He builded also the castell of Beregonium in Loughquahze on the west side of Albion, ouer against the westerne Isles, where he appointed a court to be kept for the administration of iustice: that both the Albion Scots, and also those of the same Isles might haue their accesse & resort thither for redresse of wrongs, and ending of all controuersies. The residue of his life he past in rest and peace with his neighbors the Brits and Britains, endeavouring by all meanes to knit and couple the hearts of his subiects in one friendlie bond of inward loue and amitie. Finally, sailing afterward into Ireland to be arbitrator in a matter of variance betwixt the nobles of that land, as he returned homewards by force of tempest, the ship wherein he was imbarked, was diuened upon a rocke, where he perished, after he had reigned as king amongst the Scottishmen in Albion about 25 yeeres. The rocke where he was thus cast away, hath bene euer since called rocke Fergus, after his name.

In the same season there reigned amongst the Brits one Enantus, named by Hector Boetius Eudodus, and amongst the Picts one Cruthneus Camelonus that builded a famous citie vpon the bankes of the riuer called Caron, as the Scottish writers affirme, appointing it to be the chiefe citie of all the Pictish kingdome, where in times past there was a faire commodious haven apt to harbour ships in at all seasons, but now it is dammed by in such sort, that vnderneath there appeareth anie token where that haven was: and the citie it selfe was finally subuerted by Kenneth king of Scotland, as after shall appeare. The fozenamed Cruthneus builded also the towne of Agneda, afterwards called Edenbrough, of Ethus king of the Picts, the castell was named the castell of Spaidens, for that the daughters of the Pictish kings were there kept vnder strait custodie, appointed to learne to sow & to weake, till they came to yeeres of marriage.

But now to returne to the Scottishmen. After the death of Fergus, the nobles of the realme assembled together, to take counsell whome they might chuse to succede in his place. Manie of them, in respect of the high benefits which their nation had receiued by the politike gouernement of king Fergus, would not in anie wise that his sonnes, though young of yeeres, should be forgotten; but that according to reason and equitie, the eldest of them should be elected, sith they might not otherwise deliuer themselves of the note of ingratitude towards his father, vnto whome they were more bound than with long can be well exprest.

Other hauing a speciall regard to the quiet of their commonwealth, doubted least if they crowned a child to their king, during his minority, it could not be but that there should follow strife, enuie, and contention for the gouernance of his person and realme amongst the nobles; and that in such wise, as the people being diuided into sundrie factions, the due administration of iustice should be neglected, the nobles bearing and bolstering by all kinds of iniuries done or committed by anie of their partakers.

And though it might so happen that they agreed vpon one speciall gouernor, as reason was they should; yet should he seeke to aduance his kinfolks more than reason happily required, and peraduenture do things otherwaies much displeasing to no small number of them by that his priuate authoritie. And againe, the king should no sooner come to yeeres of anie discretion, but one or other would put him in mind to take vpon him to rule the whole him selfe, before he understood what charge he had in hand; and by reason of his fraile youth he lightlie would not follow the counsell of anie, but such as consented vnto him in his sensall lusts and inordinate fantasies, which commonlie reigne in such princes as take vpon them gouernance of realmes, before they know (through want of sufficient yeeres) how to gouerne themselves.

For these and the like considerations, alledged by some of no small authoritie amongst them, it was agreed in the end, that one Feritharis the brother of the late deceased Fergus should be crowned king, and haue the gouernance of the realme during his life: and herewith in the meane time to see his nephues king Fergus his sons brought vp in princelie nurture and discipline, as appertained to the sons of a king: that after his deceasse, if he liued till anie of them were come to ripe yeeres, they might succede him in the estate and kingdome.

This ordinance also they decreed to be obserued as a law from thenceforth euer after, that if the king died leauing no issue, but such as were vnder age to succede him, then should one of his neereest cousins, such as was thought meetest to occupie the rowne, be chosen to reigne as king during his life, and after his deceasse the crowne to reuert vnto his predecesors issue without controuersie, if the same were once growne vp to lawfull age.

By this meanes then were children excluded from obtaining the crowne, least the publike libertie of the realme might chance to be put in danger. But yet was it afterwards perceiued that this deuise for choosing of kings, ministred occasion sometimes to the vncke to seeke the destruction of the nephue, and likewise to the nephue to procure the dispatch of the vncke and vnckles sonnes, with the committing of manie heinous murders of right worthy princes, to the no small danger of ouerthrowing the whole state of the commonwealth, so that finally that ordinance was clearelye abrogated, as you shall heare hereafter.

But now to my purpose. After Feritharis with the full consent of all the people was thus elected king, he was inthronized with all solemnitie in receiuing his kinglie ornaments, as his two edged sword, his scepter roiall, and his crowne of gold fashioned in forme of a rampire made for defense of a towne or fortreffe, signifieng that he took vpon him to preserve the libertie of his countrie, to see offenders duly punished, and the execution of lawes with equall punishment trulie ministred.

These ornaments of inuesture remained vnto the Scottish kings, without being in anie point changed, till the daies of Archaius king of Scotland, who establishing a perpetuall league with Charles the great, emperor and king of France, to indure for euer betwene the Scots and Frenchmen, added vnto the crowne four flower de lices, together with foure crosselets, diuided in sunder with equall spaces, rising somewhat higher than the flower de lices: that thereby the obseruing of the christian religion, and sincere faith, mainteined by the Scottish nation, might

Feritharis
chosen king.

The choosing of kings was not allowed.

Feritharis

A two edged sword.

The crowne
changed.

the custodie of a graue conncelloz, who by a common consent should haue the interpretation of those lawes if anie doubt arose, and that when anie offendor should come before the iudge, and heare the sentence read by him, the same offendor might understand that he receiued nothing but right at the iudges hands: by reason whereof it came to passe, that such offendors without repining willinglie were contented to suffer anie punishment whatsoeuer it was that the law did so appoint them. This custome grew into such force, that it neuer might yet be abrogated amongst them of the wessterne Isles, but that euen vnto this day they haue their lawiers amongst them, without whose denuntiation or decree taken out of the register, no iudgement is reputed lawfull.

These were the acts and doings of king Dozuabille, who in the 28 yere of his reigne departed this world at Berregonium, now called Dunstaffe, leaving behind him a sonne called Keuther as yet not of sufficient age to succeed in the estate. By reason whereof Pothatus the brother of Dozua-bille, a man of comelie personage and wit, apt (as was thought) to haue a realme in gouernance, was crowned king by force of law aboue remembred, debarring children vnder age to inherit the succession of the crowne.

This Pothatus had vneath reigned two yeres, when all the people began to crie out vpon him, for such tyrannicall parts as he practised as well against the meane estates as the high. And forsomuch as he being admonished of his ductie, and required to reforme certeine dishonorable vsages by him exercised, he would giue no eare thereto: therefore one Doualus gouernor of Brigantia, conspiring with other nobles of the realme to depose him, intised Keuther king Dozua-billes sonne, to take part with them, and to claime the crowne as due to him by descent from his father. And so assembling a companie of their faction sufficient for their enterprise, they entered the palace where Pothatus lay, and after reasoning with him of certeine points touching his misgouernment in the estate, diuers of their companie not fasteing till they were commanded, rashlie fell vpon him, and murdered him together with diuers of such nobles and gentlemen, as they knew to be enemies to Doualus and his friends.

After this they proclaimed Keuther king, and crowned him with all due solemnitie, diuers of the nobles of the realme being highlie displeased therewith, for that they iudged it not onelie a great offense to haue the king thus traitorously murdered, but also saw hereby the ancient ordinance of chusing their king through consent of the people, to be broken by the wicked attempt of a priuat person, and withallfull young man aduanced to the crowne, contrarie to the decree of an autentike law. Among other one Ferquhard the sonne in law of Pothatus gouernor of Lozne and Cantire, called an assemblee of the people, and began to declare what enormities were like to insue through this tyrannicall attempt of Doualus. Doualus hearing whereabout Ferquhard went, hastilie came to the place where this assemblee was made, and there slaing diuers of the chiefe, he did put Ferquhard also in great hazard of his life, who by being yet escaped his hands, and got him ouer into the Ile of Ila, whither resorted vnto him diuers of the nobles (that fauored not Douale) with a great number of the commons.

In the end, Ferquhard perswaded his companions to set all feare apart, and to returne with him into Scotland to take reuenge of Douale and his complices, being traitors and enemies to the realme and common-wealth, so that first joining hands, which they did wet in mans blood (according to the custome then vsed) they promised one to another to liue and die in the quarell, and after imbarcking themselves in certeine vessels, they entered the sea, and passed ouer into Scotland, where gathering together no small number of such as willinglie resorted vnto them to their aid, they encountered with Douale in battell, whose host twice in one daie was put to flight nere to the citie Berregonium with the losse of eight thousand men.

The night parted the fraie, but in the next morning, Douale and his partakers through great indignation conceiued, for that they were so beaten backe by Ferquhard (hauing in all his host not past 10000 persons) fiercelie came forth of their tents to giue battell afresh, and finding their enemies ready to receiue them, there was fought so cruell a battell betwixt them, that in the end either part being sore trauelled with slaughter and long fight, was glad to giue place to the other, not passing an eight hundred of all those that were present that daie in the field as then being left aliuie. Upon Douales part there was Iaine Gethus king of Picts, whose daughter king Keuther had married, with a great number of his people: also Douale himselfe with diuers of the nobles of Scotland, beside gentlemen & commons that took part with him. On the contrarie side there died also Ferquhard himselfe with diuers gouernors of tribes, beside the residue of the nobles, gentlemen & commons of Rosse, Cathenesse, Darne, Argile, Cantire, and Lozne, with them of the wessterne Isles which were there with him.

Keuther escaping with life from this bloudie encounter, in the night following departed his waies with such of his people as were left aliuie. Whereof his enemies being aduertised in the next morning, pursued after him with such diligence, that in the end they took him within a castell in Cathenesse whither he was fled for succor: he was pardoned of his life, partlie in respect of his fathers merits, and partlie againe for that it was knotone how his tender youth was such as had not deserved death by any fact, other wise than in that he had followed the counterfeit of malicious persons. By this cruell murder and huge slaughter thus committed betwixt these two nations of Scottishmen and Picts, both their forces were so greatlie infeebled, that they became an easie prey to their ancient and common enemies the Britains, who in such oportunitie of occasion thought not to sit still till the same might haplie be past and gone.

First therefore with a mightie armie the Britains invaded the Picts: the nobles of which nation perceiving themselves not able to make resistance, fled with their wiues, their children, and the most part of their goods, ouer into the Isles of Orkenie, and there assembling together, they created them a new king to haue the gouernance ouer them, who was also named Gethus, and brother to the other Gethus a little before mentioned. Here also they remained certeine yeares after, liuing in peaceable manner with the former inhabitants, whom they found there, wronging them by no iniurious dealing at all (if the Scottish historie be true). Whereof moreover as some suppose it came to passe, that these Islands of Orkenie are named by diuers writers the ancient kingdome of the Picts.

In the meane while the Britains seizing vpon such countries as these Picts had forsaken, that is to saie, the Pers, Louthian, and others, they left in diuers places where they thought expedient, garisons of men of war, to keepe the same in due subiection: and after entered into the confines of the Scottish kingdome, burning & waisting all afore them, where with such Scots as yet remained aliuie, being high-

Douale is slain.

Ferquhard is slain.

Keuther the king fled.

Keuther pursued & taken. He is pardoned of his life.

Gethus king.

why Orkenie was called Pictland as some suppose, but the truth should seeme to be that they were so called because the Picts inhabited there before they set foot in Brittain.

D. J. lie

The Scots
ouerthrowne.

He moued to indignation, came stoutlie into the field to defend their countrie, and incounting with their enemies nere to Kalendar wood, they lost two thousand of their companie: the residue also being sore chased, fled into sundrie parties for safegard of their liues.

This discomfiture put the Scottish nation into such feare and terror, that they bitterlie despaired of all recouerie, where contrariwise the Britains were so aduanced (in hope bitterlie to expell all aliens out of their Ile) that pursuing the victorie in most earnest wise, they forced Keuther and all the nobilitie of the Scottish nation that was yet left alieue, to flee for safegard of their liues into the castell of Wreggonium, where they held themselves as in the surest helde. The Britains being certified of the repaire of their enemies to Wreggonium, enuironed the castell with a strong and vehement siege, untill that the Scots within were constrained through want of vittels to eate each other, according as the lots fell by a common agrement made amongst them.

But when it came to passe, that euen those that were reputed as heads and gouernours, and in whom consisted the hope of their whole defense, did now and then come to the shambles as well as other of lesse reputation, they thought it best to trie by fleeing forth, if any of their haps might be so good as to escape the danger present, whereas by tarrying still within the fortresse, they should but deuoure one another without any reuenge for losse of their liues had vpon their fierce and cruell enemies. Whereupon by common consent there issued forth, first one Colane lord of Cantire with an hundred of his owne souldiours, and fiercelie skirmishing with the Britains, defended himselfe a good space right manfullie, though in the end both he and his whole band were bozne downe and slaine with pzease and multitude of his enemies that assailed him on each side. In the meane season, whilste he thus occupied the Britains in fight on one side, Keuther with the residue of his people brake forth by another waie, and escaping to the sea side, got ships and fled ouer into the westerne Isles, where he found a great number of other Scottishmen that were gotten thither, being scottil by Denus king of the Britains to auoid forth of the countries, which they before inhabited.

Keuther remained not long in the Isles, but passed ouer into Ireland. The Britains not a little moued for his escape with the other of the Scottish lords, reuenged their displeasure on such commons and other meane people as fell into their hands, so that such as might escape, got them into the mounteins, and liued there by roots, berries, & other wild fruits in summer, and in winter by such benefon and fleshy of wild beasts as they killed in the wilbernesse: and sometimes they came downe and made raisses vpon the Britains that occupied their houses and latus, fetching great booties verie often from amongst them.

This cruell warre lasted twelue yeres, untill in manner all such Scots and Picts as remained in Albion were brought vnder seruitude to the Britains. In which meane while, Cethus king of the Picts kept his siege roiall in Pomonia the chiefe Isle of the Orkenies. Keuther also begot of his wife a sonne named Thereus, and shortly after being procured by letters and messengers sent vnto him from the foresaid Cethus and such Scots as were yet remaining in Albion, he assembled a number of ships together, and first with a chosen power of warriors sailed to the westerne Isles, where increasing his numbers, he passed ouer into Albion, landing on the west halfe of Kosse at Lough Bruum, and there comming on land, the first person that they met with (according to a custome vsed amongst them in those daies) they slue, and wetting the points of their weapons in his blood, they first tasted thereof after their manner, then holding by their weapons into the aire, they desired of the gods that they might reuenge the blood of their elders with happie battell against the Britains their enemies. After this, hearing that Cethus king of the Picts was also entered the land with a mightie power of Germans, which were come to his aid, and was not past thirtie miles off, he staid there abiding for his comming, to the intent that joining their powers together, they might be the better able to furnish their enterprise.

The third daie after they met together with great ioy and congratulations, vnto whom with all speed a great number also of those Scottishmen and Picts that had still continued in the countrie (during the time of the persecution by the Britains) daile resorted and came flocking in from each side vnto them. Skillus king of the Britains, who succeeded after Denus, as then lately deceased, hauing knowledge hereof, assembled a great armie of his subiects, and hearing that the Scots and Picts were entered into the borders of his realme, he hasted forth to encounter with their powers, and so joining with them in battell, after long and cruell fight, in the end the victorie remained with the Scottishmen and Picts, by the great valiance and manfull prowesse of Keuther: whereupon the place where that battell was fought hath bene euer since called Keutherdale, as ye would say Keuthers ballie.

This victorie was not very pleasant to any of the parties, by reason of the great numbers of men slaine on both sides, insomuch that they were glad to fall to agrement immediatlie after, and concluded a peace, with conditions that the Scottishmen and Picts should be restored againe vnto their ancient possessions and lands in Albion. This peace continued a long time after inuolate betwixt these nations. The yere that Keuther returned thus into Albion, was before the birth of Christ 216, after the building of Rome 529, and from the creation of the world 3750. Keuther by Beda in his ecclesiasticall historie of England is named Keuda, who also supposeth him to be the first of all the Scottish princes, that set any foot in Britaine there to inhabit: his comming thither was (as seemeth to some) long after the supposed time here before alleged. And verelie there is great cause to moue a doubt of the truth of that which Hector Boetius hath written, in following (as he saith) other authors, touching the first comming into Britaine, as well of the Scots and Picts. For if it were true, that so long before the comming of the Romans into this Ile, they were here planted and growne to such puissance; it is strange that no mention is made of them in any of their writings, till about the yere 360 after Christ; as in place conuenient it shall more plainelie appere. Keuther passed the residue of his daies without any further warres, forren and ciuill, and so departed this world at Wreggonium, in the 26 yere of his reigne.

After Keuther his deceasse, his vnckles son called Keutha succeeded in the kingdome, chosen thereto by the common agrement of all the states, because that Thereus sonne to Keuther vnneth come to the age of ten yeres, was thought vnable to take the charge vpon him. Keutha therfore being thus elected to reigne as king ouer the Scottishmen, ordeined that such noblemen as had atchieued ante notable exploit in defense of their countrie, should be had in perpetuall memorie, and buried in solemne wise in sepulchres aloft vpon hills or mounteins, vpon

Scots belie-
ged deuoure
one another.

The Scots
come forth and fight.

Keuther escape-
th.

Keuther passed into Ire-
land.

They inhabit the mount-eins.

Keuther is sent for out of Ireland.

T. C. C.

The Cir-
man and of the Picts.

Keuther and Cethus met and ioyne their powers
together.

The Picts
are discomfited
by the Scots
and Picts.

whereof the first daie is the name.

A peace
concluded.

240 H.R.
499 H.R.

Keutha by Beda is named Keuda.

499 H.R.

Keutha.

An opinion for buriall of their pri-ues.

Keutha is pointed out.

The nobles conspire against the king.

upon the pointed toars: wher to this daie.

This Keall manner as were ex-
great num-for, to inhafruct them as vnto oth-pointed ho-
be receiue euerie ma-further, ech
and backe
yet the vse Scottishmen
their beast sed in the

Keutha
skillfull su-
and diseas-ordeined b-
that none
physician, practised a time they sicke or open place as came th-
declare th-
with the l-
ped the da-
For no mpasse by was accep-

Keuth
common estate to himselfe
well in th-he cause presence ged of th-
be comm-was not but also opinion prowesse Keutha
to a priuvnto thsuasion content

Thereus.

Th
of his copie in of vert lawes felle to res, so is in fo-
ces) tuings theres kindes meane the tri-
There
meane
But he and do

upon the which were set so manie obelisks or long pointed stones, as they had slaine enemies in the wars: thereof some remaine there to be seene even to this daie.

This Reutha also vnderstanding of the lacke of all manner of craftsmen in his realme, and of such as were expert in the liberall sciences, caused a great number of most perfect artificers to be sent for, to inhabit amongst his people, the better to instruct them in their occupations. Unto these also as vnto other professing anie liberall art, were appointed honest livinges, by way of fees, assigned to be received of such oxen and beestes as were killed, to euerie man of science and artificer his part. And further, each of them had certeine measures of otes and barlie in stead of yearelie annuities. For as yet the vse of coine was not known amongst the Scottishmen. The which custome of distributing their beastes, which they killed in this wise, is still vsed in the westerne Isles even to these our daies.

Reutha perceiuing furthermore that through vnskillfull surgians and physicians manie wounded and diseased persons were oftentimes cast awaie, ordeined by the aduise and consent of his counsell, that none should take vpon them as a surgion or physician, vnlesse they were by long experience well practised aforesaid in those sciences. For before that time they vsed to carie forth such persons as were sicke or otherwise hurt, and to lay them in some open place in the streets or market sted, that all such as came by, might according to their knowledge declare their aduise, and shew (if they had bene vered with the like disease) by what means they had escaped the danger, and recovered againe their health. For no man might without the note of high reproch passe by, keeping silence in this behalfe. And this was according to the custome of the old Egyptians.

Reutha thus studeing for the aduancement of the commonwealth of his subiects, continued in the estate with great prosperitie, till finally perceiuing himselfe farre growen in age, and not so able to traueil in the affaires of the realme as he was before, he caused a parlement to be assembled, and there in presence of all the estates, required to be discharged of the gouernement: and that the same might be committed vnto his cousin Thereus, who as then was not onelie of sufficient age to take it vpon him, but also of such towardnesse, as that in each mans opinion he was thought likelie to attaine vnto the prouesse of anie of his noble progenitoirs. Thus Reutha, after he had reigned 17 yeares, returned to a priuat life, resigning the whole rule of his realme vnto the aforesaid Thereus, being through his perswasion receiued as king of all estates by common consent there in that present assemblee.

This Thereus for the first six yeares was equall in all points of princelie gouernement to anie of his predecessors, but afterward he changed his copie in such maner, that iustice and all other kinds of vertue being set apart, he neither regarded the lawes of the gods, nor yet of men; but gaue himselfe to all sort of filthinesse and most detestable vices, so farre forth, that his subiects (as their custome is in following the maners and vsages of their princes) became so outrageous in their licentious liuings, and namelie the nobles and gentlemen, that thereof ensued theft, murder, rape, spoiling, and all kinds of oppression of those sillie soules that had no meanes to resist, so as in fine, diuers gouernours of the tribes perceiuing no hope of amendment while Thereus should reigne, conspired together, deuising meanes how to depose him of all kingly authoritie. But he hauing notice of their purposed intentions, and doubting the sequele thereof, conuied himselfe out of the way in most secret wise, fleeing for succour vnto the Britains, vnto whome though he made earnest sute for aid to be restored home againe, yet could he purchase no such fauour amongst them: so that leding a miserable life a long time after within the citie of Dork, he finally there ended his daies. He reigned in Scotland about 12 yeares or more.

Immediatlie after this his auoiding the realme, the nobles and peres chose one Conanus lord of Galoway to rule the estate as gouernour, whose authoritie had bene euer great amongst the people. His studie was chieflie imploied how to reduce the lords and nobles of the realme into concord and friendlie amitie, where before through the negligence of Thereus each sought others destructions. Also he caused due punishment to be executed vpon all such as liued by robbing and reuling; of whome in the beginning of his gouernement there was no small number: but he wooded them forth, in such wise that yet he left off, there was not one of them to be found. At length, after it was vnderstood that Thereus was dead, this Conanus renounced the administration in presence of all the estates assembled in parlement at Berregonium, where by common consent, Josina brother of Thereus was chosen to reigne as king, for that Thereus had left no issue behind him to succeed.

This Josina being proclaimed king, renewed the ancient leagues with the Brits and Britains. He had physicians in great estimation; for that during his abode in Ireland, he was nourished of a child amongst them, and by reason thereof had some knowledge in the facultie, speciallie he vnderstood the vertues and properties of herbes, where with in those daies the Scots vsed to heale and remedie all manner of sores and diseases, which as then were set in number, in respect of the sundrie kinds which are now known amongst vs; and all by reason of the superfluous feeding and exesse of meats and drinks vsed in our time, whereas our elders sufficed with a little, liued without surfeiting, the chiefest breeder of such strange and manifold sicknesses. In this Josina his daies it chanced that a storming gale ship was driven and drowned by force of a streinable tempest nere vnto the shore of one of the Scottish Isles, where diuerse of those that were within the same ship, mariners and other escaped to land, amongst whome were two ancient and fatherlie old men of right reuerend aspect and countenance.

These two in companie with some of the inhabitants of that Ile came ouer into Berregonium, where the king as then sojourned. They were Spanishe priests of the pagane religion, whose purpose was to haue gone vnto Athens in Grecia (as some write) but whence soeuer they were, and what purpose soeuer they had, certeine it is they were philosophers; and therefore the king receiued them most tofullie, doing them all the honoz he could deuise, and commanding that they should be lodged within his owne palace, where they had all things needfull, and accordinglie ministred vnto them.

These philosophers, after they had refreshed themselves at their ease for the space of 14 daies, the king caused them to come before him, requiring them to shew their opinion what they thought by the nature of the soile, the maners and customs of his people, so far forth as they had seene and heard. They without pausing for answer declared, that as yet they had not had time to learne those things, but onelie thus far by coniecture they supposed, that the ground was more like to be fruitfull of mettall mines, than of coine and graine, as containing far more riches vnderneath the earth than aboue; this they said that Thereus fled to the Britains.

Conanus.

Conanus is chosen king.

Conanus persecuteth offendours.

He renounceth the estate.

Josina elected king.

Josina.

Surfeiting the cause of strange diseases, which so commonlie now reigne.

Two ancient philosophers through shipwreck arrive in Scotland, and are tofullie receiued of the king.

Reutha.

An opinion for buriall of their prince obelisks or pointed stones.

Reutha resigneth the estate vnto his cousin Thereus.

Thereus negligent and vicious.

Philosophers arrive at Berregonium.

The Scottish
religion re-proued.

Uprightlik-
ing well rewarded at Gods hands.

Josina departed this life.

Finna-
mus.

Prelats ordered in religion.
Druides in the old Sco-tish tong called Durceglis.

The Scots
mistake Man for Angleſe.

The authori-tie of the Druides increased.

they gathered by the influence of the heauens vnder the which it laie. And as for the rites and vsages of the people, in one point they could in no wise commend them, for that in religion they followed the superstitious rites of the Egyptians, worshipping the immortall gods in the shape of beastes and fowls; whereas God was euen the same that did comprehend both heauen and earth, with the waters and all things in them contained, whome they named nature, and as it were the primordially cause of beginning of all things, vnto whome it was not possible to deuise anie similitude of liuing thing that might in anie wise represent him. Therefore (said they) men ought to worship the liuing God with fire and deuout prayer, building him a temple for that purpose, and onelie vnto him to burne incense, and to performe vowes: at whose hands such as liued chastly, vprightlie, and according to the rules of iustice, ought euer to looke for some high benefit, where other that liued contrarie might euer stand in doubt of contrarie reward.

With these their sensible instructions they perswaded manie of the Scottish nation vnto their opinion, though the greatest part would by no means followe anie other kind of religion, than that which they had receiued from their elders: neither could anie of them be brought to thinke otherwise of the sun, the mone, and stars, but that there was a certaine diuine power or godhead in euerie one of them. And thus much of these strangers briedlie and by the way, who came into Scotland at this present: but now to proceed with our purpose. When Josina had reigned 24 yeares, he departed out of this world at Berregonium, being a man of verie great age. He left behind him a sonne named Finnanus, who a little before his fathers deceasse was by consent of the people proclaimed king of Scotland.

This Finnanus had the nobles of his realme in such estimation, that he ordeined that nothing should be decreed or practised touching the publike affaires of the realme, except they were first made priuie and of counsell in the same. He sought also to win the fauour of his people by mekenesse and gentle intreating of them, insomuch that though he went about to restore the old religion somewhat defaced by his father through information (as is said) of the two aboue mentioned sage philosophers, yet did he not constrain anie man to worship the gods, otherwise than his fantasie serued him. He was the first that instituted those prelats, which gouerned after the manner of bishops, in all matters pertaining to religion, and were called in the Scottish tong Durceglis in Latine Druides. These Druides were appointed to be resident within the Ile of Man, as the Scottishmen hold opinion: but other thinke rather that they were resident in Angleſe, in the British tong called Mon. Vnto these also hauing great liuings assigned them, were the inferiour priests subiect, as receiuing at their hands all iniunctions and orders for the vse of their sacrifices and other ceremonies.

These Druides afterwards applied themselves so earnestlie to the studie of philosophie, as well naturall as morall, that they were had in no small reuerence of the people, as they that were both accounted and knowne to be men of most perfect life and innocencie: by means whereof their authoritie daillie so far forth increased, that finallie iudgements in most doubtful matters were committed vnto their determinations, offenders by their discretion punished, and such as had well deserued accordinglie by their appointments rewarded. Moreouer such as refused to obey their decrees and ordinances, were by them excommunicated, so that no creature durst once keepe companie with such, till they were reconciled againe, and cleaue by the same Druides absolved.

Plinie, Cornelius Tacitus, Strabo, and Iulius Caesar, with diuers other approued authors, make mention of these Druides, signifying how the first beginning of their religion was in Britaine (which some comprehend all whole vnder the name of Albion) and from thence was the same religion brought over into France. Finnanus was not onelie praised for his setting forth of that heathen religion, but also for his politike gouernement of the estate in so full rest and quietnesse. Neither was his fame a little advanced for the marriage concluded and made betwixt his sonne Durfus and Agasia daughter to the king of Britains, for by that alliance he won diuers of the British nation vnto his friendship. Finallie, this Finnanus died at Camelon, being come thither to visit the king of Picts as then soe diseased, after he had reigned about the space of thirtie yeares. His bodie was conueied vnto Berregonium, and there buried amongst his predecessors.

After him succeeded his sonne the forenamed Durfus, farre differing from his noble father in all vertuous demeanour, as he that was altogether giuen to banketting and excessive drunkennesse. Such of the nobles as his father had in high reuerence he made light account of; accepting onelie those that of their wicked deuiſes could find out new kinds of voluptuous pleasures, through whose persuasions some of his peeres he confined, some he spoiled of all their substance & inheritance, other he put to death without iust cause or anie kind of lawfull means. Furthermore he forsooke the companie of his lawfull wife Agasia, causing hir to be forced and abused by diuers vile persons in most villanous manner.

With these and the semblable inordinat practises he procured the indignation of his people so far forth against him, that those of the westerne Isles with them of Cantire, Lozne, Argyle, and Koffe, conspired together in the reformation of such disorders as were daillie vsed in the administration of iustice, by the wicked suggestion of euill disposed counsellors, against whome they pretended to make their war, and not against their king. There were also so manie that fauoured them in this quarrell, and so few that leane to the king to aid him against them, that he was constrained to dissemble with them for a time, in promising not onelie to remove from him such as they would appoint, but also to be ordered in all things according as they should thinke good. And to put them in beleefe that he ment as he spake, he committed some such counsellors as he had about him vnto ward, and other some (of whome he little passed) he sent vnto them as prisoners, to receiue such punishment by death or otherwise, as they should thinke conuenient.

He further also in presence of Dozo the gouernour of Cantire, sent to him for that purpose, swore in solemne wise afore the image of Diana, to performe all such promises and covenants as he was agreed vpon, and had made vnto the conspirators. With which cloked dissimulation they being deceived, came without suspect of further guile vnto Berregonium, where at their first comming he was ready to receiue them (as seemed by his seiued countenance) with glad some hart and most friendly meaning; but they were no sooner entered the castle, but that a number of armed men appointed for the purpose fell vpon them, and slue them all without mercie.

This heinous act being once signified abroad in their countries amongst their friends and kinfolke,

How to kill Durfus being diseased.

Durfus is diseased.

Durfus.

Ewin is cho-
sing.

Ewin.

Howeering of his first begins.

Craftie and cloked dis-
simulation.

Howeering of his first begins.

The battle of Godwine.

A notable op-
portunitye.

A craftie and cloked dis-
simulation.

caused a after, in came befo straightlie danger as for with incountri beaten do both king reigne. W doubting gainst the
perill fled nobles of
for the th to haue a them, lea venge his at point t contrarie through a mour of A
sons for th commit t promising name. W the peeres
les sonne Dialand, Durfus h
him, for manner, & for that th continued

Ad C regonium great reio with also hands in h and faithfu custome o
command dred yeare in somuch red the san in their lib this day a such as in tion of a n
capitaine, ended, an proclamat in his iuri by anie of ancient & haue bene
him name
make a cer
him, in su vice, when sacred nam
But no
die was to nison, and about to tr
thermore, ded throug
son delites should be trauell, as therbeds o
themselves
and to bear

caused a new commotion, so that within a few daies after, manie thousands of men in furious rage came before the castell, and besieged the king most straighthlie therein. When perceiuing himselfe in such danger as he knew not well how to escape, came forth with such companie as he had about him, and incountering with his enemies, was straighthwaies beaten downe among them, and so at once lost there both kingdome and life in the ninth yeare of his reigne. Durstus being thus dispatched, his children doubting the indignation of the people conceived against them for their fathers fault, to auoid the perill fled ouer into Ireland, and immediatlie the nobles of the realme assembled themselves together for the choosing of a new king, in no wise minding to haue anie of Durstus his race to reigne ouer them, least they would seeke by some means to reuenge his death: howbeit at length when they were at point to haue fallen at variance in suffering of contrarie opinions about the election of their prince, through a twittie oration made by Coranus gouer-nour of Argyle, who alledged manie weightie reasons for the auoiding of sedition, they all agreed to commit the free election into the same Coranus, promising firmelie to accept whome soeuer he should name. Hereupon Coranus consulting a little with the pères of the realme, named one Ewin the vncle les sonne of Durstus, who as then remained in Ireland, whether he had withdrawn himselfe in Durstus his daies, being banished the realme by him, for that he could not atwaie with his corrupt manners. This election was acceptable to all estates, for that thereby the administration of the kingdome continued in the line of their former kings.

And Ewin shortly after was brought forth of Ireland with all regall solemnitie, and at Ber-regonium placed vpon the stone of marble, to the great reioysing of the people there assembled. Herewith also the nobles of the realme, putting their hands in his, bound themselves by oth to be loiall and faithfull subiects vnto him in all points, which custome of swearing fealtie then first by Ewins commandement, begun and continued manie hundred yeares after amongst his and their posteritie; in somuch that the capitaine of the tribes also required the same kind of oth of them that inhabited with in their liberties, which in part remaineth yet vnto this day amongst those of the westerne Isles, and such as inhabit in the mounteins. For at the creation of a new gouernour, whome they name their capitaine, they vse the like ceremonies; which being ended, at the next saire kept within that countrie, proclamation is made, that no man inhabiting with in his iurisdiction, shall name this new gouernour by anie other name from thenceforth, than by the ancient & accustomed name as such rulers afortime haue bene called by. And that so oft as they heare him named, they shall put off their caps or hats, and make a certeine courtesie in signe of honour due to him, in such maner as we vse in hearing diuine seruice, when anie holie myserie is in doing, or anie sacred name of the almightie creator recited.

But now touching king Ewin, his chiefest stu-die was to mainteine iustice throughout his dominion, and to weed out such transgressours as went about to trouble the quiet estate of his subiects. Furthermore, considering what inconueniencies procéded through the vse of voluptuous pleasures & wanton delites, he ordeined that the youth of his realme should be trained to endure hardnesse, paine, and trauell, as to lie vpon hard boards without anie sea-therbeds or pillows vnder them. Also to exercise themselves to throw the dart, to shoot, to wrestle, and to beare armour aswell in time of peace as of warre; that when need required, trauell and such kind of exercises should be no paine but pleasure vnto them; where otherwaies lacke of vse might make the same intollerable. Whilist Ewin is thus occupied about the setting forth of necessarie ordinances for the wealth of his realme, the king of the Picts did send vnto him ambassadours to require his aid against the Britains, who were entred his countrie in robbing and spoiling the same.

Ewin consenting quicklie to that request, lent an armie forthwith, and with all speed passed forward to ioine with the Picts, in purpose to reuenge the old iniuries done to his nation by the Britains, who likewise were as ready to receiue battell, as the Scots and Picts were desirous to giue it, so that both the armies incountering together (the Scots and Picts on the one side, and the Britains on the other) there ensued a sore conflict betwixt them, continued with vniuersall slaughter till night parted them in furdor; no man as then able to iudge who had the better, but either part being pricke to their owne losses, withdrew themselves further off from the place of the battell, so that the Scots and Picts the same night got them into the mounteins of Pic-land, and the Britains so lone as it was day made homewards with all speed towards their countrie, leaving no small preie and botie behind them, which the Scottishmen and the Picts recovered, coming downe with all speed from the mounteins, when they once heard that their enemies were departed.

King Ewin being returned from this iournie, determined to passe the residue of his life in rest and quietnesse, appointing iudges in euerie part of his realme, for the ministring of iustice and executing of lawes, according to the due forme and ordinance of the same. He appointed also such as should watch for the apprehension of theues and robbers by the high wayes, assigning them linings of the common trea-surie to liue by. And there be enen vnto this day that hold still such linings, though the office be waie out of vse and forgotten.

After this, he builded a castell not farre distant from Berregonium, which he named after his owne name Ewinum: but afterwards it was called Dunstaffage, which is as much to say, as Steuenes castell, which name it beareth at this present. Final-lic, this Ewin, after he had reigned to the great weale of the realme, about 19 yeares, he departed this life, leaving behind him a son base begotten, named Gillus, who causing his fathers funerals to be executed with all solemn pompe and ceremonies, raised by some after sundry obelisks about his graue nere vnto Dunstaffage, where he was buried.

There were present also at the buriall, two of Durstus his sonnes, whome Ewin in his life time had reuoked home out of Ireland, where they were in exile. Both these, as well the one as the other, because they were twins, and not knowne whether of them came first into the world, looked to be king after Ewin: their names were Dathan and Dorgall.
And such malicious emulation and enuious spite rose betwixt the two brethren, for the attaining of their purpose, that greater could not be deuised, which Gillus, like a craftie & subtil for, by couert means sought still to augment; and in the end causing them to come together for some conclusion of agreement, at length when he had set them further at ods than they were before, he procured a number of souldiers appointed for the purpose to raise a tumult (as though it had bene in taking of contrarie parts) and there to slaue them both.

Thus Gillus hauing brought to purpose that he came for, shewed in countenance as though he had bene much offended therewith, and done what he could

A doubtfull
battell.

Dunstaffage
is builded.

The craftie swoyking of Gillus.

Durstus two sonnes are slaine.

D.ij.

could

could to haue appeased the matter; and herewith he cometh running forth with a high voice, declaring to his companie, that if he had not made good thist for himselfe, he had bene slaine by the hands of Dothan and Doggall, who fell into such mischance themselves, as they had prepared for other. Whereupon also he required his friends and seruants most earnestlie to conueie him into some sure place, where he might be out of danger, and in better securitie: in so much that manie of those that heard him, giuing credit to his words, went with him with all speed vnto Dunstaffage, where being receiued into the castle with diuers of the nobles that followed him, he got him into a gallerie, and there making an inuective oration against the sonnes of Durstus, and touching by the way what perill might insue to the commonwealth by ciuill diuision, he perswaded them to commit the rule into his hands, vntill it might be certeinlie knowne, vnto whome the same of right appertained.

Those that were present, perceiuing to what issue his painted processe tended, and doubting lest if they should seeme to stand against him at that instant in this his demand, they might happilie be the first that should repent the bargaine, consented to proclaim him king: whereupon he required all such as were present, to sware vnto him fealtie, and to doe him homage according to the custome. And herewith agreeable as he had before promised, and according to his fathers will (as he alledged) he distributed among them all such cattell as belonged to his said father. Wherby he wane the greater fauour of manie, but yet not iudging himselfe altogether in suertie, by reason that Dothan had left behind him three sonnes, as then remaining in the Ile of Man, in the bringing by of the Druides, he purposed therefore to dispatch them also for the better assurance of his estate, and thereupon he made a iournie thither himselfe, feigning as though he meant nothing but all loue and frendlie affection towards the children, by which meanes he gat two of them into his hands, the one named Lismorus, being about twelue yeeres of age, and the other Comacus that was two yeeres younger. The youngest of the three named Ederus, being about seven yeeres old, as his better hap was, chanced to be sicke at that time, by reason whereof he escaped his hands: Gillus feigning as though he wished to haue the other two brought by like the children of a prince, he led them away with him into Scotland, leauing certein of his seruants behind him, to rid Ederus the youngest out of the way at leisure; and as for the other twaine, the night following after his coming home to Dunstaffage, he caused them to be murdered, euen in their tutors armes, whose aid most pitifullie they besought and required. But the woman that had the keeping of Ederus now in his sicknesse, provided more warlike for his safeguard, for the smelling out what was the kings purpose, in the dead of the night got hir selfe together with Ederus into a ship, and passed ouer into Argile, where being set on land, she caried him on hir shoulders by into the mounteins, and there with in a secret den sustained his languishing life for certein moneths in great care and miserie.

Gillus notwithstanding these his cruell acts, shewed yet in outward apperance that no man was more desirous of the quiet state and prosperous successe of the commonwealth than he: ever reasoning among his nobles, and that in the presence of his commons touching the maintenance of iustice, & punishment of misdoers, whereas he himselfe thirsted continually, and most of all after the blood of those whom he doubted anie thing likelie to attempt the reuenge of his wicked misgouernance: in so much that he caused in one place and other, all such to be murdered and slaine as bare anie good will toward the lawfull line of Durstus.

Now the people seeing the daillie slaughter of the nobilitie, and at the last growing to be verie sore moued against him, namelie those of Galloway, Bile, Carrick, and Coningham, with them of Cantire, Lozue, and Argile, they assembled their powers together, and with all speed marched forth towards the place where they thought to find the tyrant: who hearing of this their conspiracie, assembled such assistance as he could make, & hauing no other refuge but to trie the matter by battell, made towards his enemies with more speed than good successe: for yet the two armies came to loining, a great number of Gillus his friends fled to the contrarie part, so that hereupon doubting the issue if he were constrained to fight, he stole priuilie from amongst the residue of his folks, and getting into a fishers bote, conueied himselfe ouer into Ireland: whose departure being once knowne, his souldiours yielded themselves vnto Cadall gouernoz of Galloway, who was capitaine generall of all the conspirators, and now by the consent of all the estates created gouernoz of the realme till they had chosen a king.

This Cadall, immediatlie vpon the great authoritie giuen him, gat first all the best fortresses into his hands, as Beragonium, Dunstaffage, and other: then he passed ouer into the Ile of Ila, to prouide the better for the resisting of Gillus, if he shuld attempt anie thing by purchasing aid amongst them of the weserne Isles. Whither was brought vnhimto also, the young Ederus (by such of Durstus his friends as had escaped the cruell hands of Gillus) whome Cadall caused to be honorablie conueied vnto Episke the chiefest cite of Galloway, there to be brought vp in princelie nurture, that comming to full age, he might the better be able to take vpon him the gouernance.

In which meane while Gillus made all the friends in Ireland that he could, in so much that vpon such golden promises as he made vnto the chiefest gouernors there, they consented to aid him with all their forces. Wherof Cadall being aduertised, he thought it best that a king should be chosen, and thereby an vnitie to be framed amongst all the estates of the realme, whereupon causing a counsell to be assembled for the same intent, by common agreement, one Ewin, a man of worthie fame, nephew to king Finian by his brother Douall, was in the end proclaimed king: who was latelie come from the Ile of Gowere into Albion, in companie with Cadall, and kept himselfe close hitherto within the said Ile, for doubt of Gillus that sought amongst other to haue destroyed him also.

This Ewin, being the second of that name, made great prouision in the beginning of his reigne to resist the said Gillus his enimie. And hearing that he had bene in the Ile of Ila, and put the same to fire and sword, he prepared an armie and ships also, to transport therewith ouer into Ireland, there to reuenge that iniurie vpon such as had aided Gillus therein to the hinderance of his countrie. The forenamed Cadall gouernoz of Galloway, was appointed also to haue the leading of this armie: who taking the sea at Dunstaffage, directed his course straight ouer vnto the coasts of Ireland, where taking land and encountering with his enemies, he put them to the worse, in so much that Gillus fearing to fall into his aduersaries hands, fled out of the field into the next wood, where he thought to haue saved himselfe. His souldiours also perceiuing him to be fled, gaue ouer the field, and yielded themselves vnto Cadall, who took them to grace, and forthwith sent

The nobles
the high seare consented to create Gillus
king.

Gillus goeth about to murder Dothan's sonnes also.

A detestable murder.

Dothan
is slain.

Gillus commends a seale to iustice.

Gillus taken.

Gillus beheaded.

A shipwreck
by a tempest.

Cadall for his good & faithful service is rewarded.

Gillus departeth secretly and getteth ouer into Ire-
land.
Cadall of Galoway is then sen gouernoz of the realme.

An interblew between the king of Scots and Ireland.
The people of Dykeney inuade Earle
Earle.

Ireland and other take Episke north to be so farre north.

Gillus pur-cheth all Ireland.

Dothan's king of Dykeney slayeth himselfe.

Ewin the cond of the name chosen
king.

Ennerioship is built up.

Ewin.

Ennerne
headed.

Cadall with an armie
sent into Ireland.

sent found and b was a
him in the fa
the co

Th
passe turne tempe all the voiage
of so fa nie wa
of thei toke in sensu land, t
him in also m way, a sundzi made rie tha

the kin there r
men a Suzora Dicks, leaving thus ac where
of Rol Bladla
robbin
of Rol
sted to his sud
not, ha small four i of wo tries, t throu Bladu
come i ended ney: i mongt

Afte
and at a cite the fan dors, i with m of the g other fi
this cit where i other ci water nesse, a times p manie,
the cou
same w furres, tie is a rich and dise, so for his both in

sent out certeine companions to seeke Gillus, who found him in a den closed about with thicke woods and bushes, where he had lien hid certeine daies, and was almost starued for hunger. Those that found him immediatlie strooke off his head, and presented the same vnto Cadall, to the great reioicing of all the companie.

Thus after that Cadall had atchiued his enterprisse with good successe, he took the sea againe to returne into Scotland, but by meanes of a greuous tempest, he lost the greatest part of his armie, with all the spoile and riches that they had gotten in that voyage. Which mischance sore blemished the glozie of so famous a victorie, so that the reioicing of manie was turned into dolefull mourning for the losse of their friends and kinsfolke, but namelie Cadall toke it to greivouslie, that nothing could be more offensive vnto him. Howbeit, after he was come on land, the king and other of the nobles recomforted him in all that they might, and the king gaue him also much faire lands, with diuers castels in Galloway, in recompense of his good faithfull seruice at sundrie times shewed in defense of his countrie, and made him gouernor of Galloway also, which he verie thankfullie accepted.

After this king Ewin came to an interuiew with the king of Picts in the borders of Galloway, and there renewed th' ancient leage betwixt the Scottish men and the Picts. For more corroboration wherof Siora the daughter of Oethus the third king of the Picts, was ioined in marriage with Ederus, the solemnization being kept at Epiake. These things thus accomplished, Ewin returned to Duffasage, where being certified by letters from the lieutenant of Rolfe, that the Islanders of Orkney had passed Orkney firth, and were entred into Cathnessie, robbing and spoiling that countrie with a great part of Rolfe, he leuied an armie with all speed, and hastened towards the enemies, constraining them by his sudden coming to fight whether they would or not, hauing no leisure to get awaie, so that with small resistance they were vanquished and chased, some into the mounteins, and other to the sea side: of whom part escaped by boates ouer into their countries, the residue of them in this their sudden overthrow being either slaine, drowned, or taken. But Blasius the king of Orkney, for that he would not come into his enemies hands, slue himselfe. And thus ended this enterprisse against the enemies of Orkney: greatlie to the increase of Ewins fame amongst the Scottish nation.

After this he visited the west parts of his realme, and at the mouth of the riuer of Lochtey he builded a citie which he named Enuerlochtey, infranchising the same with a sanctuarie for the refuge of offenders. This citie afterwards was much frequented with merchants of France and Spaine, by reason of the great abundance of samons, herrings, and other fish which was taken there. The old ruines of this citie in part remaine to be seene in that place where it stood, euen to this day. He likewise built an other citie in the east part of the realme nere to the water called Lochnessie, which he named Enuernessie, after the name of the water. Whither in times past there resorted manie merchants of Germanie, with such merchandize as the inhabitants of the countrie there stood in need of, exchanging the same with them for marterne skins, and other such fures, wherewith they made their returne. This citie is as yet remaining, and beareth the old name, rich and well stored with diuers kinds of merchandize, so that this Ewin proued a most famous prince for his warlike exploits right fortunatelie atchiued both in peace and warre. And finallie vnderstanding the death of his verie deere and intrelle beloued friend Cadall, he repaired vnto Epiake, as well to giue order for the pacifying of his sones being at variance for their fathers inheritance, as also to doe the more honor to his friend now deceased, by erecting some monument nere vnto his sepulchre. Comming therefore to Epiake, and setting an accord betwixt the young men, he caused an image to be made in all points resembling the personage of Cadall, as nere as might be: which he placed in the midst of the market stee, commending the same to be honozed with burning of incense and other dutie ceremonies. Within a few daies also, through inward sorrow, as was thought, for the losse of so deere a friend, he began to wax sicke himselfe, and at length perceiuing he should not escape present death, he caused Ederus (of whom before mention is made) to be brought vnto him, into whose hands with manie wholesome aduertisements how to vse himselfe in gouernement of his subiects, he wholie resigned the estate, the which after his deceasse he knew to be due vnto him without all question and controuersie: and afterward departed this world, when he had reigned seuentene yeares continuallie for the most part in high wealth and felicitie.

After the deceasse of Ewin, Ederus was, in manner before expressed, receiued for king by the whole assent of all the Scottishmen. Whose cheefe delight was altogether in hunting and keeping of hounds and grethounds, to chase and pursue wild beasts, and namelie the wolfe the heardmans so, by meanes wherof his aduancement was much more acceptable amongst the nobles, who in those daies were wholy giuen to that kind of pleasure and pastime. In the beginning of his reigne there was no trouble towards, the publike state of the realme being maintained by vpright iustice, and all transgressions through terror of due punishment politikelie repressed.

The first that went about to put him to any notable trouble, was one Bredus of the Isles, nere of kin to Gillus that usurper and murderer, who with a power of Irishmen, and other of the western Isles landed in Argile, wasting & spoiling the countrie with fire & sword, wherof Ederus being aduertised (who was at the same time in those parts hunting amongst the mounteins) gathered an armie with all speed, and hastening to the place where his enemies shipt late at anchor, he first burned the same, to take awaie all meanes from them to escape by flight. The morning next following he did set vpon them also at vnwares: of whom some he slue, and the residue being taken, either in the fight or chase by his commandement were hanged, and cruellie executed to the example of all others.

After this, he passed ouer into the western Isles, where he did execution vpon such as had aided Bredus, putting some to death, and causing other to fine at his pleasure, and depriuing some bitterlie of all that euer they had. At his returne againe into Scotland, there met him ambassadoys sent from Cassiblane kings of the Britains, requirring him of aid against Julius Cesar, who (as the same king had perfect vnderstanding) was appointed verie hostile to passe the seas from France, ouer into this Ile, with a mightie power of Romans, to subdue the inhabitants vnto the feigniozie and iurisdiction of Rome.

Ederus receiued these ambassadoys verie courteously: and forsomuch as their maisters request required counsell, he caused his lords which were then present, to assemble together the next daie, afore whom he willed that Androgeus, cheefe of the British ambassadoys, should declare the effect of his message, Cadall deceased.

Ewin resigned the estate.

Ederus deceased.

Ederus.

Bredus invaded the Scots.

Ederus burnt his enemies ships.

Cassiblane king of the Britains requirreth of the Scottishmen aid against the Romans.

Androgeus cheefe ambassador of the Britains declared the effect of his message.

The Scots
grant to aid
the Britains
against the Romans.

Cadallane & Donald with ten thousand Scottishmen
send to aid
the Britains.

c 129 H.B.
60 H. B.

The Brit-
tains refuse aid being offered them.

Julius Cesar
inadeth this land the second time.

The Brit-
tains are ouer-throwne.

Julius Cesar
his message to the Scots
and Picts.

The answer
of the Scots
and Picts to Cesar his ambassadors.

sage, which he did so eloquentlie, and uttering such sensible matter, how it stood the Scottishmen vpon to aid the Britains against such common enemies to all nations as the Romans were, that in the end it was concluded by the king, with the aduise of his nobles, that he should not onlie send a power to aid the Britains against the Romans, but also send some of his lords with Androgeus and his associates vnto Cethus king of the Picts, to moue him to doe the like: who hearing how reasonable their demands were, promised further to accomplish the same.

Thus the British ambassadors hauing sped according to their desires, repaired homewards: immedialtie vpon whose departure, both the kings Ederus & Cethus leuied their armies, & sent them forth towards London, whereas then Cassibilane sojourned. I find that the Scots were ten thousand men vnder the leading of Cadallane gouernor of Galloway, the sonne of Cadall before remembred, and one Donald gouernor of Argile. But what successe followed of this first iourne which Cesar made into Britaine, ye shall find the same in the historie of England more at length expressed. The yeere that Julius Cesar came to invade Britaine, was the fourth of Ederus his reigne, from the creation of the world 3912 complet, which is after Quassier Harilons account 54 before the coming of our Saviour, and 692 after the building of Rome.

The Scottishmen and Picts hauing their part of the spoile which the Romans at their departure left behind them, were sent home to their countries with great thanks and rewards for their pains, but the Britains were so exalted in pride by the departure of the Romans, that they beleued verelie they should haue no more to doe with those enemies, or if they had they thought themselves strong enough to repell them without aid of other. By meanes wherof when king Ederus was informed how the Romans prepared to invade them afresh, and had sent them word thereof, offering to them his aid: they made no account of that offer, but answered that it was not necessarie, for euerie light inuasion of forren enemies, to seeke helpe at other mens hands, being of puissance sufficient of themselves to resist the same well enough.

But of this refusall of so friendlie an offer, it was not long per the Britains fore repented them. For shortly after Julius Cesar with a farre greater power than that which he brought with him at the first time, landed here in this Ile amongst them againe: and being at thre sundrie times fiercelie incountred by king Cassibilane, at length he put the same Cassibilane with his Britains to flight, slaying and taking a great number of them. Amongst other of the prisoners were thre of their chiefeest captaines, Androgeus, Cilentoriges, and Tenantius. By reason of which ouerthrow Cassibilane was so discouraged, that doubting further mischefe, he yielded himselfe vnto Cesar, accepting such conditions of peace as were appointed him, and for performance of covenants, deliuered sufficient pledges.

Cesar hauing thus conquered the Britains, sent his ambassadors vnto the kings of the Scottishmen and Picts, requiring them to submit themselves as Cassibilane had done, or else he had them looke for open warres at the Romans hands, which they might assure themselves they should in no wise be able to susteine, considering their mightie and huge puissance, hauing the most part of the whole world at their commandement already. Wherevnto aswell the one king as the other made this or much what the like answer, that they were bent soner to lose their liues than their libertie. Which their resolution, if they were put to the trial, should be euidentlie proued by the deed it selfe.

Cesar hauing receiued this answer from these two nations, he sendeth new messengers vnto them with a more rough message, who not onlie by threate but also by great reasons went about to persuade them vnto submission. But they persisting in their former opinion for defense of their liberties, and utterly refusing all manner of bondage, would incline by no meanes to come in any bond of friendship with the Romans. After the returne of these last messengers, Cesar was fullie resolved to enter into their countries, to force them vnto that by dint of sword, wherevnto by treatie he might not induce them: and had set forward on that iourne shortly after indee, if he had not bene called backe into France, to pacifie sundrie commotions there raised by the revolting of the people inhabiting in those countries, where the Picards and Normans, with other the inhabitants nere about Chartres doe now dwell.

The common Scottish chronicles record, how Julius Cesar came as far as Kalendar wood, and there wan by force the citie of Camelon, where the Pictish kings vled most to sojourn. Herevnto the same chronicles adde, that Cesar builded a great stone-house of 24 cubits in heighth, & of 12 cubits in bredth, of square beuen stones, right workemanlike framed, which house they saie Cesar caused to be vled in stead of a iudgement hall, and here placed it nere the river of Caron, ouer against the forenamed citie of Camelon, as a witnesse that the Romans armie had bene so far forward within that countrie. Such an house there remaineth to be seene euen vnto this daie, and is called Julius hoff, that is Julius hall, or Julius court. Howbeit, other more agreeable to the likelihood of a truth, write that this house was sometimes a temple builded to the honor of Claudius Cesar, and of the goddess Minerva, by the Romane capteine Vespasian, at such time as he made wars in that countrie, before his aduancement to the empire.

But to returne vnto Ederus. About the same time, in which he looked to be inuaded by Julius Cesar and the Romans, and for that purpose had sent for them of the westerne Isles to reinforce his host, he was now inforced to conuert it another waie, for there was one Murketus, nephue vnto the aboue remembred Gillus, that came with a nauie out of Ireland to rob and spoile those Isles, being destitute as then of men to resist him. But Ederus hearing thereof, dispatched Cadallanus with an armie into those parties for defense of his subiects: which Cadallanus behaved himselfe so politikelie in this exploit, that setting vpon the enemies as they laie at anchor, he took them in the night season, without making any great defense, and after hanged them by along the shore side within the Ile of Galloway: Murket himself being honored with an higher place to hang in than all the rest, as due to him that was their chiefe head and leader in that voiage. The remnant of Ederus his reigne passed without any other notable trouble: and so after he had reigned 38 yeeres, he deceased a verie old man, about the 23 yeare of the empire of Augustus Cesar. He was buried also at Dunstaffage with all due pompe & solemnitie, hauing diuers obelisks (as the custome then was) erected and set vp about the place where he was so intumulate.

After him reigned his sonne Ewin, the third of that name, nothing like in any princelie qualitie vnto his noble progenitors, but contrariwise infamed by all kind of vices. In the first yeeres of his reigne he was wholly drownd in lasciuious lecherie, abandoning himselfe altogether to lie weltering

Cesar sendeth new messengers vnto them with a more rough message, who not onlie by threate but also by great reasons went about to persuade them vnto submission.

Kalendar wood, and there wan by force the citie of Camelon, where the Pictish kings vled most to sojourn.

Julius hoff.

Murketus nephue vnto Gillus came with a nauie out of Ireland to rob and spoile those Isles.

Murketus hanged with manie more by along the shore side within the Ile of Galloway.

Ewin.

He was wholly drownd in lasciuious lecherie.

Partie lawes

Ewin is partied and forsaken his subiects.

Ewin condemned to perpetual prison

Ewin is strangled.

32 H.B.

Bluetella-ous.

Donald
king of the Britains.

Bluetellanus
concometh vnto the Romans.

amongst ner the ried. A at all,
sed to b friclie
uing wh had all that he mongst full for some sh qualitie appoint and fur
the bid take fu it could former ceding awaie a
But Ewin,
as grea conspir
friends field, a of all a him, no rell. E demne ye hau uernor
after th nounce
a presu of Cad inclosed thanks ballan be hang end of the seue Scottish
his gou A gentle b subiects
maner ked law
that he
as delig stod to he was time als Britain
roz, with ment of toward his sub whole w was not some tur These
the B. of ledge a whome t
the east,
to presen
being pa
the Rom sents to in signe

amongst a sort of vile strumpets, his lust being neuer throughlie satisfied, though neuer so often wearied. The nobles of the realme he had in no regard at all, of whom some he confined, and some he caused to be murdered, onlie because he might the more frelie without gainesaying haue his vile trade of liuing with their wiues and cosins. Such delight he had also in his filthy and abhominable ribaldrerie, that he made lawes for maintenance of the like amongst his subjects, as thus: That it might be lawfull for euerie man to marie diuers & sundrie wiues, some six, some ten, according to their substance and qualitties. And as for poore mens wiues, they were appointed to be common vnto the lords of the soile: and further, that the same lords should first deflowre the bride after hir marriage: which last ordinance toke such effect, that of manie hundred yeeres after it could by no meanes be abrogated, though the two former liberties were by authoritie of the kings succeeding, shortly after this Ewins deceasse, taken awaie and reuoked.

But now to conclude touching the doings of this Ewin, ye shall vnderstand, that at length such lords as greatlie abhorred his vile conditions & vsages, conspired against him, and raising an armie of their friends and partakers, incountred with him in the field, and there toke him prisoner, being destitute of all aid and succours: for such as he brought with him, not once offered to strike one stroke in his quarrell. Ewin being thus taken, was by and by condemned to perpetuall prison; and Cadallan, of whom ye haue heard before, immediatlie proclaimed gouernor of the realme. Howbeit the night following, after that Ewin (according to the iudgement pronounced against him) was committed vnto ward, a presumptuous young man, in hope to haue thanks of Cadallan, entred into the chamber where he was inclosed, and there strangled him. But in stead of thanks he was recompensed with death: for Cadallan detesting such a wicked deed, caused him to be hanged in open sight of all men. Such was the end of Ewin, being thus dispatched in prison, in the seventh yeere after he began his reigne ouer the Scottishmen, being the 9 yeere of Augustus Cesar his gouernment of the Romane empire.

After Ewin succeeded Metellanus, son to one Carren, the brother of Coderus a prince of most gentle behauiour. This Metellanus maintained his subjects in great quietnesse and rest, without anie manner of wars, either foreyn or ciuill. Such wicked lawes as his predecessor had established, he did what he could to abolish. But such young gentlemen as delighted in sensuall lust, and licentious libertie, stood so stiffelie therein against him, that in the end he was glad to leaue off his purpose. About the same time also there came vnto Kimbaline king of the Britains an ambassadoe from Augustus the emperor, with thanks, for that entring into the gouernment of the British state, he had kept his allegiance toward the Romane empire: exhorting him to keepe his subjects in peace with all their neighbors, with the whole world, through meanes of the same Augustus, was now in quiet, without all warres or troublesome tumults.

These ambassadoes went also vnto Metellanus the son of the Scottishmen, exhorting him to acknowledge a superiortie in the Romane emperor, vnto whome the people inhabiting in the furthest parts of the east, had sent their ambassadoes with rich iewels to present his person withall. Wherewith Metellanus being partly moued to haue a frendlie amitie with the Romans, he sent vnto Rome certeine rich presents to the emperor, and to the gods in the capitoll, in signe of honour, by which means he obtained an amitie with the Romans, which continued betwixt them and his kingdom for a long time after.

Thus a generall peace as then reigning through out the whole world, it pleased the giuer and author of all peace to be borne at the same time, of that blessed virgin Marie, in the citie of Bethlem in the tribe of Iuda. Which most blessed and salutiferous birth did come to passe in the 12 yeere of Metellanus reigne, and in the 42 of Augustus his empire: from the first establishing of the Scottish kingdom by Fergusius 324 yeeres, and after the creation of the world 3966, as Harison in his chronologie doth manifestlie conclude. After this, Metellanus reigned certeine yeeres in continuall peace and quietnes, euermore readie to doe the thing that might be to the contentation and the weale of his people. Finally, he passed out of this life in the 29 yeere of his reigne, which was the 28 after the birth of our Sauour, and 13 of Tiberius the emperor. Howbeit he left no issue alieue behind him to succeed in the gouernment of the kingdom: for those children which he had begotten, he buried in his life time, by meanes whereof, one Caratake, sonne to Cadallan, and nephue to king Metellanus by his sister Euopeta, was proclaimed king: as he that excelled in riches and puissant authoritie aboue all other the yeeres and high estates of the realme, and had not a litte to doe in the administration of publike affaires in the latter daies of his vncle Metellanus.

The first thing he did after he was established in the estate, he sailed into the westerne Isles, to appease a rebellion moued by the gouernour there. Which done, and the authors punished, he returned into Albion, and came into Caritonium, which was sometimes a famous citie, and metropolitane of Scotland, situat within the countrie cleped Carrike, as it appeareth by the ruines there remaining euene vnto this day. In this citie was Caratake borne, & therefore fauouring it the more, he lay there most commonlie, and did what he could to aduance the wealth and state thereof. Whilest these things were a doing in Scotland, Kimbaline king of the Britains died, who for that he had bene brought vp in Rome, obserued his promised obedience towards the empire; but Guiderius succeeding, disdaind to see the libertie of his countrie oppressed by the Romans, and therefore procuring the Britains to assist him, assembled a power, and invaded the Romans with such violence, that none escaped with life; but such as saued themselves within castles & fortresses.

The emperor Claudius that then gouerned the Romane empire, aduertised hereof, sent two capteins, Aulus Plautius, and Cneus Suetonius to appease that rebellion. They landing in Britaine with their armie, vanquished Guiderius in battell, so that he was constrained to send to Caratake king of Scots for aid against the common enemies of both nations. Caratake hauing considered the effect of this message, gaue counsell to the Britains to send into France then called Gallia, to practise with the people there to moue some rebellion against the Romans, in hope of helpe, which they were assured to haue by the Britains. This counsell was followed, for immediatlie vpon the ambassadoes returne, there were sent ouer into France certeine intelligenciarie to moue some conspiracie which had taken effect (by reason of the generall hate of seruitude, wherein the Romans kept the people subiect to them in those daies) if Guiderius had not bene constrained to giue battell, and chanced to be slaine in the same, yea the Galls could be resolved vpon anie determinat purpose.

This ouerthrow being reported in France, caused the Galls to staie their intended rebellion. Shortly

The birth of our Sauour Christ.

10 H.B.
320 H.P.
5109 H.B.

Metellanus departeth this world.
29 H.B.

14 H.B.
Caratake is proclaimed king. This Caratake call the British and English writers take to be a Britaine, and inhabiting within that portion of the Ile now called England.

Caratake.

Caratake was borne in Carrike.

Kimbaline king of the Britains died.

Guiderius the British king rebelled against the Romans.

Plautius and Suetonius.

Guiderius sendeth to Caratake for aid.

France in those daies Gallia.

Guiderius slaine.

The emperor
Claudius
us cometh into Britaine.

Claudius sail-eth into the Orkenies.

How Kirke-Wale.

Claudius tak-eth the king of the Orke-nies.

The doubt of Claudius going into the Orkenies.
Dion Cassius.

Arviragus
for sake his lawfull wife.

Moada imprisoned.

Moada is delivered out of prison, and conueied into Wales.

Arviragus
giveth his enemies an overthrow.

lie after Claudius himselfe came ouer into Brit-taine, and receiuing the Britains vnder his obe-sance, ordered things among them at his pleasure.
And after preparing his nauie and armie with all purueiance conuenient, he set forth towards the Isles of Orkney, purposing to conquere the same, for that they had aided the Britains in these last warres against the Romans. But approaching nere to those Isles, he was in danger to haue bene cast awaie by a tempest rising by chance, euen as he was entred the streit betwixt the Orkenies and Dungibie head in Cathness called Piceland frith; yet at length getting to land, he found in that Ile where he first arriued, no bodie at home, all the people through feare vpon the first sight of the great multitude of ships being fled to hide themselves in caues and dens amongst the rocks & mounteins.

Claudius therefore leauing this Ile, passed into Pomonia the chiefest of all the Orkenies, where discomfiting such as appeared abroad to make resistance, he besieged the king of those Isles named Car-nus, within a castell where he was withdrawen, and finallie causing him to yeeld himselfe prisoner, led him with other nobles of Britaine (whome he had for pledges) vnto Rome, the more to set forth the glorie of his triumph at his returne vnto the citie.
¶ But whatsoeuer Hector Boetius and others write of this passage of Claudius into the Orkenies, it is not like that he came there at all, for if he staid not past 16 daies in Britaine, as by Dion Cassius it appeareth that he did not in deed; how should we imagine that he could both pacifie the south parts of Britaine, and after go into Orkenie and conquere the same within so small a time, being readie to returne towards Rome at the end of those 16 daies, as the said Dion affirmeth: But this discourse haue I made according to their owne histories, least I should seeme to defraud them of whatsoeuer glorie is to be gotten by errors, as the maner is of them as well as of other nations, which to aduance their antiquities and glorie of their ancestors, take the aduantage oftentimes of writers scant worthe of credit.

But now againe to our purpose. Arviragus being established in the kingdome of Britaine, vpon some priuat displeasure forsooke his wife named Mo-ada, the sister of Caratake king of the Scottishmen, and married Genissa a Romane ladie, which act manie of the Britains disallowed; the more in deed, because he had faire issue already by Moada, as a son and two daughters. But this was done, as all men iudged, by the counsell of Aulus Plautius, thereby to breake all friendship and aliance betwixt the Britains and the Scots, to the end that in no case of rebellion they should ioine their powers together.
Neither did he onelie refuse Moada, whome all men knew to be his lawfull wife, but also caused hir to be kept in prison, till that the Britains (hauing indignation thereat) got hir out of the place where she was kept, and conueied hir into Wales together with hir children.

With which dealing Arviragus being highlie moued, determined with force of armes to punish them that had thus misused him: but perceiuing that not onelie those people which inhabited the countrie, now called Wales, and other that aboined on the north marches thereof were readie to defend the queene against his malice, he was faine to requite aid of the Romans, who with their capteine Aulus Plautius assembling together with such of the Britains as toke part with Arviragus, set forward toward the enemies, and ioining with them in battell, did giue them the ouerthrow. The next day after this victorie thus gotten, word was brought that the people inhabiting in the countries which we now call Lancashire, Dorsetshire, and Dorsetshire, were by in armour against the king and the Romans, by reason whereof Arviragus and Aulus Plautius withdrew towards London, that defending the sea coasts towards France, they might yet haue the sea open at all times whatsoeuer chanced. And to re enforce their power, Aulus Plau-tius sent ouer for two legions of souldiers into France, to come with all speed to his aid.

The Britains, who had gone so farre in the matter that they could not well withdraw themselves, now being certified of all their enemies doings, thought best to make themselves so strong as was possible.
And to the end that they might proceed in some orderlie meane, all the greatest lords and estates assembled together at Shrewsburie, in those daies called Cozimum, where they concluded vpon a league to aid one another with all their might and maine against the Romans & Arviragus, who went about to bring them whole vnder scruile subiection and thraldome of the same Romans. They being thus agreed to make warres in this quarrell, and for the same purpose to ioine their whole puissance together, there rose a doubt whome they might chuse for their generall capteine, for that it was feared least there might grow some secret enuie amongst the nobles being of equall power, if one should be in this case preferred before an other. For the auoiding of which mischiefe, by the graue admonition of one Comus a noble man of the parties of Wales, they accorded to send messengers vnto Caratake the king of Scotland, requirring him to aid them in their right and iust quarrell against Arviragus and the Romans, whereby he might reuenge the iniu-rie done to his sister queene Moada and hir issue, whome the father through counsell of the Romans purposed to disherit, to the end such children as he had by Genissa (for that they were of the Romane blood) might inioy the kingdome. They further declared, that all the British lords which were consederat in this enterprise, had chosen him by common assent to be their generall and chiefe leader, if it might so please him to take it vpon him, as their trust was he would: considering the iust causes of their warre, and the suertie which by victorie gotten might insue vnto all the inhabitants of the whole Ile of Albion.

Caratake hauing heard the summe of their request, and thoughtlie weighing the same, promised them to be readie with his whole puissance in the beginning of the next spring, to come to their aid, but to what place soeuer they should thinke expedient:
and thereof he told them they might be most assured, willing them in the meane time so to provide for themselves, as their enemies might haue no aduantage at their hands. With this agreeable an-swere the British messengers returned to Shrews-burie to the confederats, who reioicing at the news, made prouision against the next spring to go against the Romans, in hope of good successe, speciallie through aid of the Scots and Picts, who also with their king called Conkist were willing to helpe towards the deliuering of the land from bondage of the Romans, whose nestling so nere their noses they were loth to see or heare of. So some therefore as the spring approached, all those three people, Britains, Scots, and Picts, gathered their powers together, and met in Dorsetshire, in purpose to encounter with their enemies in battell, where soeuer they found them.

Arviragus and Aulus Plautius hauing knowledge of all the doings of the confederats, libelously assembled their power, & comming towards them,

Conuincit against Arviragus.

The Britains make themselves
strong.

The Bri-
tains allege themselves at Shrewsburie.

They con-siderat themselves together.

Caratake
chosen to be capteine of
the Britains.

Arviragus
would take him his children which he had by Moada.

Caratake
promised to the Britains.

The Picts
to come with the Scots and Britains to fight the Romans.

The Bri-
tains to be drawn through battell.

The Romans
are battell to
the Britains.

Eight party the fray.

Caratake reuengeth home Caratake
sent vnto
Caratake
in Julius Plautius.

Caratake his power vnto
the embassador.

Arviragus
victorie.

for a fell
the take probtho-
that
with refu-
field nor vitt tho-
man from beir
arm fore eate
Wh
min mo-beti
all ten-
too bne wit parter nie
mo-
the
the to f tine marie
ast fer
W aid dec mal ter
enir
it than cau-ries rins

and to n thon clea fair hau
to b
the
The
an at tur of t retu-
rate real
from tim
man
Arv

for a while forbare to ioin in battell, through counsell of Plandius, who perceiuing the most part of the Britains and Scots to be but new souldiers, taken vp of late to fill the numbers, knew that by protracting time they would be some out of heart, through watching and euill harbourogh, in such sort that in the end they should be easie enough to deale with; and euen so it came to passe. For the Romans refusing to fight a generall battell, yet scoured so the fields on eith side abroad, that neither the Britains nor Scots could go forth anie waies for forage or vittels, but they were still snatched vp, so that what through hunger, lacke of sleepe, and other diseases, manie of the Britains began to conuete themselves from the campe home to their houses, of whome some being taken by the enemies, declared that the whole armie of the confederats was in great distresse, and sore infiebled by such vnaccustomed trauell and diseases as they were enforced vnto in the campe. Whereupon Aruiragus and Aulus Plandius determined the next day to giue battell. And so in the morning they arraied their people, & marched forth betimes towards the campe of the confederats.

Caratake, who (as ye haue heard) was generall of all the confederats, understanding the enemies intent, was as readie to receiue battell as they were to offer it; whereupon there ensued right great and vnnecessfull slaughter betwixt them on both parts, without sparing any at all, till such time as the night parted the fraie, with such losse on either side, that after they were once got in sunder, neither part had anie halt afterwards to ioin againe: so that in the morning there appeared none in the field but onelie the dead bodies, those that were left alieue as well on the one part as the other being fled and scattered into the woods and mounteins. Aruiragus and Plandius got them vnto London: and Caratake commanding his people home each man into his countrie, he himselfe withdrew first towards Powke, and after vnto the citie of Carrike; whither shortly after there came vnto him ambassadoys from Aulus Plandius, sent to know vpon what occasion he did aid the Britith rebels against the Romane empire, declaring that if he would not be conformable to make a worthie amends for so presumptuous an enterprise, he should be sure to haue the Romans his enemies; and that in such wise, as he should perceiue it were much better for him to seeke their friendship, than to abide their enimitie.

Herevnto Caratake answered, that he had iust cause to doe that which he did, considering the injuries which his sister Uoadia with hir sonne Guiderius had and were like to receiue by their counsell and meanes: and therefore he was so little minded to make anie amends for that was done, that he thought it more reason that the Romans should clearelie auoid out of the whole possession of Britaine, either else they might assure themselves to haue aswell the Britains, as also the Scots & Picts to be their perpetuall enemies, and that onelie for the chalenge of their ancient liberties and freedome. The Romane ambassadoys being returned with this answer, Plandius toke no small indignation thereat, for menacing to be reuenged of so high and contumelious words pronounced against the maiestie of the Romane empire.

About the same time Aruiragus, vpon trust conceived by ioining his power with the other confederate Britains, to expell the Romans quite out of the realme, and so to recouer the intire estate, reuolting from them, fled into Shyewsburie, where, at the same time such Britith lords as were enemies to the Romans, were assembled againe in counsell, by whom Aruiragus was receiued with great gladnesse (ye maie be sure) of those lords, trusting by his meanes to haue their force in maner doubled. His wife Genissa being at the same season great with child, toke such thought for this reuolting of hir husband, that traouling before hir time, she immediately died therewith. But Aulus Plandius, perceiuing now the roughlie how little trust there was to be put in the Britains, dispatched a messenger in all hast with letters vnto Claudius the emperor, who as then sojournd at Rome, signifying vnto him in what danger the state of Britaine stood, if timelie provision were not the sooner made.

Claudius weicng the matter by good aduise of counsell, ordeined by decree of the senate, that Vespasian (of whome ye haue heard before) should be sent thither with an armie, to tame the proud and lustie stomachs of the Britains, with their confederats the Scots & Picts. Vespasian herevpon departing from Rome, came into France, & increasing his legions, with a supplie of such souldiers as he found there, passed ouer into this our Britaine, where contrarie to the report which he had heard afore his coming, he found euerie fortresse so well furnished after the warlike order of the Romane vsage, and moreover all such companies of men of warre as kept the field so well appointed and ordered, that he could not but much praise the great diligence and politike gouernement of Plandius.

Now when Vespasian had a little refreshed his men, and taken order how to proceed in the reducing of the Britains to their former obedience, he set forward toward Aruiragus & other the enemies, whom he understood as then to be at Powke, making their assemble, not generallie of all that were able to beare a club, as they did the yere before; but out of all parties a chosen number of piked men were sent for, as out of Denonshire & Cornewall there came 6000, south of Wales and the marches 12000, and the like number out of Wendall, Westmerland, and Cumberland. Out of Oxfordshire and other the parties of Britaine subiect vnto Aruiragus, there came 35000. All which numbers assembled nere vnto Powke, euerie man bringing his provision with him to serue him for two moneths space. Vnto the same place came also Caratake with 30000 Scottish men: and Alithara otherwise called Charan, king of the Picts, with almost as manie of his subiects.

Vespasian being certified still from time to time of all the doings of his enemies, hastned with all speed towards them; and by the leading of trustie guides comming to the place where they were incamped within a marish ground not passing 12 miles from Powke, he cercelie vpon a sudden fettereth vpon them within their campe, yer they thought he had bene nere them. But yet notwithstanding they manfully stood to their defense: in somuch that those in the right wing of the Romans armie were like to haue bene distressed, if Vespasian perceiuing the danger, had not sent a legion to their aid in time, wherby the battell was newlie in that part restored. The capitains on either side did what they could to encourage their folkes to sticke to their tackle, without giuing ouer by anie meanes, considering what gaine came by victorie, and what losse ensued by receiuing the overthrow.

The Britains, Scots, and Picts, like enraged lions, ran vpon the Romans, with such cruell desire of reuenge, that euen when they were thrust through vpon the point of any weapon, they would run still vpon the same, to come vnto him that held it, that they might requite him with the like againe. But yet would not all that their fierce and desperate hardnesse preuaile, for fortune by fadall appointment being bent to aduance the Romans vnto the dominion Genissa the wife of Aruiragus d. ch.

A messenger sent vnto Claudius the emperor from Plandius.

Vespasian commeth into Britaine.

The Britains gather an armie.

Acenl.

The Scots & Picts come to aid the Britains. Alithara or Charan king of Picts.

Vespasian assaileth the Britains in their campe.

The desperate hardnesse of the Britains and Scottishmen.

Fortune fauoureth the Romans.

The Brit-
tains receive the overthrow

Caratake
escapeth.
Tharan king
of the Picts
is slain.

Messengers sent by Aru-ragus unto Vespasian
with submission.

Aruragus
cometh in unto Vespas-ian.
Aruragus is restored again to his former dignitie.
The Brit-
tains are pardoned, but yet deliuer new hostages.
Their lawes
abrogated.
New lawes.

Camelon besieged by Vespasian.

Camelon
surrendered.
The kings
regall ornaments taken.

Camelon peopled with Romans.

nion of the whole world, shewed his selfe so fauourable vnto them in this battell, that in the end, though the Britains with the confederats did what lay in men to do for attaining of victorie, yet were they beaten downe and slaine euerie mothers sonne, a few onelie excepted, which escaped by flight.

Aruragus seeing the slaughter of his people, would haue slaine himselfe, but that some of his seruants caried him by force out of the field, that he might be reserued yet vnto some better fortune. Caratake escaping by flight, fled into his countrie, but Tharan king of the Picts, not coueting to liue after such losse of his people, thereto alway his armour with all his kinglie ornaments, and sitting downe vpon a stone, as a man past himselfe, was there slaine by such as followed in the chase. Aruragus being conueied out of danger, and gotten into Forke, considered how by reason of this great discomfort, it was impossible to resist the Romane puissance, and therefore with consent of the residue of his nobles that were escaped from the battell, he sent an herald vnto Vespasian, offering to submit himselfe in most humble wise vnto anie reasonable conditions of peace and agreement. Whereupon Vespasian commanded that Aruragus should in priuate apparell come in vnto him, for he would not talke of anie peace, except he had Aruragus present, and therefore he sent vnto him his safe conduct to assure him safetie both to come and go.

Aruragus seeing no other remedie, came in vnto Vespasian, according to his appointment, and vpon his submission was pardoned of all his trespasses, and placed againe in the kingdome. The cities and good townes also that were partakers in the rebellion, were in semblable wise forgiven without fining or other indemnitie, and so likewise were all the nobles of the countrie. Howbeit, for the better assurance of their loialtie in time to come, they deliuered new hostages. Their ancient lawes also were abrogated, and the Romane lawes in their place established. For the administration of the which, in euerie prouince was appointed a Romane iudge to see good orders obserued according to the forme thereof. By which means the Britishe nation effionnes returned vnto his former obedience of the Romane empire. All the winter following, Vespasian laie at Forke, making his appress against the next spring to go against the Scots and Picts. So sone therefore as the summer was come, Vespasian set forth with his armie, and entering into the marches of his enemies, he did put them in such feare that the Picts were glad to yeld themselves vnto him, a few of the nobles & some other excepted, which were withdrawne into Camelon, in hope through strength of that tolon to defend themselves from all assaults. Vespasian being certified thereof, came & besieged them within the same citie, not minding to depart till he had them at his pleasure. This siege continued till they within, being in danger to famish through want of vittels, surrendered themselves with the tolon into Vespasians hands. In this tolon were found all the regall ornaments, as the crowne & sword, with other iewels belonging to the kings of the Picts. The sword hauing the hilt of gold, & a purple scabbard very finely wrought & trimmed. Vespasian vsed to weare in all the warres wherein he afterwards chanced to be, in hope (I wot not) of what good successe and lucke to follow thereof. The Pictishe lords which were within Camelon, were commanded to deliuer pledges: and after licenced to depart with out anie other damage. Vespasian himselfe remaining at Camelon, take order for the peopling of the tolon with Romans, granting them the vse of the liberties and priuileges which the Romans inhabiting in Rome inioied. Also ouer against the towne vpon the banke of the riuer of Caron, he builded a temple in honoz of the emperoz Claudius, wherein he set vp two images, the one representing Claudius, and the other the goddesse Victoria.

Whilist he was thus occupied, tidings came to him, that Caratake king of the Scottishmen had assembled in Galloway a great army of Scots, Picts and Britains, in purpose against the Romans, to reuenge the last overthrow. Whereupon Vespasian with all speed sent forth a strong power vnder the leading of Aulus Plautius to encounter the enemies. Plautius being approached within foure miles of them, incamped himselfe in a strong place, as though he minded not to passe further, till Vespasian with the rest of his whole puissance were come to his aid. Wherefore, night was no soner come on, but that he gaue generall commandement through his host, that euerie man should make him readie to depart at a certaine houre vnder the standards of their captains in order of battell.

Then in the second watch of the night he set forward, following certeine guides (which knew all the straits and passages of the countrie) till he came to the place where Caratake with his armie was lodged: and first killing the watch which stood to defend his entrance, till the armie was raised, he set vpon the whole campe, and though he found such resistance that the battell continued right fierce & cruell from the datoning of the day, till it was his name, yet in the end the victorie remained with the Romans; and the Scots with the Picts, & such Britains as were on their part, put to flight and chased. Caratake escaping out of the battell, fled into Argile, and got him to the castell of Dunstaffage. Diuerse of the Britains & Picts, which as yet had not submitted themselves, were put in such dread through hute of this overthrow, that immediatlie thereupon they came in and yelded themselves vnto Vespasian. And in semblable wise the people of Galloway bitterlie despairing any longer to defend their countrie against Plautius (who was now entred into their confines, and had taken the citie of Carrike) offered to become subiects vnto the Romans, which they might neuer be brought vnto before that time.

These newes being certified vnto Vespasian by a pursuant, he rode straightwaies vnto Carrike, & there receiued the oths of the nobles, and other the inhabitants of the countrie. That done, he sent ambassadors vnto Caratake, to trie if he might by anie means to become friend vnto the Romane empire, in acknowledging some manner of subiection therevnto: but this denise was to small purpose, for Caratake was determined rather to end his life as a free Scottishman in defense of libertie, than to become thrall vnto anie foireine nation, in hope to liue long time in seruitude, doubting least if he came anie waies forth into danger of the Romans, they would vsurpe the whole dominion vnto themselves. Whose mind when Vespasian vnderstood by his answer made to the ambassadors which were sent vnto him, he was minded to haue gone with an armie vnto Dunstaffage where Caratake lay, but that he was informed that dangerous passages he must needs thorough, all full of desert mounteis, bogs, and quatuernires, without anie prouision of vittels or forrage to be found by all the way as the armie should passe.

Leauing therefore this enterprize, he caused so manie vessels to be assembled, as could be prouided on all parts, purposing to haue passed ouer into the Ile of Man, into the which there were gotten together a great sort of Britains and Picts, that had escaped the Romans hands. But this iourne also was broken

Julius H. 2.
Colchester, at the B. 1. 1. 1.
English
tera 10. 1. 1.

Caratake
sembling an
armie.

Plautius
sent forth
an armie against Caratabe.

Plautius
sent forth
the second campe.

Caratabe
city vnto Dunstaffage.

The prom-
Galloway
submit the selues to Romans.

Emballo-
sent vnto
Caratabe.

Caratabe
write vnto Vespasian
submit.

The of re-

Caratabe
sembling an
armie.

Plautius
sent forth
an armie
against Ca-
ratabe.

Plautius
sent forth
the second
campe.

Caratabe
city vnto Dunstaffage.

The prom-
Galloway
submit the selues to Romans.

Emballo-
sent vnto
Caratabe.

Caratabe
write vnto Vespasian
submit.

Emballo-
sent vnto
Caratabe.

Caratabe
write vnto Vespasian
submit.

Emballo-
sent vnto
Caratabe.

Caratabe
write vnto Vespasian
submit.

Emballo-
sent vnto
Caratabe.

Caratabe
write vnto Vespasian
submit.

hen by another newes were weight, with the inhabitant
and had slain
for in those cure this wou set this re-eng the rebel
nished accord
Hostie Claudius, h rie for his no Plautius w
of Britaine
ring that Ca
Scots, and not yet subm
purpose to Vespasian h
red to meet
ring together
tell with gre
the victorie
skillfull polic and Britair bogs and m daies for the chanced to b After the
for two ye one vpon an loway. In of the fir him at leng travell at a
that he w dius, signif therevpon
might be se receiued by the same, s linage, and to haue the About t Aulus Pla
melon, wh ned, and those daies ed within (as is said vpon the taken by thinke) to the ashes kens and 1521 at Fr
from Abe two cheff
of them which so
to dust.
called the Aberdine
teine plo squared sh manthip
two. Har found in but it is were the Picts.
But
the com

be towne Julius Hoff. built a therein Claudi-
s came to en had at
ots. Pias mans, to Tespasian
bnder the er the en-ure miles
y place, as Tespasian
one to his come on,
nt through n ready to standards of

t he set for new all the he came to ie was lod-
d to defend he set upon ch resistance cruell from none, yet in Romans, and ins as were Caratake esca-
and got him
e of the Brimitted them
pute of this n they came
ian. And in victorie del-ntrie against yeir confines,
ed to become might neuer

Tespasian by into Carrike,
d other the inve sent ambas-
might by anie Romane en-
r of subiection ill purpose, for end his life as tie, than to ben, in hope to cast if he came Romans, they
to themselves.
God by his anwere sent unto h an armie un-
ut that he was he must march as, bogs, and n of vittels or as the armie

he caused so ma-
be provided on uer into the fletten together a at had escaped ie also was bndhen

Ex. 17. of right re-
adith.

Caratake as sembleth an armie.

Plantius
sent forth with an armie against Ca-ratake.

Plantius left his government, and went to Rome.

Plantius
left his government, and
went to Rome.

Caratake
went into Dunfallage.

The people of Galloway submitt themselves
to the Romans.

Caratake
went into Dunfallage.

Caratake
went into Dunfallage.

Caratake
went into Dunfallage.

Caratake
went into Dunfallage.

Caratake
went into Dunfallage.

Caratake
went into Dunfallage.

ken by another incident, for even at the same time, newes were brought that the Britains of the Ile of Wight, with the Kentishmen, and divers others the inhabitants upon the south coast, were revolted, and had slain divers Romans, which lay in gar- sons in those parts. Trespasian therefore, finding to cure this wound per it should through the fester, ha- sted thither with all speed; and with little ado pacifi- cing the rebels, caused the chiefe offenders to be pu- nished according to their deserts.

Wholie after being sent for by the emperor Claudius, he returned into Rome with great glo- rie for his noble and high achieved victories. Aulus Plautius was left in charge with the government of Britaine after Trespasians departure: whi- bearing that Caratake had assembled a great armie of Scots, and other such Britains and Picts as had not yet submitted themselves unto the Romans, in purpose to recover againe those countries which Trespasian had lately conquered, he likewise prepa- red to meet them, so that both the armies encounte- ring together, there was fought a right terrible bat- tle with great slaughter on both parties, till finally the victorie inclining to the Romans, more through skillfull policie than puissant force, the Scots, Picts, and Britains were discomfited and chased into the bogs and marishes; the common refuge in those daies for the Scots; when by anie adventure they chanced to be put to flight.

After this overthrow the warre was continued for two yers space, by robes and incursions made one upon another in the confines of Bile and Gal- loway. In which meane while Plautius fell sicke of the sick, which still continuing with him, brought him at length in such case, that he was not able to traueil at all in the publike affaires of his office. So that he wrote his letters unto the emperor Clau- dius, signifieng unto him in what case he stood, and thereupon required that some sufficient personage might be sent to occupie his roome. Claudius hauing received his letters, and understanding the effect of the same, sent one Drorzius Scapula, a man of high linage, and of good experience both in peace and war, to haue the gouernance in Britaine.

About the time of whose arriual into Britaine, Aulus Plautius departed out of this world at Ca- melon, where he then sojourned. His bodie was bur- ned, and according to the vse of the Romans in those daies, the ashes were closed in a chest, and bur- ied within the church of Claudius and Victoria, which (as is said) Trespasian builded nere unto Camelon, upon the riuers side there. Hereof was a custome taken by amongst both Scots and Picts (as some thinke) to burne the bodies of the dead, and to burie the ashes: whereof there haue bene found diuers to- kens and monuments in this our age. As in the yere 1521 at Findor, a village in Perne, five miles distant from Aberdine, there were found in an old graue two chests of a strange making full of ashes, either of them being ingrauen with Romane letters, which so soone as they were brought into the aire, fell to dust. Likewise in the fields of another towne called Kenbacten in Parre, ten miles distant from Aberdine, about the same time were found by cer- teine plowmen two sepulchres made of cut and squared stones, wherein were four chests, of worke- manship, bignesse and inscription like to the other two. Manie the semblable monuments haue bene found in diuers places in Scotland in times past: but it is to be thought, that in these sepulchres there were Romans buried, and neither Scots nor Picts.

But now to our purpose. Immediatlie upon the coming of Drorzius into Britaine, the people of the west countries rebelled, procuring the no- therne men with the Scots of Galloway, and all the Picts to do the like. They sent also unto Caratake, requiring him in this common quarell against the Romans to put to his helping hand for recouerie of the ancient libertie of the whole land of Albion, considering it was like they should match well enough with this new Romane capteine Drorzius Scapula, that understood little of the maners and vsages of the Britains. But this notwithstanding, Drorzius being informed of all these practises, and remembering that furtherance it were for a cap- teine in the begining to win a name by some praise- worthy enterprise, he made first towards the we- sterne Britains, whom he thought to surpris per they should assemble with the other rebels, and so meeting with them, he chased and tooke a great num- ber of them, as they fled here and there out of all order.

After this, he went against the people called Ico- ni, which (as some thinke) inhabited the countrie now called Drfordshire, but other take them to be Dorset- shire men, who being gathered together, were gotten into a strong place, inclosed about with a great ditch as they vse to fence pasture grounds, that no hostile men should breake in upon them: yet this notwith- standing, Drorzius assailed them within their strength, & in the end breaking downe the rampire, with such aid as he had, burst in at length amongst them, sleaing and taking the most part of them: for few or none escaped, they were so kept in on eche side. But of this battell, and likewise of other enterpri- ses, which Drorzius and other of the Romane lieute- nants achieved here in Britaine, ye shall find more thereof in the historie of England according to the true report of the Romane writers, the which verelie make no mention either of Scots or Picts till the yere of our Lord 320, at the soonest. And as for the Silures and Brigants remoued by Hecfor Boetius so farre northward, it is euidentlie proued by Hum- frey Elhoid, and others, that they inhabited coun- tries contained now within the limits of England: The like ye haue to vnderstand of the Drdouicos where Caratake gouerned as king, and not in Car- rike, as to the well aduised reader I doubt not but it may sufficientlie appeare, as well in the descrip- tion as in the historie of England aforesaid.

But now to returne where we left: the brute of this late victorie quieted the buisie minds of such o- ther of the Britains, as were ready to haue revol- ted. But they of Galloway would not at the first giue ouer, but in trust of aid at the hands of Cara- take continued in their rebellion, till Drorzius came thither, and beate downe such as made resistance, whereby the other were some pacified. After this he entred into the confines of Bile and Cantire, spoi- ling and wasting those countries, and brought from thence a great number of captiues. With which in- surie Caratake being not a little kindled, he assen- bled a mightie armie, wherein he had at the least 40 thousand men, what of his owne subjects and other such as came to his aid. For after he was entred in- to Wialand, there came unto him out of all parties no small number, of such as desired either to be re- uenged on the Romans, either else to lose life and libertie both at once, for the tast of bondage was so bitter unto all the inhabitants of Albion in this sea- son, that they in maner were whole conspiring toge- ther to remoue that yoke of thraldome from their shoulders which so painefullie pinched them.

Caratake thus furnished with an armie, chose forth a strong place to lodge in, fenced on the one side with the course of a deepe fouldesse riuer, and on the other sides it might not be approached unto for the

The Bri- tains yet esta- blished their rebel- lion. The Bri- tains require aid of Cara- take.

The Bri- tains of the west part are chaied.

Cent. Drfordshire is assailed. Some take the Ico- ni to be the Dorset- shire men.

They of Gal- loway are be- ten and paci- fied.

Bile and Can- tire wasted and spoiled. Caratake as- sembleth an armie.

The strength of the place where Cara- take was in- camped.

Of this matter ye may read more in England. women in camped.

Women placed in order of battell. Caratake and his captains exhort their men to fight.

Offozius incourageth his Romans.

Caratake overthronne by the Romans. His queene taken.

Caratake be- traied by his stepmother.

Caratake is sent to Rome.

He is shewd to the people in triumph.

Caratake departeth this life.

54 Strange lights scene.

sharpnesse of the crags and such fencing as they had made with great stones, in places where there was any waie to enter. All such women as were some- what skilful in age, and came thither with them, in great numbers, were by Caratake placed on either side his battels, both as well to incourage the men to do valiantlie with shouting and hallooing unto them, as also to assaile the Romans with stones as they should approach. Other such as were young and lustie, were appointed to keepe arate amongst the men to fight in the battell.

Caratake hauing thus ordered his field, and hearing that Offozius was come to giue battell, exhorteth his people to stick to it like men, and so in semblable wise did all his captains and sergeants of the bands, going from ranke to ranke to incourage their souldiours, declaring how that this was the armie that must either bring libertie or thraldome to them and their posteritie for ever. On the other part Offozius minding to trie the matter by battell, set his people in arate after the ancient manner of the Romans, willing them to consider that they were descended of those parents and ancestors which had subdued the whole world: and againe, that those with whome they should now match, were but naked people, fighting more with a certeine manner of a furious rage and disordered violence, than with any politike discretion or constancie.

Herewith vpon commandement giuen on both parts, the battell began right hot, & for a good space verie doubtfull, till the practised knowledge of the Romans vanquished the furious violence of the Scots, Brits, and Britains: who being put to flight fled into the mounteins to escape the enemies hands who pursued them most egerlie. Amongst other of the prisoners there was taken Caratakes wife, with his daughter & brethren. He himselfe fled for succor unto his stepmother Cartimandua: but as aduersitie findeth few friends, she caused him to be taken and deliuered unto Offozius. This was in the ninth year after the beginning of the warres. Offozius bled him verie honorable, according to the degree of a king: finally he sent him unto Rome, together with his wife, his daughter, and brethren. His name was such through all places, that where he passed by, the people came flocking in on each side to see him, of whom they had heard so much report for his stout resistance made so long a time against the Romane puissance.

At his coming to Rome he was shewd in triumph, all the people being called to the sight: for the victorie and apprehension of him was iudged equall with ante other atchieued enterpryse against whatso- ever the most puissant enemies of former time. The Emperour Claudius vpon respect as was thought of his princelie behauior and notified valiancie, restored him to libertie, and reteining his daughter and eldest brother at Rome as pledges, vpon his oth received to be a true subiect unto the empire, he sent him home into his countrie againe, assigning unto him the gouernance of Galloway, with Kile, Car- rike, and Coningham. He liued not passing two yeeres after his returne into Scotland, studieng most cheeflie (during that time) how to preserve his people in peace and quietnesse. He departed this world one and twentie yeeres after the decesse of his uncle Metellan, in the yeere of our Lord 54.

A little before his falling into the hands of the Romans, there were sundrie strange sights scene in Albion, as fighting of horsmen abroad in the fields, with great slaughter, as seemed on both parts: and forthwith the same so vanished awaie, that no appearance of them could any where be perceived. Also a sort of woulues in the night season set vpon such as were keeping of cattell abroad in the fields, and carted awaie one of them to the woods, and in the morning suffered him to escape from amongst them againe. Moreover, at Carrike there was a child borne, perfect in all his lims saving the head, which was like unto a rauen. These vniuersal signes and monstrosities put the people in no small feare: but after that Caratake was restored to his libertie & countrie, all was interpreted to the best.

After Caratakes decesse, his yongest brother Corbreid was chosen to succeed in his place, in the fiftie and eighth yeere after Christ, for his elder brother was departed at Rome through change of aire not agreeable to his nature. This Corbreid was a stout man of comach, much resembling his brother Caratake. In the first beginning of his reigne, he did his indeuor to purge his dominion of such as troubled the quiet state thereof, by robbing and spoiling the husbandmen and other the meaner people of the countrie, of the which robbers there was no small number in those daies, speciallie in the Westerne Isles, also in Kose & Cathnes. In the meane time the Brits hauing created there a new king called Conhast, gouernour of Mers and Louthian, they set vpon the Romans being about to make fortresses in those parties. And but that succours came in time from the next towncs and castles adjoining, they had laine all the whole number of them, & yet aided as they were, the maister of the campe, and eight other of the captains, with diuers officers of bands, besides common souldiours, lost their liues there.

Shortly after also, the same Brits overthrow a number of foragers, with such compantes of horsmen as came to defend them. Herewith Offozius being not a little moued, made readie his bands, and fiercelie incountred with the Brits, who defended themselves so vigozonlie, that the force of the Romans was nere hand discomfited. Which danger Offozius perceiuing, speedilie came to relieue the same, but preasing too farre amongst his enemies, he was sore wounded, and in great danger to haue bene laine. The night coming vpon parted the state, not without huge slaughter on both parts. After this, the warre continued still betwixt them with often incursions and skirmishes. At the length the Brits with such other Britains as were come unto them out of the Ile of Man and other parties, incountred with the Romans in battell, and vpon the first joining, of purpose gaue backe, training some of the Romans to pursue them unto such places, where they had laid their ambushes, and so compassing them about, slue a great number of them, and chased the residue into the streets of the mounteins, where they were also surprised by such of the Brits as returned from the battell.

Offozius vnderstanding how the matter went, withdrew with the rest of his people to his campe, and shortly after sent a pursuant unto Rome, to informe the emperor in what state things stood in Britaine, by reason of this rebellion of the Brits, who neither by force nor gentle persuasions could be pacified. The emperor determining to prouide remedie therefore, sent word againe that he would not that the Brits should be effrons received vpon their submission, if they were dzinen to make sute for pardon, but vterlie to be destroyed and exterminated. For the accomplishment wherof he appointed two legions of such men of warre, as sojourned in France to passe ouer into Britaine. But in the meane while Offozius departed this world, where of his hurts (as the Scottish chronicles make mention) or through sicknesse (as should rather seeme by Cornelius Tacitus) it forceth not. After whose Offozius Claudius was with the Brits.

The Romans are discomfited by the Brits.

Julius Diodorus cometh into Britaine.

The Brits overcome the Romans.

The Brits sent to the Romans for aid.

Offozius wounded.

The Romans trained into ambushes and so destroyed.

Carlius Pa- centred with an armie into Gallo- way.

Arminius the husband of Cartiman- da.

Arminius re- solutely.

Carlius was wounded.

whose dect charge, wh the Brits fought with bidden on come succ horsmen fresh onse sed unto th of them at there wan

About th other Rom Offozius n dius, with bred. At l old cre we blaming th enemies se ger of losh of courag wone an eout of them to p with them they had l brought t full Roma gonerma informd this new them, the of Scotla reputed a bertie, at which resp descend v assembli of Aulus to him w depart on there, c unto Car force of th of the sam empire.

The ho word cam mans un entred in terro of and robbi in danger to the la host whic way, he the coun in all haf one Wern timandou ye haue l sell with king C much ha support o from all being i mans, h with his prehens his kinsf But n not onel sed Car whose decessie Marcius Valens had the chiefest charge, who bringing his armie forth to encounter the Picts that came to seeke battell, was fiercelie fought withall, notwithstanding the victorie had a- bidden on his side, if at the verie point there had not come succours to the Picts (that is to wit) 400 horsemen out of the countrie of Kendall, by whose fresh onset the Romans were discomfited and cha- sed unto their campe, there being slain about 3000 of them at that overthrowe, and on the Picts side there wanted 2000 of their number at the least.

About the same time there arrived in Britaine an other Romane capitaine to be generall in place of Marcius now deceased, his name was Aulus Didius, with him came the two legions afore remem- bered. At his first comming ouer he mustered the old crewes of the Romane souldiers first, much blaming them for their negligence, in suffering the enimies so to increase vpon them, to the great dan- ger of losing all that (through sloth and faintnesse of courage) which latelie before in Britaine had been wonne and conquered by high prowes and valiant conduct of his predecessours. In the end he exhorted them to put away all feare, and fullie to determine with themselves to recover againe the honor which they had latelie lost, which he said would easilie be brought to passe, if they would take vnto them man- full stomachs, and obeie him and such other as had the governance and leading of them. The Picts being informed that this Aulus Didius was arrived with this new supplie of men, & prepared to come against them, they thought good to send vnto Corbreid king of Scotland, to require his aid against the Romans, reputed as common enimies to all such as loved li- bertie, and hated to live in servile bondage. For which respect Corbreid was the sooner moued to con- descend vnto the request of the Picts; and thereupon assembling an armie entred into Galloway. Where of Aulus Didius being certified, sent an herald vnto him with all speed, commanding that he should depart out of those quarters, sith he had no right there, considering that Galloway was assigned vnto Caratake but for tearme of his owne life, by force of the emperours grant, and now by the death of the same Caratake was reuered againe vnto the empire.

The herald had vnnearth done his message, when word came vnto Corbreid how an armie of the Ro- mans under the guiding of Caesius Pasica was entred into the marches of Galloway, to the great terror of all the inhabitants, doubting to be spoiled and robbed on ech hand. These newes put the herald in danger of his life, had not Corbreid vpon regard to the law of armes licenced him to depart. The host which Corbreid brought with him into Gallo- way, he bestowed in castles and fortresses abroad in the countrie for more safegard, but he himselfe rode in all hast vnto Eptake, to haue the aduise and aid of one Vlenusius that had married the fornamed Car- timandua that vnkind stepmother of Caratake, as ye haue heard before. This Vlenusius was of coun- sell with his wife Cartimandua in the betraile of king Caratake, and therefore was growne into much hatred of the people for that fact, but through support of the Romans he was for a time defended from all their malices. Notwithstanding in the end being wearied of the proud government of the Ro- mans, he revolted from them vnto Corbreid. Where with his wife being offended, found means to ap- prehend both him and his brethren with certaine of his kinnsfolks, and laied them fast in prison.

But now Corbreid at his comming thither, did not onelie set them at libertie, but also toke & cau- sed Cartimandua to be buried quickie. In the meane while a certaine number of Scots distressed a few foragers of the Romans, but following the chase somewhat rashlie, they were inclosed by the enimies and slain. This mischance put the Scots in great feare, and the Romans in good successe, so that Pa- sica was in purpose to haue assailed a certaine strong place, wherein a number of the Scottishmen were gotten, and had fortified the entrees, had not other newes altered his purpose, for hearing how an other armie of the Scots was ioined with the Picts, and were approached within three miles of him, he brought his host forth into a plaine where he ordered his battels readie to receiue them. Whereof the Scottishmen hauing knowledge, hastied forth to- wards him, and were no sooner come in sight of the Romans, but that with great violence they gaue the onset, most fierclie beginning the battell, which continued till sun-setting with great slaughter on both sides; at what time the Romans were at the point to haue discomfited their enimies, had not those Scottishmen which were left in fortresses (as is said) abroad in the countrie, come at that selfe instant to the aid of their fellowes, by whose means the battell was renewed againe, which lasted till the mirke night parted them in sunder. The Romans withdrew to their campe, and the Scots and Picts got by into the mountains.

Shortlie after a peace was concluded betwixt the parties, with these conditions; that the Romans should content themselves with that which they had in possession before the beginning of these last wars, and suffer Corbreid to inioy all such countries as his brother Caratake held. And likewise the Picts pay- ing their former tribut for the finding of such garri- sons of Romans as laie at Camelon, they should be no further charged with anie other exactions. Moreover it was agreed, that neither the Scots nor Picts from thenceforth should receiue or succour a- nie rebels of Frenchmen or Britains, nor should aid by anie manner of means the inhabitants of the Ile of Man, who had done manie notable displea- sures to the Romans during the last warres. This peace continued a six peares during the life of Aulus Didius, who at the end of those six peares, depar- ted this life at London, leauing behind him all things in good quiet.

After his decessie the emperour Nero, who succe- ded Claudius, appointed one Vlerannius to be lieutenant of Britaine, a man verie ambitious and much desirous of honor, by means whereof, in hope to aduance his name, he sought occasions to haue warres with the Scottishmen; and at length hearing that certaine of them being borderers had fetched booties out of Wiceland, he did send a great power of Romans to make a rode into the next marches of the Scots, from whence they brought a great spoile, both of men and of goods. With which iniuries the Scots being moued, sought daile in semblable sort to be reuenged, so that by such means the warre was renewed. But before anie notable encounter chanced betwixt them, Vlerannius died. His last words were full of ambitious boasts, wishing to haue liued but two peares longer, that he might haue subdued the whole Ile of Albion vnto the Ro- mane empire, as if he might haue had so much time he doubted not to haue done.

Paulinus Suetonius succeeded in his place, a man of an excellent wit, and verie desirous of peace. He first confirmed the ancient league with Cor- breid king of Scotland: a recompense being made in euerie behalfe for all wrongs & iniuries done on euerie part. After this (as Hector Boetius hath ga- thered) he conquered the Ile of Man; but for so much as by probable reasons it is apparant inough, that

The darke night parted the fraie.

A peace con- cluded.

Aulus Didius departed this life at London.

Vlerannius is made lieut- enant of Brit- taine.

Vlerannius departeth this life.

Anglesea and not Man was thus in- uaded by Suetonius.

fields, and and in the longst them was a child head, which signes and e: but after rtie & coungest brother his place, in for his elder change of Corbreid was ling his bro- of his reigne, on of such as ing and spoil- aner people ere was no ic in the we- In the meane a now king and Louthi- bout to make hat succours ad castles ad- mber of them, of the campe, diuers offi- es, lost their ouerthrow a nities of horse- with Marcius ie his hands, s, who defen- fore ward of fited. Which e came to re- amongst his great danger ing vpon par- ighter on both d still betwixt lthes. At the ains as were duffed.

matter went, to his campe, into Rome, to things stood in of the Picts, sions could be to prouide re- hat he would receiued vpon make late for and extermina- of he appoin- as sojournd aine. But in his world, the onicles make s should rather eth not. After whose Marcius Valens was the chiefest charge.

The Romans were discomfited and chased.

Aulus Didius was arrived with this new supplie of men.

The Picts were informed that this Aulus Didius was arrived with this new supplie of men.

Aulus Didius was arrived with this new supplie of men.

The Romans were informed that this Aulus Didius was arrived with this new supplie of men.

The Picts were informed that this Aulus Didius was arrived with this new supplie of men.

The Romans were informed that this Aulus Didius was arrived with this new supplie of men.

The Picts were informed that this Aulus Didius was arrived with this new supplie of men.

The Romans were informed that this Aulus Didius was arrived with this new supplie of men.

The Picts were informed that this Aulus Didius was arrived with this new supplie of men.

The Romans were informed that this Aulus Didius was arrived with this new supplie of men.

it was not Span, but the Ile of Angleſcie which the Britains name Môn, and at this time was subdued by Suetonius, we haue here omitted to make report thereof, referring you to the place in the English chronicle, where we haue spoken ſufficientlie after that ſort Suetonius both attempted & atchieued this enterpriſe, which being brought to end, he was ſent for into Gallia, to reſſeſſe certeine tumults raiſed among the people there. In whoſe abſence the Britains thinking to haue a meet time for their purpoſe, moued a new rebellion. But by the relation of Cornelius Tacitus, this chanced whileſt Suetonius was buſie in requiring the Ile of Angleſcie, as in the English chronicle it likewiſe appeareth, with the ſtrange ſights and wonders which happened about the ſame time, whereupon the ſouthſaters (as Hector Boetius ſaith) declared that the Romans ſhould receiue a great ouerthrow. Upon truſt of whoſe wordes the Picts and other Britains inhabiting Camelon and in the marches thereof, ſet vpon ſuch Romans as inhabited there, and ſlew a great manie of them yer they were in doubt of a new rebellion. The reſidue which eſcaped, got them into an old church, where they were ſlaine echmothers ſonne.

The Scots and Picts kill the Romans.

Petilius Cerealis his men being ſlaine returned.

Catus the procurator of Britaine fled into France.

Queene Moada deſireth aid of hir brother Corbreid.

Charanach King of the Picts.

The Romans ſlaine.

Dutchmen arrive in Scotland.

Also Petilius Cerealis comming with a legion of footmen and a troope of horſemen to their ſuccours, was incountred by the Picts, & being put to flight, loſt all his footmen, hardlie eſcaping himſelfe with the horſemen to the campe. Shortly after he toke by his tents and returned towards Kent, where Catus the procurator or receiuer (as I may call him) of Britaine as then ſoiourned, who vnderſtanding how the whole Ile was on ech ſide in an vppore, fled ouer into France then called Gallia. This meane while queene Moada ſent vnto hir brother Corbreid king of Scotland, requiring his aid againſt the Romans, who had ſo viliſie vſed hir and hir daughters, to the great diſhonour of hir and all hir linage, and now was the time to be reuenged of ſuch iniuries, the whole nation of the Britains through the couetous dealing of the procurator Catus, being riſen in armes to recouer their ancient liberties.

Corbreid being highlie diſpleaſed towards the Romans for the euill intreating of his ſiſter, determined either to ſee hir ſatiſfied by wortheie recompence, or elle to be reuenged on them that had miſvſed hir: and hereof gaue ſignification vnto Catus the procurator that was as then returned into Britaine with a power of men of warre. Corbreid receiving but a ſcornfull anſwere from him, found meanes to ioine in league with Charanach king of the Picts, and gathering together a mightie armie of one & other, purſued the Romans and their associates, ſlaing downe a wonderfull number of them. He alſo burned and deſtroied diuers towneſ, ſuch as in keeping their allegiance to the Romans ſtood earneſtly to their deſeſſe, as Berwike and Carlell with others. About the ſame ſeaſon there arrived in the ſiſth a number of Dutch ſhips, fraught with people of Perherne or Poravia, a region in Germanie ſituate betwixt Boheme and Hungarie. They were driuen out of their owne countrie by the Romans, and aſſembling together vnder a famous capteine named Roderike, came downe to the mouth of the Rhene, where making ſhiſt for beſſels, they toke the ſeaſ to ſeeke them ſome new habitations; and thus arriving in Idaland, were ſoſullie receiued of the Picts and Scots, for that they were reputed right valiant men, and glad to reuenge their owne iniuries againſt the Romans. Namelie wiſth the Picts they were much eſtimated, for that they came forth of the ſame countrie from whence their anceſſors were deſcended.

Theſe huge bodieſ and mightie linſ did are allie commend them in the ſight of all men before whom they muſtered, ſo that comming to the place where the kingſ of Scots and Picts were incamped with their people readie to march forth towards the enemies, they were highlie welcomed, and vpon their offer receiued into companie, and appointed to go forth in that iournie, in aid of queene Moada againſt the Romans. With this Moada was aſſembled a mightie hoſt of the Britains, amongſt whom were ſiue thouſand women, wholie bent to reuenge the villanies done to their perſonſ by the Romans, or to die in the paine. And for this purpoſe were they come well appointed with armour and weapons, to be the firſt that ſhould glie the onſet. Moada hearing of hir brothers approach with the king of Picts and their armies, met them on the waie accompanied with a great number of the nobles of Britaine, and brought them to hir campe with great loy and triumph.

After taking aduiſe how to behaue themſelues in their enterpriſe, they thought it good to make haſt to fight with the procurator Catus, yer anie new power of men of warre might come to his aid forth of Gallia now called France. Whereupon marching towards him, they met together in the field, where betwixt them was ſtriken a right fierce and cruell battell; but in the end the horſemen of the Romans part being put to flight, the footmen were beaten downe on ech ſide; Catus himſelfe being wounded, eſcaped verie hardlie by flight, and shortly after got him ouer into France. The Scots and Picts with other the Britains, hauing atchieued this victorie, purſued their enemies from place to place, ſo that there died by the ſword, what in the battell and elſewhere in the chaſe, ſeuentie thouſand Romans and other ſtrangers, which ſerued amongſt them; and of Scots, Picts, and other Britains, were ſlaine thirtie thouſand.

The gouernour Suetonius being then in Gallia, hearing of this ouerthrow, & in what danger things ſtood in Britaine, by reaſon of the ſame, came ouer with two legions of ſouldiers, and ten thouſand of other Brigants as aiders to thoſe legions. Moada the queene vnderſtanding of his arrival, aſſembled againe hir people, and ſent vnto the Scots and Picts to come to hir aid: who together with the Poravians came with all ſpeed vnto hir. When they were thus aſſembled, Britains, Scots, Picts, & Poravians on one part, and Romans with their aidſ on the other, they marched forth to incounter together with deliberat minds to trie the matter by dint of ſword, being earneſtly exhorted thereto by their gouernours on either ſide. So that ioining puiſſance againſt puiſſance, they fought a right cruell battell, manie in the beginning being ſlaine and bozne downe on both ſides. But in the end the victorie abode with the Romans, the Britains with other the Albans were chaſed out of the field. There were ſlaine of them at the point of foure ſcore thouſand perſonſ, as Tacitus writeth. The more part of the Poravians, together with their capteine Roderike, were in that number. Moada the queene, doubting to come into the handſ of hir enemies, ſlew hir ſelfe. Two of hir daughters were taken priſoners, and brought away, even as they were found fighting in the battell, vnto Suetonius.

The eldeſt of them wiſthin a ſew monethſ after was married vnto a noble Romane named Marius, who had deſloured hir before time. He was alſo created king of Britaine by the emperours authoritie, that thereby the ſtate of the countrie might be reduced vnto a better quiet. He ſiſd to lie moſt an erid in the parties of Kendale, and named a part thereof wherein were the Britains.

Women come South the queene in aid.

The Romans are put to flight and overthrown.

Catus was drowned.

70000 Romans ſlaine, and 30000 Britains.

Moada eſcaped an arrow againſt the Romans.

The Romans overthrew the Scots and Picts.

The Poravians ſlaine.

Moada ſlew hir ſelfe.

Marcius was made king.

wherein was the Britains.

Women come South the queene in aid.

The Romans are put to flight and overthrown.

Catus was drowned.

70000 Romans ſlaine, and 30000 Britains.

Moada eſcaped an arrow againſt the Romans.

The Romans overthrew the Scots and Picts.

The Poravians ſlaine.

Moada ſlew hir ſelfe.

Marcius was made king.

wherein was the Britains.

Women come South the queene in aid.

The Romans are put to flight and overthrown.

Catus was drowned.

70000 Romans ſlaine, and 30000 Britains.

Moada eſcaped an arrow againſt the Romans.

The Romans overthrew the Scots and Picts.

The Poravians ſlaine.

Moada ſlew hir ſelfe.

Marcius was made king.

(where he passed the most part of his time altogether in hunting) Westmerland, after his owne name, though afterwards, when the Romans were expelled, a portion of the same adjoining next unto the Scots was called Cumberland. The Agroautians which escaped from the discomfiture, had that portion of Scotland assigned forth unto them to inhabit in, that lieth betwixt the rivers of Loyne and Speie, called euen unto this day Pursey land.

Corbzeid being thus ouerthrowne, and hauing his power greatlie infeebled thereby, passed the residue of his life in quietnesse. For the Romans being troubled with ciuill warres, meebled neither with the Scots nor Picts, but onlie studied to keepe the south parts of Britaine in due obedience. Finally Corbzeid departed this world, after he had reigned 34 yeares, and was buried amongst his elders nere unto Dunstaffage, with manie obelisks set vp about him.

After Corbzeid succeeded one Dardan, which for his huge stature was afterwarde surnamed the great. He was lineally descended fro Metellane, who was his great grandfather. The nobles and commons of the realme chose him to be their king, onelie for the good opinion they had conceiued of him in his predecessors daies, by whome he was had in great estimation, and had atchiued vnder him manie worthie enterprises, so that he was thought most meetest for the roine, considering the sonnes of Corbzeid were not as yet come vnto ripe yeares to inioy the same. For the said Corbzeid had three sons in all, Corbzeid, Tulcane, and Bzeke. The eldest had bene brought vp with Moada, queene of the Britains, whereby he had learned the maners and vsages of the British nation, and thereupon was surnamed Gald; for so doe the Scottishmen vse euen vnto this day to name anie of their owne countrymen that hath learned the courtesie and maners of strange countries.

But to returne to Dardan, in the beginning of his reigne he gouerned the estate by good indifferent iustice, but after he had continued therein by the space of two yeares, he began to fall into all kinds of vices, remouing from offices such as were by right bearers of themselves in the same, and aduancing to their places bribers and extortioners. The nobles he had in suspect, fauoring onelie such as thorough flatterie were by him preferred. And where he was browne beyond all the terms of honestie in fleshlie and sinfull lust, yet was his couetousnesse so great, that all was too little which he might lay hands vpon. He also put to death diuers honorable personages, such as he perceived to grudge at his doings. He likewise purposed to haue made away the sonnes of his predecessor Corbzeid, but his traitorous practise being disclosed, the most part of the nobles and commons of the realme rebelled against him, and sending for Corbzeid Gald the eldest sonne of the former Corbzeid, remaining as then in the Ile of Span (where he should haue bene murdered) they chose him to their king. And at length beating downe all such as made resistance, they got that cruell tyrant Dardan into their hands, & bringing him forth before the multitude, they caused his head to be openlie stricken off. This was the 81 yeare after the birth of our Saviour, being the first of the emperor Domitian, & the fourth compleat of his owne reigne over the Scottishmen.

Corbzeid Gald being thus chosen (as I haue said) to succeed in the government of Scotland after Dardan, is called by Cornelius Tacitus Galgacus, a prince of comelie personage, and of right noble port. In the first beginning of his reigne he punished such as had bene furtherers of his predecessors mis-gouernement, and afterwards he passed ouer into the westerne Isles, where he appeased certeine rebels, which went about to disquiet the state of the common-wealth there. From thence he sailed vnto the Isles of Lewis and Skie, and put to death certeine offenders that would not be obedient vnto their gouernors and iudges. After this he returned by Kosse, and set a stay also in that countrie, touching certeine misdeemeanors of the people there. To be short, he purged the whole realme of all such robbers, theues, and other the like offenders against the quiet peace of his subiects, as were hugelie increased by the contentious rule of his predecessor Dardan, and here vnto he was mightilie aided by the Agroautians, who pursued such offenders most earnestlie, and brought in vnto him no small number of them, euer as they caught them.

By this meanes was the state of the common-wealth brought into better quiet, and the yere next ensuing, being the third of Gald his reigne, he called a councell at Dunstaffage, wherein he laboured much for the abrogating of the wicked lawes instituted by king Cluin, as before is partly specified: but he could not obtaine more, than that poxe men from thenceforth should haue their wiues free vnto themselves, without being abused from time to time indifferentlie by their landlords, as heretofore they had bene. Whilste he was thus busied about the establishing of holome orders & statutes for the welth of his subiects, word was brought him that Petilius Cerealis a Romane capteine, being sent from Caesar the emperor to haue the gouernement of Britaine, was landed with a puissant armie in the countrie, and minded shortly to inuade the borders of his realme, as Annandale and Galloway.

With these newes Gald being somewhat astonished, thought good to vnderstand the certentie of the enimies doings, before he made anie stirre for the leuieng of his people, and therefore appointed certeine light horsemen to ride forth, and to bring certeine newes of that which they might heare or see: who at their returne declared that the enimies armie was abroad in the fields, vpon the borders of Widdland, and had giuen the Picts already a great ouerthrow; and further, how they were turned westward on the left hand, in purpose to enter into Galloway. Gald being thus certified of the Romans approach towards his countrie, determined to giue them battell, before they entered into the inner parts of his realme, and therefore with all speed he assembled his people, to the number of fiftie thousand men, all such as were able to beare armes, being ready to repaire vnto him in such present necessitie for defense of their countrie.

It hath bene reported, that as he marched forth towards his enimies, sundrie strange sights appeared by the way. An eagle was seene almost all a whole day, flying vp and downe ouer the Scottish armie, euen as though she had laboured hir selfe wearie. Also an armed man was seene flying round about the armie, and suddenlie vanished away. There fell in like maner out of a darke cloud in the fields, through the which the armie should passe, diuerse kinds of birds that were spotted with blood. These monstrous sights troubled mens minds diuerslie, some construing the same to signifie good successe, and some otherwise. Also the chiefe captiues amongst the Scots were not all of one opinion, for some of them weleng the great force of the Romane armie, being the greatest that euer had bene brought into their countrie before that day, counselled that they shuld in no wise be fought with, all, but rather to suffer them to wearte themselves, till vittels and other prouision should faile them, and then

See more of him in England.

Gald punished such as disturb the quiet state of his subiects.

The Agroautians helped to appease the theues and offenders.

Gald labored to abrogate wicked lawes.

Petilius Cerealis a Romane capteine sent by Caesar into Britaine.

The Ordonians and Widdians mistaken by the Scottish writers.

The plots ouerthrowne by the Romans. The Romans purpose to enter into Galloway. Gald determined to fight with the Romans.

Strange sights appeared to the Scottish armie.

The Scots not all of one mind.

are attie ore home lace were ped with es the en
pon their ted to go da again women com
with the queene in ar
nour.
The Romans
are put to fight and o uerthrowne.
Cetus was wounded.
70000 Romans
man's name,
and 30000
Britains.
in Gallia,
ger things
came ouer housand of
s. Moada
assembled s and Picts Agroautians
were thus Agroautians
s on the o gether with at of sword, gouernors ce against cell, manie downe on ode with the bans were
of them at s, as Taci
ians, togie ere in that o come into
Two of hir brought ar
g in the bat
one this after ed Marcius
as also cre
authoritie, ght be red most an end
paid the r (where Westmerland.

Westmerland was the name of the whole of the Agroautians.

Corbzeid dead Anno Christi 71. H. B.

Dardan.

Corbzeid his three sonnes.

Dardan slain by his own people.

Marcius slain by his own people.

The common rebellion.

Dardan slain by his own people.

Corbzeid slain by his own people.

then to take the aduantage of them, as occasion serued.

The Scots agree to fight with the Romans.

The Scots are discontented.

The citie called Epiake is wonn by the Romans.

The Scots durst not fight any field with the Romans.

Touching all the doings of the Romans in Britaine ye shall find sufficientlie in the historie of England.

Moadicia renewed wars with the Romans.

The Romane campe assailed in the night by Moadicia.

Other twers of a contrarie mind, iudging it best (with the puissance of the whole realme was assembled) to giue battell, least by deferring time, the courage and great desire, which the people had to fight, should was faint and decate: so that all things considered, it was generallie in the end agreed vpon to giue battell, and so comming within sight of the enemies host, they made readie to incounter them. At the first the Scots were somewhat amazed with the great multitude of their aduersaries, but through the cherefull exhortations of their king, and other their captains, their stomachs began to reuiue, so that they bolliue set vpon the Romans, whereof ensued betwixt them a right fierce and cruell battell, holbe- it in the end the victorie inclined to the Romans, and the Scots were chased out of the field. Cald himselfe was wounded in the face, yet escaped he out of the battell, but not without great danger in deed, by reason the Romans pursued most egerlie in the chase.

There were slaine of the Scottishmen (as their chronicles report) about twelue thousand, and of the Romans about six thousand. This victorie being thus atchiued, the Romans got possession of Epiake with the greatest part of all Galloway, and passed the residue of that yere without anie other notable exploit: but in the summer following, Petilius the Romane gouernor went about to subdue the rest of the countrie, the Scots oftentimes making diuerse skirmishes with him, but in no wise durst ioine with them, puissance against puissance, least they should haue put their countrie into further danger, if they had chanced otherwise to haue received the ouerthrow.

Here haue we thought good to aduertise the reader, that although the Scottish writers impute all the trauels, which Petilius spent in subduing the Brigants, and Frontinus in conquering the Silures, to be imployed chieflie against Scots & Pias: the opinion of the best learned is wholie contrarie thereto, affirming the same Brigants & Silures not to be so far north by the distance of manie miles, as Hector Boetius and other his countriemen do place them, which thing in the historie of England we haue also noted, where ye may read more of all the doings of the Romans here in Britaine, as in their writers we find the same recorded. But neuertheless we haue here followed the course of the Scottish historie, in maner as it is written by the Scots themselves, not binding anie man more in this place than in other to credit them further than by conference of authoys it shall seme to them expedient.

In the meane time then, whilst Petilius was occupied (as before ye haue hard) in the conquest of Galloway, Moadicia the daughter of Arutragus (whom the Romans had before time misused, as before in this treatise is partlie touched) gathered together a crew of souldiours within the Ile of Man, partlie of the inhabitants, and partlie of such Scottishmen of Galloway as were fled thither for succor: with these shee toke the seas, and landing in Galloway, vpon purpose to reuenge hir iniuries in times past received at the Romans hands, she set vpon their tents in the night season, when they looked for nothing lesse than to be disquieted, by reason whereof they were brought into such disorder, that if Petilius had not caused such fierbrands to be kindled as he had prepared and dressed with pitch, rosen and tallow, for the like purpose, the whole campe had bene in great danger: but these torches or fierbrands gaue not onlie light to see where to make resistance, but also being cast in the faces of the enemies, staied their hardie forwardnesse, whereby the Romans hauing leasure to place themselves in arrate, defended the entrees of their campe, till the day was sprung, and then giuing a full onset vpon their enemies, they put them quite to flight.

But Moadicia not herewith discouraged, hasted with all speed vnto Epiake, and taking that citie she set fire on it, and slue such Romans as she found there, whereof Petilius being certified, sent forth a legion against hir to withstand hir attempts. Those that had the charge of them that were thus sent, used such diligence, that laeing an ambush for hir in a place fit for that purpose, they so inclosed hir, that slaieng the most part of hir company, she was taken prisoner hir selfe, and being brought alieue vnto Petilius, vpon hir stout answer made vnto him, as he questioned with hir about hir bold enterprises, shee was presentlie slaine by the souldiours.

Anon after Petilius was certified, that the inhabitants of the Ile of Wight, with other southerne Britains, had raised a commotion against king Aparius, so that without speedie succors they were like to driue him out of his kingdome: wherevpon he hasted thither with all conuenient speed, and subduing the rebels, set all things there in good order and staie: and so remaining there till the next yere after, he fell sicke of the flux and died. Immediatlie wherevpon the emperour sent one Iulius Frontinus to succeed in his place. This Frontinus brought with him two legions of souldiours, and after he had taken order with king Aparius for the keeping of the Britains in due subiection of the empire, he purposed to bring such vnto obedience, as inhabited within and beyond the woods of Calidon, and as yet not banquished by anie man.

Therefore entring first into Galloway, and bisting such garrisons of the Romans, as Petilius had left there for the keeping of that quarter, he commended their loialtie and diligence, in that they had looked so well to their charge, that the enimie had gained no aduantage at their hands, whilst the armie was occupied in the south parts about other affaires there. He also sent an herald vnto the king of the Pias with letters, requiring him to renew by confirmation the former league betwixt his people & the Romans, & not by any means to aid the Scots as before they had done to their great losse & hindrance. Herunto the king of Pias much suspecting the matter, made a direct answer, that he saw no cause why he should in fauor of the Romans suffer his confederats the Scots to be subdued, and brought to destruction without all reason or equitie: and therefore he was determined by the aduise of his peres & counsellors, to aid the Scots against such as sought nothing but the meanes how to bring the whole Ile of Albion into thraldome and seruite bondage.

Frontinus little regarding this vntowardlie answer, set forward to subdue such Scots as were yet disobedient. And so entring into the borders of Kile, Carrike, and Coningham, had diuers skirmishes with such as king Cald had assembled to defend his countrie, but so much as he was diseased with sickness, he was at length constrained to withdraw himselfe into Argile, leauing his power behind him to resist the enemies attempts: but shortly after his departure from amongst them, they were sought with all by the Romans, and discomfited, three thousand of them being slaine in the field. By reason of which ouerthrowe those countries submitted themselves to the Romans, perceiuing no hope otherwise how to escape that present danger.

These Scots of Carrike, Kile, and Coningham, being thus brought into subiection, the armie was licenced to withdraw to their lodgings for the winter

Epiake is taken and burned by Moadicia.

Moadicia is slaine.

The Britains rebel.

The Britains are appeased.

Petilius the Romane is gat death.

Iulius Frontinus sent into Britaine.

The Silures mistaken for Scottishmen.

Frontinus purpoeth to pursue the conquest of the Silures whith the Scots make for Galloway men.

Frontinus requirith to ioine in amitie with the Pias.

The Pias king refuseth to be in league with the Romans.

Cald resisteth the Romans.

By reason of sickness he withdraweth to Argile.

Cald resisteth the Romans.

By reason of sickness he withdraweth to Argile.

They submit themselves to the Romans.

They submit themselves to the Romans.

They submit themselves to the Romans.

They submit themselves to the Romans.

They submit themselves to the Romans.

They submit themselves to the Romans.

Frontinus being bereaved with sickness returneth to Rome.

Iulius Agricola is sent into Britaine.

The Scots of Annandale beat the Romans.

Agricola pursueth to go against the Scots.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

Marachach is of the Pias discomfited by the Romans.

unting lea.
ded the en-
wong, and s, they put ged, haffed

at citie the the found ent forth a
pts. Those s sent, bled o; hir in a d bir, that was taken vnto Peti-
tim, as he pyles, the

at the inhar southerne king Pa-
were like to upon he hand subduing
er and state:
re after, he ie whereop tinus to suc-
ht with him
ad taken o;
of the Wispurposed to within and yet not van-

ay, and viff Petilius had er, he com-
that they had entime had hilest the ar-
out other af-
to the king of
to renebe by t his people &
the Scots as & hindzance.

ing the mat-
one cause why his confeder-ht to destruc-
therefore he eres & coun-
s sought no whole Ile of dage.

owardlie ans as were yet
nders of Aile, rs skirmishes
d to defend his aled with sick-
to withdraw er behind him
rtle after his were fought
ed, three thou-
By reason of mitted them-
no hope other.

Coningham,
he armie was s for the winter

ter season, during the which, Frontinus fell sicke of superfluous abundance of flegme, which bereft him in such sort, that the emperor Domitian, who as then gouerned the Romane empire, sent for him home to Rome, and appointed a right valiant personage, one Julius Agricola to succed as lieutenant of Brittain in his roome. About the time of whose arrivall there, the Scots of Annandale slue a great number of the Romans, with which successe they procured also the Picts with the inhabitants of Galloway, Aile, Carrike, and Coningham to rebell.

These newes being reported vnto Agricola, he made his prouision with all speed to go against them, and first entring into the borders of Pictland, he reduced such as inhabited about the confines of Berwick to their former subiection, and after marching towards the citie of Camelon, Karanach king of the Picts incountred him by the waie, but being fiercely beaten off by the Romans, he fled backe into the citie, and within three daies after hauing reinforced his power, he effrones gaue battell againe to his enimies; but then also being vanquished, he lost the most part of all his men, and so immediatlie thereupon was Camelon twine by force, & a great number of the citizens slaine.

Agricola caused it to be netulie fortified, and further through fame of this victorious beginning, he recovered the most part of all the castles and fortresses of Pictland. The forenamed Karanach escaping out of that present danger, got him beyond the water of Firth, for the more suertie of his owne person. Agricola hauing sped thus in Pictland, marched forth against them of Annandale, who at the first making resistance for a time, at length were constrained to giue backe, and so fled to their houses, where in the night following by their owne wiues they were murdered each mothers sonne: for so the women of that nation bled to put awaie the shame of their husbands, when they at any time had fled out of the field from their enimies.

Agricola vnderstanding that by winning him fame in the beginning, it should be no small furtherance vnto him for the atchiuing of other enterprizes in time to come, determined to pursue his good fortune, and thereupon prepared to subdue the Ile of Man; but wanting vessels to conuey his armie ouer, he found meanes that such as could swim, and knew the shallow places of that coast, made shift to passe the golfe, and so got on land, to the great wonder and amazing of the inhabitants, who watched the sea coasts, to resist such ships as they looked for to haue arrived upon their shore: but now despairing to resist such kind of warriors as endangered themselves to passe the seas in that maner of wise, they submitted themselves vnto Agricola.

Who taking pledges of thein, and appointing certaine garisons to keepe diuers holds and places of defense within that Ile, passed ouer with the residue of his people into Galloway, where he sojourned all the winter following: which being passed, and summer once come, he assembled his men of warre againe, and visited a great part of that countrie with Aile, Carrike, and Coningham, the inhabitants whereof he put in such feare with the onelike show of his warlike armie, disposed in such politike order and wise conduct, that there was none to be found that durst aduance themselves to incountre him, so that he spent that summers season in keeping such of the Scots as had bene aforesaid subdued, from attempting any commotion. And when winter was come, he assembled the nobles of the countie, exhorting them by gentle persuasions, to frame themselves to a ciuill trade of liuing, as well in building of temples, houses, and other edifices after the Roman maner, as also in wearing of comelie and decent apparell; and aboue all things to set their children to schoole, to be brought vp in eloquence and good nurture. By this meanes he thought to traine them from their accustomed fiercenesse, and to win them the sooner to be content with bondage, though he coloured it with neuer so faire a glose of humanitie.

The third winter being thus spent, and the next summer commen vpon, Agricola inuaded such countries as were yet undiscovered by the Romans, entering by the nether side of Calidon wood, euen vnto the dolorous mountaine, which afterwards by the Scots was cleped Sterling. It was called the dolorous mountaine, for that in the night season there was heard right lamentable noise & cries, as though the same had bene of some creatures that had bewailed their miserable cases: which undoubtedly was the craftie illusions of wicked spirits, to keepe mens minds still oppressed in blind errors and superstitious fantasies.

Agricola considering the naturall strength of this mountaine, with the site of an old ruinous castell that stood thereon, he caused the same with all diligence to be repaired, and a bidge to be made ouer the Forth there, by the which he passed with his whole armie ouer into Fife: and the daie after, hearing that the king of the Picts was withdrawn into a castell thereby, standing vpon an high mountaine cleped Benart, he inuironed the same with a strong siege, howbeit his hoped prey was not as then within it, for Karanach king of the Picts, informed of the Romans approach, got him forth abrode into the fields, and assembling his power, purposed by night to haue broken the bidge, which Agricola had made ouer the Forth at Sterling, but being repelled by such as were set there to defend the same, in his returne from thence he was incountred by Agricola himselfe, who being certified of this attempt of his enimies, had leuied his siege, and was comming towards them, so that both the hosts meeting together in the fields, there was fought a fore battell betwixt them, though in the end the Picts were discomfited, and their king the foresaid Karanach chased vnto the riuier of Tay, where he got a bote, and escaped to the further side of that water. By reason of this overthrow, Agricola brought in subiection those countries, which lie betwene the waters of Forth and Tay, as Fife, Forthlike, and Ornedall, and sojourning there all the winter following, he built sundrie fortresses in places most conuenient for the keeping of the inhabitants in their couenanted obedience, after his departure from amongst them.

In the meane while, the king of the Picts kept him at Dundee, whither resorted vnto him a great number of the Pictish nobilitie, such as had escaped the Romans hands. These comforted their king in all that they might, willing him to be of god chere, and to hope well of his recouerie of his losses againe by some good fortune; and meanes that might happen to come ver ought long, promising to the furtherance thereof all that in them late, as well for counsell as aduise hand: and hereupon they took aduise which waie to worke, in somuch that at length it was by great deliberation thought god to seeke for succor at the hands of their ancient confederats the Scots, and so incontinentlie there were certaine messengers dispatched with all speed vnto Gald the Scottish king, requiting him in that common jeopardie to soine in league with his ancient friends the Picts, against the ambitious and most cruell Romans, who sought nothing else but the utter subiection of the whole land of Albion, as manifestlie appeared by their proceedings, hauing already occupied and wrongfullie

Calendar
wood.
Agricola commeth to Sterling.

Agricola buildeth the castle of Sterling with the bidge.

Mount Benart.

Karanach assaulteth Sterling bidge, which the Romans defended.

Karanach is effrones chased. Fife with other countie brought into subiection of the Romans.

Karanach comforted by his nobles.

The Picts send for aid to king Gald.

Gald promised to ioin league with
the Picts
against the
Romans.

fullie surprisid a great part not onlie of the Pictish kingdome, but also of the Scottish dominions, minding still to go forward in such unrighteous conquests, if by timely resistance they were not staied. Gald upon this request and motion of the Picts gladly consented to ioin his power with theirs, in common defense of both the realmes (against such common enemies as the Romans were esteemed) having hereunto the assent of all his peers and chiefest counsellors.

The Scots
saw the Roman souldiers
lying in certaine garisons
The river of Clide, otherwise called Clude.
Agricola repelling the Scots, could not yet win
the castell of Dunbryeton,
ancientlie called Dowlcluch, or Al-cluth.

Thus whilst the kings of the Scots and Picts were concluding a league together for defense of themselves and their countries, certaine Scots entered into the confines of Isle, Carrick, and Coningham, and wan divers fortresses, wherein certaine garisons of Romane souldiers sojourned, whome they slew downe right without all mercie, spoiling the whole countrie. Agricola having knowledge hereof, went straightwaies thither with a power, and pursuing them that had done those injuries, some he took amongst the hills and mounteines, whither they fled; and the residue he chased beyond the river of Clide, but the castell of Dunbryeton he could not by any means obtaine, though he assaied to win it even to the uttermost of his power. It was called in those daies Alcluth, that is to meane: All stone. The Scottishmen being thus driven backe, Agricola repaired such castles and fortresses as they had overthrowne and beaten downe.

Agricola
invaied Lennox.

In the yeare following, being the first after the first coming of Agricola into Britaine, he caused his ships to be brought about from the Ile of Wight into the water of Lochline in Argile, thereby to put his enemies in utter despair of escaping his hands either by water or land: and thereupon passing over the river of Clide with his armie, and finding his naime there, he set upon the countrie of Lennox, in purpose to subdue the same. But after he had made sundrie skirmishes with the inhabitants, he was certified by letters from the gouernor of Camelon, that the Picts were ready to rebell, by reason whereof he left off this enterprize against the Scots, and drew backe into Pictland, leauing a part of his armie to keepe possession of the water of Clide, till his returne againe into those parties. At his coming into Pictland, he appeled the rebels with small adoe, punishing the chiefe authors according to their demerits. This done, he returned vnto the water of Clide, lieng all that winter beyond the same, taking order for the gouernment of those parties, in due obedience of the Romane empire.

Agricola re-
turneth into Pictland, to appeale a rebellion of the people there.
He returneth
vnto Clide.

Agricola pursueth his enterprize against the
Scots.

The summer following he appointed his naime to search alongst by the coast all the hauens and creeks of Argile, and of the Ilands nere to the same. Whilst he by land passing over the water of Lenine, went about to conquer towne and castles, though halfe discouraged at the first, by reason of the rough waies, streit passages, high mounteines, craggy rocks, thicke woods, deepe marshes, fens and moles, with the great rivers which with his armie he must needs passe, if he minded to attaine his purpose: but the old souldiers being inured with paines and trauell, overcame all these difficulties by the wise conduct of their worthy generall and other the capteins, and so inuading the countrie took towne and castles, of the which some they beat downe and rased, and some they fortified and trusted with garisons of men of warre.

All the Scots assemble.

About the same time by commandement of king Gald, and other the gouernors of Scotland, all the able men of Cantire, Loche, Murrayland, Lugenmarth, also those of the westerne Isles, & of all other parties belonging to the Scottish dominions, were appointed to assemble and come together in Atholl, at a place not passing five miles distant from the castell of Calidon now cleped Dunkeld, there to abide the coming of Karanach king of the Picts, to the end that ioining together in one armie, they might work some high exploit. But he having assembled fiftie thousand of his men of war, as he marched alongst by the mountaine of Granzbene, in times past cleped Mons Grampius, there chanced a mutinie amongst his people, so that falling together by the eares, Karanach himselfe coming amongst them vnarmed as he was to part the fraie, was slaine presently at vnwares, by one that knew not what he was. By reason of which mischance that iourne was broken, for the Picts being bitterlie amayed and discomforted herewith, skaled and departed asunder.

Gald with his Scots now being thus disappointed of the Picts his chiefe aid, durst not leaue to trie the chance of battell with the enemies, but determined with light skirmishes, and by withdrawing of vittells out of their walke, to stop them from further proceeding in conquest of the countrie, & in the mean time to provide against the next summer new aid and succors to keepe the field, and so to encounter with them, with all the puissance against puissance, if they remained so long in the countrie. The Scots resting upon this resolution, thought good to send some honorable ambassage vnto the Picts to moue them vnto mutuall agreement & concord amongst themselves, whereby they might be able to resist the common ruine of their countrie as then in present danger to be oppressed by the Romans.

Those that were sent on this message, did so diligently behaue themselves, in bringing their purpose to passe, that the Picts in the end agreed to ioin in friendly amitie one with another, and to chuse one Carnard to their king to succede in the roome of Karanach. They also confirmed the former league with the Scots, and by their procurement sent messengers vnto the Norwegians and Danes, requiring them of aid against the Romans the common enemies of all such nations as loued to liue in libertie, wherefore the same were inhabiting in ante part on the whole face of the earth. There were also sent ambassadors vnto the Irishmen from the Scots for the same intent, and from both those places there was great aid promised, as from them that esteemed themselves halfe bound by a naturall respect, to succor such as were descended of the same ancestors and countries that they were of, and now like to be expelled out of the seats which their forefathers had got possession in by iust title of conquest, and left the same vnto their posteritie to enjoy for ever.

Whilst these things were thus in doing, Galdus diuiding his armie into sundrie parts, did what was possible to resist all the attempts of the Romans. Who standing in doubt of his puissance, rather through some thereof, than for any apparant sight or other knowledge had, durst not put themselves in danger to enter into Calidon wood, of all that summer; and the winter following was so extreme, by reason of frost, snow, and coldnesse of aire, that they were not able to enterprize any exploit on neither part: howbeit the summer was no longer come (being the seauenth after the coming of Agricola into Britaine) but that they prepared to inuade one another againe with all their forces.

From Ireland there came (according as was promised) a great power of men of warre, and loined with an armie of Scottishmen in Atholl, being there already assembled in great numbers out of all the quarters of the Scottish dominions. With them came also Carnard king of the Picts with his power. All which forces being thus assembled together by common agreement amongst them, Gald king of the king of the Picts

Karanach
slaine by one of his owne subiues.

An ambage sent from
the Picts
to the Scots.

The Picts
brought to agreement
amongst themselves.

Ambassadors
sent vnto
the Danes
and Irishmen
for aid.

The same
of Gald
his sance
with
the Romans
in scare.

In aid of the Irishmen
came to the succor
of the
Scots.

Gald chosen
to be generall against
the Romans.

Gald setteth upon one part of his enemies
in the night.

Agricola commeth to the succor of his men.

Agricola dis-cusseth his enemies.

The Romans passe
the high Calidon wood over
the river of Emond.

The Picts
burne the tine of Lenine.
The place where Tu-lone and is called by the substantiue
at this date Inchtylthill.

The Germans coming to succor
the Romans resist against their capitaine
and leaders.

Gald chosen
to be generall
against
the Romans.

the ring
into three miles
of the
to the
com
of h about orde byon
to hi entit nie l right
and ente cert ass ed, t ple thin beh upon thof
may den
and ning
plain of hi ch Hec
sear fow
of the the f Den
send raile
tie se he h wer defe an e laale pith
from ged ting Tul
thou gre citie buil appe
from ture
And
ued more
At
fle d amo ouer num eng appo
ning

the Scots was chosen to be their generall, who hearing that Agricola with his host was entred into Balendar wood, diuided the whole armie into three battels, and so marched forth towards the enimies in purpose to encounter them. Agricola being of this aduertised by spies, parted his people also into three wards, doubting to be inclosed within some combersome place by reason of the great multitude of his enimies, that were esteemed to be in number about 50000 of one and other.

Gald on the other side vnderstanding by spies this order of the Romans, in the dead of the night setteth upon one of those legions, which was lodged next vnto him, and finding meanes to lea the watch, was entred into the enimies lodgings, before they had any knowledge of his comming, so that the fight was right fierce & cruell euen among the Romans tents and lodgings. But Agricola being certified of this enterprize of the Scots, sent forth with all speed a certaine number of light horsemen and footmen to assault them on the backs, & so to keepe them occupied, till he might come with all the residue of his people to the rescue. They that were thus sent, accomplishing their enterprize according to the deuise in that behalfe appointed, gaue a right fierce & stout charge vpon the Scots and Picts, greatlie to the reliefe of those that were by them assailed, and withall fore amazed and disordered by reason of the enimies sudden inuasion.

By this meanes the fight continued right fierce and cruell on all sides, till at length the daie beginning to appeere, shewed to the Scots and Picts the plaine view of the whole Romane armie, approaching vnder the conduct of Agricola, to the succour of his people, being thus in danger to be distressed. Herevnto were the Scots and Picts put in such feare, that immediatlie they fell to running awaie towards the woods and bogs, the accustomed places of their refuge. This querthow did so abash both the Scots and Picts, that they durst attempt no more the fortune of battell, till they had some aid out of Denmarke, but onlie did what they could to defend their towncs and countrie, by making sundrie raises vpon their enimies, as occasion and oportunitie serued. But the Romans, supposing nothing to be hard for their vndaunted valiancie, but that they were able to overcome whatsoeuer should stand at defiance against them, determined at length to find an end of the Ile of Albion, and so passing thorough Balendar wood, and ouer the riuer of Amond, they pitched their field nere to the riuer of Taie, not far from the castell named Calidon or Balendar.

The Picts, by reason that their enimies were lodged so nere to the confines of their countrie, doubting what might follow thereof, burned the citie of Tuline, least the same enimies chancing to take it, should furnish it with some garrison of men, to the great danger of the whole Pictish kingdome. This citie stood vpon the banke of Taie, right beautifullie built, with many faire castles and towers, as may appeere euen vnto this daie by the old ruines therof, strong rather by the workemans hands, than by nature. The Scottishmen in our time call the place Inchuthill. All their wiues and children they removed vnto the mountains of Granybene for their more suretie and safegard.

About the same time the Romans were not a little disquieted, by reason of a mutinie which chanced amongst such Germans as were appointed to come ouer to Agricola, as a new supplie to furnish by such numbers as were decayed in his armie. These haueing their capteine, and such other Romans as were appointed to haue the order of them for their training in warlike seats at the beginning, as the maner was, got certeine pinnesles which they happened vpon in the riuer of Thames, and sailing about the east and north coasts of this Ile, arrived in Taie water, offering themselves to the Scots and Picts to serue against the Romans, whose malice they dread for their offense committed if they should returne into their owne countreies, which laie about the mouth of the Rhene, and was as then subiect to the Romane empire, the inhabitants in those daies being cleped Alsipites, the which (as some suppose) inhabited Cleueland and Gullike.

Their offer was accepted most thankfullie, and places appointed for them to inhabit amongst the Hurraies, because they were descended as it were of one nation. Whilist these things were thus a doing, there came also the long wished aid from the Danes and Norwegians, to the number of ten thousand men, vnder the leading of one Gildo. This Gildo with his name first arrived in the strith betwixt Fife and Louthian, but for that the Romans kept him off from landing there, he cast about and came into the riuer of Taie, where he landed all his people, for provision wherof he had good store both of bittles and armour. Garnard king of the Picts hearing of their arrival there, forthwith vpon the newes departed from Dundee, accompanied with a great number of his nobles, and comming to the place where Gildo with his armie was lodged, receiued him in most iofull wise, feasted and banqueted him and his people, and shewed them all the tokens of most hartie loue and friendship that could be deuised. Gildo himselfe was led by the king vnto Dundee, and lodged with him there in the castell, his people were prouided for abroad in the countrie in places most for their ease, to refresh themselves the better after their painefull iourne by the seas.

Shortlie after there came vnto Dundee the Scottish king Gald, who for his part did all the honour that in him lay vnto Gildo, shewing himselfe most iofull and glad of his comming, yielding vnto him and his people such thanks and congratulations as serued best to the purpose, and receiued no lesse at his and their hands againe. After they had remained thus certeine daies together at Dundee, both the kings Gald & Garnard, together with this Gildo, went vnto the castell of Fofare, there to consult with their capteins and gouernours of their men of warre, how to mainteine themselves in their enterprize against the enimie. At length they resolved not to go forth into the field till the winter season were past, for doubt of the inconuenience that might in sue, by reason of the extreame cold intemperancie of the aire, whereto that countrie is greatlie subiect.

In the meane time they took order for the furniture of all things necessarie for the wars, to haue the same in a perfect readines against the next spring, and till then they did appoint onlie to keepe frontier warre, that the Romans should not strae abroad to fetch in vittels and other provisions to their owne gains, and to the vndoing of the poore inhabitants. Vpon this determination when the counsell was broken by, Gald withdrew into Athall, to defend those parties; and Garnard with the Danish generall Gildo, furnished all the castles and holds in Angus ouer against the riuer of Taie, to stop the passages of the same, that the enimies should enter no further on that side. Thus passed the winter for that yeare, without any great exploit on either part achieved.

In the beginning of the next summer, Agricola appointed his name of ships to saile about the coasts of the furthest parts of Albion, making diligent search of euerie creeke & haueu alongst by the same. The mariners, executing his commandement, sailed

These Alsipites first inhabited the parties betwixt the mountains of Hessen and the Rhene, now called Hochrug, from whence they removed into the nether countreies. Danes, and Norwegians, come to and the Scots and Picts. Gildo is kept off from landing by the Romans. Gildo arriveth in Taie water.

Cornelius Tacitus maketh no mention of this foraine aid to come to the succours of his enimies comprehending them all vnder the name of Britains. Garnard the king of Picts iofullie receiued Gildo. Gald commeth into Dundee to welcome Gildo. Gald Garnard and Gildo assemble a counsell at Fofare, where they deuise how to proceed in their warre.

They determine to rest all the winter, and make frontier warre onlie.

Agricola sendeth forth his name of ships, to discover the furthest point of Britaine northward.

the castell abide the to the end night work ed fittine ed alongst s past cle mutinie ather by the ngst them Karamach of the Picts name by mif. fortune of one of his owne subicaps.

Karamach of the Picts name by mif. fortune of one of his owne subicaps.

Gildo setteth upon one part of the enimies with night.

An ambassage from the Scots to the Picts.

The Picts brought to agreement amongst themselves.

Agricola distressed by his enemies.

An ambassage sent vnto the Danes and Norwegians for aid.

The Romans passe through Calidon wood ouer the riuer of Amond.

The same of Gald his purpose rather to fight or himselfe in all that summe extreame, by e, that they t on neither er come be Agricola in made one an

The Picts burn the citie of Tuline.

An aid of Britishmen come to the succour of the Scots.

The Germans comming to seeke the Romans re- against the captain and leaders.

Gald chosen to be generall against the Romans.

failed round about the north coast, discovering manie of the wessterne Isles and likewise those of Orkney, till at length they found out Orkney firth, being a streit of the sea of twentie miles in breadth, which separateth the Isles of Orkney from the point of Cathness, passing with so swift a course, that without an expert pilot the ships that shall passe the same are oftentimes in great danger, by reason of the contrarie course of the tides. The Romane mariners therefore, finding certeine husbandmen in the next Isles, constrained them to go a shipboard, & to guide them through that streit, promising them high rewards for their labour; but they upon a malicious intent not passing for their owne lues, so they might be reuenged of their enemies in casting away such a notable number of them together with their vessels, entered the streit at such an inconuenient time, that the ships were borne with violence of the streame against the rocks and shelues, in such wise that a number of the same were drowned and lost without recoverie.

The Romane ships through want of pilots are lost in Orkney firth.

Agricola making a bridge ouer Tay water, passeth by the same with his host, and encampeth nere to the foot of the mountaine of Granzbene.

Some of them that were not over-hastie to follow the first, seeing the present losse of their fellows, returned by the same way they came vnto Agricola, who in this meane time had caused a bridge to be made ouer the riuer of Tay, by the which he passed with his whole armie, and encamped on the further side thereof nere to the roots of the mountaine of Granzbene, leaving the bridge garnished with a competent number of souldiers to defend it against the enemies. The Picts being not a little troubled herewith, dispatched forth a messenger with all hast vnto Gald the Scottish king, signifieng vnto him the whole matter, and therupon requiried of him aid.

Gald hauing mustered his people aswell Scottish as Irish, assembled them together to the number of fortie thousand persons, what of one and other, and incontinentlie with all speed marcheth forth to come vnto the aid of the Picts, and so within a few daies passing ouer the mountaine of Granzbene, he arriveth in a ballie beyond the same mountaine, where he findeth the Picts, Danes, and Norwegians incamped together not far off from the host of the Romans. Here taking aduise together, & in the end determining to giue battell, king Gald (vnto whome as before is exprest, the gouernance of the whole was committed) assembling together all the number of the confederats, made vnto them a long and pithie oration, exhorting them in defense of libertie (the most precious iewel that man might inioy) to shew their manlie stomachs against them that sought onlie to deprive them of that so great a benefit. And sith they were diuened to the uttermost bounds of their countrie, he perswaded them to make vertue of necessitie, and rather chose to die with honor, than to liue in perpetuall shame & ignominie, which must needs inue to their whole nation, if they suffered themselves to be vanquished in that instant. With these words, or other much what of the semblable effect, Gald so moued the hearts of his people, that they desired nothing but to ioine with their enemies, & to trie it by dint of sword, which they vniuersallie signified according to their accustomed vse with a great noise, shout, and clamor.

On the other part Agricola, though he perceived a great desire amongst his souldiers to fight, yet he was not negligent on his owne behalfe to incourage them with most cheerefull words and countenance; so that both the armies being thus bent to haue battell, the generals on both parties began to set them in arate. Agricola to the end his armie being the lesser number should not be assailed both a front and on the sides, prouided (by disposing them in a certeine order) a remedie against that disaduan-tage. On the other side, king Gald by reason of the aduantage which he had in his great multitude and number, ordered his battells thereafter with a long and large front, placing the same vpon the higher ground, of purpose to compasse in the enemies on eche side. At the first approach of the one armie towards the other, the battell was begun right fiercelie with shot of arrowes and hurling of darts, which being once past, they ioined together to trie the matter by hand-strokes, wherein the Scots & Picts had one disaduantage, for those that were archers, or (as I may call them) kerns, comming once to fight at hand-blows, had nothing but broad swords and certeine sorte light bucklers to defend themselves with, such as serue to better purpose for men to ride with abroad at home, than to be carried forth into the warres, though the same haue bene so used among the Scottishmen, euen till these our daies.

The Romans therefore being well appointed with armor and broad targets, flue downe right a great number of these Scots and Picts thus slenderlie furnished, without receiuing anie great damage a gaine at their hands, till king Gald appointed his spearmen to step forth before those archers & kerns, to succor them, and therewith also the bilmen came forward, and stroke on so freshlie, that the Romans were beaten downe on heaps, in such wise that they were nere at point to haue bene discomfited, had not a band of Germans (which serued amongst the Romans) rushed forth with great violence vpon the Scottishmen, where most danger appeared, and so restored againe the fainting stomachs of the Romans, whereby the battell renewed on both sides againe right fierce and cruell, that great ruth it was to behold that bloudie fight, and most vnnmercifull murder betwixt them, which continued with more violence on the Scottish side than anie warlike skill, till finallye the night comming on, toke the daies light from them both, and so parted the fraie. The Romans withdrew to their campe: and the Scots and Picts with their confederats the Danes, Norwegians, and Irishmen, such as were left alieue, got them into the next mounteins, hauing lost in this cruell conflict the most part of their whole numbers.

Cornelius Tacitus agreeth not in all points with the Scottish chronicles, in a booke which he wrote of the life of Iulius Agricola, where he intreateth of this battell. For he speaketh but of thirtie thousand men (which he comprehendeth vnder the generall name of Britains) to be assembled at that time against the Romans, making no mention of anie Scots, Picts, Irishmen, Norwegians, or Danes, that should be there in their aid. The number of them that were slaine on the Britains side (as the same Tacitus recounteth) amounted to about ten thousand men, and of the Romans not passing three hundred and fortie. Amongst whom was one Aulus Atticus, a capteine of one of the cohorts. But as the Scottish writers affirme, there died that day of Scots, Picts, and other their confederats at the point of twentie thousand, and of the Romans and such as serued on their side, as good as twelue thousand. Moreover, the night following, when Galdus with the residue of his people which were left alieue was withdrawne to the mounteins, and that the huge losse was understood by the wifes and kindred men of the dead, there began a pitifull noise among them, lamenting and bewailing their miserable case and losses.

But Gald, doubting least the same should come to the eares of some espials, that might lurke nere to the place where he was withdrawne, caused an huge shout and noise to be raised by his people, as though it had bene in token of some reioysing, till the Gald king of the Scottish men cometh to the aid of the Picts.

The Scots and Picts determine to giue battell to the Romans. Gald exhorteth his people to fight manfullie.

Gald by reason of his multitude, thought to compasse his enemies.

The armies approach together to fight.

The Scots had one disaduantage, for those that were archers, or kerns, comming once to fight at hand-blows, had nothing but broad swords and certeine sorte light bucklers to defend themselves with.

A cohort of Germans serued amongst the Romans, which rushed forth with great violence vpon the Scottishmen.

The night severeth the armies in the betwixt the dayes light from them both, and so parted the fraie.

He moueth here of in the history of England.

The number of them that were slaine on this battell.

Domitian the emperor enueth the prosperous success of Agricola.

The Scots upon occasion of this battell, amongst the Romans, came forth against them.

The Scottish men's Picts break by their campe.

The Romans in pursuing vniuersallie are distressed.

Agricola laboureth to bring the north Ingles and to intereth them.

Agricola is terrified of the multitude of his name.

The Romanes set saileth about the north point of Britain.

Strange visions.

Ships bene in the aire, & rained eggs.

Domitian the emperor enueth the prosperous success of Agricola.

The Scots upon occasion of this battell, amongst the Romans, came forth against them.

the women bewailing thus the death of their friends, might be removed out of the way. This done, they fell to take counsell what was best to do in this case: and in the end all things considered, it was determined that somewhat before the dawning of the next morning, euerie man should dislodge and withdraw himselfe into such a place as he thought most meet for his safeguard, saue onelie such as were appointed to attend Gald and Gernard into Atholl, whither they munded with all speed to go.

Thus leauing a great number of fiers to dissemble their departure, they disloded and made awate with all speed possible. In the morning when their departure was once discovered, a great number of the Romans followed as it had bene in the chase, but some of them vnadvisedly aduenturing to farre forward, were inclosed by their enemies and slaine. Those that wrought this feat got them to the next hills and to escape. At length, when all the fields and countries adjoining were discovered, and the same appearing to be quite deliuered of all the ambushments of the enemies, Agricola caused the spoile to be gathered, and after marched forth vnto Angus, where (for so much as summer was past) he appointed to winter, and so comming thither and subduing the countrie, he toke pledges of the best amongst the inhabitants, and lodged his people about him in places most conuenient.

About the same time Agricola heard newes from his nauie (as then riding at anchor in Argyle) what mishap had chanced to the same in Midland frith. But herewith being not greatly discouraged, he gaue order that the ships that had escaped, should be new rigged and furnished with all necessarie provision, and manned thoroughlie, both with able mariners and men of war. This done, he appointed them effones to attempt fortune, and to take their course againe to come round about by the Dykenies, and so to p alongst by the east coast: which enterprise they luckilie accomplished, and in the water of Tait they burnt the Danish fleet lieng there in harbor.

Where is to be noted, that before the fore-reinembred ouerthrow of the Scots and their confederats at the foot of Granzbene, there happened manie sundrie vnketh and strange sights in this Ile. Amongst other there appeared sheng in the aire certeine fire bitions, much to be wondered at. Also a great peece of Kalendar wood seemed in the night time as it had bene on a flaming fire, but in the morning there appeared no such token. There was in like manner scene in the aire the similitude of certeine ships. And in Angus it rained frogs. At Tuline there was a child borne hauing both shayes, so filthie a sight to behold, that forthwith they rid it out of the way for offending others eyes. These prodigious things were deuertly interpreted, according to the variable fanisie of man.

After that the prosperous successe of Agricola was once notified to the emperor Domitian, he toke such enuie thereat, that shortly after, vnder a colour to send him into Syria to be lieutenant there, he countermanded him home vnto Rome, appointing one Cneus Trebellianus to succed him in the gouernment of Britaine, but the armie bearing more fauour vnto one Trebellianus being cousin to Agricola, caused no small trouble amongst the souldiours, so that in the end after certeine bickerings betwixt them, Trebellianus toke a sort of the best souldiours away with him, and went ouer with them into France.

The Scots taking occasion hereof, joined with the Picts, and entred into Angus. Whereof Cneus Trebellianus being informed, assembled his people, who perceiving no great forwardnesse in their leader, created Caius Silius (brother to the forenamed Trebellianus) their capteine, but he would in no wise meddle with that charge, though they looe herie earnest in hand with him to take it vpon him. In the meane time came the enemies vnder the leading of Gald readie to giue the onset, wherewith the Romans being sore troubled, by reason of this discord amongst themselves, set forward yet right valiantlie, to giue battell to their enemies: howbeit in the end, because that Silius received a mortall wound, and so departed out of the field, they fell at length to running awate, the Scots and Picts following in the chase right fiercelie.

This atchieued victorie, after so manie vnluckie enterprises, highlie reioiced the appalled hearts of the Albions, hauing bene continuallie in maner noll for the space of fiftie yeeres through aduerser fortune grievouslie oppressed by the Romans, who being not a little discouraged by this ouerthrow, withdrew themselves wholie vnto Tuline, and shortly after for their more safeguard, they got them ouer the riuer of Tay, breaking the bridge which they had made there, to the end that by the same the Scots & Picts should haue no passage in that place. But Gald hauing got this notable victorie with the spoile of the Romans campe, thought it best with the aduise of his nobles, to pursue the Romans without delate, not suffering them to haue time to provide for resistance. And herevpon comming to the castell of Calidon other-wise Kalendar, they got ouer the riuer of Tay, by a bridge of wood laid ouer the same riuer, which in that place is but narrow, by reason of the rocks & cliffs forcing the banks on either side to a streinnesse.

The Roman captiues also not ignorant of the passage of the enemies, brought forth their armie, and made themselves readie to encounter them, but for that the forenamed Caius Silius was not able to stirre by reason of his wounds received in the last battell, they chose one Titus Celsus, a valiant gentleman of Rome to be their leader, and so vnder his conduct setting vpon their enemies they fought right fiercelie for a time, but yet in the end they were put to flight, & chased into Calidon. There were slaine of the Roman part in this encounter to the number of fne thousand, and of the Scots and other the confederats two thousand. After this victorie thus obtained by the Scots, a great number of the Britains revolted from the Roman obedience, as those that inhabit the countrie which we now call Wales, with the marches, slaieng & chasing awate such Romans as lay abroad in those parties.

This done, they sent vnto Gald king of the Scots, certeine messengers with rich iewels and gifts, in token of their reioicing and gladnes for his victories, promising him furthermore such aid as they were able to make against the Romans the common enemies of all the whole Albion nation. Moreover, in this meane while did the Romans within Calidon castell direct their messengers with letters vnto Marius king of the Britains, signifying vnto him the present danger wherein things stood in those parties by the cruell rage of the Scottishmen and Picts, whom fortune had aduanced with the gaine of two foughten fields, in so much that if timelie succours were not the sooner sent, the losse would be irrecoverable. Herevnto Marius answered, that as then a common conspiracie appeared to be in hand amongst his subjects, so far forth that he doubted greatlie the suertie of his owne estate; and as for hope of aid to be sent from Rome, he saw small likelihood; considering the slender provision there through the misgouernment of cruell Domitian, who by reason of the hatred which the people bare him, regarded nothing but how to keepe them from rising

The Scots set vpon the Romans.

The Romans are discouered.

The Romans withdrew hither to Tuline. They retire backe ouer the water of Tay and broke the bridge after them.

The Scots get ouer the water of Tay nere to Calidon castell. The Scots effones gine battell to the Romans.

The Romans are againe discouered.

The Britains hearing of the calamities vnto the Romans, revolted to their obedience.

The Romans send vnto Marius king of the Britains for aid.

Marius king of the Britains doubting rebellion of his subjects.

Marius com-seileth the Romans to leave the north parts unto the enemies, and to draw unto him into the south parts to keepe the same.

The Romans
withdrew into Cantire, & after into Galloway.

Gald pursueth the Romans.

The Romans
determine again to fight
with the
Scots.

The Romans
fiercelie assaile
the Scots.

Strange dealing in womē,
and contrarie
to their nature

The Romans
sue to their campe.

The Scots
purpose to assaile the Ro-
mane campe.

The Romans
require a communication.

rising by in armour against him, and therefore he thought it necessarie that leaving the north parts to the enemies, they should all withdraw towards him into the south parts, to keepe yet the more fruitfull portion of the Ile in due obedience, with their puissance might not suffice to retaine & rule the whole.

These newes greatlie abashed the Romane amie, & so much the more, for that about the same time it was shewed them how king Gald with an huge armie of Scottishmen and Picts, was come within ten milles of them. Whereupon the Romans not knowing at that instant what was best for them to do, in the end they concluded to withdraw into Cantire, where being arrived, and perceiving them- selves as yet to be in no great libertie there, they went awaie from thence with speed into Galloway. In the meane time king Gald, supposing it best effeines to fight with them, per they might have anie space to reinforce their power, followed them with all diligence, not forcing though he left behind him diverse castles and fortresses furnished with sundrie garrisons of his enemies, so that he might discomfit and chase away their maine power, which he thought might as then easilie be done, considering the great multitudes of people which came flocking in on each side, presenting themselves with offering their service unto him, and shewing further more great tokens of ioy and gladnesse, for that it had pleased the gods at length yet to declare them- selves favourable in this their relieving of the oppressed Britains. Whereunto Galdus on the other side, giuing them heartie thanks for their trauell, receiued them verie gentle, mixing his talke with most comforttable words, therewith to put them in hope of such good and prosperous successe, as that thortlie they should thereby be restored interlie unto their former libertie, and perpetuallie deliuered from all forein servitude and bondage.

But to proceed, at length he did so much by his courties, that he came into Galloway, where the Romans with all speed (seeing none other remedie) resolved themselves to giue him battell, and there- upon exhorting one another to plaie the men, with their onelie refuge rested in their weapons points, they fiercelie gaue the onset, and at the first put the left wing of the Scots and Picts wholie unto the worst. In which wing, according to their manner in those daies vsed, there were a great number of women mingled amongst the men. Gald therefore perceiving the danger, succoured them with such as were appointed to giue the looking on till need requi- red, and then to go where they should be comman- ded. By which meanes the battell on that side was renewed afresh, the women shewing no lesse val- antie than the men, and therewith much more cruel- tie, for they spared none at all, though they offered neuer so much to haue their liues preserved.

In fine, the Romans being chased in the left wing, their overthrow gaue occasion to all the resi- due to flee backe to their campe, being pursued so e- gerlie by the Scots and Picts, that they had much ado to defend the entries of their trenches, where both parties fought right egerlie, till at length the night parted them both in sunder. Being parted, the Scots gaue not themselves to rest, but provided them of all things necessarie against the next mor- ning to assaile their enemies afresh, and namelie from the next wood they fetched great plentie of sa- gots and buzsh to fill the trenches withall. But this their demeanour and purpose being understood of the Romans, they required a communication, the which (though some perswaded Galdus to the contrarie) upon deepe considerations of fortunes fraile fauor, was at length granted unto them, and foure an- cient Romans clad in right honorable and verie rich apparell came forth and were admitted to the pre- sence of the kings [Gald of the Scots, and Gar- nard of the Picts] unto whom with humble submit- tion they acknowledged themselves as vanquished, and that by the just wrath and reuenge of the equal gods, which against them they had conceived for the wrongfull situation of that which in no wise of right appertained unto them. Therefore if it might please those kings to bide and reframe their displeasure against them, in licencing them vnder some reason- able conditions of appointment to depart, it should be a thing reuoluing so much to their fame and glo- rie, as nothing could bee more; considering so humble sute made to them by the orators of those people, who were reputed as vanquishers of the whole world.

Herewith falling prostrate at the feet of those kings, they besought them of pardon, in such pitifull wise, that the hearts of the hearers began somewhat to mollifie, and at length Gald toke vpon him to an- swer in name of all the residue of the Scottish and Pictish nations, and in the end concluded, that they were contented to grant a peace on these condi- tions: That the Romans should cease from that day forthward in anie wise to molest or disquiet by way of anie inuasion the Scottish and Pictish borders, and also to depart wholie out of those countries, resto- ring all such holds and fortresses as they held with- in the same: and further, to deliuer all prisoners, pledges, and fugitiues whatsoeuer as then remai- ning in their hands, together with such goods & spoiles as they had latelie taken.

These conditions being certified to the Romans by their orators, were gladlie accepted, with they saw no better meane how to deliuer themselves out of that present danger. And so deliuering sufficient ho- stages for performance of all the articles of agree- ment, they departed without protracting time, mar- ching southwards to come into Kent, where Pa- rius king of the south Britains sojourned as then. Agricola, as the Scottish chronicles report, left at his departure towards Rome, to the number of threescore thousand men in the Romane armie, what of one and other, but so at their departure out of Galloway, there remained thirtie thousand, the residue being dispatched by one meane or other. By this conclusion of peace then, the Scots and Picts got againe the whole possession of all such countries as the Romans had before womne and taken away from them, as the shires Lothian, the marches about Berwick, Fife, and Angus, with Kile, Cantire, Coningham, and Galloway: all the Romane garrisons departing out of the fortresses and holds, and leaving the same unto the former owners.

Galdus hauing thus ended the warres with the Romans, toke order to set good directions amongst his people for the quiet and peaceable gouernment of the commonwealth, visiting baslie the countries abroad, the better to vnderstand the state of them, and to reforme the same where it was needfull. Fur- ther considering that as warre breedeth god soule- ers, so peace by iustice riddeeth them out of the way, if they be not the better provided for. Such as had serued long time in the last wars, and had not anie trade now in time of peace whereby to get their li- uing, he placed in garrisons nere to the borders of the Britains for defense of the countrie. After this, hee came to an interuiew with Garnard king of the Picts at Calidon, or Kalendar, to respect cer- teine troubles raised betwixt their subiects being borderers, concerning the limits of their countie: where perceiving a sort of euill disposed persons to be

The Romans submit them- selves as vanquished.

The con- ditions of peace preferred to the Romans by the Scots and Picts.

The Romans depart out of Galloway.

The Romans giue by all their holds and fortresses which they kept within the Shire of Dunbarton.

Galdus toke order to set good directions amongst his people.

Such as had serued long time in the last wars, and had not anie trade now in time of peace whereby to get their li- uing.

he wholie scale, and trauell a shed the et, and friendly.

Thus to aduan his coun- tour of a seldom displea- than the reigne, & of Adria- and from buried in maner, with m of obel maner.

Galloway is the name Gald.

Agthake in ingrat- son suc- betw alter a fourthie year.

The inconti- nent of Agthake.

A small re- gard to the bodie. Many shewed men of bale emotion.

Offendours maintained.

Justice is punished.

Agthake is murdered with a number of his men.

Agthake is murdered with a number of his men.

Agthake is murdered with a number of his men.

Agthake is murdered with a number of his men.

Agthake is murdered with a number of his men.

Agthake is murdered with a number of his men.

Agthake is murdered with a number of his men.

Agthake is murdered with a number of his men.

Agthake is murdered with a number of his men.

Agthake is murdered with a number of his men.

ble and verie rich mitted to the pre-Scots, and Cal-
th humble submi-
as banquished,
enge of the chiall
o conceived for, the
in no wise of right e if it might please ne their displeasure nder some reaso-
to depart, if shoul-
their fame and glo-re; considering so the oazons of these banquishers of the
at the feet of those don, in such pittfull ers began somewhat
oke upon him to ane of the Scottis and concluded, that they ace on these conditi-ceasse from that day
a disquiet by way of Ditch borders, and sole countries, restoes as they held with deliuer all prisoners, foener as then remai-
with such goods & spoiles tified to the Romans accepted, sith they saw ner themselves out of liuering sufficient ho-the articles of agreetracting time, what to Kent, where Pa-
is sojournd as then.
vnicles report, lest at e, to the number of Romane armie, what their departure out of vnneath twentie thou-atched by one meane o-peace then, the Scots le possession of all such de before twonne and the Mers, Lothian, the iffe, and Angus, with and Galloway: all the ing out of the fortresses same vnto the former ed the warres with the ood directions amongst peaceable gouernement ing daillie the countries stand the state of them, re it was needfull. Fur-Calvus sub-
eth to pre-
his subiects
in good quiet-
now after the warres were ended.
Such as ought to reble the peace
Secre punit-

The Romans
submit themselves as vanquished.

H.B.

H.B.

H.B.

The conditions of peace prescribed to
the Romans
by the Scots
and Picts.

The Romans
depart out of Galloway.

The Romans
give by all their holds and fortresses
which they kept within
the Scottish or Pictish minions.

Calvus sub-
eth to pre-
his subiects
in good quiet-
now after the warres were ended.

Such as ought to re-
ble the peace
Secre punit-

be holthe in the fault, vpon a naughtie intent to scale, and trouble the peace, which they had with such trauell and labour fought to restore, they punished the offenders, and set all things in good quiet, and so departed in sunder with great loue and friendship.

Thus Calvus applieng all his studie and diligence to advance the common-wealth and quiet state of his countrie, liued manie yeeres so highlie in the famour of all his subiects, that the like hath bene but 10 selome heard of: finally, to their great griefe and displeasure he ended his life, more deere to them than their owne at Epiake, in the 35 yeere of his reigne, which was about the 15 yeere of the empire of Adrian, the 4098 yeere after the worlde creation, and from the birth of our Saviour 131, and was buried with great lamentation in most pompous manner, and laid in a goodlie tombe which was raised with mightie huge stones, hauing a great number of obelisks set by round about it according to the 20 maner. Furthermore, to the end his memorie should euer indure, the countrie where he fought last with the Romans was called Caldia, after his name, which by addition of a few letters is now called Calloway, and before that time Brigantia, as the Scots do hold: but how that seemeth to agree with a truth, ye may read in the historie of England.

After this famous prince was thus departed hence, his sonne Lughthake succeded in rule of the Scottis kingdome, no lesse abhorred of all men 30 for his detestable and filthy vices, ioined with all kind of crueltie and couetousnesse, than his father was beloued for his noble and excellent vertues.
This Lughthake went so farre past the bounds of all continencie in following his sensuall lusts, that he forced and ransished not onelie aunt, naece, and sister, but euen his owne daughters also. Such as were honorable personages, and met to gouerne in the common-wealth he nothing regarded, but committed the administration of things vnto vile persons, 40 and such as could best deuise how to inuent quarrels against the rich, whereby they might be sliced of all whatsoeuer they had: and oftentimes vpon some forged cause cruellie put to death. So little did he prouide to see offenders in anie wise corrected, that contrariwise he mainteined them in such sort therein, that iustice was quite banished, and nothing but spoil and raine exercised.

Thus he continued aboue two yeeres, to the great ruine of the common-wealth. Finally, when 50 he went about to put vnto death such as in an assemble called at Dunstaffage spake against the mis-ordered gouernement of the realme, he was there murdered amongst the people, with a number of those also whom he vsed to haue attendant on his person for safegard of the same. His owne bodie was solennelie buried by appointment of the nobles, hauing respect to his fathers benefites, but the carcasses of his gard were cast out into the fields, there to bee deuoured of beasts and birds of rauine.

After Lughthake was thus dispatched, one Apo-60 gal the nephew of Calvus by his daughter was admitted king in his place. His chiefe studie was to reforme the decayed state of his countrie, and first he caused such wicked counsellors of his predecessors and vncle Lughthake, as had escaped with life (when their maister was made a waite) to be put to death, according to their iust desertings. He restored also the due worshipping of the gods, in part as then neglected, by the wicked counsell of their former rulers.
The Scottis men in like maner conceiuing an affired hope of a good redresse in all their greifes and oppressions, by the means of such a well disposed prince, began to beare him incredible loue and fauor, euen the like as they had done his grandfather Calvus.

In the meane time came certeine ambassadoers from the Picts, vnto this Apogall, requiring him of aid against the Romans and Britains, who by a sudden inuation had done much hurt in Pictland, to the great distresse of the inhabitants.

At the same time thep of Galloway certified him also by letters, that the same Romans had made a rode into their countrie, and led awaie a great bootie of gods and prisoners. Apogall hauing a mind no lesse giuen to deeds of chivalrie, than to the studie of ciuill gouernment and religious deuotion, reioiced that he had iust occasion giuen him to shew some prose of his balliant inclination, and so herevpon sent an herald at armes vnto the Romans, requiring to haue restitution and amends for the iniuries thus by them committed. The herald doing his message, receiued nothing but scornfull words, and disdainfull menaces, whereby Apogall being thoroughly kindled with despite, assembled his polver togther forth of all the parties of his dominions, and comming with the same into Galloway, visited his grandfathers sepulchre, honoring it with great reuerence and solenne supplications, requiring as it were his aid against those enimies, which had violated the league made betwixt him and them, by solemne oths and other accustomed means of ratification. This done, he drev into Annandale, where Winpanus as then king of the Picts abode his com-ming. There ioining their powers together, they marched forth into Cumberland, and so forward into Westmerland, with fire and sword wasting and spoiling those countries, as then belonging to the Romans.

Lucius Antenus the Romane lieutenant, lieng at the same time at Porke, being certified hereof by such as fled for feare out of those parties thus inuaded by the Scots, gathered a mightie armie out of all the countries of Britaine, and hasted forth with 40 the same towards his enimies; of whose approach Po-gall hauing notice, he made a long oration vnto his people to encourage them to fight manfullie against the Romans, persuading them effectualle thereto by manie familiar examples brought in of the valiant enterprises atchiued by their elders, in the defense of their countrie and libertie of the same. In like maner Lucius Antenus for his part exhorted the Romans, and other his souldiers, to call to remembrance the victorious exploits of their predecessors, and how that as then they should fight but with a rude and barbarous people, running to battell more vpon a furious rage and violent madnes, than with any discretion or aduised order, saieing furthmore, that it laie now in their hands with no great adw to recouer that which through the negligent sloth of Cneus Trebellius was before lost, whereby they should attaine great honor and famous renoume for euermore.

By this meanes the armies on both sides being kindled with desire of battell, in hope of victorie, they drev nere together, and began the fight right fierce-lie at the first, with throwing and shooting of darts and arrowes so thicke that one might vnneath see another. The place was more for the advantage of the Scots than of the Romans, because they were compelled to fight as it were by companies and parts, by reason of bogs and marishes, with such sliding banks on the sides that they could keepe none arate: yet all these impediments notwithstanding, this battell was fought so far forth to the bitterance, that in the end, after a wonderfull slaughter on both sides made, when their swords and other weapons were spent, they buckled together with short daggers.

F. J.

Finally

Apogall is beloued of his subiects.
The Picts
desire aid of
the Scots
against the Romans.

The Romans inuade the Scottis
borders.

Apogall requireth restitution of swornes done by the Ro-
mans.

Apogall pre-pareth to the warres.
Apogall visiteth his grandfathers sepulchre.

The Picts
and Scots
ioine their powers togther and enter into the land of their enimies.

Lucius Antenus lieutenant of Brit-taine.
Apogall exhorteth his men to bee balliant-
lie.

The battell beginneth betweene the Romans and Pibions.

A cruell fight.

The Romans retire.

Lucius Antonius is wounded.
The Romans are put to flight.

Women as ready to the battell as the men.

Adrian the emperor prepared to go into Brittain.
Adrian transported into Brittain.

Adrian cometh to Forke

He passeth over the river of Tyne.
Adrian findeth nothing abroad in the countrie of his enemies.

What manner of people he had to do withall.

Finallie the violent charge of the Scots & Picts was such, that the Romans were constrained to retire, which their generall Antonius perceiuing, did what he could to staie them, and to bring them forward againe, but as he was most busie in the forefront to exhort them herunto, he was wounded with an arrow, and thereupon departed out of the battell, which gaue occasion to diuers other of his companie to follow him, by meanes whereof all the residue fell to running awaie, and made toward the next wood, there to saue themselves as well as they might, though some companies perceiuing that they could not reach thither without manifest danger, closed themselves together and departed by another waie, which they toke at aduenture, not knowing towards what parts they dzelt, so that they laie all the night following within two miles of the Scots and Picts, who for that the daie was in maner spent (before the Romans were put to flight) incamped themselves in the selfe-same place where the battell was fought, and in the morning, hearing that part of their enemies were lodged so nere them, & knew not which waie to draw, they sent a number forth of their campe to fight with them, & to kill them if they resisted, or to bring them captiue to the king if they should seeme willing to yield. Those that were thus sent, found the Romans in verie good order of battell for so small a band, not minding to yield themselves as prisoners. By reason of which their obstinate wilfulness, they were slaine in the end euerie mothersonne.

Lucius Antonius hauing thus receiued the overthrow, dispatched a post vnto Rome with all hast, signifieng vnto the emperor Adrian the whole manner of the discomfiture, and how that by reason thereof things stood in great danger here in Brittain, if speedie succors were not the sooner sent, for the enemies were neuer more cruell and fierce, than at this present, not onelie the men, but also the women (as in the last battell he saw plaine proofe) who cared not for the losse of their owne liues, so that they might die reuenged.

When Adrian vnderstood these newes, he purposed forthwith to go himselfe into Brittain. Causing therefore an armie to be leuiued, he passed forth with the same into France, then called Gallia, and coming to Calice, he transported ouer into Brittain, where he learned how the Scots and Picts were neuer more busie than at this present, hauing of late waisted and spoiled the countrie euen to the riuer of Tyne. Herewith Adrian being fore offended, ioined the powder which he had brought with him frō Rome, with the other which he had caused to be raised in France and Brittain. This done, he remoued to Forke, where sojournig certeine daies to refresh his people, he afterwards dzelt toward the borders, and coming to the riuer of Tyne, he passed ouer the same.

The fourth daie after, he came into a countrie wherein was left no kind of earthlie thing seruing to mans vse, and so passing forward a daie or two, he found neither corne, nor other prouision of vittell, nor any kind of liuing creature, all the people being fled into the mounteins and marish grounds, where no man might come vnto them, as commonlie in case of extreme danger they were accustomed to lie abroad in the same without house or any couerture ouer their heads. Howbeit, for all that he gaue not ouer to pursue them, but finding them out where they lurked in the hilles and woods, he graueously assailed them, and that in sundrie maner. In the end esping the barrennes of the soile, the rudenes of the people, and that there was no hope left to come by sufficient prouision for the maintenance of his armie, he determined not to spend anie longer time in such a vaine and fruitlesse trauell, and therefore returned vnto Tyne, there to refresh the Scots and Picts from inuading such of the Britains as were subiect to the Romane empire, he caused a great trench to be cast ouerthwart the land from the mouth of Tyne to the riuer of Ouse, and a wall to be made on the inner side of the same, of turfe and sods. The Scottish chronicles make mention that it was begun by Adrian, but not finished till the daies of the emperor Seuerus, who made an end of it, and therefore the same chronicles name it the wall of Septimius Seuerus.

Adrianus hauing thus dispatched in the north parts of Brittain, in his returne visited Wales with the marches of the same, setting an order amongst such as had moued a commotion against the magistrats in those parties, the authors whereof he punished according to their offenses, & so then he came to London, whither at the same time a great number of the Brittain nobilitie resorted to do him honor, according to their duties. And he for his part shewed them such friendlie intertainment, that they could not with any better. After this he sailed into France, taking Lucius Antonius with him, because he could not alwaie with the aire of Brittain, in whose place he left one Aulus Aduianus lieutenant there, who disposed diuers garrisons of souldiers in places nere vnto the fore-remembered wall, for defense of the inhabitants against the violence of the Scots & Picts. Who seeing this demeanour of the Romans, diuided those lands and countries (which they had latelie waisted on the further side of Tyne) in such sort betwixt them, that all whatsoeuer laie towards the Irish sea, remained to the Scots, and the rest coasting vpon the Almane seas, fell vnto the Picts for their portion.

After this Mogall liued manie yeares in good quiet without anie trouble of enemies. But being puffed by in pride, by such notable victories as he had thus got of the Romans the conquerours of the world, he could not in time of peace maister his owne vnrulie appetites; but that drownded in the filthy lusses of the bodie, he spared neither maid, nor widow, nor wife. Againe, he was giuen to such vnquenchable couetousnesse, that nothing might suffice him, finding manie forged matters against the rich, whereby to bereue them both of life and substance. He was the first which ordeined that such as were banished or condemned for anie crime, should possess all their lands & goods without any consideration had either of wife or child, which is obserued at the full euen vnto these our daies, where before it was otherwise in that countrie. But these so notable vices in the prince could not long continue vnpunished, for at last a conspiracie was practised against him, whereof he hauing knowledge (whether by witcraft or otherwise by relation of friends, the certaintie is not knowne) in the dead of the night he armed himselfe, and with two of his seruants onelie fled to the next wood, not giuing notice of his departure to anie other of his household.

The morning being come, and knowledge had how he was thus departed, the conspirators pursued after him, who perceiuing them to approach, sought waies how to haue escaped their hands; but such was his hap, that he fell amongst other that were as ready as the first to wreake their malice vpon him, and so by them he was immediatlie murdered in the 36 yeare of his reigne, being the 4136 of the world, and after the birth of our saviour 169, Antoninus Pius then governing the Romane empire, and Philius surnamed Albus reigning amongst the Picts. His head being smitten off, was set vpon a poles end, and caried about in derision; but afterwards in respect of his linage it was buried ried together in nobles, not without worth.

Mogall being his sonne (as is reported) sed against his ment by wicked selfe much what he began at the right colours, stration of publication and vile nature in banquet the ancient te his worthie an

In waiting such riotous require in an op to be granted, all there, as hane daile in rents that beleant to furnish contribution to rie person acceptance of su bled in excess to heare him dering witha spit to make th ded secretlie onelie to deni all kinglie go quired no less

The next d downe in the name of the r ring that the uelled not a l the king hau his treasure tallage for m his household; to rest in such to rule thing; did nothing h to spoile his sessions, the he) as they sh and so aduan other mens paire of gal shame, as a ten done bel ith his skill office, shoul ther, and su realme, as n lords most n

The king lowd voice if they went daetlie abin these words him betwir ned, where stance. In under him, the most pa their offens demerits.

ried together with the bodie by appointment of the nobles, notwithstanding the commons thought it most unworthie of anie such honor.

Maill being thus dispatched, as ye haue heard, his sonne Conarus was admitted king, who (as is reported) was pfitue to the conspiracie deuised against his father, and as he came to the gouernment by wicked means, so in the end he vied himselfe much what accordinglie in the same; for after he had for a time dissembled his naughtie nature, he began at the last openlie to shew himselfe in his right colours, committing first of all the administration of publike affaires vnto men of base condition and vile nature. His chiefe delight was altogether in banketting and costlie fare, not regarding the ancient temperancie in feeding, vied amongst his worthie ancestors.

In waiking therefore his kinglie reuenges vpon such riotous exerce, he was nothing abashed to require in an open assemble of his nobles, a subsidie to be granted, towards the maintenance of such roiall chere, as he iudged to stand with his honor to haue daillie in his house. And therefore whereas the rents that belonged to the crowne were not sufficient to furnish the charges, he requested a generall contribution to be leued through the realme, of euerie person according to their abilities, for the maintenance of such superfluous expenses, as he daillie vied in exccellue banketting. The lords maruelling to heare him moue anie such demand, and considering withall the occasion thereof, they asked respite to make their answer till the next day: which being granted, in the night following they communed secretly together, and in the end concluded, not onlie to denie his request, but also to depose him of all kinglie gouernement, with his naughtie life required no lesse.

The next day therefore when they were againe set downe in the councill-chamber, one of them in name of the residue toke vpon him to speake, declaring that the lords and commons of the realme maruelled not a little how it should come to passe, that the king hauing no waies therewith to consume his treasure, should yet be enforced to demand a tallage for maintenance of his estate and charges of his household; but the fault was knownen well enough to rest in such as he most unworthie had preferred to rule things vnder him, who being come of naught did nothing but deuise means how to cause the king to spoile his naturall subiects of their goods and possessions, therewith to enrich themselves, but (saith he) as they shalbe prouided for well enough yer long, and so aduanced as they shall not need to thirst for other mens liuings, that is to wit, even to a faire paire of gallowes, there to end their liues with shame, as a number of such other losengers had often done before them: so it is conuenient that the king his skill is so small in the administration of his office, should be shut vp in some one chamber or other, and such a one to haue the gouernance of the realme, as may be thought by common assent of the lords most meet to take it vpon him.

The king hearing this tale, started vp, & with a loud voice began to call them traitors; adding, that if they went about anie hurt to his person, they should derelie abide the bargain. But notwithstanding these words, such as were appointed thereto, caught him betwixt them, and had him forth to a place assigned, where they laid him vp, maugre all his resistance. In like manner, all such as had borne offices vnder him, were attached and had to prison, where the most part of them, vpon examination taken of their offenses, suffered death according to their just demerits.

When was the rule of the realme committed vnto one Argabus, a man of noble birth, and ruler of Argile, who vnder the name of a gouernour toke vpon him the publike regiment, vntill other aduise might be taken. His mans studie in the beginning was onlie to cleanse the countrie of all misdoers, and to see the peace kept to the quiet of the people; & finally in all his doings shewed himselfe a perfect patterne of an vpright iusticer. But with in a few yeares after (as it often happeneth) prosperous successe changed his former mind to an euill disposition, whereby he ordered things after his owne selfewill more than by reason, without the aduise of his peeres. And further, to the manifest ruine of the common-wealth, he nourished ciuill discorde and sedition amongst the nobles, supposing it to make for his welfare, so long as they were at odds. He also married a Pictish ladie, the better to strengthen himselfe by this his forren alliance.

Yet vpon the peeres of the realme, vnderstanding what mischiefe might insue by these manifold and sundrie abuses of the gouernour, caused a parliament to be called, where, in presence of the whole assemble, they laid vnto his charge, how that (through his misgouernement and presumption, not onlie in coupling himselfe in marriage with a wife of a strange nation, but also for attempting manie other things preiudiciall to the estate of the realme, without consent of the nobles or commons of the same) he had deserued grieuous punishment; his trespass being so much the greater, in that considering the meane how he came to that dignitie, he answered not their expectation, nor performed the trust and credit which was generallie committed vnto him.

Argabus hearing himselfe thus charged, and not able to late anie likelie excuse, fell vpon his knees, & partly confessing his fault with teares gushing from his eyes, besought them of pardon, whole submitting himselfe to be ordered at their discretion. The lords being moued with this humble submission of Argabus, vpon promise he should redresse all his former misdemeanours, were contented that he should continue still in the administration. But such as had bene his chiefeest counsellors were committed to ward. After this sharpe admonition and warning thus giuen, Argabus did nothing touching the gouernement of the common-wealth, without aduise of his peeres; and some after, amongst other things, he toke order for the limiting how far the authoritie of inferiour officers, as bailiffes, boroughmaisters, constables, and such other should extend. But especiallie he trauelled most diligentlie for the punishing of theues and robbers, of whome none escaped with life that fell into his hands. Moreouer, he ordeined by statute, that no man exercising anie publike office, should taste of anie drinke that might make him drunken. He also banished all such persons as vied with drelling of delicat meats, and (as I may call them) deintie dishes, or banketting chere, to allure mens appetites from the old rude fare accustomed amongst their elders, who sought not to follow their delicious appetites, but onlie prouided to suffice nature, which is satisfied with a little, & that void of costlie furniture. Argabus thus being occupied in reforming the state of the common-wealth, brought manie euill doers into good frame and order, and such as were vpright liuers of themselves, indured still to proceed forward to better and better. At length, in the eight yeare of his gouernement, Conarus being consumed with long imprisonment, departed out of this life, in the fourteenth yeare after the beginning of his reigue.

F. g.

After

Argabus is chosen to gouern the realme.

Argabus an vpright iusticer.

Prosperitie changeth conuitions.

Argabus is rebuked.

Argabus consesseth his fault.

Argabus is permitted to continue in his office.

Argabus amendeth his former misgouernance, and ruleth himselfe by better aduise.

A notable statute.

Fine cokerie banished.

Conarus departed out of this world. 162. H.B.

Ethodius.
Ethodius the nephue of Argodius is chosen king.

Argodius is created lord president of the councill.

Emill discorde amongest the lords of the Iles.
Argodius is sent forth to apprehend the rebels.

The Island
rebels are punished.

The Romans
inuaide the Pictish and Scottish borders.

Ethodius requireth restitution of his subjects goods taken away by the Romans.

Adrianne
answers to E-thodius request.

Ethodius exhorteth the king of the Picts to make warre
against the
Romans.

After whose deccasse, the nobles and other estates of the realme assembling themselves together, chose one Ethodius, nephue to king Mogall by his sister, to reigne ouer them. But Argodius being highlie rewarded with lands and livings for his faithfull & diligent paines taken in the aduancement of the publicke weale, during the time of his gouernement, was thereto some after created as it were lord president of the councill, thereby to be chiefest in authoritie next to the king, in ordering and ruling of all publicke affaires & causes. Shortly after Ethodius (as the custome of new kings in those daies was) went ouer into the welterne Isles, there to take order for the administration of iustice, where immediatlie vpon his arrivall, it was shewed him, that not passing two or three daies before, there had bene a great conflict fought betwixt the nobles or clannes of the countrie, by reason of a strife that was stirred amongst their seruants, being a compaignie of naughtie and unrulie fellows, to the great disquiet of the inhabitants. Wherevpon was Argodius sent forth incontinentlie with a power to appease that businesse, and to bring in the offenders, that they might receiue reward according to their demerits. Argodius forthwith hastened towards the place where he understood the rebels to be remaining, and apprehending the whole number of them, some by force, and some vpon their humble submission, he returned backe with them to the king, who causing the matter to be throughlie heard, such as were the chiefest beginners and most in fault, were punished by death, and the other fined at the kings pleasure.
The Island people being thus appeased, the king returned into Albion, where as then lieng at En-uerlochthee, a towne (as is said) in Louchquhaber, word came vnto him that the Romans had broken downe the wall builded by the emperor Adrian, and made a great roade into the Scottish and Pictish borders, where meeting with the inhabitants assembled together in defense of their countrie (after a foure conflict) the victorie remained with the Romans; by reason whereof they led a great botie of cattell and other goods away with them to the places where they sojourned.

Ethodius being moued herewith, sent forthwith an herald vnto Adrianne the Romane lieutenant, requiring that his subjects might haue restitution of their goods wrongfullie taken from them, or else to looke for warres within fiftene daies after. Adrianne answered herewith, that the Scots and Picts had first begun to breake downe the foresaid wall, and to build a tower vpon the same, fortifying it with a number of men of warre, who running dai-lie into the British confines, fetched preies thence from amongst the Romane subjects, and though he had sent diuers times to the Scottish and Pictish wardens for restitution, yet could he neuer haue a nie forwardlie answer, so that he was constrained to begin the warre in maner and fourme as he had done already.

Ethodius not a little kirtled with this answer, wrote streightwaies to the Is. of the Picts, exhorting him in reuenge of such iniuries as his subjects had lately receiued at the hands of the Romans, to inuaide the wall on that side where it diuided his countrie from the Britains, and to breake in vpon the enemies by the same, and for his part he promised thortlie after to come, and to ioine with him in such a necessarie enterprize against the common enimies of both these countries. The Pictish king gi-uing thanks to the messenger for his pains, promised with all speed to set forward according to the ad-uise of Ethodius. The Romans in like maner hauing knowledge of the whole intention of the two kings, with all speed made preparation also for the warre, but the Scots and Picts first breaking in vpon them, did much hurt abroad in the countries next adioining. Which when the Romans perceived, they passed by the enemies campe in the night season, and entred into the Pictish borders, waiking and spoiling all afoze them.

When the two kings understood this, they hastened forth towards them, and were no sooner come within sight of them, but that they made ech towards other, and so incounting together, there was fought a fere battell with doubtfull victorie, for the right wings on either side vanquished the left, the brails of both the battells keeping their ground, the one not once shynking backe from the other till night. Scuer-red them in sunder, but not without such slaughter made on both sides, that being once parted, they made no great hast to ioine againe together; for as well the one part as the other being thus disloured, drew incontinentlie homewards without abiding for the morning. Neither did they attempt anie further exploit of all that yeare following.

In which meane time Adrianne sent letters to Rome vnto the emperor Marcus Antonius Aure-lius, who as then gouerned the empire, signifi-ing vnto him in what state things stood in Britaine, further declaring, that if conuenient succours were not sent in time, it would be hard to resist the furious rage of the enemies, by reason of the small trust he perceiued was to be had in the Britains, being no lesse readie vpon occasion to make warres in recouerie of their libertie, than the Scots & Picts were to inuade vpon them. The emperor vpon receit of these letters, thought in his mind that Adrianne was not so valliant a capitaine as the case required, and that therevpon the Scots and Picts became the more emboldened to resist, therefore he sent for him home, appointing one Agricola Calpurnius to succeede in his roome, who was (as some haue left in writing) the nephew of Iulius Agricola, the most famous capitaine of the Romans that euer came into Britaine.

This Calpurnius comming into Britaine with an armie, ioined to the same the power which he found there, as well of the Britains, as of other ser-uing vnder the Romane ensignes. Which done, he repaired toward the riuer of Tyne, where being arriued, he marched forth into the borders of his enimies, finding all the countrie round about him so clearelie wasted and burned, that there was not a house left standing, nor a graine of come, nor one hee of cattell to be found therein. Yet notwithstanding all this, forth he passed thorough Northumberland, and entering into Pictland, wasted all that was before him with fire and sword. And for so much as winter came vpon him, when he had done his will in that behalfe, he returned vnto York, where he sojourned untill the spring.

When summer was once come, hauing made his provision to warre on the Scots and Picts, word came vnto him that the Welshmen were revolted, and began to raise warre against the Romans, so that taking order for the repairing of the wall made by Adrian, which the enemies in diuers places had broken downe, and leauing a sufficient number of men of warre for defense of the same against all inuasions that might be attempted, he turned the residue of his power against those Welsh rebels, whom in the end, though not without much adoe, he reduced to obedience. Immediatlie after this, he heard also how the Britains of the Ile of Wight were vpon in armour against such Romans as ruled there, sundry noble men of the maine Ile taking their part, but they also were at length brought againe to their forme bellion puni-

In the me-ned not to a Romans, dagricola in the remembzan grandfather exploits, best English hist Calpurnius
ded whole t Britains, t passe, he w
the emperor succesour o
sending on there to sup
This Tre
first bled b shewing all subjects to r chus, who r
name and after that b mongest his couetousne way to fill forged accu death or ba and so come ment, the had it not b Lucius (v some rebel part. Po of this mil mane lieut them also tence the
an armie,
and onert entred into crueltie. A forth with inuations:
and incon
was euen
most part Britains a the residu himselfe a
to his ho
After
as they fle
with them
a great m warre: so number o satisfied i in the fig
they had their fello barried th in most c to fight w
that mig was his l
light infe
lowed: si countrie
haue di
Their

The name of Agricola p all to the Scottishmen
and Picts.

Calpurnius
drew to restore the state of Bri-taine.
Calpurnius
returneth v-
to Rome.
Agricola
last as lieutenant into Britaine.

Calpurnius
returneth
to Rome.

He is hated of
the Britains.

The Scots
and Picts re-
turne the warre
against the Romans.

Calpurnius
returneth
to Rome.

Calpurnius
returneth
to Rome.

Calpurnius
returneth
to Rome.

Calpurnius
returneth
to Rome.

to their former subiection, and the authoꝝ of that rebellion punished by death.

In the meane time the Scots and Picts determined not to attempt any further exploit against the Romans, doubting the verie name and linage of Agricola in the lieutenant Calpurnius, by calling to remembrance the noble atchieved conquests of his grandfather Julius Agricola, of whose victorious exploits, besides that which ye haue before heard, the English historie also doth make a long rehearfall. Calpurnius being thus at quiet on that side, intended whole to reforme all misorders amongst the Britains, which being hysought to indifferent god passe, he was sent for home againe vnto Rome by the emperor Antonius Commodus, the sonne and successeur of the fore-remembred Marcus Aurelius sending one Publius Trebellius into Britaine, there to supplie his charge.

This Trebellius comming into Britaine, at the first vied himselfe verie brightlie in his office, shewing all honoz and loue towards the Britains, subiects to the Romane empire, and namelie to Lucius, who reigned as king of the land, vnder the name and authoritie of the Romane empire. But after that he had once woone him a peece of credit amongst them, he changed his manners, or rather discovered his naturall inclination, so whole giuen to couetousnesse, that his onelic studie was set which way to fill his bags, not caring how vntuall he forged accusations against the rich, so that either by death or banishment their goods might be confiscat, and so come to his hands. By this wicked gouernement, the Britains began so sore to hate him, that had it not bene for the loue of their king the foresaid Lucius (who holpe to appeale them) there had bene some rebellion practised against him in the south part. Now the Scots and Picts hauing knowledge of this misliking in the Britains towards the Romane lieutenant, thought it a time conuenient for them also to be doing, to the end they might reuenge their former iniuries; and hereupon leueng an armie, they came to the old remembred wall, and ouerthrowing the same in diuers places, they entred into the British confines with great spoile and crueltie. Trebellius being hereof informed, hasted forth with all the power he could make, to resist their insasions; but finding the enemies readie in the field, and incountering them sooner than he looked for, he was euen vpon the first ioining abandoned of the most part of his whole armie, which consisted of Britains and Frenchmen, then called Galls, so that the residue being beaten downe, he was glad to saue himselfe as well as he might, by setting the spurs to his horse and galloping awap.

After this, gathering together his people againe as they fled from the discomfiture, he retired backe with them vnto Forke, hauing lost in this bickering a great number of his best souldiours, and men of warre: for the Scots and Picts, missing no small number of their friends in that battell, were not satisfied with those whome they had likewise slaine in the fight, but also fell vpon their prisoners which they had taken, and slue them also in reuenge of their fellowes whome they had lost. Afterwards they harried the countries of Westmerland and Kenball in most cruell wise, Trebellius not being so hardie to fight with them againe for doubt of some traine that might be practised by the Britains. Neither was his suspicion groundd vpon the credit of any light information, as may appeare by that which followed: for immediatlie after, the commons of the countrie rose against the Romans, in purpose to haue driuen them all out of the land.

Their capteine was one Caldozus a Pict bozne.

There were also diuerse of the British nobilitie amongst them not knowne, for they were disguised in strange apparell, counterfeiting themselves to be of the bulgar sort. The furie of these people was great, but yet in the end the politike order of the Romans vanquished them, howbeit not without great slaughter on both sides. Caldozus rescoiled the hands of his enimies, fled into his native countrie of Pictland, not a little reioysing that he had procured such slaughter amongst the Romans and Britains, both being enimies to him and his countrie. Such prisoners also of the Britains as fell into the hands of the Romans, were hanged by vpon sundrie trees and gibets: whereat other of the Britains being offended, in the night season toke down those dead bodies, and hanged by as manie of the Romans in their places, the truth being neuer knowne who were the doers of that act.

The lieutenant Trebellius perceiuing thus what danger he stood in on euerie part, wrote vnto the emperor Commodus, that without some reformation were had, the Romans were not like to keepe so long season in Britaine, and therefore required to haue some aid sent ouer vnto him in time. But the emperor doubting least the fault rested most in the lieutenant himselfe, appointed that one Pertinax an ancient gentleman, and one for his high and notable vertues greatlie esteemed both amongst the men of warre, and also in the senat, should go into Britaine, to be legat there in place of Trebellius. This Pertinax comming into Britaine, according to the emperors appointment, toke vpon him the office: and first setting a staie among the Britains, by right prudent and well aduised gouernement, he afterwards made a iournele against the Scots and Picts, drining them by great slaughter beyond Adrians wall, and so constrained them to remaine within their owne confines, pursuing them no further, for that he was sent for home to Rome, where the emperor Commodus being murdered amongst his owne men, he was against his will preferred to his place.

About the same time the state of the Scottish commonwealth was brought into great danger through an other incident, as by reason of a rebellion stirred by them of the western Isles, who not quieted in their stomachs for the death of their friends executed by Argadus (as before ye haue heard) assembled themselves together, and comming ouer into Argile, spoiled and harried the countrie in pitious wise. For redresse whereof, Argadus was sent thither againe with an armie, and in the meane time Ethodius lay in campe nere vnto Adrians wall, to resist the insasion of the enimies on that side, if happilie they should attempt any new exploit against him in those parts. The Island-men hearing of Argadus his approach, drew themselves together to receiue him by battell, if he minded to offer it.

In which meane time two thousand Irishmen were landed in that countrie, in hope of spoile, and hearing that Argadus was comming that waies forth to fight with his enimies, they laid themselves secretly in ambush by the waite where he should passe, and when he was passed by them, they brake forth vpon his reeward suddenly, putting his people in such disorder by their violent impression at the first bunt, that though he did what in him laie to bring them againe into arae of battell, yet in the end he was there slaine with two thousand of his armie, the residue escaping by flight out of the hands of their wild and cruell enimies. Ethodius hauing knowledge hereof, with an armie of twentie thousand men hasted forth towards Argile, to reuenge

The same commons are vanquished. Caldozus recoiled at the slaughter as well of the one part as of the other.

The spite of the Britains shewed towards the Romans.

Trebellius writeth to the emperor Commodus for aid.

Pertinax sent as lieutenant into Britaine.

Pertinax driueth back both the Scots and Picts.

Pertinax is chosen emperor.

Argile infested by the Islandmen.

The Irish men land in Argile.

The Irish men lay an ambush to intrap Argadus.

Argadus is slaine.

The Island-
men yeld
themselves.

Execution.

Ethodius visited his countries, to see iustice main-
teined.

He giveth him
selfe to hunting, & causeth
the lawes for the maintenance of game to be wel kept & looked vnto.

Ethodius
murthered by a musician.
194 H.B.

Septimus Seuerus, H.B.

the death of his valiant capteine Argadus vpon the rebels. Who hearing of his coming, made towards the sea, and would gladlie haue bene gone, but by reason of a contrarie wind they were forced to stay against their wills, so that he finding them still in the countrie, wrought so warlike by closing them vp among the hills and mounteins, that finally constrained through famine, they submitted themselves vpon these conditions, that their head capteine with two hundred others of the chiefeft, should yeld themselves simple to the kings mercie, and the residue to be licenced to depart againe into their countries.

Those that were appointed to be deliuered to the king with their capteine, suffered death by sentence of the nobles and pæres of the realme. Whereat the other taking indignation, though they had already yelded by their weapons, yet began they to fall vpon the Scots with hurling of stones, and other such things as came to hand, till finally they were beaten downe by the armed soldiers, and a great number of them slaine: the residue escaping as well as they might, fled into the mounteins. The Island-men being thus vanquished, and the Romans attempting nothing against the Scottishe men or Picts, Ethodius visited all the parts of his realme, taking order for the due execution of iustice amongst his subiects.

And for that he would not spend his time in idleness, being now at rest from warres, he began to exercise himselfe in hunting, and for the better nourishing of game, he took order that all such ordinances as had bene deuised by his elders, should strictly be obserued and kept: as that no man should be so hardie to go about to destroye anie hares with nets, greys or hare-pipes: neither to kill them in their formes by anie meanes: nor after that they had bene once coursed and escaped, to follow the sute, to the intent to start them againe. Also that none should go about to kill anie hart or hind, during all the winter season, at what time they were accustomed for hunger to leaue the mounteins, forrests and woods, and to come downe into the fields and courtes, nere vnto the townes & houses.

He ordeined moreover therevnto, that no man should presume to kill anie hind-calues, detestling nothing more than to haue such game destroyed, as serued for the exercise and solace of him and his nobles. The other vacant time, whilst he rested from hunting, he spent for the most part in hearing of musike, hauing diuerse cunning plaiers of sundrie kinds of instruments attending in his court. At length setting all his pleasure in hearing of a musician being bozne in one of the west Isles, he was murdered by him in the night time within his owne chamber. The murdherer being apprehended, and examined vpon that occasion he did that heinous fact, for the which he had deserued the most extreme kind of punishment that might be deuised, he answered: that in reuenge of the death of such his kinsmen and friends as the king had caused to be executed in Argile, he purposed long before to do that deed, and now that he had accomplished his purpose, he was readie to receiue what kind of death they would adudge him vnto. For sure I am of this, saith he, that how terrible soeuer my execution shall be, yet can it not bee so painfull, but that I shall reioice euén in the very instant of my death, for that I haue in such notable sort reuenged the deaths of all my kinsmen & friends. Finally by commandement of the magistrates he was drawne in peeces with wild horses in most violent wise.

Ethodius reigned 33 yeres, vntill the latter dates of Caracalla the empero. He was buried at Dunstafage, with all such pompous ceremonies as was accustomed about the interment of kings in that age. In his daies Lucius the king of Britaine receiued the faith with a great part of his people, being the yere after the birth of our Saniour, as the Scots chronicles haue 187, but after the Britissh 177.

After the death of Ethodius, his brother Sathrahell or Serrahell (as some write him) was chosen to succeed by the common consent and voices of all the estates of the realme. For although Ethodius left a sonne behind him; yet because he was very young in yeres, he was thought insufficient to haue so great a charge as the rule of a kingdome committed vnto his hands. This Sathrahell was subtle of nature, and a great dissembler, whose purpose was to defraud the issue of his brother Ethodius from attaining at anie time vnto the rule of the kingdome, and therefore to bring his purpose the better to passe, he found forged matter against all such as were familiar friends vnto Ethodius, thereby to put them vnto death. Neither dealt he anie thing more sincerelie with a great number of other of his wealthie subiects, whose lands and goods he onelie sought to inioy at his owne will. By means whereof such mischance ensued through the realme, and such euill sedition daily rose amongst the people, that pittie it was to behold it: the king being not so bold all the while, as once to shew his face abroad for redresse thereof, by reason he understood well enough what hatred the people bare towards him, neither did his keeping within doores saue his life anie long time, for in the end his owne seruants found means to strangle him, and that before he had reigned full foure yeres.

His place succeeded his brother Donald, a prince of a farre contrarie nature and conditions, for he was free, courteous, and without all deceit, more righteous than rigorous, and afore all things desirous that peace and concord might prosper amongst his subiects. Neither bare he with offence, but such as were disobedient against the lawes and wholesome ordinances of the realme he caused to be duly punished: finally he took such order for reformation of things, that he reduced his subiects as it had bene from a wild and savage rudenesse, vnto a perfect ciuill trade of humanitie. About the same time Lucius king of the Britains being dead, the Romans perceiving that a kings authoritie amongst the Britains, did nothing else but diminish the maiestie of the imperiall iurisdiction amongst them, determined not to suffer any more of the Britissh nation to inioy that title.

This thing moued the Britains to such indignation, that by procurement of one Fulgentius, diuers of them rebelled, and choosing the same Fulgentius to their general, they directed a messenger with letters vnto Donald king of the Scots, requiring him to ioine with them in league against their ancient enemies the Romans, whose endeuor (as he knew) had euer bene from time to time, how to bring the whole Island vnder their subiection, and to extinguish all the nobilitie and ancient inhabitants of the same: adding furthermore, that if he would now put to his helping hand, the time neuer serued better for the dispatching of them whole out of the Ile, considering the sundrie rebellions attempted as well by the people of Germanie and France, as also of the easterlie nations and countries.

Donald receiued the messenger most friendlie, and being glad to vnderstand of these newes, he promised to aid Fulgentius with all the power he was able to make, and to meet him at such date and place as he should afterward appoint. The like answer was made also by the king of Picts, vnto whom in semblable

Ballena-craned the christian letters in the yere 187.

Sathrahell.

Sathrahell
saith to such as were in fauor with his predecessor.

Discord ensued amongst
the people through the kings iniqui-tation.

Sathrahell
strangled
death by his owne ser-
uants.

397 H.B.

Donald.

Donald
saith to
such as were his subiects
vnto all
the Isle.

Lucius king
of Britaine
died.

The Britains
rebell
and chose Fulgentius
to their captaine
whom they chose for their captaine.

Seuerus
saith to such as were
his enemies.

Seuerus
saith to such as were
his enemies.

Donald
promised to aid Fulgentius.

The Britains
come
to Britains
wall, and pull
it downe vnto
the
scots.
The
scots
men & picts came
to
the aid
of
the Britains.

The
scots
and
picts
made
the Britains.
The
scots helped the Britains
to spoil
their owne countie.

Caracalla
saith
the emperour
of
the state
of Britaine.

Fulgentius
incourageth
the Britains
to make vnto
the beginning
of
the warre.

Seuerus
saith
to such as were his enemies.

Seuerus
saith
to such
as were
his enemies.

Seuerus
saith
to such
as were
his enemies.

Seuerus
saith
to such
as were
his enemies.

semblable
Thus the great aid
which they friends invnto them picts now they like
that wall, alongst the

This don-passed for-the Roma-
and to han-ledge how gather a p-
that citie,
trie abro-
part of the vnder their sing from winter in to licence countreies
and meet

In this roz Seue-taine: the set forwa-Britaine
may appeked no tin-
go again
force of h treat for nie, where the Britawise he ci-sallie be-wished li-
thing the lie attain so that th
trie it for and best cord, com-
of so ma-lent in o-
ning of t

The
liue and uile with against readie c Britissh forward Cetera in the same
he took
At his c gods, a aduise terpise

Thiwards
Scots
somuch
fight of together
betwix ding th long to tied sta

Seuerus
saith
to such
as were
his enemies.

Seuerus
saith
to such
as were
his enemies.

Seuerus
saith
to such
as were
his enemies.

Seuerus
saith
to such
as were
his enemies.

Seuerus
saith
to such
as were
his enemies.

Seuerus
saith
to such
as were
his enemies.

Seuerus
saith
to such
as were
his
enemies.

semlable wise Fulgentius had directed his letters. Thus the Britains (being confirmed with hope of great aid from the Scots and Picts) assembling their host together, resorted unto the wall of Adrian, which they ouerthrowe in diuers places, that their friends might haue the more free access and entrie vnto them by the same. Neither were the Scots and Picts slow for their part to make forward: so that they likewise comming thither, holpe to throw down that wall, and to fill vp the trench or ditch that went alongst the same.

This done, joining their powers together, they passed forth towards Poyke, in hope to haue found the Romane lieutenant Trebellius within that citie and to haue besieged him therein: but hauing knowledge how he was withdrawn into Bent, there to gather a power, they left their purpose of besieging that citie, and fell to spoiling & harrying of the countrie abroad on euery side, constraining the most part of the people to come in and yeld themselves vnder their obedience. Thus they continued in passing from one quarter of the countrie to another, till winter enforced them to breake vp their campe, and to licence the souldiers to depart home into their countreies, till they had new summons to assemble and meet againe.

In this meane time Trebellius certified the emperor Seuerus of all this trouble and rebellion in Britaine: wherupon he with all speed leuied an armie, & set forward with the same himselfe in person toward Britaine, as in the English historie more plainlie may appere. At his comming into Britaine, he slackened no time, but assembling his power, prepared to go against the enimies. Fulgentius doubting the force of his enimie, sent ambassadoys vnto him to treat for peace, but Seuerus would not grant to a nie, whereupon Fulgentius confirmed the minds of the Britains with all comfortable words, in the best wise he could, exhorting them to stick to their necessities begun enterprise, for recouerie of their long wished libertie, which he doubted not, but by vanquishing the emperor at that present they should assurelie attaine: and as for victorie, he was in no doubt, so that they would plucke their harts vnto them, and trie it forth manfully by dint of sword, like fellows and brethren knit in one faithfull band of trustie concord, considering the enimies armie being gathered of so manie sundrie nations & languages that consent in one opinion, the cheefest meane for the obtaining of victorie must needs be wanting among them.

The Britains moued herewith, promised him to liue and die in the quarrell. Whereupon he toke aduise with them, which waie to mainteine themselves against Seuerus, of whose comming they were already certified. For Seuerus hauing dispatched the British ambassadoys from him, set incontinentlie forward towards Poyke, leauing his yongest sonne Geta in the south parts to haue the gouernance of the same in his absence. His eldest sonne Antoninus he toke with him in his iourne against his enimies. At his comming to Poyke, he did sacrifice to the gods, according to the Ethnick custome, & also toke aduise with his captains how to proceed in his enterprise against his enimies.

This done he marcheth forth with his armie towards them, who being already joined with the Scots and Picts, were determined to abide him, in so much that those of the one side came no sone in sight of the other, but that they hastied forth to ioin together in battell, whereof ensued great slaughter betwixt them, though the British part (notwithstanding their aid of Scots and Picts) were not able long to endure against the great multitude and practised skill of the Romane souldiers, so that in the end they were opened perforce and put to flight with the losse of thirtie thousand, what of Britains, Scottishmen and Picts.

Fulgentius himselfe, seeing the discomfiture and huge slaughter made of his people, had runne in amongst the thickest prease of his enimies, had not those that were about him led him awaie by force, and so at length he got him amongst the troops of the Scottishmen and Picts, and together with them passed ouer Tine, and so into the borders of his friends where he got together such souldiers as he could, that had escaped from the battell, and reteined them with wages so well as he might, in hope vpon occasion to imploye them effectually against his enimies. The Scots also sent into Ireland for aid, and the Picts into Denmarke and Norwaie. Such of the British nobilitie as fell into the hands of the Romans, Seuerus punished most grauously, but the commons he used more gentlie, as it were making excuse for them being procured thereto by their captains. After this, when winter was come, he appointed his men of warre to dray vnto places conuenient for them to lodge in, till the next spring. He himselfe wintered at Poyke.

In the next summer there was little done worthe to be spoken of, but that there were certeine skirmishes betwixt the Romans lieng on the borders, and the Scots and Picts, euer as occasion serued, either of the parties to worke any exploit for their aduantage. But for so much as the Scots had no aid sent them forth of Ireland, they were not minded to icopard againe in a foughten field, supposing it sufficient if they might defend their owne, though they gained nothing as then, considering the puissance that was readie bent against them. At length Seuerus fell sicke at Poyke, and his son Antoninus lieng on the borders beyond Tine, caused the wall afore mentioned, diuiding the Britains from the Scots and Picts, to be repaired. This wall was built (as is before recited) first by Adrian the emperor, to staie the Scottishmen from inuading the lands appertaining to the subiects of the Romane empire, & after ouerthrowne in diuers places as well by Scots and Picts, as by the Britains, in soot as before is partly mentioned. Antoninus caused it to be fortified with bastilions, one placed so nere to another, as trumpets being appointed in each of them, the sound might be heard betwixt to warne one another vpon the first deserting of the enimies approach.

Finallie Seuerus dieth, though not so sone as his son Antoninus wished, in hope after him to attaine the imperiall dignitie. Concluding therefore a league with the Scottishmen and Picts, and granting peace to Fulgentius, and other such British rebels as were fled with him into Ireland, he receiued sufficient pledges, and then returned towards London, where his mother with his brother Geta as then late, shortly after both the brethren departed forth of the Ile, & went to Rome, as in the historie of England it appereth. But now to retorne vnto Donald the Scottish king, ye shall vnderstand, that being deliuered of foren trouble, he studied the way to preferue his people in god peace and perfect tranquillitie. Which mind our Sauour Christ the author of all peace and concord had giuen vnto him, being latelie afore conuerted vnto the true faith from his wicked paganisme and heathenish idolatrie.

For as we find in Hector Boetius, in the daies of the aboue said emperor Seuerus, he sent a messenger with letters vnto pope Victor (Zepherinus saith Harison) being the 15 in number, as they saie, after saint Peter, declaring vnto him that he was fullie minded to receiue the christian religion, and vnto the forsake the superstitious seruice of the heathenish gods, Fulgentius is put to flight and his armie discomfited.

Fulgentius withdrawneth into Ireland.

Seuerus wintereth at Poyke.

Seuerus sicketh. The wall is repaired.

Seuerus dieth.

Antoninus in hope to be emperor concludeth a peace with the enimies.

Donald studi-ous to mainteine his subiects in peace and concord.

Donald conuerted into christian beleefe in the daies of the emperor Seuerus.

The Britains come to Britains wall, and pull it downe in the place of the Britains.

The Scots and Picts come to the Britains wall, and pull it downe in the place of the Britains.

Trebellius certified the emperor of the rebellion in Britaine.

Fulgentius confirmed the minds of the Britains with all comfortable words.

Seuerus dispatched the British ambassadoys from him.

Seuerus commeth to Poyke.

Seuerus is accounted by his enemies.

Britaine received the christian faith in the year 187.

Satrabell.

Satrabell was the rule of the purpose the gainst all us, there hee anie r of other gods hee

Discord arise among the people through the things in gouernment.

Satrabell strangled to death by his owne seruants.

397 HB.

Donald.

Donald studi-ous to reduce his subiects vnto all ciuilitie.

The British nobilitie was punished most grauously, but the commons he used more gentlie.

Donald studi-ous to reduce his subiects vnto all ciuilitie.

Donald studi-ous to reduce his subiects vnto all ciuilitie.

Donald studi-ous to reduce his subiects vnto all ciuilitie.

gods, and therefore instantlie required him to send over into Scotland some godlie learned men, to instruct him in the right belefe. The pope hearing this, and being glad to increase the faith of Christ through all parts of the world, sent with all speed into Scotland such well disposed persons as he thought most meet for that purpose, who at their arrivall there, did their endeuour in such diligent sort, that not onelie the king, but also through his example a great number of the nobilitie were baptised, and clerelie forsooke their former errors and idolatrie. This was in the yeare after the birth of our saulour 203, from the creation of the world 4170, & after the first erection of the Scottish kingdome 330, as W. Harison in his chronologie doth manifestlie confirme.

The Scottish men received the faith in the yeare of our Sautour 203.
5399. H.B.
533 H.B.

Donald departed out of this world.
216 H.B.

Ethodius.

The gouernance of the realme committed to sundrie noble men.

Ethodius being giuen to couetousnesse is slaine by his owne seruants.

Athirco.

Athirco changed in conditions from good to bad.

Athirco regeth death not his nobles.

The villanous act of Athirco in abusing a noble mans daughters.

Whereafter this Donald was the first as the Scottish chronicles alledge, that caused silver and gold to be coined in his realme. The stampe which he deuised for the same, was a crosse on the one side, and his face on the other. Before that time the Scots used no coine, but either exchanged and bartered ware for ware, either else occupied with British and Romane monie, as diuers marble chests full of the same which haue bene found of late yerres in sundrie parts of Scotland doe verie well witness. Finally Donald in the 21 yeare of his reigne departed out of this life, and was buried according to the maner of our christian religion, without any heathenish ceremonies.

After him succeeded Ethodius the second, and some of the former Ethodius, which prince procured so verie a sole, that the regiment of the realme was quite taken from him, and committed vnto certeine noble men, who being diuided into sundrie quarters of the realme, toke verie good order for the due gouernment of the parties so to them limited, and used themselves verie byrightlie in all their doings. As for cause of wars they had none, for Seuerus before his death had giuen such order for the gouernement of the Britains, that they durst not once stir by reason of such pledges as were deliuered and conueied to Rome, which were the chiefe of all the British nobilitie. At length Ethodius being apt for nothing but to fill his cofers, as one though dishonest, yet naturallie giuen to vniuersall couetousnesse, was slaine by those that were appointed to the gard of his person, in the 16 yeare of his reigne.

Then was his sonne Athirco elected by the generall voices of all the estates, who in the beginning of his reigne shewed himselfe verie sober, gentle, courteous, and friendlie of behauiour, exercising himselfe in all laudable pastimes conuenient for his estate, and herewith he was so free and liberall towards all men, that he won him wonderfull much praise and loue amongst his people. But these his noble vertues increased not in him together with his age, but contrarie decaied, in such sort, that after he had reigned eight yerres, he was quite altered: in place of liberalitie, embracing auarice: for courtesie and amiable countenance, he used sterne and loftie looks: for commendable exercises, he gaue himselfe wholly to filthy pleasures and sensuall lusts of the bodie: and such as could further his purpose most in these his beastlie affections, he cherished and had them most in estimation, not regarding at all the nobilitie of his realme, but was as readie to wrong them by villanous iniurie, as he was anie other of the lowest and meanest degre.

It chanced that a noble man in Argile (being one of no small authoritie amongst the people of that countrie) named Patholocus, had two faire yong gentlewomen to his daughters: now the king being verie desirous to satiffie his lust vpon them, forced them both the one after the other, and not so content, deliuered them afterwards to be abused in semblable sort by his pages and seruants. The father vnderstanding this villanie done to his daughters, by their owne lamentable complaint, sent for his friends, and opening vnto them the whole matter, he required their assistance. They being in a wonderfull farie to heare of such an iniurie done to their blood, promised in reuenge therof to spend life, lands & goods, and forthwith departing in sander, they prepared themselves to assemble their powers, procuring a great number of other noble men to ioine with them in so necessarie an enterprise, as to rid the countrie of such a catife wretch, respecting nothing but the satiffing of his filthy carnall lusts, and the accomplishment of his most beastlie appetites.

When they were once got together in a companie, they marched forth towards Dunstaffe, where they vnderstood that the king as then did sojourne, a great multitude of people still resorting vnto them by the waie, after it was once knowne whereabout they went. Athirco hearing of their approach, called together his power, supposing at the first to haue beaten downe his enemies; but when he had thoughtlie weighed the matter, and considered of what force and power they were, & how feeble his part was through want of godd will in his people, he priuillie stole away from them, and would haue passed ouer into Fla, one of the westerne Isles, to haue procured some succor there, but being imbarcked and set from the shore, he was by contrarie winds driuen backe againe to land, where doubting to come into his enemies hands, he chose rather to slea himselfe, and so ended his wretched life in such miserable extremite after he had reigned the space of 12 yerres. His reigne continued till the daies of the emperor Gordian the third, or (as others saie) till the time of the emperor Valerian. But as William Harison hath gathered, he reigned in the daies of the emperor Aurelius Claudius. Doozus the brother of Athirco vnderstanding of the death of his brother, disguised himselfe in beggers weed for doubt of death, and went into Picland with three of his nephues, sonnes to the same Athirco, whose names were Sindocke, Carance, and Donald.

Howbeit, Patholocus hauing knowledge whether he was fled, sent forth certeine of his seruants, with commandement to search him out, commanding furthermore verie streelie, that if they found him, they should dispatch him out of life, for feare of further mischance. But they that were sent, finding one in all features and proportion of bodie resembling Doozus, slea the one in stead of the other, and so returning home to their maister, they made him verie iollull of the newes, although indeed they came not nere to Doozus. Then Patholocus causing the estates of the realme to assemble, he handled the matter in such wise, by dissuading them to chose any of Athircos blood to reigne ouer them (for doubt least they should seeke any meanes how to reuenge his death) that in the end this Patholocus was elected himselfe, more by force than by anie common consent of the nobles: for diuers of them doubting the craftie nature, which they knew to be in him, wished rather that the issue of Athirco (hauing deserued nothing why to be defrauded of the kingdom, saue onlie in respect of the fathers offenses) might haue inioied that which of right they ought to haue had, that is, either one of them to be king, or else some nere kinsman of theirs to reigne as king, till the eldest of them might come to sufficient yeares to beare the rule himselfe.

But Patholocus being once proclaimed king by the multitude, and Athircos blood attained of treason,

The blisfull and friends of the good men conspire against Athirco.

Athirco being taken of his owne men came to the trial of his guilt, which he confessed.

242 H.B. Doozus the brother of Athirco conceited himselfe out of the way.

Patholocus seeking the death of Doozus.

Patholocus is chosen to be king.

Patholocus.

Patholocus goeth vnto Dunstaffe to be in his priuillie.

Patholocus being taken of his owne men conspire against Athirco.

Fortune fauouring Patholocus for a time began to change. Doozus being taken vnto certeine Scots lords to moue them to rebellion.

Patholocus being taken of his owne men came to the trial of his guilt, which he confessed.

Patholocus seeking the death of Doozus.

The wretched answers.

What happened by giuing credit to the words of a witch.

treason, as he toke then repaired according as he exhorted assured of therof, b rewards. selfe verie loues, for chined of the fourest nobles, fr ous quar

Thus peres, at countena Doozus then heard, Doozus being taken vnto certeine Scots lords to moue them to rebellion.

Patholocus being taken of his owne men came to the trial of his guilt, which he confessed.

Patholocus seeking the death of Doozus.

Patholocus seeking the death of Doozus.

The wretched answers.

What happened by giuing credit to the words of a witch.

Patholocus seeking the death of Doozus.

Patholocus
geth unto Dumfries
as he might pro.

Patholocus
geth unto Dumfries
as he might
pro.

Patholocus
geth unto Dumfries
as he might
pro.

Patholocus
geth unto Dumfries
as he might
pro.

Patholocus
geth unto Dumfries
as he might
pro.

Patholocus
geth unto Dumfries
as he might
pro.

Patholocus
geth unto Dumfries
as he might
pro.

Patholocus
geth unto Dumfries
as he might
pro.

Patholocus
geth unto Dumfries
as he might
pro.

treason, and so published, according to the custome he took the othes of those that were present, and then repaired unto Dumfries, there to be inuicted according to the manner. This done, he called such aside as he suspected, and talking with them alone, he exhorted them to be faithfull, promising to bestow assured good lord and maister, and for an earnest thereof, he gave unto diuerse of them verie great rewards. Generallie vnto all men he showed himselfe verie gentle and tractable, thereby to win their loues, for the better establishment of his newe aduised estate: and here he imployed such riches as the former kings had heaped together amongst the nobles, studying by all meanes to auoid all seditious quarels and secret discords amongst them.

Thus ruling the realme at his will for certayne yeeres, at length fortune began to show a change of countenance after hir old accustomed guise. For Douglas the brother of Athirce (whome, as ye haue heard, Patholocus supposed to haue bene dead) wrote certayne letters, signifying his owne estate with the welfare of his nephews the children of Athirce vnto certayne Scottish lords, whome he knew to fauour his cause. Which letters he deliuered vnto a Scottish woman, appointing hir hys and to whome she should deliuer the same, but the woman apprehended by the waie, and brought vnto Patholocus, he caused hir secretly to be sacked and thowne into a riuer. Afterwards sending for such of the nobles as the direction of the foresaid letters had giuen him occasion to haue in some suspicion, he committed them first to prison, and at length caused them to be secretly strangled.

Which wicked deed being once notified abroad, so moued the hearts of their friends and allies, that they procured the people to rebell: and so gathering them together, they raised open and cruell warres against him. Patholocus informed of their determinations, withdrew himselfe priuie into Murray land, there to get together an armie to resist his enemies, and for that he was desirous also to understand somwhat of the issue of this trouble, he sent one of his trustie seruants, being a gentleman of that countrie, vnto a woman that dwelt in the Ile of Colmekill (otherwise called Fona) esteemed verie skillfull in shewing of things to come, to learne of hir what fortune should hap of this warre, which was alreadie begun.

The witch consulting with hir spirits, declared in the end how it should come shortly to passe, that the king should be murdered, not by his open enemies, but by the hands of one of his most familiar friends, in whome he had reposed an especiall trust. The messenger demanding by whose hands that should be: Cuen by thine saith she, as it shall be well knowen within these few daies. The gentleman hearing these words, railed against hir verie bitterly, bidding hir go like an old witch; for he trusted to see hir burnt before he should commit so villanous a deed. And departing from hir, he went by and by to signifie what answere he had receiued; but before he came where the king lay, his mind was altered, so that what for doubt on the one side, that if he should declare the trueth as it was told him, the king might haplie conceiue some great suspicion, that it should follow by his means as she had declared, and therefore put him to death first; and for feare on the other side, that if he keepe it secret, it might happen to be revealed by some other, and then he to run in as much danger of life as before; he determined with himselfe to waite the surest way, and so comming to the king, he was led aside by him into his priuie chamber, where all other being commanded to auoid, he declared how he had spied; and then falling forth with vpon Patholocus, with his dagger he slue him outright, and threw his bodie into a pitie; and afterwards getting out by a backe doore, and taking his horse which he had there ready, he fled with all speed vnto the campe of the conspirators, and was the first that brought newes vnto them of this act thus by him atchieued. This chanced in the yeare of our Lord 1586, in the eleventh yeare after the first entring of Patholocus into the estate.

After Patholocus was thus dispatched, the peers assembled together to ordaine offe for gouernement of the realme, where in the end it was amongst them considered, that the sonnes of Athirce should be sent for into Scotland, and Findocke receiued for king. The parliament that slue Patholocus was appointed to fetch them, who according to his commission remaining into Scotland, conuicted their right honorable into Argile, where Findocke being alreadie chosen king, was placed on the throne of marbly with all the ceremonies in that case appertaining.

Thus Findocke was in the flower of his age, of person most beautifull, cleane made, & of a goodlie stature: wherewith were ioined most excellent gifts of the mind. Not so much desirous to seeme as to be vertuous indeed. He was courteous, meke, full of affabilitie, studying alwaies to win frendship and loue, rather by gentlenesse, than by feare and menacing words. The leagues with the Britains, Scots and Romans he firmelie obserued. But as peace with foraine enemies breedeth oftentimes euill discords at home, so came it then to passe with him at this present: for one Donald of the Isles, a noble man borne, came ouer with an armie into Rolle and Murray land, fetching from thence a great spoile and bootie, not without great slaughter of such as enforced themselves for to resist him. The occasion as he pretended was to reuenge the death of Patholocus. But Findocke vnderstanding his doings, prepared an armie with ships, and sailed ouer with the same into the Ile of Ila, where in countering with Donald and other his enemies, he vanquished and chased them egerlie, without returning once backe, till either the sword or the sea had made an end of them all.

Donald himselfe taking a vote, in hope to haue escaped, the pleasure was such at his entring into the same, that before they could get it off from the shore, it sunke by means of the ouerlading, and so he and all they that were on board were drowned there without. The king hauing atchieued this victorie, returned into Albanie; but the Iland-men not fullie quieted with this slaughter of their fellows, sent ouer into Ireland, and got from thence certayne Ierns, who vnder the leading of an other Donald, the sonne of the former Donald, made starts now and then into Argile and Cantire, doing manie shrewd turnes in the same, yet they could be suppressed. But Findocke being some informed of these tidings, went ouer againe into the Isles, and such of his enemies as he found, he caused to be hanged, to giue other example what to take for when they should rebell, but Donald escaped, and got ouer into Ireland, where he remained, till he heard that the king was returned backe into Albanie, and then he came againe. But perceiving himselfe not able to waite such feats as he hoped to haue done, he sent a messenger vnto the king, offering to yield himselfe, and to become his true subiect if he might get his pardon, and be at his owne libertie. But being answered that he should not be receiued, vntill he would come vnto Dumfries with other of his chiefest complices, and so stand fallie at the kings mercie; he refused thus to doe, deuising an other meane

Patholocus
murdered.

252. H. B.

The lords of the realme assembled together to chuse a new king.

The sonnes of Athirce are sent for, and the eldest of them named Findocke chosen to reigne.

Findocke.

Findocke his noble qualities and ver-tuous disposition.

Findocke obserueth the leagues confirmed of former times with his neighbors.
Those of the isle of Ila inuade the countries of Rolle and Murray land.
Findocke ma-
keth a tourne
into the Isles,
to subdue the rebels.

Donald is drowned.

The Iland-
men with aid of the Irish Ierns, make often inuasions into Argile, and other
of the Scottish
countreys.

Findocke goeth againe to subdue the rebels of the Isles.

Donald offer-eth to yield
himselfe vpon certaine
conditions, but is not re-
ceiued.

used in The fa-
dangh-ent for le mat-
g in a ome to end life,
lander,
olders,
men to
as to l luffs,
e appe-

panie,
ere they ne, a o them seabout called ue bea-ughtie ce and through ole a-er into ocured et from n backe
his ens, and remittie
s. His or: Core of the
on hath
243 H.B.
Douglas the brother of Athirce con-uicted him out of the way

age whiseruants, rimman
y found feare of finding e resem-
ber, and ade him ey came sing the bled the oose any doubt reuenge
was e-common doubting
in him, ing de-
ing dom,
s) might to haue
e, or else king, till yeares

Patholocus
is chosen to
be king.

Patholocus
is chosen to
be king.

Patholocus
is chosen to
be king.

Patholocus
is chosen to
be king.

Patholocus
is chosen to
be king.

Patholocus
is chosen to
be king.

Patholocus
is chosen to
be king.

Patholocus
is chosen to
be king.

Patholocus
is chosen to
be king.

Patholocus
is chosen to
be king.

Patholocus
is chosen to
be king.

Patholocus
is chosen to
be king.

Patholocus
is chosen to
be king.

Donald deusleth how to murder king Findocke by two naughtie persons.

meane how to be reuenged.

Therefore to begin withall, he procured two naughtie persons to go ouer into Albaine, and to seine themselves to haue fled from him, where also he willed them to offer their seruice vnto the king, and to disclose vnto him certeine light secrets of the said Donalds, thereby to win credit if it might be,
and in the end to spie a time to rid him out of the way. These craftie mates working according to Donalds wicked instructions, at length with much adoe they got credit, and after credit they got place so nere the king by the furtherance of Carantius the kings brother (whome they made priue also vnto their intent) that finding all things correspondent vnto their purpose (one day as the king hunted) the one began to feed him with a tale of the hatred which the Islanders bare towards him, thereto he gaue verie good eare, whilst the other smote him to the heart with a ianeline, & so leauing the iron sticking in his bodie, he fled away in hast with his traitorous companion and fellow. Those that were nere, seeing what had happened, some of them ran to him, to see if they might relieue him as then struggling with the pangs of death; others followed the murderers, and ouertaking them, brought them backe to receiue their meed according to that which they had iustlie de-serued; being also examined, they confessed how they were procured vnto it, not onelie by Donald of the Isles, but also by Carantius the kings owne brother, who of set purpose, being out of the way at that present, and hauing knowledge that he was accused of the kings death, fled out of the countrie as a banished man, first into Britaine, from whence (after he had remained there for a time) he went vnto Rome, and seruing in the wars vnder the emperours, Aurelius Vrbobus, Carus, and Dioclesianus, he became a right famous and a verie skillfull captaine.

But if this report be true that Carausius (of whom Eutropius maketh mention) were descended of so high parentage, maruell it is, that neither the same Eutropius, nor anie other of the Romane writers, could at no time come to the knowledge thereof, which if they had done, no doubt they would haue spoken somewhat of the same; for although he might happilie vpon the consideration aforesaid counterfeit himselfe to be borne of some base kindred, and so for a time to dissemble what he was, yet afterwards that he attained vnto so high degree of honour, as to usurpe the imperiall robes of purple, and to pos-seste the dominion of Britaine, it is not like but that to aduance his credit and authoritie roiall, he would haue set forth to the vttermost the nobilitie of his birth, if he had bene come of anie, and that so apparantlie to the world, that alwell his enemies as friends should both haue knowen and spoken of it.

Donald.

Findocus being thus slaine in the tenth yeare of his reigne, and buried with great lamentation of the people at Dunfalsage, his brother Donald, the third son to Athirco, was admitted to the kings dome, who immediatlie vpon his entring into the estate, prepared to go into the Isles against Donald that common enimie of Scotland. But this Donald himselfe deliuered the king of a great peece of that trauell: for so soon as he heard that the mur-ther by him contriued was executed, he assembled a mightie power of the Island-men, and transporting with them ouer into Kosse, proclaimed himselfe king, persecuting with fire and sword all such as denied him obedience. King Donald being aduertised of that attempt of his aduersarie, speedilie marcheth forth with such power as he had already assembled, sending proclamations abroad, that all other appointed to serue, should follow him with speed.

Thus comming into Murray land, he pitched downe his tents, purposing there to abide the com-ming of the residue of his armie. But Donald of the Isles vnderstanding all his demeanour and whole intention, thought it best to assaile him within his campe, before all his power should come vnto him, and being thus resolved, he set forward in the night time, and was vpon his enimies, before that his comming towards them was once signified in their campe. The king then vnderstanding his aduersaries to be at hand, bringeth forth his men, setteth them in arrate, and exhorteth them with many pitthe wordes to receiue their enimies with manlie stomachs. But the Island-men encouraged also by their captaine, gaue the onset so roundlie, that the Scotishmen had not leasure to occupie their shot, but were enforced even at the first to loine at handblowes, which were bestowed in such furious sort, that in the end the Scots being oppressed with multitude, were constrained to giue backe, some sauing themselves by flight, and some standing at defense till they were beaten downe and killed in the place.
There were slaine on the kings part thre thousand men, and two thousand taken prisoners; amongst whome were thirtie personages of honorable estate, together with the king himselfe being wounded so soze, that he died within thre daies after the battell, rather through anguish of mind than of his hurts (as some haue written) in the same yeare that he began his reigne. Donald of the Isles hauing thus got the victorie, took vpon him as king, accordinglie as he had caused himselfe at the first to be proclaimed.

But because he came to the estate thus by bloud, he continued still in doubt and feare of new conspiracies, being guiltie in conscience of his wrong-full usurpation. Those prisoners also, which he had taken in the battell, he kept in perpetuall captiuitie, menacing them present death, if anie of their friends and allies attempted anie stirre against him. More-ouer he nourished priuie factions amongst the nobilitie, supposing thereby that their powers would be the more feeble in anie publike exploit that was to be moued against him; finallie, if anie mischief happened amongst them, he caused the matter thoroughlie to be looked vpon, but with such regard that he alwaies enriched his owne cofers with the forfeitures and penalties which he took vpon amongst them. He seldeome times went abroad, and when he stirred forth anie whither, he had his gard about him, appointed with weapons in warlike sort for doubt of treason. He aduanced diuers of base condition to great wealth and honor, and behaued himselfe so in sundrie sorts with his mistrustfull crueltie, that manie there were which deead him, and but a few that loued him, so that in the end being in a maner run into the deadlie hatred of all men, he was murthered one night at Cnuerlochthe (whither he was come to haue passed ouer into the Isles) by certeine that had conspired his death in the twelfth yeare of his reigne.

The chiefe of the conspirators was one Crathlint the sonne of king Findocke, who immediatlie after the deed done, conueied himselfe secretlie out of the chamber, and repairing vnto certeine nobles and gentlemen inhabiting nere hand in the countrie, he declared vnto them the whole matter, exhorting them to aid him, in reuenging the injuries done not onelie to them priuatlie, as he knew verie well; but also to the whole state of the Scottish common welth, by the naughtie suggestion of diuers of the kings complices, who as yet vnderstood nothing of their maisters death, but were all quiet in their beds, as men suspecting nothing lesse than that which was now

Donald of the Isles slaine
setteth vpon
the enimies.

Crathlint

Crathlint is made king.

The Scots
overthrowen.

Donald vpon teeth this sword.

Donald of the Isles taketh
vpon him as king.

Donald.

A guiltie conscience.

The kinnes
and friends of Donald of the Isles are persecuted.

The politike government of Crathlint.

Crathlint goeth to hunt in the mountains of Grampian ancientlie called Grampen
mons.
An ambassager from the Isles.
The Scots requize the league to be renewed.

Donald of the Isles is murthered.

Anno Christi
273. H.B.

Crathlint
chiefe conspi-
rator to the murdering
of Donald.

Crathlint
chiese conspi-
rator to the
murdering
of Donald.

Crathlint
chiese conspi-
rator to the
murdering
of Donald.

Crathlint
chiese conspi-
rator to the
murdering
of Donald.

Donald of the Isles inuadeth Scot-
land.

Crathlint promised to ob-serue the ancient amitie betweene the Scottishmen
and Isles.
The present time by Crathlint vnto the king of the Isles.
Diuers Dictators come to Crathlint to hunt and make merie
with him.
A peice of the Scottish bog.

ith spard.
he pitched the com-Donald of r and whole within his e into him,
in the night
ze that his fied in their is aduerfa-
en, setteth
many pittie manlie sto-
also by their
at the Sco-ir thot, but re at hand.
urions soyl,
with mul-
some sauing
g at defense
in the place.
e thousand
; amongst zable estate,
wounded so
r the battell, his hurts (as sozib.
at he began thus got the inglie as he lamed.

Donald of the fles subtle
setteth byon
the enemies.

The Scots
overthrowen.

Donald byme teth this sozib.

Donald of the fles taketh byon him as king.

Donald.

Guillie conscience.

Donald of the fles is mur-
thered.
Anno Christi.
273. H.B.

Crathlint
chiefe conspi-
rator to the
murdering
of Donald.

Crathlint pro-
cureth the nobles of the countrie to oppress the servants of king Donald.

noto happened.

The gentlemen hearing the newes, and resolving greatlie thereat, got them to their weapons, and earlie in the verie dawning of the day, coming upon the kings household meanie, they slue about two hundred of them in the place where they lodged, the residue escaping forth of the house, and thinking to saue themselves, were beaten downe in the countrie as they passed by the people, who bare so deadlie and mortall hatred vnto the late king, that they not onelie reioiced much at his death, but thought themselves sufficientlie reuenged, when they could kill anie that did belong vnto him.

Crathlint Crathlint is
murdering.

After this, Crathlint being certeinlie knoene to be the sonne of king Findocke, by such evident tokens as were shewed by him that brought him by, was (partlie in respect of his iust title, and partlie for consideration of his good seruice in deliuering his countrie of so detestable a tyrant) aduanced to the gouernement of the kingdome, by consent of all the estates, and so being confirmed king, he perswaded the people that all the linage of the late tyrant Donald might be plucked by, euen as it were a tree by the roots, least anie of them happlie remaining alieue, should find meanes afterwards to disturbe the common wealth. The people consented lightlie hereto, as they that beside the mortall hate which they bare towards Donald, were now suddenly in loue with Crathlint, not onelie for his wit and other qualitties of the mind, but also by reason of his comelie personage and passing beautie, setting forth all his doings greatlie to his high praise and commendation.

The issue therefore with other the kinsmen and allies of Donald were sought for, and those that were found, without anie difference or respect of age or sex, were cruellie put to death. Which done, Crathlint appointed forth iudges and other administrators of iustice to see the laws executed, and the countries gouerned in good and quiet order, euerie man being assigned to his owne proper circuit. These he chose out of the most ancient peeres and barons of his realme. The yonger sort he referred to attend upon his person.

When he had taken direction in this wise for the rule of his kingdome, he went by into the mountains of Grangebene, there to passe the time for a while in hunting the hart, and other wild beastes, whither came vnto him ambassadoers from Thelargus king of the Picts, declaring the ioy which their maiester had conceiued for the slaughter of Donald, and the restoring of the right blood againe vnto the estate, requiring that the ancient league betwixt the Picts and Scottishmen might be once againe renewed. Crathlint receiued these ambassadoers most iollie, giuing them heartie thanks on the behalfe of their maiester for this signification of his good will shewed by their coming, and herewith promised, that during his life he would gladlie obserue the old ancient amitie established betwixt the two nations: according to the tenor of the old league. Moreover, when the said ambassadoers should depart, he toke vnto them to deliuer from him as a present vnto their maiester certein hounds, with hounds and greihounds, such as he thought that king Thelargus wanted.

And shortly after the returne of these ambassadoers into their countrie, diuerse young gentlemen of the Pictish nobilitie repaired vnto king Crathlint, to hunt and make merie with him: but when they should depart home wards, perceiuing that the Scottish dogs did farre excell theirs, both in fairnesse, swiftnesse, hardinesse, and also in long standing by and holding out, they got diuerse both dogs and bit-ches of the best kinds for breed to be giuen them by the Scottish lords, and yet not so contented, they stole one belonging to the king from his keeper, being more esteemed of him than all the other which he had about him. The maiester of the leash being informed hereof, pursued after them which had stolen that dog, thinking in deed to haue taken him from them, but they not willing to depart with him, fell at altercation, and in the end chanced to strike the maiester of the leash through with their bozespikes that he died presentlie, whereupon a noise and crie being raised in the countrie by his seruants, diuerse of the Scots as they were going home from hunting, returned, and falling upon the Picts to reuenge the death of their fellow, there ensued a shrewd bickering betwixt them, so that of the Scots there died threescore gentlemen, besides a great number of the commons, not one of them understanding (till all was done) what the matter ment. Of the Picts there were about an hundred slaine.

The kinsmen and friends of the Scots that were thus slaine, were wonderfullie moued with the iniurie committed, insomuch that without commandement of king or capteine, they assembled in great numbers together, and entring into the Pictish confines, they began to rob, spoile and kill after the manner of warre, wherewith the Picts being set in a rage, came forth together into the field, and encountering with the Scots, there was fought a fore battell betwixt them, without capteine, order, or standard, till at length the victorie remained with the Picts, of whom were slaine notwithstanding the day went on their sides, about two thousand men, but of the Scots there died about thre thousand, or more, as was supposed. Thus upon a light occasion was the league broken betwixt these two nations, who had continued as friends, the one still readie to aid the other, euer sith the daies of king Keutha, being the 7 in number that reigned after Fergus.

These two nations being thus fallen at debate, it was wonder to vnderstand with what crueltie the one sought to destroye the other. No pittie might moue their cruell hearts to spare either man, woman or child that fell into their hands: such was their inordinate and like desire which they had to shed each others blood. At last Thelargus R. of the Picts being a verie aged man, and perceiuing what mischiefe was happened through the follie of a few wilfull persons, appointed certein of his counsell to go as ambassadoers vnto king Crathlint, to find some means to haue the matter taken by, for the auoiding of the imminent danger that was like to inue to both nations. They according to their instructions coming to the place where Crathlint as then sojourned, had much adoe to get licence to come vnto his presence: but at length being admitted, they vsed such humble persuations grounded vpon reasonable considerations, that although no peace could be fullie concluded, yet a truce was granted them for thre moneths space, which was but sozillie obserued, for deadly hatred and inward desire of reuenge was entred so farre into the breasts of the commons on both sides, that neither commandement nor punishment might staie them from the inuading of one anothers confines, inauager their princes and all their fore restraints.

In this meane time was the estate of the Roman empire in Britaine brought into trouble by Carantius, of whome a little before mention hath bene made. Eutropius nameth him Carausius: he would not be acknoene at his coming to Rome of what linage he was descended, and so he was repared to come of some base stocke, but yet through his worthie seruice in the warres, he attained vnto great

The Picts
steale one of the kings best greihounds.

The Scots &
Picts fight
for a grei-
hound.

What mischiefe ensued vpon
so light an occasion as the stealing of a dog.

This chanced about the pere
of Christ 288,
as lo. Ma.
noteth.

The Scots
rob the Pic-
tish borders.
The Scots &
Picts encount-
ter in battell.

The Scots
discomfited
by the Picts.

What continuance the league was betwixt the
Scots and Picts, & how broken about a small matter as begun about a dog.

Cruell warre

Thelargus
king of the Picts being an aged man, desireth to
haue peace,
and thereupon sendeth his ambassadoers vnto Crath-
lint.

A truce granted.

Carantius
named by Eutropius Carausius, troubleth the estate of Bri-taine.

The wille practise of Carantius.

Carantius
seerly to come to make answer to such matters as he was charged
with.
Carantius
revolting co-
meth into Westmerland, & causeth the people there
to take his part against
the Romans.

Carantius
sendeth messengers unto king Crathlint, in excu-
sing his fault
for his brother Findoche's
death.
Carantius
requereth to be aided against the
Romans.

Crathlint resolueth to hear that Caranti-
us was alive.

Crathlint re-
solueth to aid Carantius, &
certifieth him
of the same.

The king of the Picts also promiseth to aid Carantius.

Crathlint
king of the Scots and Carantius
come to talke
together.

Crathlint and the king of the Picts come to a communication by Carantius his means, who trauellerth to set them at one great honor, and was appointed by Dioclesian to haue the souereigne regard ouer the coasts of the French ocean, to defend the same from pirates of the Saxons and other Germans, that soe molested the same in those daies. But for that he used to suffer those rousers to take spoiles and prizes, to the end he might in their returne take the same from them againe, and conuert the gaine wholie to his owne vse, without restoring that which was due to the owners, or sending anie portion thereof to the Ro- mane emperor, he was complained vpon, and sent for; but for that he doubted to come to his answer, as one which knew himselfe guiltie, he furnished his name with men, vittels and ordinance, and with the same took his course about the west parts of Britaine, and landed in Westmerland, where he easilie procured the people there to submit themselves to be vnder his rule and obedience, and promised to deliver them from the greivous yoke and bondage of the Romans.

Thus having begun the foundation of that which he purposed to achieve, for his further advancement therein, he sent ambassadors unto his nephew king Crathlint, both declaring that he was, and also ex- cusing the trespasses committed against him, for being of counsell touching the murder of his brother Findoche, father to the same Crathlint: and therefore if in putting away all mistrust of his innocencie in that behalfe, he would aid him against the Romans, he doubted not but that he should in short time vtterlie expell them out of all Britaine, and enioy all those provinces within the same (which as then they possessed) unto his owne vse, and this he said should be more honor and gaine both to the Scottishmen & Picts, if they could be contented to renew friend- ship, and to come with them in aid against their com- mon enemies, than to seeke to destroye one another, as he lately understood they had done for a dog.

Crathlint hearing the words of these ambassadors, reioiced not a little, that his uncle Carantius was not onelie alive, but also had through his baliance achieved so high renowne as to be accounted one of the worthiest warriors amongst all the Romane captiues. And hereupon with good aduise he deter- mined to aid him in that his enterprise for the con- quest of Britaine to the vttermost of his power. Ad- ding further, that if it were not for the warres which he doubted to haue with the Picts, he would not on- ly send him aid of men, but also come with them himselfe: and hereof he assured the ambassadors both by word of mouth and letters. Who returning with such answer unto their master Carantius, he reioiced not a little, to vnderstand how well they had sped, and so much the more, for that he received about the same time the like answer from the king of Picts.

Shortlie after he came to an interuiew with the king of Scots at the water of Elke, where after he had purged himselfe with manie words of excuse, touching the murder of his brother Findoche, there was an assured friendship concluded betwixt them. And at the motion of Carantius, Crathlint was contented to come to a communication with the king of Picts, for the conclusion of a peace, to the intent that both of them might ioine their powers together, in aid of Carantius against the Romans. At this communication both the kings met, and Carantius likewise was there, as a man indifferent betwixt them both, to do what he could to linke them both in amitie. And verelie his presence thereunto stood so much in stead, that chieflie through his persua- sion grounded vpon great reasons and weightie considerations, they agreed to conclude a peace, and to renew the old league in such manner and forme, and with such conditions, as should be thought requisite by the aduise and discret order of eight an- cient persons: foure to be chosen on the one part, and foure on the other. Which eight persons taking the matter in hand, did so aduisedlie giue order for the auoiding of all causes of grudge and hatred, that both parts held them satisfied with their arbitre- ment and direction, so that a full peace was confir- med, and all variance vtterlie quenched.

In this meane time Quintus Bassianus the Romane lieutenant in Britaine, vnderstanding how Carantius was thus revolted, and had not on- ly caused them of Westmerland to rebell, but also laine and chased the Romans out of that countrie, he was not a little disquieted, and determined with all speed to go against him, and to reuenge these in- juries. Within a few daies after, having his armie ready, he entered into Westmerland: but hearing that his enemies were already come to Poike, and had taken the citie by surrender, he turned his force thitherward, in purpose to fight with them, though he vnderstood they were in three great battels, as the Scots in one, the Picts in another, and those of Carantius retinue in the third. He lodged that night within a verie strong place, fenced about with mar- shes.

But Carantius vnderstanding all the manner of his enemies by his espials, and being in campe within ten miles of them or thereabout, in the same night he raised his field without anie great byte, and by the leading of certeine guides he marched straight toward the place where Bassianus was in- camped, so that anon after the spring of the day he came thither: whereof Bassianus being aduertised, and perceiuing he should haue battell, maketh ready for the same, giuing the best exhortation he could vnto his people to plaie the men: but forsomuch as the most part of his armie were Britains, all his words nothing auailed: for they desirous to see the vt- ter ruine of all the Romane power, euen at the verie point when the battels should haue ioined, withdrew themselves apart without anie stroke stricken, and got them by into the next mounteins, to see what would ensue. The residue of the Romane armie, see- ing themselves thus forsaken of their fellows, and their sides left bare and open for the enemy to enter vpon them, fell to plaine running away, but by rea- son of the marshy ground compassing them in on each side, seruing well to purpose for the Scots, and other the confederates, a great number of the Ro- mans, and other of their part were ouertaken and laine. Amongst whom Bassianus himselfe was one, and Vircius the emperors procurator an other.

The Britains (who as is said refused to fight in the beginning of the battell) yielded themselves vnto Carantius, and swore to be his true liege men and subiects. In like manner Carantius appointed all such of the nobilitie as were betwixt twentie yeeres and threescore, to remaine with him in ho- stage: but the spoile of the field he diuided amongst his people equallie, so that as well the Scottishmen and Picts, as also his owne souldiers held them well contented and satisfied therewith. After this victo- rie Carantius caused himselfe to be proclaimed king of Britaine, usurping the government thereof wholie to himselfe, and retaining two thousand of the Scots and Picts to attend vpon the safeguard of his per- son, sent the residue home laden with riches of the enemies spoile. He sent also with them his ambassa- dors, to render thanks vnto both the kings for their aid in this so prosperous a victorie, assigning vnto them as a portion of the conquest, the countie of Westmerland and Cumberland, with all that region which lay betwixt Adrians wall, and the citie of Poike, to inioy as their owne proper patrimonie for Peace confirmed againe betwixt the Scottishmen

and Picts.

Quintus
Bassianus
entereth into Westmerland,
but hearing
that his enemies were at Poike he turneth thither-
ward.

The Bri-
tains betray
the Romans.

The Romans
are discouered.

The slaughter of the Romans.

The Bri-
tains yield
themselves
vnto Carantius.

Carantius
proclaimeth himselfe
king of Britaine.

Carantius
sending gottard, bishop of the north, to assigne the countie of Westmerland
to the Scottishmen
for their patrimonie.

The persecution of the christians by Dioclesian.

Constantius perfecteth
the christians.

Spane of the Britains flee
to the Scots
to avoid persecution.
Crathlint de-stroyeth the temples of the false gods in Spain.

The first bishops see in Scotland.
Sodorenus
ecclesia.
Crathlint departeth out of this world.

Fine-
marke.

Amphibalus.

The church
of St. Andrew, wherein called Sodorenus ecclesia.

Culdee.

What peere
Fine-marke
began his reigne.

for euer mo-
raine by his historie pe-

After that from trouble
god ordina-
common-ly obserued be-daies the pe-
the emperor
ted in most partes of the knowne to ell ordinance taine also, a small quantity of Chris-religion.

In the Constantine
who aduocuen to pillage determine subjection.

terpise, he right genti-
point he for-
of the chief
der Diocle-
full among
and Picts
lint receined vnto
for a place of the heat which had terlie abosomes of and brother dedicated christians ding to the dowed, w
and there the realm niour. Af-after he b
as well for and carna-
ment of the

him in
of marble who with continue daies a taine bo-
raised in lint, and Sauour
ric much setting fo hearts a
There is bout the instructi-
cus Pict
Carnoc
Scottish Dei, or as of God.

But
peere Fine-marke
began his reigne.

What peere
Fine-marke
began his reigne.

What peere
Fine-marke
began his reigne.

What peere
Fine-marke
began his reigne.

What peere
Fine-marke
began his reigne.

What peere
Fine-marke
began his
reigne.

for euer more. Finallie the said Carantius was slaine by his companion Aleaus, as in the English historie ye may find more at large.

After this, Crathlint king of Scots deliuered from troubles against the Romans, deuised sundrie good ordinances for the quiet state of the Scottish common-wealth, causing the peace to be diligentlie obserued betwixt him and the Brits. Also in his daies the persecution of the christians chanced, which the emperor Dioclesian commanded to be executed in most furious wise, so that there were few partes of the world (where anie christians were knowen to inhabit) that tasted not of that his cruell ordinance and scourge in that behalfe. In Britaine also, as well as in other places, there was no small quantitie of innocent blood shed, with most vnnmercifull murder committed, to the great triumph of Christs crosse, that glorious ensigne of our religion.

In which time Constantius Chlorus father to Constantine the great, was resident in Britaine, who adiudging the Scots to be a people wholie giuen to pillage and slaughter, as they were in deed, determined with himselfe to haue brought them to subiection. But per he could atchiue any notable enterprise, he died, leauing behind him the same of a right gentle and wortheie prince, sauing that in one point he fore stained his honor, for that he was one of the chiefe that persecuted the christian flocke vnder Dioclesian, forcing no small number of the faithfull amongst the Britains, to flee vnto the Scots and Brits to auoid his persecution. Whome Crathlint receiued for his part most louinglie, and assigned vnto them (as the Scots say) the Ile of Man for a place of habitation, destitute of all such temples of the heathens religion belonging to the Druides, which had continued there since the beginning; and utterly abolished all the superstitious rites and customs of the same Druides, with their whole order and brotherhood. He erected a temple there, which he dedicated vnto Iesus Christ our sauour, wherein the christians might celebrate their diuine seruice, according to their profession. This church being richlie indowed, was the first bishops see amongst the Scots, and thereupon was taken for the mother church of the realme. It is now called the church of saint Samour. Finallie Crathlint departed out of this life, after he had reigned 24 yeres, being much praised aswell for his politike gouernment, as for his great and earnest zeale which he bare toward the aduancement of the true christian religion.

Fincomarke that was his vnckles sonne, succeeded him in the kingdome, & was placed on the stone of marke, to the great reioicing of all the estates, who wished him a prosperous reigne, and long to continue therein. There liued in king Crathlints daies a noble christian called Amphibalus, a Britaine borne, who fleeing from the persecution then raised in his countrie, came vnto the same Crathlint, and by him was created the first bishop of saint Sauours church in Man: this Amphibalus did berie much good amongst the Scots and Britains in setting forth the word of life, and rooting out of their hearts all superstitious errors of blind gentilitie. There were other also of right famous memorie about the same time, that ceased not in preaching, and instructing the people in the right beliefe, as Apodorus, Priscus, Calanus, Ferranus, Ambianus, and Carnocus, called by an old ancient name in the Scottish tong Culdei, that is to vnderstand, Cultores Dei, or as you would say in English, the worshippers of God.

But now to the purpose touching Fincomarke, perchall vnderstand, that he began his reigne in the yeere (as W. Harison saith) after the birth of our Sauour 325, after the creation of the world 4292, and from the first establishing of the Scottish kingdome 652, and in the 20 yeere of Constantine the emperor. It chanced that Otanius king of the Britains was vanquished by Traherus a Romane capteine, and forced for his refuge to flee vnto this Fincomarke then king of Scots, who receiued him as a friend. And furthermore though he were required by Traherus to deliuer him into his hands, as a traitor and a rebell vnto the Romane empire, yet Fincomarke refused so to do, choosing rather to susteine all Traherus his malice, and to haue warres with the Romane emperor, than to betray his friend who had put his life into his hands vpon an especiall trust of safegard.

Herewith Traherus being not a little moued, assembled his power, and entred into Westmerland, the which countrie had remained in the Scottish mens hands euer since Carantius deliuered it ouer vnto them. Fincomarke hearing that the Romans would thus make him wars, had likewise raised a puissant armie to resist them, so that he had at the least 60 thousand persons together in one armie, as 30 thousand of his owne countreiment, 20 thousand Brits, & ten thousand of such Britains as followed after Otanius. Fincomarke being thus furnished, hastied south to encounter with his enemies, before they should haue time to do any notable damage vnto his subiects, & so comming within sight of them, sent an herald vnto Traherus, to vnderstand the cause why he thus invaded his countrie, but receiuing fro him an vntoward answer, he brought forth his people into the field in order ready to giue battell, and so joining with the enimie, there was fought a right sore and cruell conflict, which continued for a time with vnnmercifull murder and slaughter on both parts.

Finallie, when the Romans were at a point to haue got the vpper hand, they were suddenlie put in such feare with the sight of a number of husbands men, who had got together their cattell and were diuising the same alwaie, that supposing they had bene some new succors comming to aid their enemies, they immediatlie fled vpon the same, leauing the vladie to their aduersaries: howbeit of the Scots side were slaine (as their chronicles report) fiftene thousand men, and on the Romane part about sixtene thousand. Traherus himselfe escaped vnto Forke, but hearing that Fincomarke and Otanius pursued after him, he forsooke that citie, and got him into places of more suertie, so that when the enimies came thither, the citizens yielded themselves, and receiued Otanius as their prince, offering from thenceforth to be vnder his rule and gouernement. The newes of these atchiued victories being buzzed throughout the realme, caused a great number of the nobles to come in vnto Otanius, who receiued them most thankfullie; & to conclude, wrought so by their support, that he was shortly after restored to the gouernance of the whole realme, and established therein according to his owne wish.

This done Fincomarke returned into his countrie, as well himselfe as other of his nobles and men of warre, being highlie rewarded for their paines and trauell sustained in that iourne. There was also promise made and confirmed by solemn oath, that the countrie of Westmerland, with such other parts as were assigned to his predecessour king Crathlint, by order of Carantius at the time of their joining together in league against the Romans, should for euer remaine vnto Fincomarke, & to his successors the Scottish kings, without anie claime or title to be made to the same by any of the

322. H.B.
490. H.B.
655. H.B.
Constantine H.B.
Otanius is vanquished, & fleeth into Scotland.

Traherus invadeth westmerland.

Fincomarke raiseth his power.

Fincomarke cometh in battell with Traherus.

The Romans flee.

The number is slaine.

Forke is yielded vnto Otanius.

Otanius obtaineth the rule of Britaine.

Westmerland assigned to the Scottishmen.

eight ancle ne part, and taking the order for the tred, that their arbitre was confir.

Peace confir. med againe betwixt the Scottishmen and Brits.
Constantine the derstanding had not one. ll, but also that countrie, mined with ing these ing his armie but hearing Forke, and ned his force dem, though attels, as the those of Ca d that night out with ma.

all the maner ing in campe, in the same great bzute, s he marched nus was in of the day he ing aduertised, maketh rea- he could for somuch as nus, all his s to see the bt- ened at the verte ned, withdrew striken, and s, to see what ne armie, se- fellows, and imie to enter y, but by rea- g them in on he Scots, and er of the Ro- uertaken and himselfe was ator an other. sed to fight in themselves bin- rne liege men nus appointed wixt twentie ith him in ho- ided amongst e Scottishmen yeld them well

The Romans are discoried.
The slaught- ter of the Romans.

The Brit- tains yield themselves vnto Carantius.

Carantius pro- claimed king meth him, blaspeth the kingdome of Britaine.

Carantius ob- taining got the victorie, diue- both the game in assigning his coferat their true poztions.

Constantine the derstanding had not one. ll, but also that countrie, mined with ing these ing his armie but hearing Forke, and ned his force dem, though attels, as the those of Ca d that night out with ma.

Constantine the derstanding had not one. ll, but also that countrie, mined with ing these ing his armie but hearing Forke, and ned his force dem, though attels, as the those of Ca d that night out with ma.

Constantine the derstanding had not one. ll, but also that countrie, mined with ing these ing his armie but hearing Forke, and ned his force dem, though attels, as the those of Ca d that night out with ma.

Constantine the derstanding had not one. ll, but also that countrie, mined with ing these ing his armie but hearing Forke, and ned his force dem, though attels, as the those of Ca d that night out with ma.

Constantine the derstanding had not one. ll, but also that countrie, mined with ing these ing his armie but hearing Forke, and ned his force dem, though attels, as the those of Ca d that night out with ma.

Constantine the derstanding had not one. ll, but also that countrie, mined with ing these ing his armie but hearing Forke, and ned his force dem, though attels, as the those of Ca d that night out with ma.

Constantine the derstanding had not one. ll, but also that countrie, mined with ing these ing his armie but hearing Forke, and ned his force dem, though attels, as the those of Ca d that night out with ma.

Constantine the derstanding had not one. ll, but also that countrie, mined with ing these ing his armie but hearing Forke, and ned his force dem, though attels, as the those of Ca d that night out with ma.

Constantine the derstanding had not one. ll, but also that countrie, mined with ing these ing his armie but hearing Forke, and ned his force dem, though attels, as the those of Ca d that night out with ma.

A counsell kept at York.

Otauius
counsell to inlarge his dominion.

The Brit-
tains invade Westmerland.

Traherius
returneth
into Brittain.
Otauius is banquished by Traherius.

Traherius by a conspiracie
is murdered.
Otauius is reconciled with Fin-comarke.

Otauius
entrencheth
into Brittain
with the Pictish
king.

Otauius be-cometh tributarie vnto the Roman emperor.
17 of Constantine
emperor. H.B.
Fincomarke
deceased.
358. H.B.

Eugenius &
Ethodius
sons to Fin-comarke.

Romacius,
Fethelmacus
and Angustianus sons to Ethodius
brethren pretend a right to the estate.

Britains: but this promise was not long kept, for shortly after that Otauius had once chased all the Romans south of the British confines, and that Traherius was fled over into France, there was a council called at York, where it was not onely ordeined, that from thenceforth there should neuer anie stranger be suffered to reigne ouer the Britains, but also that the bounds of the realme should be extended south beyond the wall made (as before is recited) by the emperor Adrian, euen vnto the old ancient bounds and limits, expelling south the inhabitants of forren nations.

Such an immoderate lust of inlarging his dominion inflamed the hart of Otauius, that neither regard of his oth, nor remembrance of benefits receiued, might staie him from seeking to wrong them, whose aid had restored him vnto his former estate and dignitie, as before we haue rehearsed. For hereupon there were ten thousand men of war sent into Westmerland, to the intent to conquer the same out of the Scottish mens hands: but being incoun-tered with a power of Scottishmen & Picts, they were sharpe repelled & quicklie put to flight. About the same time also, Traherius returned out of France with two legions of Romans and twentie thousand of other aids: and giuing battell vnto Otauius, he banquished his armie, and constrained him for his refuge to flee vnto the mouth of Humber, where he got certeine vessels, and sailed into Forwaite, there to saue his life, because that Scotland was now no sure refuge for him. Thus was Traherius againe in possession of Britaine as lieutenant to Constantine the emperor; but shortly after he was by certeine conspirators in fauour of Otauius murdered, and then Otauius returned againe: as in the English chronicle is mentioned more at large.

Immediatlie vpon his returne, he reconciled himselfe with Fincomarke the Scottish king, and was contented that he should quietlie inioy the countreies of Westmerland and Cumberland, with such other territories as Carantius had granted in former time vnto Crathlint. He likewise sent vnto the king of the Picts, and concluded a friendship with him, to the intent he might haue aid from him also, if it chanced the Romans estones to invade his countreie, as shortly after they did, not ceasing till they had so wearied him with continuall wars, that in the end to be at rest (as his age and other necessities then required) he deliuered into their hands certeine castles and fortresses, and also became tributarie to the emperor, on condition that he might vse the office and name of a king all the residue of his daies. These things being thus quieted in Albion, the Romans, Britains, Scottishmen and Picts, continued in friendlie peace without any notable trouble, till the ninth yeare of the reigne of Valentinian emperor of Rome: & first of Damasus the pope. In the which yeare Fincomarke king of Scots departed this life, after he had gouerned the estate aboue 47 yeeres. This was in the yeare of our redemption 172. His Fincomarke left behind him two sonnes, the one named Eugenius, being as then about 18 yeeres of age; the other hight Ethodius, and was yonger than his brother by one yeere, so that neither of them might succeed their father, by reason they were not of yeeres sufficient to rule, according to the ancient ordinance.

Whereupon a counsell was called in Argile, where there was hard hold betwixt the three nephues to king Crathlint, that were begotten by three of his brethren, which of them should gouerne the land: their names were Romacius, Fethelmacus, and Angustianus. Romacius had a Pictish ladie of the blood rofall of that nation to his mother, and for that his father was eldest brother next vnto Crathlint, he looked to be preferred, though he himselfe was yonger in yeeres than either Fethelmacus or Angustianus. Fethelmacus gaue his consent with such voyces as he had vnto Angustianus, wherewith Romacius being not a little offended, sought meanes to haue destroyed them both: but his practise being discovered, caused manie to withdraue their good wills from him, whereby his aduersaries were the more encouraged: and thereupon the counsell brake vp, either part deuising how to strengthen themselves against the others practises. But forsomuch as Angustianus vsed plaine meanes without any fraudulent dealing, he got the more friends, so that Romacius was constrained in the end to require aid of the king of Picts, who being nere of kin to him, might not denie his request. Angustianus therefore vnderstanding that danger he was in, if he fell into his aduersaries hands, got together an armie of such as fauoured his cause, and incountring with him in battell was put flight, and forced to flee into the westerne Isles with his coufine Fethelmacus, where remaining for a while, at length he was aduertised that the inhabitants had conspired against him, for doubt thereof he got him ouer into Ireland.

Angustianus being thus chased out of the realme, Romacius was receiued by the most part of the nobles and commons for their king. But as the accustomed manner of tyrants, committing thus to the gouernement of a realme through euill meanes, is to rule with crueltie, so did he behaue himselfe, according to that semblable rate, so lone as he thought himselfe to be sure of the estate. Wherfore such as had bozne any euill will to Fincomarke, and were out of fauor in his daies, those did Romacius call vnto him, and afterwarde vsed their counsell about all other mens, aduancing them also to most high rule and rich offices. Again, those which had bene in fauor with Fincomarke, or bare any affection toward his issue, he sought courtlie to bereaue them both of life, lands and goods, so that by such his doings, there was gathered no light suspicion, that he would likewise ver long find meanes to dispatch Ethodius and Eugenius the sons of the same Fincomarke, thereby to be the more assured of the crowne & kingdome it selfe. The two children also fearing as much on their owne behalfe, by the aduise and helpe of their trustie friends, conuicted themselves into Westmerland, and after ouer into the Ile of Man, where they remained looking for a date.

Then began banishments, confiscations of goods, and slaughter of such as were thought to be fauourers of Angustianus cause, without respect either of sex or age, till the nobles of the realme being not a little moued with such his cruell doings, and tyrannicall gouernment, conspired together by secret meanes how to deliuer their countreie of so pernicious a tyrant. And to bring this their purpose the more speedilie to passe, they wrought so closelie, that they had assembled a great armie, and were come with the same within ten miles of the place where he then laie, yet he had any vnderstanding of their enterprise, so that whereas he (being vnprovided of resistance) assailed by slight towards Pictland to haue escaped their hands, it preuailed him nothing, for he was taken by the waie, and receiued such end as his former passed life had verie well deserued, in the fourth yeere of his reigne: his head was set vpon the end of a pole, and carried about to be shewed vnto the people to their great reioicing. There were slain at the same time beside him, diuers Scots & Picts, of counsell with him in all his cruell practises.

After which execution done, they sent for Angustianus, who returned into Scotland, & was proclaimed king,

Romacius
looketh vnto to restore
cousins.

Eugenius
was by desiring chastitie more ship.

Romacius
banquished Angustianus.

Romacius
Romacius
receiued by
king.

Romacius
gouerneth tyrannicall.

Eugenius
&
Ethodius
the sonnes of Fincomarke
are conuicted into the Ile
of Man.

The Scottish
lords conspire against Ro-macius.

Romacius
apprehended and put to death.

Eugenius
proclaimed
king.

king, as well by the commons. Abtaius had slain the sonne of Constantius the rebels, countreing in battell. And within thre Britains, through being constrained he left a sonne who doubting to be fled into the Ile of Ierne peres vnkidus, the sonnes of persisting in their fed in battell by ted, till he had by tication.

While these tro- gulfianus B. of tanus king of uenge the death sundrie robes & and greatlie in gods, murderin of towne with his power incre men, which had v preased so for v medie but to tri field; for no ite anie agreement made humble f. Wherfore perce prepared an arm where (after fore rie remained w his Picts were c by flight.

Pedatus hin to Camelon, wh to haue their ad uenged of the in of he was most danger he brow somewhat ease had thus concei. Neither wante that assemblie, twin fauour of earnest wise th say to the cont sped an armie the Scottish boz sent of his nobl sed men of wa ties of his dom that might be g he staied not l entred into Ba all afore him a

Angustianus ting least the mans should destruction of the anie friendlie fall vnto some warres to ind estates, in put to the hands of and the Britai to Pedatus a such dangers a this warre th king, as well by consent of the lords, as fauour of the commons. About the same time, because the Britains had slaine the Romane lieutenant, the emperor Constantius sent one Maximus thither to chastise the rebels, with whom the same Maximus in countering in battell, gaue them a great overthrow. And within three daies after Maximus king of the Britains, through greife, age, and long sickness, being consumed to the last point, departed this life. He left a sonne behind him named also Maximus, who doubting to fall into the hands of the Romans, fled into the Ile of Man, and remained there certaine yeeres unknowne with Eugenius and Ethodius, the sonnes of Maximus. The Britains also persisting in their rebellion, were oftentimes discomfited in battell by Maximus, and soe by him persecuted, till he had brought them againe to their full subiection.

While these troubles continued in Britaine, Angustinus R. of Scots was soe disquieted by Pectanus king of Picts, who enforced himselfe to reuenge the death of his cousine Romacus, making sundrie rodes & forraies into the Scottis confines, and greatlie indamaged the countrie, by spoiling of goods, murthering of the inhabitants, and burning of townes with villages; and in the end hauing his power increased by the aid of certaine Scottis men, which had borne godd will vnto Romacus, he pleased soe fore vpon Angustinus, that he had no remedie but to trie the hazard of battell in a pitched field; for no friendlie persuasions to haue peace or any agreement could be heard, though Angustinus made humble sute to haue purchased the same. Wherefore perceiuing no hope of attonement, he prepared an armie, and met his ennemie in the field, where (after soe fight and much slaughter) the victorie remained with Angustinus and Pectanus with his Picts were chased and forced to saue themselves by flight.

Pectanus himselfe neuer rested till he came vnto Camelon, where he called a councell of his nobles to haue their aduise by what meanes he might be reuenged of the iniuries received by the Scots, where of he was most desirous, not regarding into what danger he brought his owne realme, so he might somewhat ease his rancour and displeasure, which he had thus conceived against his enemies the Scots. Neither wanted there diuers great personages in that assemblie, which (to content his mind and to win fauour of him) set forward the matter in such earnest wise that (notwithstanding what other could say to the contrarie) it was ordeined that with all speed an armie should be leuied, and led forth into the Scottis borders. Pectanus hauing thus the consent of his nobles to inuade the Scots anew, caused men of warre to be taken vp through all the parties of his dominion, and that of the choicest men that might be got; the which being once assembled, he staied not long but set forward with them, and entred into Balendar wood, spoiling and destruction all afoze him at his owne will and pleasure.

Angustinus vnderstanding his furie, and doubting least the Britains through setting on of the Romans should seeke to ioine with the Picts, to the destruction of the Scots, thought good to assaie if by any friendlie meanes he might bring Pectanus to fall vnto some reasonable point, rather than by the warres to indanger both the Pictis and Scottis estates, in putting the same in aduenture to fall into the hands of their ancient enemies the Romans and the Britains. Wherevpon therefore he wrote vnto Pectanus a gentle letter, declaring therein all such dangers and inconueniences as might insue by this warre thus by him attempted. And againe, how necessarie it were for both the nations to haue peace together as then, considering how it was not to be thought that Maximus the Romane legat (hauing now all the Britains at his commandement) would rest (if occasion were offered) till that he had fullie subdued both the Scots and Picts: for the auoiding of which perill he offered for his part, to accept any reasonable conditions of peace, that should by him be prescribed.

But Pectanus in no wise would giue care to any treatie of peace, so that Angustinus being forced to giue battell for defense of his subiects, brought his people into the field, and exhorted them to plaie the men with sundrie comfortable words, he placed them in order of battell. On the other part Pectanus likewise encouraged his folkes to doe valiantlie, so that the archers on both sides stepped forward, letting their arrowes flie frelie one at another, vntill at length coming to handblowes they strooke on frethlie, beating downe and killing without sparing on either side, so that a good space the victorie was doubtfull. At length Angustinus perceiuing his people to be put to the worst, rushed forth into the thicket of the prease amongst his enemies, where he was quicklie espied, oppressed with prease, and slaine out of hand. The most part of his people mistaking him, & not vnderstanding what was become of him, supposed that he had bene fled, and therefore fell also to running away; but the residue that stood still at their defense were slaine downe right. Thus the victorie remained with the Picts, but neither part had any cause to reioisse, for the captiues on both sides were slaine, besides manie thousands of other; so that aswell the one nation as the other departed from the place right penfise and sorrowfull, giuing manie a soe curse vnto such as had bene the procurers and nourishers of such detestable hatred betwixt those two nations, which had so long a time bene contained in the faithfull band of amitie, to the great quiet and wealth of both the countries. After this bloodie battell, aswell the Scots as Picts sat still for a season, not attempting any enterprise of importance the one against the other.

Angustinus reigned not past two yeares before he was slaine thus in the field, as before ye haue heard, in whose place succeeded his cousine Fethelmacus with little better successe: for in the second yeare of his reigne, desirous to be reuenged of the Picts, he assembled an armie, and entring into Angus, began to spoile & slea downe right all that was before him, without regard to impotent, aged, tender infants, or other. The Picts also being kindled herewith, gathered their power together, and countering with the Scots, there was a soe battell fought betwixt them; but the Scots first putting the wings of their enemies host to flight, at length discomfited their maine battell also, being left naked on both sides of all aid or succour, great slaughter was made in the chase of the Picts as they fled hither and thither to saue themselves. So that among other, their king named Pectanus, brother to the aboue remembred Pectanus, being wounded with an arrow, died within three daies after this cruell conflict was ended. The courage of the Scots now being aduanced with this their prosperous successe, they passed forthwith ouer the riuer of Tate, to rob, harrie, and spoile the countrie of Fife.

The Picts, perceiuing themselves not to be strong enough to match with their enemies in plaine field at hand-strokes, determined yet with skirmishes and light incounterings (if it were possible) to keepe them off from the winning of any of their fenced townes, castles or strong holdes. And to be the more able to maintaine themselves in this their purposed Pectanus refused all offers of peace.

Angustinus and Pectanus joine in battell with their armies.

Angustinus is slaine.

The Scots are discomfited.

Pectanus is also slaine.

Fethelmacus.

The Scots discomfited the Picts.

In other Pectanus king of the Picts dieth of hurts received in the fight with the Scots.

G. y. inten.

Heirgust is chosen king
of the Picts.

Heirgust
pretended treason.

Fethelmacus
is murdered
in his bed.

In the fift yeare of the emperour Constantius.

360. H.B.

Saint Keule
commeth into Fife, then a part of Pict-
land, and now
of Scotland.

The Scots
send into the Ales of Hydan, for Fincomarke
his sonnes.

Eugenius.

Eugenius is inuested king.

The practice of Sparimus
to destroy the
Scots.

intention, they did choose on Heirgust to their king, a man of subtil nature and craftie imagination. This Heirgust deuising how to deliuer his countrie of such an intollerable enimie as Fethelmacus was, procured two sic fellows Pias by nation, to counterfeit themselves for Scots, and for that they were cunning thowters of the dart, in which kind of exercise the same Fethelmacus took great pleasure, they were appointed to make sure to be in seruice with him, to the intent that when they might espie their time, they should slea him, by one kind of meane or other.

They (according as they were instructed, comming into Scotland) found meanes not onelie to haue place in the kings house, but also to corrupt one of his musicians an harper, and to bring him to be of counsell with them in this their wicked purpose. By reason thereof, in one night as he laie at Carrike, where he was busie to make his prouision there for the warres against the Pias, the same musician (having plaied in the kings bed-chamber till he had brought him asleepe) did let in those two Piasish traitors, who forthwith slea him euen as he laie so sleeping: but the king growning grieuoullie at the deadlie stroke, some of them that watched before the chamber doze perceiving what was happened, folloved after the murderers, who fled with all speed vnto the next mounteins, where they sought to defend themselves with hurling downe stones, vpon them that came by towards them: but in the end, being taken, and confessing the deed, with the whole manner of the same, they were drawn in peeces with wild horses: the musician also being apprehended and convict of the treason, suffered semblable the like kind of death. Fethelmacus came to his end in the third yeare of his reigne, being the second yeare after the death of the emperour Valentinian.

In this season (as in times past hath bene beleued) certeine bones of the apostle saint Andrew were brought forth of Achata, a prouince in Crete, into Scotland by a Crækish monke named Regulus Albus, commonlie called S. Keule, a man in those daies highlie esteemed, for the opinion which the world had conceiued of him for his holie and vertuous life, to whome king Heirgust gaue his palace that stood in that part of Fife, where the same Regulus first landed; at whose contemplation also, he erected a church in old time called Kirkruill, that is, the church of S. Keule, afterwards named the old church of S. Andrew, standing in the abbie churchyard, where the charons were wont to be buried. But to leaue this matter to the further report and credit of the Scottish chronicles, we will proceed with our purpose. After the death of Fethelmacus, the nobles and commons of the Scottish nation sent into the Ile of Man for Eugenius the sonne of king Fincomarke, where he with his brother Ethodius had remained, during the daies of the thre last re-membred kings, Romacus, Angusianus, and Fethelmacus.

This Eugenius at his comming into Albanie was inuested king of the Scots by common consent of all the nation. About the same season, Sparimus the Romane lieutenant in Britaine, vnderstanding of the late dissention betwixt the Scottishmen and Pias, deuised which waies he might best subdue both those nations, thereby not onelie to enlarge the bounds of the Romane empire, and to deliuer the Britains from inuasions of those so cruell enimies, but also to haue the south part of the Ile more obedient and loiall vnto the same empire than heretofore it had bene. He thought good therefore in the beginning to assaie if he might ioine in friendship with the one of the nations, till he had destroyed ed the other: for he considered it would be an hard peece of worke to haue to doe with them both at one instant. Wherevpon directing his letters vnto Heirgust king of the Pias, he required to renew the old league with him and his people, promising to aid him against the Scots, common enimies not onelie to the Piasish nation, but also to all such people as loued rest and quietnesse, as might easilie be perceived by their continuall practise and vltage, euer seeking to disturbe their neighbors with robes & forraies, so that it stood with a generall commonwealth to haue them vtterlie destroyed and extirped.

Heirgust right iollfull of these newes, gaue hartie thanks vnto almighty God, that had moued the Romane lieutenant to make such offer vnto him, whereby the furious rage of the Scots might be once repressed, and put away from his people; & therefore willing to confirme a friendship with the same lieutenant, he promised to renew the league betwixt the Romans and Pias, vpon anie reasonable conditions which he should deuise, not onelie requiring an aid at this time against the said Scots, but also at all other, as occasion should demand. Sparimus hauing receiued this answer, he found meanes also to come to a communication with Heirgust nere to Forke, where the league was confirmed betwixt them, and therein the Scots not onelie adiudged for common enimies, both to the Romans and Britains, but also to the Pias. And further therewith were certeine orders appointed how the war should be pursued with all expedition against them. These things thus finished, and both the princes returned to their homes, Sparimus sent an herald vnto Eugenius the Scottish king, commanding him on the behalfe of the Romane empire, to make restitution for all wrongs and iniuries done vnto the Piasish nation. And further, to deliuer into the hands of Heirgust the R. of the Pias, the authors of the same wrongs and iniuries to be punished at his discretion, or if he would refuse thus to doe, that then he should looke to haue the emperour and the Romane people enimies vnto him and all his nation.

Eugenius for answer herevnto, declared that since he entred into the government of the Scottish estate, he had done nothing that might be thought prejudiciall either to the Romans or to the Britains their subiects: and as for the Pias, he would be glad to haue peace with them, if there might be amends made for all displeasures done on either part, according as should be thought to stand with equitie and reason. Neither did he see what cause the Romans should haue to make warres for the Pias against those that had done them no displeasure: but if it were so that he must needs haue wars, he would doe what in him lay to defend the libertie of the Scottish nation, trusting chiefly in the succours of almighty God, who used to fauour the cause of the iust and innocent, against such as sought to wrong them vpon feined quarrels, without occasion giuen. Sparimus receiuing this answer from Eugenius, assembled with all speed a strong & mightie armie of Romans, Britains, and Frenchmen, with the which entring into Westmerland, he spoiled that countrie most miserable, taking diuers castles and strong holds by force, the which he furnished with garrisons of his people, and then passing into Anandale, burned and harried the same; from thence he entred into Galloway, omitting no kind of tyrannie that might be shewed against the inhabitants, so that the feare was great throughout all the countrie: for of manie yeares before, so great an armie had not bene seene in those parties.

Eugenius notwithstanding, gathering his power together, determined to trie the fortune of battell, and power fight

with his armies, and to overcome.

The Romans
destroying too
the Pias, re-
ceiued damage.

Eugenius
brought by his armie.

Rebellion in Brit.

The Scots
indamage the Pias.

Sparimus
is feared guide.

Sparimus
allures in-uadeth the Scots.

Eugenius
prepareth an armie to defend his coun-trie.

Women fled to the warres.

The number of the Scottish
armie.

The approach of Sparimus
warres the Scots.

Eugenius
gathering his
armie.

and so joining with ter of Cree, his p
and chased, by rea in number. But happened to light
had not bene at t wards it, and ne
as pursued their backe with some so (which were cha
so that if night ha bene a far great in that bickering
of. Wherevpon the mies intended to night verie from that a multitude tell, so that the
was stopped by (with the aduise depart to their enimies anie mo

Which being night vnto Carr son, making pro
best he could de in the morning
their waies, he but being cert Britains in Ker turned thitherw in Galloway a holds as he had lowing, Sparin
of Britaine,
warres against teining such g countreies, by happened betw
the Scots, who olone countrie
also to invade
ried the countrie Sterling thire,
and houses mo

Whereof Spar
blance as thou but inwardlie
more than to h vnto the Pias purpose; and h
the next summe
a quiet order a with the same riued, there w
the poze inhabi vnderstanding
stered his peop
made in the c
that his enimie
not onlie all th but likewise a men apt to be customed gull numbered in th
fierce and har enimie with di
the place.

Sparimus
camped in ged the same Sparimus, wher nus, that Spar
him, with a g

and joining with his enemies nere unto the water of Cree, his people were quicklie put to flight, and chased, by reason that they were much inferior in number. But the Romans pursuing the chase, happened to light amongst them of Argile, which had not bene at the battell, but were comming towards it, and now fiercelie incountring with such as pursued their friends, they caused them to retire backe with some losse, wher upon the other Scots also (which were chased) returned, & gaue a fresh onset, so that if night had not come on the soner, there had bene a far greater multitude of the Romans slaine in that bickering than they themselves did thinke of. Whereupon the Romans, doubting what their enemies intended to do, they fortified their campe that night verie stronglie; but Eugenius understanding what a multitude of his folks were slaine in the battell, so that the verie streame of the water of Cree was stopped up with dead carcasses, he thought best (with the aduise of the peres) to licence his people to depart to their homes, and not to fight with his enemies any more for that time.

Which being done, he himselfe repaired the same night unto Carrick, where he remained for a season, making provision for defense of his realme the best he could devise. Sparinus hauing knowledge in the morning how the Scots were quite gone their waies, he determined to haue followed them; but being certified of a rebellion amongst the Britains in Kent, he changed his purpose, and returned thitherwards, to appease that tumult, leauing in Galloway a good part of his armie to keepe such holds as he had got in that voiage. The yeare following, Sparinus was so buied in the south parts of Britaine, that he could not attend vnto the waies against the Scots, otherwise than in mainteining such garrisons as he had placed in their countries, by reason whereof sundrie bickerings happened betwixt them of the same garrisons and the Scots, who laboured not onelie to deliuer their owne countrie out of the hands of all forrainers, but also to invade and destroie Pictland, so that they harried the countrie of Fife, with part of Penteth and Sterling shire, burning & waisting townes, castels, and houses most cruelle.

Whereof Sparinus being certified, made semblance as though he were sore grieved therewith, but inwardlie he could haue reioiced at nothing more than to heare of the injuries don by the Scots vnto the Picts, supposing it to make chiefe for his purpose; and hereupon preparing an armie against the next summer, when he had disposed all things in a quiet order amongst the Britains, he set forward with the same towards Galloway, where being arriued, there was no kind of crueltie spared against the poore inhabitants. Eugenius in the meane time vnderstanding the comming of his enemies, mustered his people, and appointed the assemble to be made in the countrie of Aile, which way he heard that his enemies would trauell. Thither came also not onlie all the able men of the Scottish dominions, but likewise a great number of lustie & strong women apt to beare armour according to the old accustomed guise of their nation, so that there were numbered in this armie fiftie thousand persons right fierce and hardie, desirous either to banquish the enemie with dint of sword, or else to die presentlie in the place.

Sparinus hearing that the Scots were thus in-camped in Aile, marched towards them, and lodged the same night not far off from the river of Gunda, where knowledge was giuen vnto Eugenius, that Sparinus was come within fene miles of him, with a greater armie than he had at his last incountreing with him in Galloway. These aduertise-ments caused no small feare to be raised in the campe, some being striken with present feare; where other contrariwise moued with high indignation, desired nothing so much as to come in battell with the Romans, whose cruell tyrannie they much detested.

Eugenius himselfe shewed no countenance of feare at all, but encouraging his people with comfortable words, he brought them straight in order of battell, divided into three wards, committing one of them to the leading of his brother Ethodius, the second to Doctus the gouernour of Argile, & reseruing the third to himselfe. This done, he made vnto them a pithie oration, declaring how necessarie it was for them to plaie the men, considering that in victorie consisted the onelie hope of libertie; and in being banquished, their countrie was endangered to be brought into perpetuall bondage for euer, for the onelie marke which the Romans shot at, was to op-presse the libertie of the whole Iland, and to reduce the same into the forme of a prouince, to be gouerned at the will of the victors, to the breach of all their old ancient lawes & long continued customs.

With these and manie other like reasons he went about to encourage the minds of his subjects, in such wise, that in manner the most part of them determined rather to die with honor, than to liue in such miserie as they feared would insue, if the victorie should rest vpon the Romans side. And as they were in such talke together, suddenlie commeth in one of their scouts with newes, that Sparinus with his armie was euen at hand. This was in the morning, anon after the sunne was vp, where he was not loked for till the evening following, insomuch that the same his sudden arrivall, chancing so farre contra-rie to their former expectations, troubled all their heads, and brought them into a great maze, for that hereby they were constrained to change the order of their battels to haue the sunne on their backs, as they had provided at the first it should haue bene, if the enemies had not come untill the after none. Yet notwithstanding, they had no soner changed their place, and gotten themselves into arrate of battell again, but that with great violence they pressed forward to giue the onset vpon the Romans. Which Sparinus perceiving, made all the speed he could to set his men in order of battell, that he might receiue his enemies comming thus to incounter him. So both sides being fullie bent to battell, and approached within danger of shot, they let flie the same most e-gerlie, albeit that through halting forth to ioine at hand strokes, there was litle hurt done with bowes or darts.

The Scots crying vpon the name of their wothie and famous ancestor king Cald, did laie about them, most fiercelie, after they came once to the joining; and likewise the Romans, being encouraged with the cherefull words of the lieutenant Spari-nus, boldlie incountered them, so that it was doub-full at the first whether part should haue the worse end of the strife. But shortly there followed variable successe, for on the one part, they of Rolfe and Spari-nus, being appointed vnder Ethodius to incounter that wing of the enemies where the Picts were, fought so egerlie and with such fierce wils, that they easilie put the Picts vnto flight, beating downe a great number of them as they would haue passed the water of Dune, but straightwaies after falling to the spoile, they were slaine downe right by a legion of such Romans as were sent by Sparinus vnto the succours of the Picts.

On the other side, in the left wing those of Argile, Cantire, Aile, and Coningham, who were matched with the Britains, Frenchmen, and Germans, after C.ij. long

Eugenius
comforteth
his people.

The sudden arrivall of Sparinus.

The Scots
giue the onset.

The battels
joine.

Doubtfull
fight.

Ethodius
northerly
the Picts.

The Scots
having ban-quished the Picts, are slaine by the Romans.

ould be an hard
milk at ore
ers br to their
to renew the
promising to enemies not
o all such peo-
ght easlie be
and vface, cos with redes &
rall common-
and extirped.
s, gaue hartie
ad misued the
er vnto him,
might be once
ole; & therefore
the same flew
ague betwixt
asonable con-
elic requiring
scots, but also
d. Sparinus
and means al-
deignest nere
rined betwixt
elic aduised
ians and Bri-
her therewith
e war should them. These nces returned
ald vnto En-
g him on the
ke restitution
to the Pictis
the hands of
s of the same
at his discre-
that then he
the Romane
ation.

ould be an hard
milk at ore
ers br to their
to renew the
promising to
enemies not
o all such peo-
ght easlie be
and vface, co-
s with redes &
rall common-
and extirped.
s, gaue hartie
ad misued the
er vnto him,
might be once
ole; & therefore
the same flew
ague betwixt
asonable con-
elic requiring
scots, but also
d. Sparinus
and means al-
deignest nere
rined betwixt
elic aduised
ians and Bri-
her therewith
e war should them. These nces returned
ald vnto En-
g him on the
ke restitution
to the Pictis
the hands of
s of the same
at his discre-
that then he
the Romane
ation.

ould be an hard
milk at ore
ers br to their
to renew the
promising to
enemies not
o all such peo-
ght easlie be
and vface, co-
s with redes &
rall common-
and extirped.
s, gaue hartie
ad misued the
er vnto him,
might be once
ole; & therefore
the same flew
ague betwixt
asonable con-
elic requiring
scots, but also
d. Sparinus
and means al-
deignest nere
rined betwixt
elic aduised
ians and Bri-
her therewith
e war should them. These nces returned
ald vnto En-
g him on the
ke restitution
to the Pictis
the hands of
s of the same
at his discre-
that then he
the Romane
ation.

ould be an hard
milk at ore
ers br to their
to renew the
promising to
enemies not
o all such peo-
ght easlie be
and vface, co-
s with redes &
rall common-
and extirped.
s, gaue hartie
ad misued the
er vnto him,
might be once
ole; & therefore
the same flew
ague betwixt
asonable con-
elic requiring
scots, but also
d. Sparinus
and means al-
deignest nere
rined betwixt
elic aduised
ians and Bri-
her therewith
e war should them. These nces returned
ald vnto En-
g him on the
ke restitution
to the Pictis
the hands of
s of the same
at his discre-
that then he
the Romane
ation.

ould be an hard
milk at ore
ers br to their
to renew the
promising to
enemies not
o all such peo-
ght easlie be
and vface, co-
s with redes &
rall common-
and extirped.
s, gaue hartie
ad misued the
er vnto him,
might be once
ole; & therefore
the same flew
ague betwixt
asonable con-
elic requiring
scots, but also
d. Sparinus
and means al-
deignest nere
rined betwixt
elic aduised
ians and Bri-
her therewith
e war should them. These nces returned
ald vnto En-
g him on the
ke restitution
to the Pictis
the hands of
s of the same
at his discre-
that then he
the Romane
ation.

ould be an hard
milk at ore
ers br to their
to renew the
promising to
enemies not
o all such peo-
ght easlie be
and vface, co-
s with redes &
rall common-
and extirped.
s, gaue hartie
ad misued the
er vnto him,
might be once
ole; & therefore
the same flew
ague betwixt
asonable con-
elic requiring
scots, but also
d. Sparinus
and means al-
deignest nere
rined betwixt
elic aduised
ians and Bri-
her therewith
e war should them. These nces returned
ald vnto En-
g him on the
ke restitution
to the Pictis
the hands of
s of the same
at his discre-
that then he
the Romane
ation.

ould be an hard
milk at ore
ers br to their
to renew the
promising to
enemies not
o all such peo-
ght easlie be
and vface, co-
s with redes &
rall common-
and extirped.
s, gaue hartie
ad misued the
er vnto him,
might be once
ole; & therefore
the same flew
ague betwixt
asonable con-
elic requiring
scots, but also
d. Sparinus
and means al-
deignest nere
rined betwixt
elic aduised
ians and Bri-
her therewith
e war should them. These nces returned
ald vnto En-
g him on the
ke restitution
to the Pictis
the hands of
s of the same
at his discre-
that then he
the Romane
ation.

The Scottish
battell is ouer-
throwne.

Eugenius is
slaine.

The furious rage of the Scottish
carrers.

The spoile diuided amongst the soldiers.

The buriall of the dead bodies by appointment of Marinus.

Ethobius fore wounded, is committed to the cure of surgeons.

long and cruell fight were there slaine in the place, greatlie to their shame and glorie for ever, so that by this meane the maine battell of the Scottishmen, wherein Eugenius himselfe stood amongst his people, was left bare & naked on both the sides. Which Marinius perceiuing, he caused the same to be assailed on each part with such violence, that in the end longer resistance preuailed not, but that their maine battell must needs be opened perforce, by meane whereof Eugenius chosing rather to die in the place, than either to save his life by flight, or by rendering himselfe into his enemies hands to live in miserie, as was there slaine, together with a great number of his nobles and gentlemen, hauing determined by the example of their maister to die rather speedilie with honor, than longer to live with shame and reproch. Thus Eugenius lost his life with his kingdom, in the third yere after his first entering to the rule, hauing intoted few good daies in rest during the said time.

Such of the Scots also as were appointed to keepe the cartage and trusse of the field, seeing their lordes and maisters thus slaine, rushed forth with such weapons as they had at hand, in purpose to slaue some number of their enemies, not passing though it should cost them also their owne liues, so that they might die reuenged. The slaughter was great which at the first was made, more through an obdurate desire of reuenge, than by any valiant activitie: but this companie being anon broken in sunder, and driven backe, they were finally slaine & beaten downe. Whereouer the Romans that pursued in chase after their enemies, when the battell was done, encountered with great numbers of such women and aged persons as followed a farre off, to vnderstand the successe of the field, doubting what hap might fall to their children and kinfolks, whose slaughter when they perceived, like people enraged they slue vpon such Romans as they met with; but being easily vanquished, and refusing to flee, they were also slaine and cut in peeces in a most miserable manner.

The Romans hauing thus rid the fields of all kind of enemies, lodged that night abroad here and there at their pleasure, where they might heare the dolefull gronings, and lamentable complaints of them that lay wounded, and as yet not dead, cursing most bitterlie the cruell tyrannie and conetous ambition of the Romans, with that most detestable disloyaltie of the Picts, procuring this murder and destruction of those people that had deserued farre otherwise at their hands. When the morning was come, & the light appeared, Marinius the lieutenant caused the spoile of the dead bodie to be gathered, & equally diuided amongst his men of warre. And such as were found sore wounded and not dead, to shew some token of clemencie, according to the old accustomed manner of the ancient Romans, he commanded surgeons to see to the cure of them. The other being dead, he suffered to be buried, causing the corps of Eugenius himselfe to be interred in most solemne and pompous sort, after the vsage of the Roman princes.

His brother Ethobius being found mangled in most pitifull wise, and in manner halfe dead, was also taken by by commandment of the same Marinius, and surgeons charged to haue the ordering of him, and to shew their diligence for the cure of his hurts in most speedie and gentle wise. The victorie thus achieved, Marinius surueteth the countries of Hile, Carrike, and Coningham, with that also of Calidone, and seizeth the same into his hands, suffering the inhabitants to inioy both goods and lands in peace and quietnesse vpon their othes of allegiance, without any further molestation. Heirgust king of the Picts with other the nobles of that nation, were nothing contented therewith, desirous to see the utter destruction of all the Scottish race. Wherevnto Marinius at the first would not agree, alledging the ancient custome of the Romans, who sought rather to vanquish by benefites, than by the sword, euer vsing to spare such as submitted themselves, and in no wise to spot the honour of maiestie of their empire with crueltie.

But the Picts not satisfied herewith, went about earnestlie to persuaide him in no condition to suffer the Scots to haue any abiding within the confines of Britaine, if he wished any quietnes in the estate thereof, for their delight (said the Picts) was onelie set to seeke occasion how to disturbe the peace, to lue by the pillage and spoile of their neighbours, and namely of the Picts, vnto whose confusion (as the prophetes spake) they were begotten and borne. Finally when all their earnest sute missed the wished effect, they fell to and assaied if they might bring that to passe by wicked meed and thorough corrupting bribes, the which they could not do by other meanes. And euen as it oftentimes chanceth in such cases, where words are but spent in wast, gifts yet preuaile: so also came it to passe euen here, for at length a proclamation came forth by procurement of the Picts, that all such as were naturall Scottishmen, should by a certaine date auoid out of those countries that they possessed in Brittain, vpon paine of losing life and goods, & to deliuer by their houses and lands vnto such Britains and Picts as were appointed by the Romans for to inioy the same.

The Scots perceiuing themselves not able to make any resistance, obeyed this commandment, some of them passing ouer into Ireland, some into the westerne Isles, and some of them got ouer also into Norwaie, and Denmarke, and manie there were that got intertainment amongst the Roman soldiers, and went ouer with them into France, as yet Gallia, to serue in the warres there, and in other places vnder the emperors ensignes. The Picts were so cruell and diligent to see all the Scottish lineage confined, that they would not consent that a certaine number of gentlewomen should remaine behind, who had their husbands slaine in the last warres, and made intercession in most lamentable wise vnto Marinius, that they might be permitted to abide in their native countrie all the residue of their liues, though in seruite estate, to the end that they might be buried after the same were once ended in granes with their slaine husbands.

Whereouer, where Cartandis queene of the Scots, late wife vnto Eugenius, was brought vnto Marinius, with two gentlewomen and a grome from the toome of hir husband, where she had remained euer sith his burfall in continuall mourning, for so much as she was a Brittain, and descended by lineage from the princes of Wales; Marinius lamenting hir miserable case, assigned the citie of Carrike vnto hir, with certaine other reuenues for the maintenance of hir estate. But after she had taken leaue of such as had the conduction of hir, and was come into a village not farre from Carrike aforesaid, it chanced that a sort of Pictish riders, or (as I may call them) robbers, met with hir, small to hir profit, and lesse to their owne case, for they did not onelie flea hir grome, but also beat hir gentlewomen, and stripped both them and hir of all that they had, whereof Marinius being informed, caused them that had done so vile a deed to be apprehended & executed by death, according as they had deserued. The queene herselfe being brought backe vnto Marinius, and honorable intreated, had all hir substance restored vnto hir againe, so nere as it was possible.

Marinius offended with the Picts.

Cartandis
lamenteth hir infortunate
state.

Where
the Scots
faile, gifts
preuaile.

The proclamation made by
the Picts
to drive
the Scots
out of Brittain.

The Scots
plague
their crueltie.

The monastic house
of Jona
burned
by
the Scottish
monks.

The cruell dealing
of
the Picts.

Cartandis
queene
of Scots.

The time that
the Scots
were thus confined.
1147. H.B.
1179. H.B.
The second yere
of Justan the Apo-
cata, H.B.
Strange
visions.
Swords
and weapons
seen in
the aure.

It
raineth
birds.

Ethobius
confined into Denmarke.

But the cruell for their nobles make a se-
that the dward the put to ere-enemie at the might
to the ter-goods. U-gan to m-most vnh-hir wretch-
should ne-
tric: will to do, tha-
in the pla-holding t-
wise, the please hir hir life afhir widow hir prefer-
There
saw and two full of Picts waassigned licenced dient, the disturb priests, b-the Scot-
them into where the tation, th-
mous, evafterward diuers of there aff-
shall be h-

The y-banquish confined of the w-
from the
and the f-before Cnie than Albion, Iharts. I-fierce Iranke, a-
ing chan-
brand, it-
riuer of riuer fl-
There
out of th-
birds, anrauens t-Certe-
these thinking
hold the-nothing
tals profozie, Cred (as was yet ned to tapaire in-nearer b-

f that naeffrons to otifly race.
not agree,
rans, who an by the ted them,
of male,

ent about to suffer
e confines
the estate was onelic
ace, to live ours, and on (as the borne. Fi-the wished ght bying gh corrup-
o by other eth in such giffs yet re, for at urement
all Scotifh
ut of those upon paine eir houses
s were ap-
me.

ot able to ndement,
some into ot over also anie there Romane France, as id in other Dits were fith linage
a certaine
ie behind,
arres, and wife unto to abide in their liues, hey might in graues

the Scots,
unto Marie from the ained euer
for fomuch nage from ng his mi-e unto his intenance ue of such me into a id, it chan-
may call roft, and lie flea his nd ftripped ec of Mari-
dome so death, ac-hifelfe beonorable unto his de-

But

But

But

But

But

But

But

But

But

But

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

The Scots
being the better
defence of
the Scots.

But the Picts being offended herewith, and spe-ciallie for putting to death of their men, fundrie of their nobilitie came vnto Maximus, and began to make a sore complaint in that behalfe, declaring that the deserts of their nation had not bene such toward the Romane empire, as to haue their people put to execution for a womans sake, being both an emie and a prisoner, therefore they required that he might be confined into Britaine, and according to the tenor of the proscription, spoiled of all his goods. Here Cartandis being present his selfe, began to make pitifull lamentation, bewailing his most unhappie state, in that contrarie to the order of his wretched case and present miserable fortune, he should now be forced to turne againe into his coun-trie: wishing rather than he should be enforced so to do, that he might offer by his life as a sacrifice in the place of his husbands buriall: and therefore holding by his hands vnto Maximus in most pitifull wise, he besought him instantlie, that it might please him, either to suffer him to passe the residue of his life after such sort as he thought best agreed with his widowlike estate, or else to take the same from him presentlie by some violent meanes of execution.

There was not a man other than the Picts, that saw and heard him at that instant, but lamented his wofull distresse, so that in the end the request of the Picts was disallowed, & Cartandis hauing lining assigned him for the maintenance of his degree, was licensed to depart into what place he thought expedient, there to live as he thought best without let or disturbance. The same time the Scottish bishops and priests, being banished as well as the other sort of the Scottish people, a number of their monks got them into the Ile of Iona, now called Colmekill, where they erected a monastirie for their owne habitation, the worthinesse whereof hath bene right famous, euen vnto these our daies, as that which was afterward indowed with manie faire reuenues by diners of the Scottish kings, who had their burials there after the returne of the Scots into Albanie as shall be hereafter exprest.

The yere in the which the Scottishmen were thus vanquished by the Romans and Picts, and finalie confined out of their seats, was from the creation of the world 4319, after the birth of our sauiour 352, from the beginning of the Scottish kingdome 679, and the third yere of Magnentius. The same yere before Eugenius gaue battell vnto Maximus, manie strange sights were seene in the furthest part of Albion, striking a wonderfull dread in manie mens hearts. In the night season in the aire were seene fierie swords and other weapons mouing in a long ranke, after comming together on a heape, and being changed into an huge flame as it had been a firebrand, it then vanished awaie. The waters of the riuer of Dune ran with blood, the banks of the same riuer flashed oft times as they had bene all on a fire.
There were seene also a number of small birds fall out of the aire so thicke, that it seemed it had rained birds, and incontinencie came a great number of rauens that denoured by the same.

Certaine witches and soothsayers, declaring that these things betokened the destruction of the Sco-tish kingdome, were commanded by the priests to hold their peace on paine of death, as they that told nothing but lies & fables, though afterwards their tales proued most true. But to returne to our historie, Ethobius the brother of Eugenius being curred (as is said) by commandement of Maximus, was yet banished amongst the residue, and constrained to take an oth, that he should immediatlie repaire into Denmarke, and hereafter not to approch nearer vnto the coasts of Albion, for doubt of some new attempt that might be made by the Scots thorough his meanes, thereby to returne into their countrie againe, & to recover their former state. But this failed not them of the western Isles, but that assembling themselves together, and choosing one Gillo to their capitaine, they passed ouer into Argile, where in the end they were encountered by such Picts as were set there to defend that countrie, and slaine each others some. Their vessels were also taken and brought into sundrie haueis of the countrie, to serue for defense of the coasts vpon any new enterprise which the Scots should chance to make: but the other Scots, perceiving they were not able to furnish forth a new armie in the Isles by any aid they might purchase there, sailed ouer into Ireland, where presenting themselves vnto the king of that region, they declared vnto him from point to point all their infortunate chances and lamentable calamities, which were happened vnto them of late through the tyrannicall puissance of the Romans, and malicious enmie of the Picts, in such sort as nothing could be more miserable than their present estate, considering the ruine of so mightie a kingdome, and the small banishment of the inhabitants from their houses and lands, which had bene in possession of them and their elders, by the space almost of seuen hundred yeres.

The Irish king with his nobles moued with pitie to heare and vnderstand so dolefull calamities to haue chanced vnto that nation, whose good or bad hap could not but touch them verie nere, considering they were descended both of one progenie, comforted these Scottishmen to the best of their power, and in the end concluded to aid them with ten thousand men, and to furnish them forth with ships, vittels, and munitions to passe into Albanie for recovery of their countrie. This aid being put in a readines, and the ships rigged and decked as was requisite for such an enterprize, they took the sea, and landing in Cantire, chanced to meet with Herodoriane brother to Petricus king of the Picts, accompanied with a great number of Picts and Britains assembled to defend the countrie, but being charpelle afflicted of the Scots and Irishmen, they were quicklie put to flight, & such as were overtaken died on the sword, so the great terror of all the new inhabitants that were planted on their parts.

This victorie thus atchieued, there were that gaue counsell not to attempt fortune ouer farre, but to take such booties of goods and prisoners as they had got in the countrie, and to returne therewith into Ireland. Other were of a contrarie opinion, supposing it best to follow the victorie, and either to recouer againe their ancient seats, or else to vie in the valiant attempt thereof. Which aduise was followed as the best, though it proued otherwise: for before they could come to any conclusion of that enterprise, the Romans, Picts, and Britains gathered themselves together, and gaue battell againe to the Scottish and Irish companie, wherein they ouer-threw them, to their vtter ruine and destruction.

The newes of this infortunate encounter being brought into Ireland, put the king and his nobles there in such feare of the Romans, that they thought it best with all speed to send ambassadors vnto Maximus to sue vnto him for peace. They that were sent at the first were sore blamed and checked by Maximus, for that they had aided the Scottishmen in the last inuasion made into Albion: but at length accepting their excuse, he granted a peace vpon certaine conditions, whereof the most principall article was, that in no wise they should receiue aid, or succor any enimie to the Romane empire. This Maximus, hauing got a quiet peace on each side, vied all meanes possible

Gillo chosen
captaine of the banished
Scots in the western Isles
comming into Argile is banaquished by
the Picts.

The Scots
repaire into Ireland.

The king of Ireland with his nobles
lament the Scottishmens
case.
The Irishmen conclude to aid the Scottishmen.

The Scots
and Irishmen land in Can-tire.
The Picts
in countrie
with the
Scots and Irishmen and are discor-
died.

The Scots
and Irishmen
are ouer-
throwne.

The king of Ireland see-
keth for peace.
Maximus
granteth
peace to the Irishmen.
Maximus
seeketh by his banishments libertie to win the proprie fauour.

possible how to procure the love of his souldiours and men of war, shewing himselfe not onelie gentle, courteous and meeke towards them, but also so liberal and free, that his bounteous gifts passed all understanding: insomuch that (as is reported by writers) he bestowed in one daie more hand as much in rewards, as the revenues of Britaine yielded to the empire in a whole yere.

Marinus is chosen emperor in Britaine.

Marinus ruled the estate of Britaine 17 yeres.

The emperor Gratian is slain by Marinus.

This franke liberalitie and courteous behavior he used not onelie towards the Romans, and his other men of warre, but also towards the Britains and Picts, conforming himselfe so nere unto their manners & fashions, that at his coming into Scotland, he laid abate his Romane apparell, and arrayed himselfe in garments after the Pictish guise. By this manner of meanes therefore he won him such love and favor, as well amongst his souldiours, as also amongst the Picts and Britains, that in the end by common consent they chose him for emperor, in the 383 yere after Christ, professing generally that they would owe onelie their obedience unto him as to their supreme gouernor. Where the Scottish chronicles somewhat varie from other writers, who affirme that Marinus was thus advanced to the imperiall dignitie, rather by constraint of his men of warre, than by any meanes which he of himselfe used to attaine unto the same. Where the said chronicles nevertheless shew, that it came chieflie to passe by his owne seeking, procuring certeine persons to worke for him as instruments to frame other to this his purposed intent. He held the dominion of the empire being thus preferred to the imperiall state, the space of five yeres, all the countries and people of Albion being at his commandement without contradiction: which had not chanced unto any one man before his time, since the Isle was first inhabited. At length desirous of more empire, he passed ouer into France with a great armie, in purpose to subdue all France and Italie, with such other countries as were obedient unto Gratian as then emperor of Rome. But how prosperously he sped in the beginning, and how at length he was slain at Aquila in Italie, ye shall find in the historie of England a great deale more at large.

By reason of such trouble in the estate of the Romane empire, Octavius the sonne of Octavius late king of the Britains, the which (as before is said) fled into the Isle of Man, & after departing from thence, got ouer into France, returned now into Britaine, and did so much there, that the Britains received him to their king: but shortly after he was constrained to agree with the Romane emperor Theodosius, so that the Britains should paie their wonted tribute, and liue under such lawes as by the emperor should be to them prescribed. In all other respects, Octavius should be reputed during his life for king. Immediately hereupon two lieutenants were sent from Theodosius, of whom the one named Martinus sojourned at London, and the other called Valentinian at York. And with all expedition they began to put the Romane lawes in practice, abolishing the old British lawes, to the great offense of manie that could not well brooke strange ordinances; & namelie the Picts repined sore therat, and used most an end their owne lawes and constitutions, greatlie to the contempt of the Romane estate. Whereof Valentinian, the one of the Romane lieutenants having knowledge, gaue straight commandement unto Helgust the Pictish king, that in no wise he should suffer the old lawes and rude ordinances of his countrie, to be used any longer amongst his subjects, vpon paine that might insue for disobedience shewed towards the maiestie of the Romane empire.

Helgust now perceluing into what shalldome and miserie his countrie was brought, by meanes of the warres which he had procured against his neighbours the Scottishmen, as a man sore repenting his passed follie, and seeing no readie meane present how to reforme the same, being aged and sore broken with continuall sicknesse, he got himselfe secretlie into his priue chamber, where immediatlie he slue himselfe, to be rid of the sight of that present seruile state, into the which he saw both him and his whole countrie reduced. Whose death being once knowne, Valentinian commanded that the Picts should not chose any other from thenceforth to reigne as king ouer them, nor to obeye any other magistrates but onlie such as should be appointed to haue the gouernment of them, by commandement and commission of the Romane emperor. For it was agreed, as he acknowledged, by the tenor of the league, concluded betwixt Helgust and Marinus, that after the deceasse of the same Helgust, all his dominions should be gouerned by Romane officers in forme of a province. Howbeit the Picts nothing regarded the wordes of Valentinian, but by common agreement did chose one Durstus the second sonne of Helgust to be their king.

Whereupon Valentinian being informed of their doings, raised a power, and made such speed towards them, that he was gotten so nere unto the citie of Camelon, yet they had any knowledge of his approach, that Durstus with other of the nobles, being as then within the same, could not haue space to escape their waies, but being forthwith besieged within it, at length they were taken by force of assault, and the citie sacked, to the great enriching of the Romane armie, and utter vndoing of the poore inhabitants. Durstus with other the chieffest prisoners were first had unto London, & from thence conueied to Rome, there to haue iudgement by decre of the senat. The residue of the nobles that were taken there, suffered in the market place at Camelon. Thus was that tumult appeased, and the Picts commanded to paie yearly unto the emperors procurator the fourth part of all their revenues growing of their coine and cattell. Beside this tribute he charged them also with diuerse base seruices, as to labor in mettall mines, to dig stoncs forth of the quarries, and to make byckie to be sent into Britaine, or into other places whither it pleased him to command it.

The cause why he burdened them in such sort, was (as he said) to teach them to know themselves. For they were become so loslie, since the departure of the Scottishmen out of the Isle, that if they were not restrained in time by authoritie of the Romane puissance, the whole British nation were like to be shortly disquieted by their wilfull meanes and insolent presumptions. Neither was it thought sufficient vnto Valentinian, to charge the Picts in manner as is before specified; but to their further grauaunce he deuised an other waie, whereby to bring them in the end vnto bitter destruction, which was this: he constrained them together with their wiues, children, & whole families, to remoue beyond the water of Forth, and to leaue all the countries on this side the same water, as well those which they ancientlie had inhabited, as the other which of late appertained to the Scots, and were assigned to them by Marinus to possesse, after that the Scots were expelled.

All which countries thus by the Picts now left void, were appointed by Valentinian to the Britains, as subjects to the empire, to be inhabited. And for a perfect diuision betwixt the Picts and the same Britains, he commanded a wall to be made, & a trench to be cast along by the same, from Abirconne through the territorie of Blacow vnto Alclud, or Alclud, now called Dunbarton, so running from the

Helgust slain himselfe.

The Picts are forbidden to create a king.

Durstus chosen king of the Picts.

Durstus besieged at the Romans.

Durstus brought prisoners to London.

The Picts become tributaries.

They are put to their base seruices.

The Picts are constrained to dwell beyond the water of Forth.

The Picts are constrained to dwell beyond the water of Forth.

The Picts are constrained to dwell beyond the water of Forth.

The Picts are constrained to dwell beyond the water of Forth.

The Picts are constrained to dwell beyond the water of Forth.

The Picts forbidden to pass over the water of Forth.

The Scots live in other countries.

Helgust slain himselfe.

Helgust slain himselfe.

Helgust slain himselfe.

Helgust slain himselfe.

Helgust slain himselfe.

Helgust slain himselfe.

Helgust slain himselfe.

Helgust slain himselfe.

Helgust slain himselfe.

Helgust slain himselfe.

Helgust slain himselfe.

the east made, passe to the confines die for it are thus the Rom nished t out the with the their ha dther st ued and as occas ded (as receiued see, there ued their and beg him for after his Kocho (bles of cond per whole d richly m domie. I under A age whi pire. I therne r name, t gether t of. And said Ala of the w Fergule was with a p of such parties. commo the Rom in expell tiue cow Gotther whereof ted) a c opinion Gles, an mekill, intent. teine h

But the tor Boe to be bz not be t

It is nuch w he liued Athaulf estimat him in t duct to r depart t in pact uice the in the l daies of the same ther will one Pir tains in tains in the east sea to the west. Where to proclamation was made, that if anie of the British nation did enter, passe to passe this wall, and to enter into the British confines without licence of the magistrats, he should die for it. Whilste the Picts through their owne fault are thus brought into most miserable subiection of the Romans, the Scottismen (as is said) being banished the land, liued in other countries by shifting out the time so well as they might, some continuing with their wiues and children, got a poyse lining with their hands, exercising some science or occupation. Other there were that followed the warres, and serued vnder sundrie worthie captains here and there, as occasion serued.

But Ethodius the brother of Eugenius commanded (as is said) to go into Denmarke, was so fullie receiued of the king there; who also gaue him an office, therewith to mainteine his degree, so that he liued there certeine yeeres in right honorable estate, and begat of his wife whom he brought wither with him south of Albanye, a sonne named Erthus, who after his fathers deceasse had issue by his wife called Rocho (a ladie of high parentage amongst the nobles of Denmarke, as daughter to one Roichus, second person of the realme) a sonne named Fergus, whose chance was afterwards to restore the Scottish nation againe to their former estate and kingdom. In his young yeeres he was appointed to serue vnder Alarike the Gottish king in that famous voyage which he took in hand against the Romane empire. For such was the hate as then of all the northerne regions & kingdoms towards the Romane name, that by generall agreement they conspired together to the bitter ruine and finall destruction thereof. And so ech of them sent forth a power in aid of the said Alarike, chosen by common consent as generall of the whole enterprise.

Fergus being set forth by the king of Denmarke with a power of Danes, and with a chosen number of such Scottismen as were withdrawne into those parties, went with the better will, for that beside the common quarell, he bare a priuate grudge towards the Romans for the bling of his ancessors so cruelle in expelling them out of their owne homes and native countrie. This Fergus was present with the Gottishes at the winning of Rome, in the sacking thereof, amongst other spoiles, he got (as is reported) a certeine chest full of booke, the which some hold opinion he brought afterwards into the westerne Isles, and caused them to be kept in Iona, now Colmekill, within a librarie there builded for the same intent. Which booke (as is to be supposed) were certeine histories or monuments of old antiquities. But the same were so defaced in the daies of Hector Boetius (who, as he himselfe writeth, caused them to be brought ouer to him to Aberdine) that it could not be vnderstood of what matter they intreated.

It is written moreover of Fergus, that he continued with Alarike in all his enterprises, so long as he liued, and afterwards serued vnder his successor Athaulfus, to his great fame, and in such honorable estimation, as few were found comparable vnto him in those daies. At length requiring a safe conduct to returne into Denmarke, he was licensed to depart with high and right bountifull rewards, as in part of recompense of his good and faithfull seruice shewed, during the time of the warres, as well in the life time of the said Athaulfus, as also in the daies of his predecessor the foresaid Alarike. About the same season, the bishopps se of Candida casa, or therwise called Dubitterne, was first instituted by one Pinian a preacher, that toke great paines (as the report hath gone) to instruct the Picts and Britains in the christian faith. He was afterwards reputed a saint, and the place of his burfall had in such veneration, that manie used to resort thither for deuotion sake, as the manner in times past was when pilgrimage-goings were vied.

But now to returne there we left touching the Picts, and to shew the maner how the Scots returned againe into Albanye; ye shall vnderstand, that the Picts being brought into seruile bondage (as before we haue partly declared) and doubting daile of worse to ensue, they sent secret messengers vnto such Scots as remained in exile in the westerne Isles, in Norwaie, and in other parts of the world, promising them, if they would giue the attempt for recouerie of their ancient dwelling places in Albanye, they should be sure of all the aid that in them laie, being readie to spend their liues to reuenge the injuries which they daile sustained at the Romans hands, whose continuall practice euer was, how to oppresse the ancient liberties of all such nations as came vnder their subiection. The experience whereof they now felt to their vn sufferable graunce, looking for nothing else but hostile to be expelled out of their countrie, and driven to go sake them other places to inhabit in strange countries after the manner of outlawes, as it had chanced already to the Scots by commandement of Spartius, as before is expessed.

Fergus, vnto whom amongst other this message was chiefly directed, reioiced greatlie of the helpe; and first conferring with the king of Denmarke, of whose aid he knew himselfe assured, by his aduise he sent letters abroad forthwith into Norwaie, Diknie, the westerne Isles, and into Ireland, vnto such of the Scottismen as dwelt in those places, to vnderstand their minds hereto. And being certified that they were vniuersallie agræd, not onlie to trie their chance for recouerie of their former state and kingdom; but also had chosen him to be gouernour and generall capteine in that enterprise; he prepared partly at his owne costs, and partly at the charges of the king of Denmarke and other of his friends and allies there, a great multitude both of men of warre and ships, in purpose to passe ouer into Albanye to recouer his grandfather's estate, which as it was thought might now be the more easilie brought to passe, sith the Picts would aid him thereto, vpon an earnest desire which they had to reuenge their owne injuries receiued at the Romans hands, and to deliuer themselves from such thraldome as they daile felt themselves oppressed with, doubting withall hostile to be quite expelled out of their whole countrie, as they had bene forced to forgo a great and the better part thereof already.

In this meane time, one Gratian descended of the British blood, by consent of the Romane legat Spartius (both of them going against their allegiance) vsurped the gouernance of Britaine by his owne priuat authoritie; but hostile after, they two falling at variance together, the one of them slue the other. And then the souldiers not stateng till they vnderstood the pleasure of Honorius the emperor, chose one Constantine to succede in the place of Spartius, who passing ouer into France, was slaine there by Constantius one of the captains of the said Honorius. Victorine the other of the Romane legats hearing of the death both of Spartius and Constantine, removed from Norke vnto London, the better to prouide for the safe keeping of the land to the emperor Honorius his vse; for that he doubted sundrie dangers which might chance, by reason the countrie was as then vnprouided of men of warre, the most part of them being transported ouer into France with the soynamed Constantine, and not againe returned.

The Picts sent into other countries to call home the Scots.

Fergus sent vnto the Scots dispersed.

Fergus was prouided himselfe to warre.

Gratian vsurped the gouernance of Britaine.

Spartius slaine.

Constantine succeeded Spartius. Constantine is slaine. The lieutenant of the north cometh to London.

The

The Picts
send speidie vnto Fer-guse.

Ferguse arri-ued with his ships in Mur-
rey firth.

The Picts
toillie re-cette Ferguse.

The Picts
crave pardon excusing themselves.

Ferguse.

The Picts
punished for their vn-truthes.

The ancient league renewed again between the Scots and Picts.

The Scots,
rehozied to their countries.

Ferguse.

Ferguse is conueied into Argile, and there inuested
king.

The Picts informed of these things, sent word with all speed vnto Ferguse, requiring him to make haste, sith if he should haue wished for a conuenient time, a better could not be deuised; considering the present state of things as well in Britaine, as in other parts of the Romane empire, the people euertie where being readie to moue rebellion. Ferguse vnderstanding the whole, by such messengers as still came one after another vnto him from the Picts, he hastied to depart with all diligence; and when all things were readie, he took the sea with his armie, and within eight daies after, he arriued in safetie within the firth of Murrey land with all his vessels and people; where taking land, & word thereof being brought into Ireland, into Mkenie, and into the westerne Isles, all such of the Scottish linage as liued in those parties in exile, came with their wives, children, and whole families in most speedie wise vnto him, as though the countrie had bene already recovered out of the enimies hands, without all doubts of further perill or businesse.

The Picts also reioysing greatlie at the newes of his coming, repaired vnto him, and shewed him all the honoz that might be deuised, beseeching him to pardon and forget all iniuries and displeasures by them wrought and contriued in times past against the Scottish nation, sith now they were readie for the advancement thereof to spend their liues against such as were enimies to the same. Neither was the fault theirs, in that Heirgust had consented with the Romans to banish the Scottish people, but in their ancestors, who being blinded through the faire words and swete promises of the Romans, saw not the mischief which they brought vpon their owne heads and their posterities. Therefore they desired him to renew againe the league betwixt the Pictish and Scottish nations, with such conditions of appointment as it should please him to prescribe.

Ferguse by consent of his nobles answered, that he was content to establish the league with them, even according to the tenor of the ancient agreement, and to ioine his power with theirs to helpe to restore them vnto their former estate and liberties, so that they would be contented to surrender vp into the Scottishmens hands, all such townes and countries, from the which they had bene expelled by great fraud and iniurie. And as for the displeasures done to the Scottishmen in times past by aiding the Romans against them (as he thought) the Picts had felt punishment enough for the same already, being reduced into most seruile & miserable bondage, as iustlie rewarded by almightie God for their great vntruthes, fled and shewed towards their neighbors, faithfull friends and allies. The Picts were throughlie pleased and satisfied with Ferguse his words, so that within few daies after, their king (whome they had lately chosen since the time that the Scottishmen were thus returned) came vnto Ferguse, and ratified the league with him, according to the articles of that other which in time past had bene obserued on the behalfe of the Scottish and Pictish nations, with such solempne othes and assurance, as betwixt princes in semblable cases of custome is requisite and necessarie. Then were those countries restored to the Scottishmen againe, out of the which they had bene expelled by the Romane power.

And Ferguse then being conueied with a right honorable companie of lords, gentlemen, and commons into Argile, was there placed on the chaire of marble, and proclaimed king with all such accustomed pompe and ceremonies as to him appertained. This was in the 45 yeare after the Scots had bene driven forth of Albanie, and after the birth of our sauour 424, in the yeare after the death of Honosius the emperour, and from the first erection of the Scottish kingdome 750 yeares complet. All such castles also and fortresses as the Picts held within anie of those countries, which belonged vnto the Scots, were surrendered into their hands in peaceable wise; but the residue which the Romans kept were earnestlie defended for a while, though at length through want of victuals and other necessities, they likewise were deliuered. ¶ If I should here say what I thinke, and that mine opinion might passe for current coine, I would not sticke to affirme that either now first (or not long before their late supposed expulsion from hence) the Scots settled themselves to inhabit here within this Ile, and that they had no certeine seats in the same till then: but that coming either forth of Ireland, or from the westerne Isles, where they before inhabited, they used to make often inuasions into this land, greatlie molesting as well the Britains, the ancient inhabitants thereof, as the Romans that then held the Ile vnder their subiection. For I can neither persuaade my selfe, nor wish others to beleue, that there was anie such continuance in succession of kings, as their histories doe make mention; as we haue here before set downe in following the same histories, because we will not willingly seme to offer iniurie to their nation, which peradventure are otherwise persuaaded, and thinke the same succession to be most true, where other perchance may coniecture (and not moued thereto without good reason) that such kings as in their histories are auouched to reigne one after another here in this Ile, either reigned in Ireland, or in the out Isles, and that verelie not successiuelie, but diuerse of them at one season, and in diuerse places. Which mistaking of the course of histories hath bred errors, not onelie amongst the Scottish writers, but even amongst some of the British and English writers also, as to the learned and well aduised readers may plainelie appeare. And as for Wald, and some other happlie which they take to be kings of Scots, although they reigned in that part of this Ile which afterwards was possessed by Scots, and after them named Scotland, yet were they mere Britains, and had little to doe with Scots; except perchance we may thinke that they held the out Isles in subiection, where the Scots were then inhabiting, far longer time perhaps (before their settling in Britaine) than their histories make mention.

But now to returne where we left. After that Vittozine the Romane legat was aduertised of all the fore-remembred doings of the Scottishmen and Picts, he caused an armie to be leuied with all speed, and hastied forth with the same vnto Forke, where being arriued, he attempted by an herald at armes to persuaade the Picts to forsake their confederacie lately concluded with the Scots: but perceining he could not bring it to passe, he determined to pursue both those nations with open warre: and so there, vpon setting forthward, he passed forth till he came nere Camelon, where he encamped with his whole armie, hauing therein (as the report went) about fiftie thousand persons at the least. Ferguse being aduertised hercof, & hauing in like maner already assembled a mightie huge host both of Scottishmen and Picts, came therewith ouer the Forth, & marched forth with all speed in the next season, in purpose to haue set on his enimies verie earlie in the dawning of the next morning. But Vittozine hauing knowledge thereof, commanded his men to be arranged and set in order of battell by the third watch of the same night, so that being redie to receiue the Scots vpon their first approch, there was fought a right sore and cruell battell, with such slaughter on both parts, that the riuer of Carron (nere vnto the which

The riuer of Carron runn-neth with blood.

The battell
fought by reason of a tongue.

The lestenant furnishing diuerse boats, returning into the sea.

The Scots &
Picts by cause
of their camps.

Whole assigned to the Picts.

The Brit-
tains by the appointment of Vittozine
made a wall.

The Scottish
men & Picts interrupt the building of that wall.

Graine, other wale called Strahan, and Salinage.

Ferguse marshalled his armie of Graine

Quintie of graine touring the original beginning of the Picts.

which the dead bea riddi-
together

In
whether such a su-abundable to be lent ray-
was for naire to well or lust to
fer. For losse of anie supanies Pictish
In like
Picts,
make brake might son.

An
sed vncountr-
with su-position mans that the other lwithou-
ben. E-sed the stels an-titieng tozine
tains heard posts otwixt
heard co, and biton wall, &
be ma-

they ading c-
the W-
the fan-
bours defend-border
and oth-
the cou-
in this quene Denne Scotti-
to his nith l-
noble
ter, wh-Denne
his connius, &
after iston se-
Grain
which gouer-

creation of pleet. All such held within red onto the
nds in peace, Romans kept
ugh at length ellaries, they here say what passe for cur-
ne that either
s supposed exhemselfes to it they had no
but that com-
the westerne
used to make molesting as
tants thereof,
le under their
made my selfe,
was anie such as their histo-
here before set s, because we rie to their na-
se persuaded,
most true, where d not moued uch things as in one after ano-in Ireland, or accessuall, but diuerse places.
ozies hath bzed
ly writers, but d English wtz advised readers
ald, and some ings of Scots, his Ile which
and after them were Britains, cept perchance
tles in subie-abiting, far long in Britaine)

422. H.B.
296. Jo. Ma.
The 18 yeare
of the empe-
rour Honorius.
H.B.
755. H.B.

when the Scots first
got certein
seats herein
this Ile of Britaine as
some thinke,

left. After that advertisid of all Scottishmen and
d with all speed,
a Porke, where herald at armes eir confederacie
nt perceiving he nited to pursue
re: and so there,
with till he came d with his whole went) about fl-erguse being adaner already as of Scottishmen forth, & marchid
on, in purpose to e in the dawning ne having known to be arranged the Scotis
s fought a right aughten on both (are unto the which

When the Scots first
got certein
seats herein
this Ile of Britaine as
some thinke,

When the Scots first
got certein
seats herein
this Ile of Britaine as
some thinke,

When the Scots first
got certein
seats herein
this Ile of Britaine as
some thinke,

When the Scots first
got certein
seats herein
this Ile of Britaine as
some thinke,

When the Scots first
got certein
seats herein
this Ile of Britaine as
some thinke,

When the Scots first
got certein
seats herein
this Ile of Britaine as
some thinke,

When the Scots first
got certein
seats herein
this Ile of Britaine as
some thinke,

When the Scots first
got certein
seats herein
this Ile of Britaine as
some thinke,

When the Scots first
got certein
seats herein
this Ile of Britaine as
some thinke,

When the Scots first
got certein
seats herein
this Ile of Britaine as
some thinke,

which their battels (joined) was well nere filled with dead bodies, and the water thereof so changed into a reddie hue, that it seemed as though it had run altogether with blood.

In the end (whilest as yet it was doubtfull to whether side the victorie would incline) there came such a sudden shower of raine, mixed with such great abundance of hailestones, that neither part was able to haue sight of other, so that by reason of the violent rage of that huge storme and tempest, either side was faine to withdraw from the other. There were flaine in this battell such great numbers of men, as well on the one side as the other, that they had small lust to come in battell againe for certein yeeres after. For the Roman lieutenant understanding what losse of people he had sustained, without attempting anie further exploit, appointed certein of his companies to lie in garrison within sundrie fortresses in Duneland, & with the residue he returned into Kent.
In like sort the Scots with their confederates the Picts, perceiving themselves not able as then to make anie further attempt against their enemies, broke by their armie, and deuised onelie how they might defend that which they had already in possession.

And so much as the Pictish nation was increased unto a greater multitude of people, than those countries which they then held were able to find with sufficient sustentance (considering what a great portion of their ancient seates the Britains and Romans kept from them) it was agreed by the Scots that they should inioyn the countrie of Athole, with other lands bordering nere unto the same, lying without the compasse of the mountaine of Crangeben. The Picts then being placed in Athole, increased there wonderfullie, and builded manie faire castels and towers in those parties, to the great beautifying of that countrie. In which meane while, Aldozine the Romane lieutenant commanded the Britains to make haile with the wall (whereof ye haue heard) made of turfe, and sustained with certein posts of timber passing ouerthwart the borders betwixt them and their enemies, beginning (as ye haue heard) at Abercrombie, and so stretching forth by Glasco, and Kirkpatrick, euen unto Abdeluch, now Dunblaton, 80 miles more northward than the other wall, which the emperor Adrian caused (as is said) to be made.

Whereof the Scots and Picts being informed, they assembled themselves together, & under the leading of a noble man called Graime, they set upon the Britains, as they were busie in working about the same, and due not onelie a great number of la-bourners and souldiers, which were set to labour and defend the worke, but also entering into the British borders, fetched from thence a great bottie of cattell and other riches, which they found dispersed abroad in the countrie. This Graime (who as I said was chiefe in this enterprize) was brother unto the Scottish quene, the wife of king Fergus. He was borne in Denmarke (as some hold opinion) in the time of the Scottishmens banishment, and had a Scottishman to his father descended of a noble house, and a Danish ladie to his mother. He himselfe also married a noble woman of that nation, and had by hir a daughter, whom Fergus by the persuation of the king of Denmarke tooke to wife, and had issue by hir (afore his coming into Scotland) three sonnes, Eugenius, Dongarus, and Constantius, of whom hereafter in their place mention shall be made, as occasion serueth. Other there be, that affirme how this Graime was a Britaine borne, & that through hate which he bare towards the Romans for their cruell gouernment, he fled south of his native countrie, and continued euer after amongst the Scots, as first in Denmarke, and afterwards in Albion, euer readie to do what displeasures he could deuise against the Romans & other their friends or subiects. Of this Graime these Scots, which unto this day beare that surname, are said to be descended.

But now to the purpose. We shall vnderstand, that after that it was knowne in forreign countries, how the Scots had got foot againe within those regions in Albion, which their elders in ancient time had possessed, there came daile diuerse companies of that nation out of Spaine, France, Germanie, and Ita-lie (where during the time of their banishment they had serued under sundrie captains) unto Fergus to aid him, in recouerie of their countrie and ancient seats; out of the which they had bene most cruellie expelled. So that Fergus now seeing his power thus not a litle augmented by their coming, entereth into the borders of Isle, Carike, and Coning-ham, spoiling and harrieng those countries on eu-erie side: but shortly thereupon commeth the armie of the Romans, with whom the Scots encountering in battell, received no lesse damage than they minded to haue done vnto their aduersaries. Whereupon being forced to leaue that countrie, they drew backe into Argile, where Fergus wintered for that part of the yeare which yet remained.

When summer was come, he was counselled to haue offrandes offered vnto Aldozine, who as then was entered Calowale: and rather to trie the uttermost point of fortunes chance against him, than to susteine such displeasures and injuries at the Romans hands, as by them were daile done vnto him and his people. But there were other that gaue other aduise, alleging how the danger was great to leaue againe in battell with the Romans, being men of such skill & practise in the seates of wars, considering what losse had chanced in the two former battels. Again, there was great likelihood, that if he could be contented to forbear for a time, and seeke to defend the borders of his countrie, so well as he might without gaining battell, it must needs come to passe that shortly the Romane empire should be brought vnto such ruinous decarie, by reason of the multitude of enemies, which as then invaded the same on each side, that in the end Aldozine doubting his owne suertie, would conuete himselfe with his men of warre out of the countrie, and then should it be an easie matter for the Scots and Picts to recouer againe all such countries as ancientlie belonged to their elders, and wholie to restore the estates of their common-wealths vnto their former dignities.

This aduise was followed as the best and most likeliest, so that making sundrie roads into the boders of their enemies countries so to keepe them still occupied, Fergus and the Scots refused vtterlie to come to anie foughten field with them. Shortly after also it chanced, that Aldozine was accused vnto the emperor Honorius of some secret practise against his maiestie, as to be about to surpe the crowne of Britaine, whereunto he was compelled in deed by the souldiers (whose hearts he had wonne through his bountious liberalitie sundrie waies declared towards them) and vnderstanding at this present, that he was minded to haue fled his waies for doubt of the said information made against him, they did moue him with such earnest persuations to take vpon him the imperiall dignitie, promising euen to live and die with him in defense thereof, as well as gainst Honorius, as all other, that in the end he consented vnto their desires, and so was proclaimed emperor, and clothed in purple, using thereto all the other imperiall ornaments, as if he had bene emperor indeed. But afterwards when one Heraclianus was

The Scottish
men returned
into their countrie.

Fergus in-nabed the confines of the Britains.

The Scots
put to the worke.

Aldozine in-nabed Calloway.

Fergus is disturbed to fight with the Romans.

The Romane
empire inuaded by barbarous nations.

Aldozine accused vnto Honorius.

Aldozine taketh vpon him
the name and authoritie of emperor in Britaine.

Her actianus is sent against Quitoine.

Victorine is delivered into
the hands of Heracianus.
Heracianus
is sent into Affrike.

Placidus
lieutenant of Britaine.

The warre
renewd by the Scots.

The Scots
and Picts invaded the borders of their
enemies.

Placidus ga-thereth a power.
He incountereth with his enimies.

Placidus receiveth the ouerthrow.
He fleeth to yoke.

Placidus seeth to haue
peace.

A league con= cluded be= twixt Scots, Picts, and
Romans,

Fergusse diubeth the land in parts.

was sent with an armie by Honorius into Britaine against this Maxime, the most part of the souldiers, with those Britains which had acknowledged him for their supreme gouernor, began to feare the sequel of the matter, and afterward requiring pardon for their offenses, they took Maxime, and deliuered him prisoner vnto the same Maxentius, with diuers other of his confederats, and so by this means was the estate of Britaine, recouered vnto the behoofe of Honorius, who shortly after sent for Maxentius, minding to send him into Affrike against one Athalus, who vsurped there against the Romane empire.

At his departure forth of Britaine, he left one Placidus as lieutenant and generall of the Romanie armie in those parties: a man of no great courage, and lesse skill, which being perceiv'd of the Scots, gaue occasion to Fergus their king to renew the warre. And first he procured Durdus king of the Picts, being the third of that name, to ioine with him in that enterprise, according to the articles of the league. Who consenting thereunto, when their powers were once assembled, they entered into the marches of their enemies, overrunning the most part of Bile, Carrike, and Conningham, and after they had taken their pleasure there, they entered into Galloway, destroying all before them, which way soever they passed. Then turning into Pictland, they subdued the whole region, and expell all such Romans and Britains as inhabit the same.

Placidus being aduertised hereof, gathered a great power, and cometh forward towards them, with whom encountering in battell, after long fight, his horsemen chanced to be put to flight, so that the legions of his footmen being left naked on the sides, were so sore beaten with the shot of arrowes, and hurling of darts, that in the end they were forced to b rake their araic, & so being chased left to the Scots and Picts a great and ioisfull victorie. Placidus himselfe escapeth into Rome, whither the Scots were minded to haue pursued him, had not the want of such numbers as they had lost at the battell, somewhat abated their courageous intents. In the meane time Placidus not onelie moued with this overthrow, but also weeing with himselfe after what sort the Romane empire was afflicted, with the inuasion of the barbarous nations in Germanie, France, Spaine, Italie, and Affrike, thought it good to conclude some peace with the Scots and Picts, for doubt of further mishaps that might insue. And so by such meanes as he made, shortly after a league was concluded betwixt the Scots, Picts, and Romans, with these conditions: that the Scots and Picts should inioy and keepe their ancient seates and regions, which they had now recovered, & hereafter not to make anie rodes or forreies into the prouince belonging to the Romans, and that the same Romans contenting themselves with the British confines, should not moue anie warre or hostilitie towards the Scots or Picts.

This league being thus concluded and ratified, the Scottishmen and Picts inducoured themselves to reduce the state of their common-wealth into the ancient forme and order. Fergus made partition of lands and grounds throughout all his kingdome, and assigned the same forth unto his subjects the Scottishmen, and to such other strangers as were come into Albion, to serue him in the wars against his enemies, and were minded now to remaine there. The other that were desirous to depart againe into their countries, he gave them honorable rewards, with safe conducts to passe their waies at their owne pleasures. At this time also were the names of diuerse countries & people changed in the parties of Scotland, vpon sundrie considerations: as Goznana a part of Scotland, lieng in the furthest end of all the countrie, tooke a new name of one Ca-thus a valiant captaine, and of the promontorie there shooting forth into the sea called Nessle: so that being compound together, that countrie was cleped Catynessle. Also of certeine Irishmen called Kollians, the countrie of Koffe toke that name, being afoze named Uugia.

That part of the countrey ancientlie called The-zalia, which lieth on the sea coast, began to be called Wuthquhane, of the tribute bled to be paid there for sheepe, of the which kind of cattell there is great store in that province. For Dubane in the old Scottish tong signified tribute: and Wuth, a flocke of sheepe.
The other part of Thezalia, lieng into the landward, was called Bogdale, of the riuer named Bog, which runneth through the middelt of it. Loughababer tooke the name of a great meare or water, into the which the riuer of Dubaber falleth, and passeth through the same, notable by reason of the great plentie of samons taken therein. Some other countries there be, which keepe their ancient names euer unto this day, as Athole, and Murray land. And some names remaine a little changed by length of time, as Argile, for Argathile; Apar, for Aparthea; and such like.

Fergus also repaired such temples and churches as the warres had defaced, and restor'd againe churchmen into their former linings: and further increased the same where he saw cause, and builded certaine celles and chappels for religious persons to inhabit in, assigning unto them large revenues for their living. He also laid the foundation of that famous abbey within the Ile of Iona, now Colmcill, appointing the same for the buriall of kings, with certaine ordinances and customes to be used about the same. Moreover, in the time of peace he was not negligent in providing for the defense of his realme. Such castles as were decayed and overthrowne by the enemies in the warre time, he repaired; and in those which stood towards the borders of the British countries, he placed sundrie garrisons of such souldiers as wanted trades to get their living now in the time of peace, assigning them sufficient stipends to live upon.

In this meane time, Honorius the emperor being dead, and the estate of the Romane empire daily falling into decaye, it chanced also that Placidus the lieutenant of Britaine departed out of this life, by reason whereof the Scottishmen and Picts tooke occasion to renew the warres, making as it were claime vnto the countreies of Westmerland & Cumberland, which their elders in times past had held and possessed. Entering therefore into these countreies, they take, spoile, and destroye all such of the British nation as went about to destroye them; neither spared they impotent, aged, or others, but shewed great crueltie against all such as came in their wayes. 60 Marie an honest woman they rauished and misused after a most villanious manner. The Romane soldiers, after the decesse of Placidus, ordeined one Cassius to succeed in his roome, who being aduertised of this enterprise of the Scottishmen and Picts, doubted least (as the truth was) that Monethus the sonne of Datavilus some time king of the Britains, in hope to attaine the crowne of Britaine, as due to him by inheritance, would now seek to aid the Scottish king Fergus, whose sister he had in marriage. Cassius therefore more desirous of peace than of warres, sent forth a messenger at armes vnto king Fergus, requiring him to remember the league made betwixt him and the Romans, and to withdraw his power forth of the provinces, which were considerations: as ing in the furthest name of one Ca pionontoxie there esse: so that being was cleped Cath reason of the land,

n called Kossians,
name, being afoze

The names of divers pla ces in Scot land changed.
Cathnicke
whereof it is so named.
Rosse.

entlie called The began to be called o be paid there for there is great store in the old Scotish
h, a flocke of sheepe.
reason into the land,
er river named Wog, st of it. Loughquha are or water, into falleth, and passeth reason of the great

The signifi
cation of the name of Wog
quhane, Wogdale, Loughquha
ber.

Some other coun
ancient names euen Murrey land. And changed by length of Har, for Sparthen; and

Loughquha
ber.
Whole, Spar
rey land.

temples and churches and refozed againe uinings: and further cause, and builded
religious persons to n large revenues for oundation of that fa Zona, now Colme
the buriall of kings, customes to be vied a
the time of peace he ing for the defense of were decayed and ouer warre time, he repa wards the borders of ced fundie garrisons trades to get their li
, assigning them suffi

Argyle, for: the gathile: and Har, for Sparthen.
Fergusie re
pareth chur ches, and p niderth hui
ngs for relig ious persons.

The first foun dation of the abbey within the Ile of I na now Colmehill.

Fergusie re
pareth his castles.

sius the empero: be Romane empire dai ced also that Placidus parted out of this life, Whithmen and Pits toke
, making as it ware a Westmerland & Cum
times past had held and ie into those countreies, ie all such of the British raie them: neither spa thers, but shewed great auidished and misused af
. The Romane leu
Placidus, ordeined one me, who being aduert Scotishmen and Pits, as) that Dionethus the king of the Britains, e of Britaine, as due to ow seke to aid the Sco after he had in marriage.

Placidus the
lieutenant of Britaine dur
the warre.

The Scotish
Pits a reuice
the warre.

The crneling of the Scotish and Pits.

Calistus orde
ined lieut
nant of Brit
taine.

Dionethus,
or Dionothus,
as some talke
haue.

Calistus fir
edth vnto Fergusie.

essirons of peace than essenger at armes vnto him to remember the
and the Romans, and to
of the prouinces, which
were

were subiect vnto the same Romans, without pro ceeding anie further in that vnlawfull attempt, ei ther else he should be sure to feele the pulssant force of those people readie bent against him, by whom his elders had bene driuen out of their countreies, and banished quoth forth of all their dwellings and pla ces of habitation in Albion.

But here vnto was answer made with great in dignation, that as for the league thus alledged, ceas ed by the death of Placidus; and as for peace, there was no cause why he should looke for anie, vntill the whole prouinces, both of Westmerland and Cum berland, were restored againe into the hands of the Scotishmen and Pits, according as of reason they ought to be. The like answer also was made by Dur stus king of the Pits, vnto whom Cassius had sent a like message. Therewithall the said Cassius being not a little moued, assemblth an armie, and with all sped marcheth forth toward his enimies: but before his entering into Westmerland, where they were as then lodged in campe, he had perfect knowledge how Dionethus with his Welshmen (for his lands laie in Wales) was already iointed with the Scots.

Which newes soze appalled the hearts of the Bri tains, but yet being encouraged with comfortable words of their capteins to proceed, forward they go together with the Romans, and within three daies af ter, they came with in sight of their enimies, being ranged in battell readie to receiue them, so that straightwaies buckeling together, there was a right fierce and cruell battell fought betwixt them, till fi nallie the multitude of the Scotish archers and hernes so compassed in the battels of the Romans on each side, and speciallie on the backes, that in the end, and by reason of the losse of their generall Ca ssius (who was slaine there amongst them) those of the middle ward being discomfited, brake their ar raie and fled. Whereupon the residue likewise follo wed: the Scots, Pits, and Welshmen pursuing so egerlie without all order, that there was no small number of them distressed by the Romans, the which in their giuing backe, kept themselves close togi ther, readie to defend themselves, and to beat downe such of there enimies as followed more rashlie than warlike in the chase, not once regarding to keepe any order of battell; but yet by other companies that pur sued more orderlie together for their most aduantage, there was great slaughter made both of Romans and Britains.

After this victorie thus atchined, Dionethus was proclaimed king of Britaine, and soze warres con tinued in the land by the pursuit of the Welshmen, Scots, & Pits, to the great hazard of the prouince, and likelie expelling of all the Romans quite out of the same. About this time also there remained in France, one Etius lieutenant to the emperour Valentinianus, who vnderstanding all these things by letters and messengers sent from the capteins which yet remained aliue in Britaine, appointed one Marimianus being of kin to the emperour, to passe with an armie in all hast ouer into Britaine, to aid and succor the Romans, and such Britains there, as still continued in their allegiance which they had promised vnto the Romane empire.

This Marimianus at his arriuall in the Iland was most iollie receiued by the soldiors and sub iects of the foresaid empire. All the lords and nobles of the countrie refozed also vnto him, shewing them selves most glad of his comming, & promising with what aid soeuer they were able to make, to go with him against their enimies. Whereupon, procuring them to asseemble their powers, and to ioine the same with his, which he had brought ouer with him, he pas sed through the countrie vnto Doyke, and so from thence marched forth towards the Scots, being al readie assembled in campe to defend the countrie of Westmerland against him. There were both the kings of Scots and Pits, Fergusie and Durstus, with Dionethus, naming himselfe king of the Bri tains, who had brought with him, beside the Welsh men, a great number of those Britains that inhabi ted in the countreies now accounted the marches of Wales, the which onelie amongst all other the Bri tains acknowledged him for king.

When both the armies were come nere togither, they camped for that night the one in sight of the o ther, and in the morning following they prepared themselves to battell. Fergusie first making an ear nest oration vnto his people, to encourage them the more boldlie to giue the onset, declared amongst o ther things holo the right was on their sides, which alwaies ought to minister hope of good successe in them that enterprise anie thing in defense thereof; where contrariwise all such as attempted to disquiet o ther by iniurie and wrong doing, could not but loke for an euill conclusion of their malicious intents and purposes. Neither were other of his capteins negligent in their duties, but that both in exhorting their bands, they vied most comfortable words, and in disposing them in good order of battell, they shew ed most readie and earnest diligence.

On the other side, Marimianus with his capteins and officers of bands were as busie on their side to array their battels most for their aduantage, as they saw cause and occasion, so that both the armies being readie to fight, the onset was giuen, and that in most furious wise, the Romans being at the first soze an noyed with arrowes and darts, which flue so thicke from ech side, that their sight was in manner taken from them, the skie seeming as it had been couered o uer with a pentle. So that Marimianus perceiving this disaduantage, he caused a fresh legion of his sol diors to aduance forward to the succour of their fel lows; by reason whereof the battell was forthwith most cruellie renewed, the hindermost wings of the Romans soze preasing vpon their enimies: so that in the end passing quite through their battels, they caused a great disorder and feare amongst those Scots and other their confederats, which were pla ced in the hindermost ranks. But yet casting them selves in a ring, they made great & stout resistance for a space, and at length a great number euen of the most valiant personages of the whole host, closed themselves togither, and with maine force assaied to haue broken through the thickest prease of their enimies, but being inuironed about on ech part, they were there slaine ech mothers sonne. Whilste the Ro mans drew togither to resist on that side, other of the Scotishmen, Pits, Britains, & Welshmen, found a waie to get forth through their enimies on the other side, and so being gotten past them, made awaie as fast as their feet might beare them: but a great num ber being notwithstanding overtaken, were slaine and beaten downe right pittifullie.

Fergusie the Scotish king, and Durstus king of the Pits were slaine in this mortall battell togither, with the most part of all their nobilitie. Dionethus being soze wounded escaped to the sea side, and there getting a ship, passed ouer into Wales. His ouer throw soze dismaied both the Scotish and Pitsish na tions, who looked for nothing more than present ex pulsion out of their countreies, for Marimianus pur suing the victorie, burst into Galloway, most cruel lie wasting and spoiling the same. And when he had made an end there, he entered into Anandale, and in to the Pitsish confines, destroing all before him with fire and sword. Camelon was besieged, taken by force, and miserable put to sacke and spoile, with D. J. diuerse

The Scots
and Pits as sembled a gainst the Ro
mans.

The armies prepare to bat
tell.

Fergusie ex
horteth his people to do
valiantlie.
Right mani fest hope of good successe.

The onset is giuen.

Marimianus
perceiving the disaduantage, proceedeth to remedie the same.

The Scots
disordered.

The two kings Fergus
ie and Dur
stus are slaine.
Dionethus
escapeth.

Marimianus
pursueth the victorie.

Camelon ta ken by force.

The Scots
and Picts
withdrew beyond the wall of Bircoigne.

diuerse other notable tostones and places, as well belonging to the Picts as Scots. Neither was there anie end of these cruell doings, till both the Scots & Picts for their refuge were generallie constrained to withdraw themselves beyond the wall of Abircoigne, which (as before is said) a few yeeres passed was begun by the Britains, and stretched from A-bircoigne aforesaid, ouerthwart the land unto Alclud now Dunbarton.

Marinianus hauing thus driven his enemies beyond this wall, caused them to make assurance by the oath of couenant, neuer to passe the same againe by waie of hostilitie, either against the Britains or Romans. There were that counselled Marinius either utterly to haue destroyed both the Scots and Picts, either els to haue driven them out of the whole Ile. But he being satisfied with that which was already done, thought good to returne unto Yorke, and there to winter, that in the beginning of the next spring he might go into Wales, to chastise Dionethus and other of that countrie for their rebellion, in aiding the enemies of the empire. But when the time came that he should haue set forward on that iour-nie, he heard such newes from the parties of beyond the seas, into what ruinous decaye the empire was fallen, without anie likelihood of recouerie, that changing his purpose, he minded to usurpe the crowne of Britaine as absolute king thereof himselfe. And to haue the more fauor of the British nation without anie impeachment in the beginning of his reigne, he tooke to wife one of the daughters of Dionethus, being the elder of those two, which he onelic had without issue male, by the sister of king Fergus. She that was thus coupled in marriage with Marinius was called Dithilia, & the other daughter named Arsula was professed a nun in an house of religion, to the intent that the whole right which Dionethus pretended to the realme, might remaine to the wife of Marinianus. Then was Dionethus made second person of the realme, as well in degree of honor, as in publicke gouernment.

Marinianus
taketh vpon
him the absolute governance of Bri-taine, with the imperiall
title.
He marrieth Dithilia the daughter of Dionethus.
Dionethus
reputed for second person of the realme.

Eugenius.
Eugenius
created king
of Scots.

410. H.B.
760. H.B.

The bodie of Fergus is buried in the abbie of Iona, otherwise Colmekill.

Marinianus
granteth
peace to the Scottishmen.

And whilst these things were thus a doing in Britaine, the Scottish lords had created Eugenius the sonne of Fergus, king of their realme, as due to him by rightfull succession from his father, who had gouerned the same by the space of 16 yeeres per he was slaine (as before is specified) in the last mentioned battell. This Eugenius began his reigne (as we find) in the yeere of our Lord 440, after the first beginning of the Scottish kingdome 767. His fathers corps, which at the first was secretlie buried, as occasion suffered, whilst the Romans were yet in the countrie, he caused to be taken vp, and conueied ouer into the Ile of Iona, otherwise called Col-mekill, where, with all solemne pompe and ceremonies it was intombed, according to the ordinance which he himselfe had deuided in his life time, within the abbie there.

In like manner Marinius, to the intent to establish himselfe the more quietlie in the estate of Britaine, and to deliuer his subiects the Britains, which bordered vpon the Scottish dominions, from all trouble of warres, was contented to make peace with the Scots vpon light sute made vnto him for the same. After this also, he being once fullie established in the estate of Britaine, coveted also to attaine to the type in gouernment of the whole empire, and therefore assembling all the forces of the British youth, sailed into Gallia, causing himselfe to be proclaimed emperor, and so usurped that title; as in the English and Italian historie you maie find more largelie expessed. He left behind him in Britaine his father in law Dionethus as chiefe gouernour there, with one legion of Romane soldiors. After this did Etius the emperors lieutenant in France, send for such Romans as Marinius had left in Britaine, who reuolting from their othes of allegiance giuen vnto the same Marinius, obeyed Etius, as one that supplied the rone of their rightfull lord and master the emperor Valentinian. So that in this wise was Britaine dispurueied of all manner of able men for defense, whereof the Scots and Picts toke good occasion to invade the British borders, not sparing to pursue with fire and sword all such of the Britains as did yet continue in obedience to Marinius.

They first droue those Britains out of all the countries, which had bene taken from them by the same Marinius, and by other of the Romans and Britains, as Wicland, Hile, Carrike, and Coningham, Galloway, the Marches, and Northumberland. This done, they entered into Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Denbail, not ceassing till they had spoiled and defaced all those countries, with the most part of all Yorkshire, in such cruell wise, that they made all those quarters barren both of corne and cattell, which waie soeuer they passed. The Britains perceiving into what danger they were brought, if some good redresse were not found in time, sent ouer with all speed vnto Rome for succor to be had at the emperors Va-lentinians hands, for Marinius was otherwise occupied. Valentinian desirous to deliuer the Britains from such cruell enemies as the Scots & Picts shelued themselves to be, least through their meanes all the whole Ile should reuolt from the obedience of the Romans, appointed one Gallio borne in Rauenna, and as then sojournig about Paris in France, with a legion of soldiors to passe ouer into Britaine, to drive backe the Scots and Picts from further molestant the subiects of the empire.

The Scots and Picts, vpon knowledge had of this Gallios arriual, drezv backe into their countries, not minding to fight with the Romans, whose force they doubted, and not without cause, hauing had in times past so manie ouerthrowes and slaughters at their hands. But Gallio pursued them euen vnto the water of Forth, where in sundrie skirmishes he slue no small number of them: and for that he knew he should be sent for hostlie to returne againe into France, to helpe to resist such barbarous nations as warred in the same, for the better defense of the Britains against their enemies the Scots and Picts (whome he knew would not be anie while in quiet after he was once gone) he caused the wall to be newlie made by betwixt Abircoigne & the mouth of Clude water, thereby to defend the Romane prouince from all sudden inuasions of the enemies. This wall was earst made of turffe, but now repaired with stone, and strengthened with great pilles of piles of wood, diuen in betwixt in places most need-full. It was also 8 foot broad, and 12 foot high. And in certeine turrets cast forth vpon this wall, Gallio appointed watch & ward to be kept, that vpon the enimies approach towards the same, warning might be giuen by fire in the night, and by smoke in the day, vnto such of the Britains as dwelled nere vpon those borders (commandement being giuen vpon paine of death for being found in the contrarie) that eu-erie man vpon such knowledge had, should resort in-mediatlie to the place appointed, with such armour and weapon as for him was requisit.

When Gallio had thus giuen order for the surtie of the Britains, and deliuered them at that present from the cruell hands of their enemies, he returned into France with the armie that he brought with him, according to the commandement which he had from Etius the emperours lieutenant there. His departure out of Britaine was no sooner knowne of the Scots and Picts, but that with all their maine force

The Scots
and Picts
under the wall of Bircoigne to find it.

The Scots
and Picts approach the wall to assault
it.

The Scots
and Picts approach the wall to assault
it.

The Scots
and Picts approach the wall to assault
it.

The Scots
and Picts approach the wall to assault
it.

The Scots
and Picts approach the wall to assault
it.

The Scots
and Picts approach the wall to assault
it.

The Scots
and Picts approach the wall to assault
it.

The Scots
and Picts approach the wall to assault
it.

The Scots
and Picts approach the wall to assault
it.

The Scots
and Picts approach the wall to assault
it.

The Scots
and Picts approach the wall to assault
it.

force of gaine.
the kin-
do bal-
men i-wards part p-
office
first th-
the Btentio-
ted, y-
wall, y-
were Al-
were giue t-
what appoint-
tels hape ha-when demether time
made exter-
under so th-
teret-Brit-
stancued
A Pit-pur-
king-
fed
W-counuer whi-
by a spot
man toun-
the ma-
and by cou-E
pro-
tail-
th an be te
tr
as sa fo
in
th
th
of
of
F r u sc h

t in France, send for had left in Britaine, of allegiance given obeyed Etius, as one rightfull lord and mal-So that in this wise all manner of able men s and Picts took god borders, not sparing all such of the Britains to Maximianus.

The Scots
and Picts
under the
tains.

is out of all the coun-from them by the same the Romans and Bri-
like, and Coningham, Northumberland. His

The prope-
rous lines of the Scot-tishmen.

g till they had spoiled with the most part of ife, that they made all one and cattell, which Britains perceiving in-ought, if some good re-

The Bri-
tains requiring of Valentinian the emperor.

o at the emperor Marianus was otherwise ous to deliver the Bri-as the Scots & Picts through their means from the obedience of allio borne in Raen-out Paris in France,
e over into Britaine, Picts from further mo-

Gallio has nennas is sent over into Britaine.

re.

on knowledge had of acke into their coun-
th the Romans, whose without cause, having erthowes and slaugh-

The Scots
and Picts
first to give battell to the Romans.

io pursued them euen ere in sundrie skirmies of them: and for that hostilie to returne ao resist such barbarous

Gallio pureth the Britains and Picts.

emies the Scots and not be able while in he caused the wall to Abircoine & the mouth end the Romane pro-

Gallio canthe wall of Abircoine to be repaired.

is of the enemies. This e, but now repaired
o with great posts o-et in places most nee-nd 12 foot high. And in

The maner
of the building of the wall.

pt, that upon the enie, warning might be by smoke in the day,
welled nere upon those

The ordi-
nation of the wall for watching.

ing given upon paine
e contrarie) that eue-
had, should resort ined, with such armour

The ordi-
nation of the wall for watching.

ing given upon paine
e contrarie) that eue-
had, should resort ined, with such armour

The ordi-
nation of the wall for watching.

ing given upon paine
e contrarie) that eue-
had, should resort ined, with such armour

The ordi-
nation of the wall for watching.

ing given upon paine
e contrarie) that eue-
had, should resort ined, with such armour

The ordi-
nation of the wall for watching.

ing given upon paine
e contrarie) that eue-
had, should resort ined, with such armour

The ordi-
nation of the wall for watching.

ing given upon paine
e contrarie) that eue-
had, should resort ined, with such armour

The ordi-
nation of the wall for watching.

force they determined to set upon the Britains againe. So that assembling their powers together, the kings of both those nations exhorted their men to do valiantlie. Eugenius the king of the Scottish men incourageth them through hope of high rewards and spoile. The Pictish king likewise for his part promiseth the lieutenantship of Camelon (an office of most honor amongst them) unto him that first should passe the wall of Abircoine. Whereupon the Britains being advertised of their enemies intentions according to the ordinance before appointed, drew in defensable wise unto that part of the wall, where they understood the Scots and Picts were minded to assault.

At length when the Scottish and Pictish kings were come to the wall, and had their people readie to give the assault, they themselves stood apart somewhat out of danger of shot: and such bands as were appointed to assault, advanced forth of the maine bat-tels under the leading of that Craine, the which (as ye have heard) was chiefe in expelling the Britains when they had first made the same wall by commandement of Maxime the Romane lieutenant. Yet ther shewed he lesse proofe of his valiance at this time than he had don before. For though the Britains made earnest resistance, so far as their power would extend, yet at the length by great force the wall was undermined and throwen downe in sundrie places, so that the whole number of the Scots and Picts entered by the same into Pictland, beating downe the Britains on eche side that went about to make resistance, for none escaped their hands, but such as saved themselves by flight.

There came also an other power of Scots and Picts by water out of Fife, and landing in Pictland, pursued the Britains with more crueltie than the kings did themselves. Both houses and people passed by fire and sword, in such sort that all such of the Britains as could get away, withdrew forth of the countrie, not staying till they came beyond the ri-uer of Tyne; by reason whereof, all the countrie which lieth betwixt Tyne and Tyne was deliuered by appointment of the kings unto the soldiers, to spoil and sle at their pleasure, whereupon followed manie notorious examples of crueltie, enuie, contention, wrath & malice. In the meane time, whilest the Scottish and Pictish men of warre applied their market, the Britains with all diligence repaired and newlie fortified the other wall begun (as is said) by the emperor Adrian, shooting overthwart the countrie from the river of Tyne, unto the river of Gtke.

Howbeit the Scots and Picts, because winter ap-proched, made no further attempt against the Britains at that time, but dividing those countries which lie by north from the foresaid wall of Adrian, among themselves, according to the order in that behalf appointed by their kings, they fortified cer-teine castles and holds for defense of the same countries, as it were to countergarison such Britains as continuallie kept watch and ward upon the fore-said wall. The Britains therefore mistrusting least so soone as the spring were come, the Scots would inuaide their countries which lay on the south part of the same wall, breaking in by force through it, as they had done the yere before through the other wall of Abircoine, they sent ambassadors unto Etius the Romane lieutenant, governing Gallia now called France, under the emperor Valentinian, requiring to haue some aid and succour at his hands, whereby to resist such fierce and cruell enemies, as sought to destroy and expell out of their lands and houses, all such of the Britains as acknowledged themselves in any manner of wise subiects unto the empire.

But Etius, whether he would not, or rather because he committie could not (for that he was otherwise occupied in defense of Gallia against the French men) made a direct answer that he had no men of warre in store to send over into Britaine, and therefore willed them to do what they could for their owne defense, for aid of him they might none haue. The messengers returned home with this answer, and made report thereof in a publike assembly of all the British nobilitie, being as then gathered together at London to consult there for the estate and order of their countrie. Where after long deliberation (notwithstanding that they perceived they should haue no more aid from the Romans) it was yet determined, that to resist the enemies, the whole puissance of the British nation should be mustered, as well men as women, being able to do any feat of seruice available in defense of their countrie, & ather to trie the uttermost point of fortunes chance, than to suffer themselves to be overrun without resistance. But Conanus Camber, a prince of great authoritie amongst them, as one that was descended of the bloud of Maxime sometime king of Bri-taine, went about with earnest persuasions to remoue the residue of the nobilitie from this determination, abusing them to seeke for peace at the Sco-tishmens hands, rather than to trie the doubtful chance of wars his iudgement, considering the feebleness of their whole force now, euer since that the tyrant Maximianus had in manner emptied and dispeopled the land of all such able men as were apt for seruice in the warres. But this abuse of Conanus was verie euill taken, & moued the multitude that heard him, to be greatly offended with his words, not sparing to say that he spake like no true man nor louer of his countrie; so that the former ordinance (that is to say, to seeke an end of the wars by dint of sword) was allowed for the best.

Whereupon there were musters taken, armour and weapon provided, and both day and place appointed, where they should assemble together to march forth towards the enimie. Conanus for lamenting their doings, called almightie God to record, that that which he had said, was spoken onlie for the loue & zeale which he bare to his countrie, & such his advise might not be followed, he doubted great-lie least the ruine of the British state by some fatall appointment drew fast upon them. The people hearing him speake thus, some wilfull wicked persons fell upon him, and due him there presentlie amongst them: wherewith other being soe moued to indignation, set upon the murderers, there to haue reuenged his death immediatlie. Whereupon began taking of parts, and together they went by the eares in such a furious wise, that sundrie amongst them being slaine, the magistrats had much adoe to appease the fraie.

In this meane time, whilest the Britains were thus busied in sending of their ambassadors to the Romans, & consulting together for defense of their countrie, the Scots first raced downe the wall of Abircoine, not leaving one piece thereof whole, so that a few tokens excepted, nothing remaineth to be seene at this day of all that huge and wonderfull worke, it is called now in these daies Crainsike, because that Craine was not onlie (as ye have hard) chiefe in expelling the Britains from the same, but also at this time in the racing of it to the ground he was the greatest doer. Which being accomplished, the Scottish and Pictish kings assembled their powers, and overthrow all such fortresses as had not bene destroyed the yere before: standing on the northside of Adrian's wall, the which wall the Britains

Etius refus-eth to aid the Britains.

The Bri-
tains for lacke of the Romans, determine yet to make resistance.

Conanus
Camber
counselleth
the Britains
to seeke peace at the Scotish
mens hands.

Britaine dispeopled of warlike men by Maximianus.

Conanus
counsel is received.

The Bri-
tains make their appoyntment to go against
the Scots.

Conanus is slaine amongst the Britains.

The Scots
raze the wall of Abircoine.

Crainsike.

The Scottish
and Pictish
kings inuaide
the British borderers.

Whians wall undermined and overthrowen.

fains had newlie fortified, but yet were not able to defend the same from the power of the enimie, who now set vpon the Britains with maine force, in so much that undermining the foundations of that wall in diuers places; at length sundrie parts thereof were reuerfed into the ditch, so that the souldiers breaking in by the same, cruellie beate downe the Britains which stood at defense.

Cruellie of Scots.

The entrie being thus wonne, both the kings with their powers marched forth into the south countries, commandement being giuen that no man vpon paine of death should kill anie woman or child, aged person, or otherwise impotent and not able to beare armour. But this commandement in some places was but slenderlie obried; such desire of reuenge was planted in the Scottishmens hearts, by reason of the remembrance of old iniuries, that vnrath made them anie difference either of age or sex. To be short, all those countries which lie betwixt the riuers of Tyne and Humber, were wasted & spoiled, the whole number of the inhabitants (such as could make thist to escape the enimies hands) got them ouer the foresaid riuier of Humber, there to remaine as further out of danger. The report of which mischiefe being brought to London, the lords there (who as ye haue heard were not all of one accord together) they took new aduise, to redresse the present mischiefe in this maner. First they thought it best to send forth two ambassadores, one to the Scots & Picts to require a peace; & an other with letters to Etius the Romaine lieutenant in France, for fresh aid and succour. The tenour of which letters as then sent vnto Etius here inseth.

The lords
of Britaine
take new ad-
uise.

See more hereof in England.
The tenour of the letters sent vnto Ettius from the Britains, as is written by Hecst. Boetius.

The lamentable complaints of the Britains vnto Etius thise consill. At what time our elders became subiects vnto the Romans, they vnderstood by woorthie proofes and notable examples, that the Senate was a most safe refuge and haue, to be wished of all such as fled to the same for support. But we their posteritie by the pernicious working of the legat Vaspianus, tending whole to our destruction, being spoiled both of force and substance, and therefore remaining in great danger of losing both kingdome and liues, through the sore and terrible inuasion of our most cruell enimies the Scots and Picts, making humble sute for succours vnto the Romaine empire, according to the loiall trust and most assured confidence, the which euer like true and faithfull subiects we haue reposed in the same, are yet neglected, & nothing regarded, but deliuered as a prey vnto the barbarous nations to be spoiled, destroyed, and slaine in most pitious wise, which can not but be an euident signe, that either the Romans haue changed their most commendable maners into the worst that may be deuised, either els their most large empire, thorough the wrath and high displeasure of almighty God, is now giuen for a prey vnto other foreign nations. But if it be so, that the fatall force of the time present doth require, that without all remedie the land of the Britains being taken auaie from the Romans, must needs be brought vnder the subiection of some barbarous nation, we neither abhorre nor refuse the gouernement of anie people or nation, the Scots and Picts (the most cruell of all other) onelie excepted, whose cruellie we hauing long since too much tasted, are at this present brought vnto that point by their late increased puissance, that we know not now after the losse of our gods and cattell, which way to safe gard our liues; for the turffe walls being pulled downe, and the ditches filled by with earth, which aforesaid did somewhat state them, now breaking in vpon vs without letting passe anie kind of cruellie, they haue destroyed our fields, burned bp our houses, towncs & villages, beaten downe & rased euen to the ground our castles and towres, with such other places of defense, not sparing to put to the sword as well the poore innocent children, women, and impotent aged, as such other innumerable numbers of men, which they haue slaine standing at defense with weapon in hand. And as for vs, which are the residue of our decayed nation, they haue driuen euen to the sea side, and from thence (because we cannot passe ouer) we are put backe vpon our enimies againe. And here of proceed two kinds of our destruction, for either we are drowned in the raging floods, either else slaine most vnnecessarie by our cruell enimies. Therefore if the honor of the Romaine people, if our assured loialtie and loue, which we beare to the emperre of Rome, now continued for the space of these 500 yeares or thereabout, may moue you to rue on our miseries, we humble pray and beseech you, not to suffer vs longer to be trodden vnder foot of these our most beastlie and cruell enimies, but send vnto vs some conuenable succours and that with all speed, least we seeme to be more cruellie betrayed of the Romans, than brought to destruction by these barbarous people, and that we be not set forth as a notable example for all other to beware, how they put confidence hereafter either in the rule or friendship of the Romans.

Paulus Diaconus, Beda, Gefray of Monmouth, Veremound, and others make mention of these foresaid letters. Wherevpon Etius answering, declared that those calamities, misfortunes and losses sustained by the Britains were right displeasing vnto him, and so much the more, for that through the sundrie inuasions made, aswell into France as also into Italie it selfe, and into other parties of the Romaine empire by people of sundrie nations, he could not as then spare anie men of warre to send ouer vnto them, & therefore he willed the Britains to make the best thist they could to defend themselves for a time, till things were better quieted in other parties, and then should they see such redresse of their iniuries provided, as they should thinke themselves to be vberie well reuenged. About the same time that the ambassadores returned with this answer vnto London from Etius, the other also came backe forth of the north without hope to speed of that about the which they had bin sent, for the Scots & Picts would incline to no reasonable conditions of peace, vntill the Britains would wholly submit themselves as subiects vnto them. The Britains hereat took such indignation, that by generall consent they agreed to trie it out with the enimies by maine force; & herevpon made their prouision with all diligence. The Scots and Picts hearing of the Britains intents, gathered their people together with more speed than was thought possible for them to haue done, & forthwith rushed into the borders of their enimies countries in right puissant wise and most warlike order.

In the fore ward went such as came forth of Calolway and Annandale, with those Picts which inhabited about the coasts of Barwicke. Then followed there a mightie battell of those which came forth of Argile, Athole, and other Picts inhabiting nere vnto the parties of Kalendar and Camelone with them of Fife, and Angus. In the midst of this battell both the kings kept their place with their choicest souldiers, and standards borne afore them. Then went the carriage and trulle of the armie, next wherevnto a great number of noble men of both the nations followed in faire order of battell, with their seruants and men of warre the best they could chose forth. And last of all (as the maner of those nations hath bene euen from the beginning) there came a great multitude of the commons closing vp the back of the whole whole afore said

The Britains
with their enemies, when the maine force of discouraged
fore once againe chased. But to the confeder-
was, that cruselus, their w-
and substance
ple without algranted. The of the Britains one part, and their minds to change of pur-number of the Whereof in for the Britains fence of their deaths vpon than is credibuerthelie a gr-
much that the sing in the for-and such other were in great Graime perce-
armie was ru-
both the kings
men, who iner-
sent them witsuccors of the point to haue comming of toke courage
most hercelie
with great fla-Britains beinenimies, and ning auaie, th-
bogs, master
place of the ba-remained wit-
constitute of ed them into small number tell of the Brit-Scots and P-
The Britains
saw no helpe onelic to suc-
sent therefore kings, besee-
peace, euen
them to perfect
the present forwith their ow-
right warthie fented to gran-
the Britains
nant or armie enimie of the tion fouer he They should e-nation, nor out consent of ther should be-ner of enimie Whereouer, th-
children, and tries, lieng l

The Brit-
ains doubt
to come with the maine army of the Scots and Picts.

The Brit-
ains vpon
the Scottish-mens refusal to haue peace,
require to fight battell.

The fierce on-ing men by
the Britains.

Graime au-thoritie in opposing of the
battell.

Whole of the westerne fies comming to the succors of the fore ward,
enjoyed the battell.

The Brit-
ains run a-
waie.

The number of them that were slaine on both sides.

The Brit-
ains make humble sute
by peace.

Peace granted by the Scots with the conditions of the same.

But not largely as here is recorded.
The answer
of Etius.

The Scots
and Picts
would agree vpon more conuenient
conditions of peace.

The Scots
and Picts
prepare to fight the Britains.

The order
of the Scots
and Picts
entring into the lands of
the Britains.

whole aforesaid armie.

The Britains also comming forth into the field with their whole puissance to encounter their enemies, when they understood by espials the order and maine force of the Scots and Picts, they were halfe discouraged in their minds, and thought good therefore once againe to assaie if anie peace might be purchased. But sending forth their ambassadours unto the confederat kings, to that end their answer was, that except the Britains would yeld themselves, their wives and children, with all their goods and substance into the hands of their enemies, simple without all conditions, there would be no peace granted. When this was knowne abroad in the host of the Britains, what thorough kindeled ire on the one part, and soule despaire on the other, prouoking their minds to displeasure, they generallie upon change of purpose required battell, euen all the whole number of them.

Whereof ensued a most cruell and mortall fight: for the Britains (as it were) resolved to die in defence of their countrie, and to reuenge their owne deaths upon their enemies, with more fiercenesse than is credibie to be thought, gaue the onfet, and utterly slew a great number of their enemies, insomuch that those of Galloway and the Picts fighting in the fore ward with them of Argyle, Athole, and such other as were in the battell with the kings, were in great danger to be put to the sword: which Graime perceiuing (by whome the most part of the armie was ruled, and that by commandement of both the kings) called forth a number of the Island-men, who were appointed to attend the cariage, and sent them with all diligence to the fore ward to the succors of them of Galloway, being then at the point to haue sought refuge by flight. But by the comming of these Island-men to their succors, they took courage afresh, so that the battell was againe most fiercelie renewed, and so continued a space with great slaughter on both parts, till finally the Britains being oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, and not able longer to indure, fell to running awaie, thinking to saue themselves in certaine bogs, moasses, and marish grounds neere vnto the place of the battell: but such coiserels, and other as remained with the Scottish cariage, seeing the discomforture of their aduersaries, ran forth and pursued them into those marishes, killing and taking no small number of them. There were slaine in this battell of the Britains, aboue 15 thousand, and of the Scots and Picts neere hand foure thousand.

The Britains hauing receiued this ouerthrow, saw no helpe which waite to recover their losses, but onelie to sue for peace at the victors hands. They sent therefore an orator vnto the Scottish & Pictish kings, beseeching them humble to grant them a peace, euen with what conditions it should please them to prescribe. The kings not moued onelie with the present fortune of the Britains, but also partlie with their owne, hauing lost no small number of right worthie personages in the battell, were contented to grant a peace vpon these conditions: That the Britains should in no wise receiue anie lieutenant or armie hereafter from Rome, nor suffer anie enemy of the Scottish and Pictish estates, of what nation soeuer he were, to passe through their countrie. They should enter into no league with anie citie or nation, nor be about to make anie warres with out consent of the Scottish and Pictish kings, and further should be readie to serue them against all manner of enemies whensoever they should be sent for. Moreover, they should remoue with their wives, children, and whole families out of all those countiees, lieng betwixt Line and Dumber, resigning the possession of the same vnto the Scottishmen and Picts.

Also they should giue thre score thousand peeces of gold then current to the Scottish & Pictish kings, towards the dispatch of their soldiers wages, and further should payd as a tribute twentie thousand peeces of gold, to be paid yerelie vnto the severall vices of the victors. They should likewise deliuer one hundred hostages of such as the two kings should appoint, betwixt the age of eightene and thirtie yers. These conditions of peace though they seemed verie strict & greivous to the British nobilitie, yet for that they understood not how to make a better bargain, they perswaded the multitude to accept them, and so a league thereupon was concluded amongst those people, and the publike state of the land brought to a more quiet rule than it had bene before. Thus were the Britains made tributarie to the Scottishmen and Picts, about 500 yeres after Julius Cesar had brought them in subiection to the Romans, being in the yere after the birth of our Saviour 446, and of Eugenius his reigne over the Scottishmen the seventh.

In this season was the Ile of Albion fore infected with the heresie of the Pelagians, and therefore pope Celestine sent one Paladius a learned man vnto the Scots, to persueve them from that infection, and ordeined him bishop, the first in Scotland that had his inuention from Rome: for all the other before him were ordeined by the voices or suffrages of the people, choosing them forth among the monks and priests called Culdeis, as the Scottish chronicles doe report. Paladius with right good and wholesome exhortations purged the Scots and Picts of sundrie superstitious rites of their old gentillish idolatry, till those daies used amongst them, whereupon he is named and reputed for the Scottishmens apostle. He lieth at Fordruce, a towne in Pernes, where his reliques remained, and were long after had in great estimation.

Moreover he instituted one Seruan bishop of the Orkenies, that he might instruct the inhabitants there in the faith of Christ, which as yet they had not receiued: and one Teruan, whome he himselfe had baptised, he made archbishop of Pictland. In these daies also manie strange sights were scene in sundrie parts of Britaine before the last mentioned ouerthrow: the moone being in plaine opposition to the sunne, when it should be most round, appeared in a quadrant figure. At Perth it rained blood: and trees in sundrie places being blasted, withered and died. The market place, or rather (if ye will so tearme it) Cheapside in London opened, so that a great hole appeared, and manie houses were swallowed vp. About the same season also (as is supposed) liued that huge personage Finnmacoell, a Scottishman borne of seven cubites in height. He was a great hunter, and fore feared of all men by reason of his mightie stature, and large lims: manie fables go abroad of him, not so agreeable to the likelihood of truth, as ought to be registred in an historie, and therefore here passed ouer with silence.

The Romane empire being brought into irrecoverable ruine by the Vandals, Gothes, Hunnes, Frenchmen, and other barbarous nations, occupying sundrie parts and portions thereof, put the Britains out of all hope to haue anie assistance from the emperors, which caused them to remaine in quiet certein yeres without attempting any exploit against the Scots or Picts, and so duclie paid their couenanted tribute, though sore against their wills, if they might otherwise haue remedied it. At the last about ten yeres after the conclusion of this last peace, it chanced that one Conanus the sonne of the aboue

Wij.

mentioned

6000 pound
the Britains
tributarie to the Scots and
Picts.
436. H. B.

The Britains
tributarie to the Scots and
Picts.
436. H. B.

Of this Pa-ladius who more in Ire-
land.

Paladius accounted the apostle of Scotland.

Seruan bishop of Orkenie, and Ter-
uan archbishop of Pict-
land.
Unketh
sights and strange wonders appered.

Finnmacoell
the great hunter.

Conanus a Britaine go-
th about to persuade his countrie men to breake the peace concludes with the Scots and
Picts.

to the ground
places of deas well the otent aged,
men, which h weapon in ie of our de-
the sea side,
our we
And here,
for either
either else
all enemies.
people, if our
to the em-
ace of these on to rue on each you, not of these it send vnto
th all sped, raied of the y these bar-
th as a now they put e friendship

Monmouth,
of these fore-
ing, declar-
id losses su-
asant vnto gh the sun-
e as also in-
of the Ro-
s, he could nd over br-
is to make eludes for a
er parties,
eir injuries
s to be ve-ie that the were vnto ackie forth
it about the icts would ace, unless selfes as it take such pagrad to ce; & here-

The Scots
and Picts
would agree
vpon no reasonable conditions of peace.

The Scots
and Picts
prepare against the Britains.

The order of
the Scots
and Picts
entering into the lands of
the Britains.

The Brit-
ains come
with armie arrived Gow and Dun.

The Britains upon the Scottish shall make peace, vnto the Scottish.

The Britains only up
the Britains.

Grimes an-come in option of the Scottish.

Scale of the Scottish
coming to the Scottish
the Scottish
the Scottish

The Brit-
ains run-
away.

The Britains only up
the Britains.

The Brit-
ains make peace.

The Brit-
ains make peace.

mentioned Conanus, descended of the blood of the Detains, sometimes kings of the Britains, fore assigned to see his countrie thus brought into thraldome of the Scottish nation, and devising how to find some rebbers, called together the most part of the British nobilitie, by secret message home to a manour place which he had within a thicke wood in the countrie of Kent, and there opening unto them a great peece of his mind, perswaded them with the weightiest reasons he could imagine, to leue warre against the Scots and Picts, hauing at that present, meanes now since the last warres to mainteine it, as well by reason of their increase both of able men, as also of substance to furnish them withall.

The Britains hauing respect to their sonnes & kindred lieng in hostage would not agree to breake the peace.

The kings of the Scots & Picts offended with the conspacie of the Britains, perswaded vnto them new articles to be performed.

Impudent ferilitie intruded vpon the Britains by the proud and cruel Scots, if it be true.

The commons of Britaine offended with their gouernors.

The commons of Britaine conspire against the nobles.

One estate of men cannot live without helpe of another.

Where the nobles were of sundrie opinions: for some awearied with the note of bondage, would gladlie haue had warres: other hauing regard to their sons lieng in hostage with the enimies, would in no wise consent thereto: by reason whereof this counsell brake vp without conclusion of anie effect. When ech man was returned to his home, there had bene some amongst them, that gaue knowledge to the confederate kings what motion had bene made, and what was intended against them. Whereupon they immediatlie determined, not onelie to cause the hostages to be executed, but also to pursue the rebbers with fierce and cruell warres. Yet before they practised anie violence, they sent their ambassadoes vnto the Britains, to vnderstand their full meaning, and to declare vnto them further certaine articles which the said kings required to haue performed without all delays, or else to looke for open warre out of hand.

The chiefest points of which articles were these. First that the Britains should not assemble together in counsell without licence of the Scottish and Pictish kings, notwithstanding that their ancient laws they might vse at their pleasure, but they should receiue no stranger into their countrie being a Roman or a Frenchman, neither merchant nor other. Their old hostages they should receiue home againe, and deliuer in exchange of them twise so manie in number of the like age and degree, as was covenanted by the former league. The commons of the land vnderstanding what was demanded by these ambassadoes, were in a wonderfull rage, and would haue made a great surre if they had not bene quieted by the lords, who for their paines taken herein, got them an euill report amongst the inferior sort of people, as though through their want of stomach onlie, the common-wealth was brought into such a miserable estate, that looke what it pleased the enimie to charge the British nation with, no man durst once speake against it.

This grudge of the commons increased so farre forth against their superiours, that after the Scottish and Pictish ambassadoes were returned home, with answer agreeable to their demandes, their arose incontinentlie a great commotion of the people, conspiring together the viter destruction of the whole nobilitie. But their furie was repressed, so that they were ouerthrowne in battell at two severall times with great slaughter and bloodshed, whereupon they withdrew into the mounteins, and there kept themselves, making railes vpon the nobilitie, and fetching booties awaite from the herds and flocks of cattell belonging to the lords and gentlemen: but finally through famine which began to oppresse both parties, they perceined what need the one had of the others helpe, and so they agreed. This ciuill warre fore decreed the force of the Britains, for beside the great slaughter that was made betwixt them, by the avoiding of the commons out of their houses, the ground laie vntilled, whereof ensued a marvellous great scarcitie and dearth of all things, by reason whereof an innumerable sort of people died. Yet shortly after followed such plentie, that those that were left aloue forgetting the pasted miseries, gaue themselves to all kind of vice, which took such root in the hearts of the more part of them, that for anie man to vse anie manner of vertue amongst them, was a readie meane to procure great enuie and hatred.

In the meane time liued the Scottish and Pictish kings in good quiet and rest, applieng their studies onelie how to instruct their people now after the warres were once ended, in laudable exercises and necessarie occupations, conuenient for the time of peace, whereby their realmes might flourish in welth and prosperitie without dread of anie foreign power. For they saw such tokens of ruine in the British estate, as small likelihood appeared, that the same should at anie time be able to recouer againe the former force and dignitie. Finally the Scottish king Eugenius hauing aduanced the estate of his countrie vnto more felicitie and wealth than anie of his predecessors had euer done before him, after he had reigned thirtie yeeres, he ended his life about the fourth yeere of Leo, that usurped the empire of Constantinople.

But forsomuch as Eugenius left no issue behind him, his brother named Dongard succeeded in the estate. He began his reigne in the yeere 470, and his chiefest studie was, according to his brothers example, to prouide for the maintenance of good order and iustice, appointing in euerie quarter men of god same and report to haue the administration vnder him, with commandement that they should diligently forese, that euerie man might inioy his owne. He himselfe took vpon him also to see to the repairing of such castles as were decayed, and to the building vp of new in places where he thought most expedient, specially nere to the British borders, for he well considered that peace increased riches, riches pride and presumption, with other sinnes, which could not long endure without the plague of wars. Therefore he doubting the changes of fortunefull fortune, thought good in time of peace to prouide for the dangers of warre, when the same should happen vnto him.

These ciuill policies and princelie prouisions for defense of his countrie and subiects increased the fame of Dongard mightilie, but that which he did towards the aduancement of religion did most exceedingly set forth his commendation. First, all such religious men as followed the trade of life taught by Paladius and others, which came with him from Rome, he caused them to be highly reuerenced: and for the maintenance of their liuing, he assigned forth lands, houses, and other kinds of reuenues in diuers places of his realme, and granted not onelie vnto them, but also vnto all other, being within anie orders of clergie, sundrie priuileges, appointing that the churches & abbeyes with other holie places should be infranchised and taken for sanctuaries, that all such as fled to the same for safegard of their liues, should be suffered to rest in peace, so long as they kept them within the same.

About the same time also, and whilst these things were thus aduancing in Scotland, the Britains being awearied of their seruite estate, through the setting on of Conanus, conspired together, and took aduise by what meanes they might best take to deliuer themselves from the thraldome of Scots and Picts, and vpon aduise taken they concluded to send ouer into Britaine Armozike some honorable ambassage vnto Androenus the king of that countrie for aid. Wherewith was the archbishop of London appointed

Superioritie
with respect of vice.

The Scots
applied themselves
to peace.

The death
of Eugenius
the Scottish
king.

Dongard,
Dongard
king of Scots.

461. H. B.
The death
of Dongard
by persecution of iustice
and good order.

The repairing of castles by Dongard.

The Scots
and Picts
make their ap-
pell.

The Scots
and Picts
ap-proue
the Britains.

The bounds
of liberty
of Dongard towards churchmen.

Donard exposed his people to fight manfully.

The bounds
of liberty
of Dongard towards churchmen.

The Scots
and Picts
ap-proue
the Britains.

The things
of the Britains
are put backe.

ted as chie archbishop Constant appointed men to ge British in ships wi die, he im
was mad spacious into grea Denonsh
England
forthwith
be promi recouer a to maint
thed desir
For command should be appointed daies aft
the lords
in execut ing apt rie man of the all mies, fo
sent of th
to recou beheld su same wo Scots a them ou When
which the Scots a
to meet their pol shire, a where C
the next the crim wards t camped nere to
of Sco that nig day, an getting a there of pers liantly
the ord broke mies w
He h diuerse how th had loo die in o
to inco
be righ nentlie euerie pointe take a
to vel ning b and cr Britain
the mi
Where

of The Piers
and stand in feare
in of the king of Brittaine.

33

saile to reuenge old injuries against them, they should be little able to match him without aid of the Scots (whereof they had small trust now, by reason of the insufficiency of the Scottish king) they devised a meane how to rid the British king out of the waie, and so appointing certaine lie fellows to go into Britaine for the accomplishment of their devised purpose, at length the same was brought to passe, as in the English chronicles ye shall find more at large, though in the same chronicles there is mention made but of one Bit that should worke this feat, where the Scottish writers record of diuers, which neuertheless were apprehended, and after bound both hand and foot, were cast into a mightie great fire, and therein burnt to ashes in most miserable wise, as by the said Scottish writers it appereth. The death of this Constantine king of Britains happened in the 15 yere of Constantine king of Scots, neither liued he long after: for hauing rauished a noble mans daughter, borne in the weserne Isles, he was slaine by his father in the night season, after he had reigned in great infamie for his reprochfull life, the space of 17 yeres.

Constantine the Scottish king is slaine by one whose daughter he had rauished. Anno 481.

Dongall. Dongall the sonne of Dongard is made king of Scotland.

The politike rule of Dongall.

Constantinus a monke elected king of Britaine.

Mortigerns treason. Constantinus murdered.

Guistellus generall of the British army

Then was Dongall his nephew, as sonne to his brother Dongard, proclaimed king, a prince of disposition indifferent either to peace or warre, though in the beginning of his reigne he shewed himselfe more desirous of peace than of warres, by reason the state of the common-wealth so required, considering how things stood not all in the best order, through his predecessors negligence. Dongall therefore desirous of a reformation, appointed men of great wisdom and good fame to be iudges and officers vnder him, who in redressing misorders, in punishing transgressions, & in deciding of all strifes and contentions betwixt partie & partie, did so well their endeavour, that peace and concord thereupon ensuing, the people recovered peaceable rest and quietnesse, to their no small comfort and contentation.

In this meane while that things passed thus among the Scots, by the procurement of one Mortigern, Constantinus the eldest sonne of the late deceased Constantine king of Britains, was taken out of an abbey, where he was shorne a monke, and advanced to the kingdome: but being not meet of himselfe to gouerne, Mortigern had the whole rule committed to his hands, whereupon he first caused the league to be renewed betwixt the Britains, the Scots, and Picts, and appointed a garrd of the same Scots and Picts to be attendant on the kings person: in the end also he procured some of them to murder the king, and after put all the said Scots and Picts to death, as well the guiltie as the vnguiltie, and finally made himselfe king, as in the historie of England you shall find more at large expressed.

The Scots and Picts (for displeasure that these countreymen which had bene appointed to garrd the person of Constantinus king of the Britains, were maliciouslie circumvented, & the more part of them wrongfullie executed) made sundrie roades and forraides into the British borders, neither sparing fire nor sword where they came. So that the said Mortigern by a greivous report informed hereof, caused an armie with all speed to be leued, and appointed Guistellus the prince of Wales to haue the leading thereof against the enemies: whilst he (doubting least the people would not be ruled by him, for that it was known how he would haue made away Constantines children) kept him about London, & durst not commit himselfe so much to the sight of a multitude, as to go forth in that iourne in his owne person.

Guistellus, in respect of the loue which he bare to his countrie, purposing to serue truelie in defense thereof, chanced vpon his approach to the borders to take the number of five hundred of the enemies, being advanced from the residue to fetch a bottie. These Guistellus caused to be hanged, as condemned for robbers and pillers of the countrie afore anie outbreak of warre was denounced. Whereupon such other as escaped by flight, and had sene their fellows thus executed, declared vnto their gouernors what had happened vnto their fellowes. The confederate kings, being in a great chafe herewith, gather together their people, and haile forward with all speed toward the enemies, who at the first shewed manifest tokens that they were fore afraid of the Scottish and British power: whereupon Guistellus their generall with comfortable words willed them to be of good courage, and not to doubt of victorie, hauing so iust a cause to fight with truce-breakers, and such as were giuen more vnto pillage and spoile, than to anie other commendable exercise or practise of warre.

With such and sundrie other the like words the Britains being emboldened, as might well appere by their change of countenances, Guistellus thereupon removed his campe more nere vnto his enemies, so that at the first and for certaine daies together, there chanced onlie diuers skirmishes betwixt the parties, as occasion serued. But at length the one being fore moued against the other, they ioin in a pight field. The beginning of which battell was very fierce and doubtfull. For on that side where Dongall the Scottish king fought, the Britains shortly began to preuaile, through the faint fighting of his people: which danger Calanus the Pictish king quicklie perceiving, forthwith provided remedie: for taking with him certaine bands out of his owne battell, willing the residue to stand to it manfullie, and in no wise to giue ground to the enimie, he himselfe with the said bands fetched a compasse about, and set vpon the backs of them that so had outmatched the Scots.

This sudden chance sore disordered the Britains, and immediatlie the Scots encouraged afresh, assailed their enemies with more eger minds than they had done at the first, so that maintanentlie both the wings of the British armie were vtterlie discomfited. And herewith a certaine number of the Picts were commanded by their king to make halfe to win the campe of the Britains, that such as sought to escape by flight, should find no refuge in the same. Thus the Britains being chased and slaine on euerie side, they knew not whither to flie: so that in the end a great number of them throwing away their weapons, yielded themselves, most humble craning mercie at their enemies hands. There were slaine in this battell about twentie thousand of the Britains, together with their generall Guistellus, and a great number of other of the nobilitie. There died also of the Scots and Picts nere hand foure thousand. The prisoners with the spoile of the field were diuided by appointment of the kings amongst the souldiers. Which done, they marched forth into the countrie to conqueere castles and townes, such as stood in their waie.

In the meane time, the Britains being sore discomfited with the ouerthrow, assembled a councell at London, there to deuise by what meanes they might best defend their countrie from the imminent danger in the which it now stood. Mortigern as one guiltie in conscience, doubted least through want of good wils in his commons, he should not be able to withstand the mightie inuasion of his enemies, whereupon he was minded to haue avoided the realme, but there were of his councell that aduised him to the contrarie, holding, that better it was for him to trie the bittermost point of fortures hap, than with

the enemies

The Scots and Picts

The Britains

The Scots

The king of Picts

The king of Picts

The king of Picts

Mortigern is

Mortigern

The Saxons

The Saxons

The king of Picts

The king of Picts

The king of Picts

borders to timies, become. These domined for anie over-upon such ore fellows
rnoys that confederate

gather tog-all sped to ed manifest Scotish and re general
be of good ing so iust a uch as were to anie o-
warre.

woys the well appare
us thereby to his ent-saies toghes betwixt ng the one p some in a tell was be-where Don-ains hostile

thing of his Dianish king
re medie: for is owne batnfullie, and he himsele
out, and set matched the

the Britains,
affair, as the they
the discomf-
of the Pias take halfe to ch as sought
in the same,
ine on euerie
at in the end aie their wea-
e craning
were laine in he Britains,
and a great
e died also of onland. The re diuided by the souldiers,
e countrie to d in their being fore dis-

ed a counsell meanes they he imminent gerne as one ugh want of not be able to minies, wher-
d the realme, uised him to as for him to ap, than with dis-

disamor so to peld at the first blow of his forward hand, considering the abundance of treasure which he had in those, wherewith he might wage souldiers and men of warre out of Germanie & other places, in number sufficient to match with his enemies.

This counsell as the best was follo and, and messengers with commission & sufficient instructions sent with all sped into Germanie, to retaine a number of Saxons, and to bring them over into Britaine, to serue against the Scots and Pias in wages with Wostigerne.

At the same time there were amongst those Saxons two brethren, descended by rightfull linage of the princes of that nation, who bring reputed for valiant captains, appointed with the British commissaries for a certeine summe of monie to take vp their prescribed number of men, & to receiue charge of them as cozencels, aswell for their conuait ouer into Britaine, as also for their seruice there, after their arrival. The one of these two brethren was called Hengist or Engist, and the other Horsa, who hauing their appointed numbers once filled, contei-ning about ten thousand souldiers in the whole, they bestowed them abroad in thirtie hulks, hoies, and plaits, and in the same transported them ouer into Britaine, in the 449 yere after Christ, as our histories do affirme: where they were receiued with great ioy and gladnesse of Wostigerne, who trusted by their aid to ouercome his fierce and dreadfull enimies.

Therefore when they had refreshed themselves somewhat after their trauell by sea, they were sent forth with an other armie which Wostigerne had assembled of his owne subjects the Britains, to the frontiers of the enemies countrie, where at their first comming they passed ouer the riuer of Humber, before the Scots or Pias had knowledge that anie such people were come in support of the Britains to bid them battell. They being therefore amazed with the strangenesse of the thing, some of them fled into the inner parts of their countrie, & other that made but foxie shift, fell into the hands of the Saxons, who to begin their enterprize with blood, slawe all such as they could laie hands vpon, without anie respect of person. Great was the slaughter by them committed in all those parties where they passed, namelic about the riuer of Tine. And when they had made an end there, they entred into Northumberland, and so into the dales about Berwike, next adioining vnto Dieland, destroing all before them with fire and sword.

The British king in the meane time had sent vnto Dongall the king of Scots to come with all sped to support him against the dreadfull inuasion of the enemies, whose force being now increased with a power of Saxons, would worke much mischiefe, if the same were not the more speedilie in the beginning repelled: but hearing that the Saxons and Britains daile approached, he thought not good to tarie for the comming of the Scots, but hastied forth with his owne power to incounter his aduersaries, and rashlie giuing battell, he was ouercome, and thereby lost no small number of his people. In this conflict the Saxons wan them a great name for their high baliance, where contrarilie the Britains got them no small note of gillie cowardize, fighting so famtlic, that their captains had much adoe to cause them to keepe their ground, being readie still to haue run awaie: which their faintnesse of stomach being noted of Hengist, euen then put him in no small confidence that it should be an easie matter for him to conquire them at his pleasure, when time and occasion might serue thereto.

Th: Pias nation hauing receiued this grieuous ouerthrow at the hands of their cruel enemies, sent again an other ambassage vnto the Scottish king Congall, to signifie to him by way of lamentation, what losse had happened to them by that most cruel people the Saxons void of all religion and mercie, and what mischiefe by the same people was intent-ed, aswell against Scots as Pias, vnto the great danger of the utter ruine of both nations, if the enimies in time were not resisted. They that were sent, declared all this matter vnto king Congall, and as they had in commission, be fought him of speedie succors. Congall not onlie moued for the harins and losses of the Pias his friends and allies, but also much more for the likelihood of the imminent danger and perill towards himselfe and his owne people, determined speedilie to go with all his power, and to ioine with the Pias, as fullie resolved to preuent that mischiefe which was like to follow, if the violent rage of the enemies were not the soner resisted.

He sent word therefore to the Piasish king, that if he might keepe off the enemies by light skirmishes and incursions for a small time, he would come to his aid shortly, with all the whole puissance of his realme. And herewithall he commanded by open proclamation, that all those within his dominions, which were able to beare armour should by the twentith day after assemble together at the south side of Calidon wood, all and euerie of them bringing then and there with them vittels sufficient to serue them for two moneths. According to the which proclamation, there came together at the day and place assigned, about the number of 40000 able men, fit and mete for the warres. On the morrow after, when Congall had taken the musters & bew of his whole numbers, he set forward towards the place where he vnderstood that the king of the Pias as then lodged, who had likewise assembled his people, and in campe taried for the comming of the Scottish armie.

On the first day after, both the kings met together, and shewed great tokens of intire loue and friendship the one towards the other. After this they go to heare diuine seruice, where they make their deuout prayers vnto almighty God for their good sped and luckie successe in that tourne: which being done, they march forth toward the enemies, as then lieng in campe not past ten miles from them. Were at the first sight of the enemies, diuers of the Scots and Pias being stricken with feare to behold so great a multitude, as the like had not bene scene in those parties manie a day before, they flike awaie and secretlie hid themselves in the next woods. But the kings, to giue example to other, caused them that were thus flied awaie, to be sought out, & brought again into the campe, where they were hanged in open sight of all the armie.

The Saxons & Britains also vpon the approach of their enemies gathered their companies together, & maintenantlie herewith the Saxons encouraged with such comfortable speech as Hengist uttered a-mongest them, required to haue battell without delay: whose example the Britains following, shewed themselves also right willing thereto. Congall the Scottish king perceiuing the enemies to make readie for battell, went likewise amongst his folks, and exhorted them in best wile he could, to play the men. The like also did Galanus the Piasish king a-mongest his people, omitting nothing that might incourage them to fight manfullie. After this, the battell on both sides comming forward to some, the arrows and darts flue freshlie betwixt them, but neither part minding to giue place for all the shot, at length they ioined at handblowes, first the Britains in the right wing with the Scots in the left wing;

The Scots
and Pias
kings gather
their people to resist the Sax-
ons.

The Scots
and Pias
kings gather
their people to resist the Sax-
ons.

The Scots
and Pias
kings gather
their people to resist the Sax-
ons.

The Scots
and Pias
kings gather
their people to resist the Sax-
ons.

The Scots
and Pias
kings gather
their people to resist the Sax-
ons.

The Scots
and Pias
kings gather
their people to resist the Sax-
ons.

The Scots
and Pias
kings gather
their people to resist the Sax-
ons.

The Scots
and Pias
kings gather
their people to resist the Sax-
ons.

The Scots
and Pias
kings gather
their people to resist the Sax-
ons.

The Scots
and Pias
kings gather
their people to resist the Sax-
ons.

The Scots
and Pias
kings gather
their people to resist the Sax-
ons.

The Scots
and Pias
kings gather
their people to resist the Sax-
ons.

The Scots
and Pias
kings gather
their people to resist the Sax-
ons.

The Scots
and Pias
kings gather
their people to resist the Sax-
ons.

The Scots
and Pias
kings gather
their people to resist the Sax-
ons.

The Scots
and Pias
kings gather
their people to resist the Sax-
ons.

The Scots
and Pias
kings gather
their people to resist the Sax-
ons.

The Pias
enemies follow the Scots
for aid.

Cogall promised to the Pias.

Proouision
made by the Scots to aid
the Pias.

The Scottish
and Pias
kings assemble together
with their powers.

The Scots
and Pias
come within sight of the enemies.

The Scots
through come forth of them:
gills exhortation desire
battell.

The Scottish
and Pias
kings exhort
their people to fight valiant-
lie.

The battell
is begun.

The Britains flee.

A great tempest.

The Saxons close themselves together.

The Scots and Picts pursue the Britains.

The Saxons assault the Scots and Picts disorderd in pursuit of the Britains.

Hengist purposed at the first to make conquest of the Britains.

Hengist returneth to London.

Hengist offereth to send for more aid into Germany.

Hengist's offer is disliked of some of the nobilitie of Britaine.

The honors shewed unto Hengist by Alostigerne.

Britains sent to defend the borders, are distressed.

wing; but the Britains not able long to indure against the force of the Scots, gaue backe and fled. In the meane while came a great sholwer of raine, mixt with such a tempest of haile, that the hardiest there wished himselfe thence, the storme beating so fast upon them, that one might binneath see an other, so that the Scottishmen and Picts wist not whether were better to pursue the Britains that fled, or to keepe their places.

On the other part, the Saxons according to their maner in time of anie present danger, closed themselves togither and drew nere vnto their chiefe teins standard. Finallie the tempest no longer began to ceasse, but the Scots and Picts leauing their order of battell, fell to follow the chase of the Britains, supposing the victorie had bene wholie theirs. Which the Saxons (now after that the element began to cleare by) plainelie perceiuing, by commandement of Hengist their generall, assailed the Scots and Picts here and there dispersed about the spoile and slaughter of the Britains, and made such murder of them on euerie side where they found them, that pittie it was to behold. Those that escaped by flight, neuer staid till they were gotten into places faire enough out of danger. This was a blacke day with the Scots and Picts. Neither was it verie ioisfull to the Britains, of whome no small number died in the place by the enimies sword lamentable to see. Hengist hauing thus gotten the victorie, with-drew to Pothe, leauing those countries betwixt Tine and Ewe in the enimies handes, of purpose ceassing from further indamaging them, that the Britains might haue neighbours whome to feare: for that (as he thought) should make much for his purpose, already hauing determined to make a conquest of this Ile.

When summer then was well nere passed, he placed his souldiers in harbrough to lodge for the winter season, and went himselfe to London, where he counsell'd Alostigerne to send of his owne people to the borders of his enimies, to keepe the same from their inuasions till the next spring, against which time he promised to cause such notable numbers of his countriemen to come to his aid, as should suffice not onelie to vanquish the Scottishmen and Picts, but also utterlie to destroy both the nations, or at least wile to driue the more forth of the whole countrie. This offer vnto some of the nobilitie was not greatlie liked, as euer suspecting that which followed, least in time to come Hengist should seeke the dominion of the realme in placing his owne people, and expelling the former inhabitants. But Alostigerne did not onelie giue him most hartie thanks for those his offers, but also thewed by the maner of his interteinement, which he vsed towards him, that he thought he could not doe vnto him so much honor for such notable seruice as he had done already, and trusted he should doe hereafter. According to Hengist's aduise also, there was a crue of men of warre of Britains sent vnto the borders to the number of five thousand, who shortly after their comming thither, were quicklie dispatched and made awaie in sundrie skirmishes and incounters with the Scots and Picts, that assailed those places which they were appointed to defend.

Shortly after was sent thither also an other compaignie, double in number to the first, to redresse the deaths of their fellows; but they finding fortune as forward vnto them as the former had done before, sped much what a like, for in sundrie confli-duers of them being slaine, and diuers other by treason of the borderers themselves deliuered cap-tiue into the aduersaries hands, the residue that was left, perceiving in what danger they stood, thence they might not trust their owne countriemen, returned backe into the inner parts of the land, and so left the borders altogether unfurnished. In this meane while a new supplie of five thousand Saxons, with their wives and children, came ouer into this land, in eightene hoies, and amongst other came Hengist's wife and his daughter the ladie Korena. Shortly after king Alostigerne gaue vnto Hengist his Saxons a great part of the countrie called Lind-seie, with a castell of great strength called Thong-castre. Some haue written that Hengist required of Alostigerne so much ground as he might compass with an ore hide, and hauing that granted, he took a nightie ore hide, and cut it into small thongs, and so compassing about a right strong plot of ground with those thongs line wise, began there the foundation of a castell, which took name of those thongs, wherewith the plot of ground was first measured, and so was it called Thong-castell. But vpon what consideration so euer it took that name, certelie it is by record of all the Scottish histories, that there the Saxons first inhabited after their entring into Britaine.

When Hengist had set things in order for the placing of his people there in dwellings (appointed them by Alostigerne) according as seemed best vnto his politike head and craftie forecass, he took forth the souldiers and men of warre, ordered vnder certaine capteins and officers of bands, and led them forward by slow iournies as it were staing for the comming of the Britains. Alostigerne had gathered as then an huge host of his subjects, and appointed his generall lieutenant ouer them his sonne Alostigerne, a yong man of great force and valiantie, but so that he should be ordered in all things by the aduise and discretion of Hengist, whose authority for the warres he commanded chiefelie to be followed.

When both the armies of Saxons and Britains were met togither, Hengist led them ouer the riuer of Humber and Tine, marching directlie towards the place where he thought the enimies laie. The Scottish and Pictish kings, hauing knowledge of such preparation made by the Britains, they gathered their powers togither, to the number of 60000 men, furnished with provision of vittels for a long time. But before their comming to the riuer of Tine, vpon knowledge had that the Saxons and Britains were passed the same, they made straight towards them, in purpose to haue giuen battell without longer protracting of time: howbeit comming to the place where they were lodged, they found them so stronglie incamped, that no aduantage could be perceiued which waie they might be constrained to raise and come forth of their strength to receiue battell vpon some euen ground, which Hengist of purpose for a time seemed to deferre.

Betwixt them also and the armies of the two kings there was a ballie, in the botome full of mires and marish grounds, which the Scottishmen and Picts must needs passe, per they could find meanes to doe ante notable displeasure to the enimies. Wherefore at length they determined with turfe and fagots to make passage ouer those mires, which being accomplished in the night following, the next morning they passed ouer and got them vnto certaine hilles lieng right ouer against the Saxon and Pictish camps, some of them taking their lodgings vpon the brow of front of an hill so nere to the lodgings of their enimies, that they might throwe a dart into their campe: and hereof they took no small occasion to worke a feat against their aduersaries, to their great annoiance and vexation.

There was growing in that place, where they were

Some writers of Saxons comming into Britaine

Thong-castell

The Saxons first inhabited in Britaine

Alostigerne generall of the Britains

The Saxons and Britains against the Picts

60000 of Saxons and Britains to meet the enimies

Hengist's long time to giue battell

60

A pollicie of the Britains

The tumult and feare raised in the campe of the Saxons

Hengist calleth his people togither

Congals exhortation to the Scots

Hengist exhorteth the Saxons to fight manfully

The Scots and Picts giue the charge

The Saxons in danger to lose the ouerthrow

An ambush of three thousand men en, returned and so left the this meane Sarons, with into this land,

r came Ven-

lorena Short-hengist & his called Kind-alled Thongngist required
night compas
anted, he toke
all thongs, and lot of ground
were the four-
f those thongs,
st measured,

But upon what ie, certaine it s, that there the ring into Wyl-

der for the plas (appointed emed best into he toke forth red under cers, and led them staign for the rne had galhe
as, and appoin-
them his sonne force and bali-
ed in all things
ngist, whose au-
ed chieftie to be

s and Wiltains
ouer the riuers irealie towarde niles laie. The g knowledge of ns, they gathe-

number of 60000
ittels for a long
to the riuer of the Sarons and y made streight uen battell with wbett comming
they found them
antage could be e constrained to
th to receiue bat-

hengist of pur-

mies of the two ome full of mires ostishmen & Wils
d meanes to do
nies. Wherefore se and fagots to sch being accom-
ext morning they Wiltish campes,
s upon the blow odgings of the e a dart into their small occasion to ries, to their great place, where they

were

politic of
the Scots.

The multitude
of the Scots
were raised in the camp of the Sarons.

hengist called his pro-pagandist.

Engels exhortation to
the Scots.

hengist exhortation to the Sarons to fight
manfully.

The Scots
gave the charge.

The Sarons
were to be the overthrown.

The Sarons
were to be the over-
thrown.

were thus incamped, verie much of that kind of heath or ling, which the Scottishmen call hadder. Of which heath or hadder, they gathered a great quanti-tie together, and binding it in bundels like unto fa-gots, in the night season they set the same on fire, tumbling it downe the hill, on that side where the Sarons laie. The wind in that instant being somewhat aloft, caused these bundels of ling to blase and burne vehementlie, and hereto standing that waies forth, droue the flame so fireinable amongst the tents and cabins of the Sarons, that the fire catching in the straw and twigs which they had couched together vnder them in stead of beds, increased the feare amongst the soldiers wonderfullie, by reason that the blasing bundels of the ling or hadder, still comming downe the hill vpon them, seemed as though the same had fallen from aboue; and euen forth of the heauen it selfe.

Great was the tumult and noise throughout the whole campe, with such roing of beastes, and running vp and downe both of them and of the horses which were there in the campe, that if heauen and earth had gone together, there could not haue bene a more terrible noise nor clamor. At length, when the soldiers had done what they could to quench the fire, and to appease the trouble, not without some vp-rore and disorder raised on each side, they got them with their armor and weapons forth into the next field, which hengist himselfe perceiving (having first done what he could to stay them) inuironed with a companie of his choicest men of warre, he got him vp vnto a little hill next adioining, and there gaue knowledge by the sound of a trumpet that all his people should draw thither vnto him. After this, when they were come together, he disposed them in order of battell with all diligence, abiding for the spring of the dale, to vnderstand more certeinlie the meaning of his enemies.

The Scots and Wiltis supposing the enemies to be farre disordered, by reason of the fire defended downe from the hill, fullie determined to assaile them in their camps: but vpon their approach to the same, perceiving how the Sarons were gotten forth, and stood readie in good order of battell, min-ding to defend their ground, both the kings thought it best to tarie till the morning, yet they made anie exploit, for doubt of perils that might befall thereof.
In the breake of the daie Congall came amongst his people, exhorting them to remember their woythie elders, and by their example to chafe rather to die in defense of their countrie & ancient liberties, than by cowardize to saue a dishonest life, which (if their chance was to be vanquished) they should passe in great thalidome and miserie. The Wiltish king also with like words encouraged his men to do val-iantlie. Neither was hengist slow in perswading his Sarons to plaie the men, that obtaining the victorie they might deliuer themselves from terror of all en-mies from thenceforth in Britaine.

Whilist he was thus exhorting his people, the Scots and Wiltis with great force and violence began to giue the charge vpon him, which whilist the Sarons and Wiltains went about to defend, they were beaten downe by heaps so fireckle on each side, that the discomfiture had light vpon them forthwith, had not hengist by sound of trumpet called forth about three thousand fresh men to their succors, which he had placed in an ambush a little before the spring of the daie within a thicke groue of wood, fast by his campe, appointing them to remaine there in a readi-nesse, to come at his call, vpon what danger soeuer happened. These most fireckle setting vpon the backes of the Scots, brought them streight out of all order: for they being occupied with the other Sar-ons before, and now assailed of these behind, they had vnnearth some for anie aduantage to turne their weapons. In the meane time the Wiltis being matched with the Britains did put them to flight, and chased them out of the field, not ceassing to pursue them in the chase, till they came to a riuer in the which a great number of them were drowned, as they ieo-pardied to passe ouer the same, and to saue themselues by swimming. On the other side, the Scots being fore handled by the Sarons, both before and behind, were at the length constrained to giue ground and breake forth by flight, & so to escape the cruell hands of the enemies. Some were slaine in the chase, and some taken prisoners. The residue getting away, fled streight to the Wiltis: but Congall himselfe, through helpe of his household seruants escaped to the top of an high hill, and saued himselfe all wounded as he was.

The Wiltis returning from the chase, and understanding how the Sarons had giuen the Scots the ouerthrow, and that they were now marching forward to encounter also with them, determined not to abide their comming at that time. And so night approching yet the Sarons had got sight of them, order was giuen by commandement of their king, that all their carriage, and a great quantitie of logs and fagots, should be placed and piled together before them, and in the darke of the night to be set on fire, which being executed according to the appointment, when the fire was once kindled, the Wiltis with the Scots which were got vnto them, departed as secre-lie as they might, and staid not to make atwaie, till they were farre enough out of the danger of the Sar-ons. Hengist hauing thus got the victorie, and perceiving no enemie abroad to bid him battell, mustered his men, and found that he had lost in this tour-nie as good as foure thousand of one and other. After this, hee withdreweth to York, and leaving his armie there, went himselfe vnto London, where he was receiued with ioy inough by king Closti-gerne.

Shortlie after, vpon knowledge that Aurelius Ambrose, and Uter, the sonnes of king Constantine prepared to come ouer with a mightie armie of Armorike Britains, and other Frenchmen, to claime the crowne of Britaine, as lawfullie descended to them from their father: the Sarons were sent for out of the north parts, and had dwellings appointed vnto them in Kent, to be at hand if need were to resist anie such attempted inuasion. But shortlie after, for a policie, hengist caused it to be vniued abroad, that the Scots and Wiltis meant easines to inuade the British confines, & therefore was there an other power of Sarons called into the land, and placed in the north parts, to defend the same against the Scots and Wiltis. Decca the sonne of hengist had the leading of these Sarons, who brought them ouer, being ten thousand men of warre, in fiftie plaits, and fiftie hies. They brought with them also their wiues and children, and settled themselves in the north parts betwixt the riuer of Humber and the borders of the Wiltish dominions. And euen then it began to take the name of Northumberland, which is as you wold say, the land by north the riuer of Humber, and so it doth continue.

Shortlie after, Clostigerne forsaking his lawfull wife, married the ladie Korena or Kowen, hengists daughter, to the high offense of God, and great displeasure of his subiects. And in the meane time, De-cca not attempting anie exploit against the Scots and Wiltis, rather sought to get into his hands all the fortresses betwixt Tine and Humber, euen from the east sea to the west: which his purposed intent he greatlie aduanced, winning castles and fortresses there

The Wilt-
tains put to flight by the Wiltis.

The Scots
forced to flee.

Congall was wounded, but yet escapeth
through helpe
of his household
seruants.

The policie of the Wiltis to escape out of danger.

Aurelius Ambrose & Uter,
sons to king Constantine.

The Sarons
placed in Kent.

A new power of Sarons
came ouer
with their captain Decca.

Northumber-
land when it first began to be so called.

Clostigerne
married hengast's daughter.

York in possession of Hengist.

Maxtignerne deposed by his subjects. Maxtigner chose to govern the Britains. The Britains require aid of the Scots and Picts against the Saxons.

The answer of Congall K. of Scots unto the British messengers.

Upon what conditions Congall consented to support the Britains.

A league concluded betwixt Scots Picts and Britains.

there in those parties, some by force, and some by surrender: and amongst other places of importance, he first got possession of Yorke, and feigning accusations against manie of the nobles and gentlemen, surmising that they would betray the countie unto the Scots & Picts, he put diuerse of them to death, some secretly, and others openly, as consuit of such offenses as were forged and laid against them.

Hereupon the Britains for the stay of such mischief as they saw at hand, deposed Maxtigner from his kingly seat, and placed his sonne Maxtigner in his come, which being done, ambassadoers were sent both unto the Scots and Picts, to require their aid and support against the cruell oppression of the Saxons, who sought not onlie by craftie meanes and fraudulent waies to attaine the dominion of the whole Ile, but also to extinguish and utterly subuert the faith of Christ, and the vse of his religion throughout the same. Therefore they earnestly desired the Scottish and Pictish kings, to assist them against such common enemies as had bene called into the realme, not by publike consent of the nobles, but onlie by the private commandement and ordinance of Maxtignerne, to helpe as well toward the subduing of the Scots and Picts, as also to repress all commotions of the Britains, which they might happlie raise against him for his wicked tyrannie vsed amongst them, as his guiltie conscience might put him still in feare of.

The Scottish king Congall (unto whom first the ambassadoers were sent) for answer declared, that he was loathe to vnderstand into what danger the miserable christians of Britaine were thus fallen, and therefore if nothing else might moue him to ioin with the Britains against the Saxons, yet that were sufficient cause to inforce him to doe the best he could, to helpe to deliuer the whole Ile from such an ethnike generation, as not onlie vsed the rites and ceremonies of their false religion, and that openly among the christians, with doing sacrifice in the honor and worship of their hellish gods, to the great horror and terrible offense of the beholders consciences; but also sought by all meanes they could devise, how to destroy and quench viterlie the faith of our Saviour Christ in all places where they might get the upper hand.

He promised therefore to imploie his whole puissance to recover out of the enemies hands all such countries as laie betwixt the frontiers of his dominion and the river of Humber, and further to aid the Britains to drive them quite out of the Ile, if the Britains would assure him, from thenceforth neuer to make claime, title nor interest, to any of the countries aforesaid, lieng betwixt the said river of Humber and the confines of his realme; but to leaue the same in the hands of the Scottishmen and Picts, to haue hold and inioy for euermore in quiet: which to performe, the ambassadoers had (amongest other things) already promised in name of all the British nation, as a recompense or meed to haue for support and succors of the Scots. The like answer the same ambassadoers receiued of the Pictish king, and returning therewith unto Maxtigner, declared afore him and his counsell how they had sped.

Shortlie after, for the moze and better assurance of all promises, couenants and articles passed betwixt the Scottishmen, Picts, and Britains, there was an amitie and bond of peace now renewed, ratified and established, according to the tenor of the ancient league, which had bene concluded in times past betwixt them, with some new conditions of agreement included in the same: all old iniuries being ended and quieted clearelie betwixt them, so that no cause of grudge or displeasure might be thought to remaine in remembrance. The first enterprise put in execution after the concluding of this league, was made by the Scots against Decca and his Saxons, which (as partly ye haue heard) had nestled themselves betwixt the rivers of Tyne and Humber.

Against those Scots, as they were verie earnestlie occupied in ouerthrowing castles and towers, with slaughter of such Saxons as stood at defense, Decca commeth into the field with an armie ready to encounter with them, but perceiuing the multitude of his enemies to be such, as he doubted least he should not be well able to match with them, he staid a while from giuing the onset: but in the end perceiving he could not retire backe but to his great disadvantage, he boldly gaue signe to his people to set upon their enemies: which they fiercely executing, it was hard to tell for a while to whether part the victorie would incline. But at length the Saxons not able to susteine the force of the Scots, ouerpressing them with multitude, began to giue backe: which Decca perceiuing, did what he could to hem them in from running awaie, but yet notwithstanding all that he could doe, feare at length ouercomming regard to their captiues commandement, shame of rebuke was quite set apart, and so they toke them to their feet, and fled awaie so fast as they might, the Scots pursuing after them amaine.

Decca yet escaped with diuerse of his nobles, and coming to the mouth of Humber, got a ship, and sailed forth in the same with great danger, till at length he arriued within the Thames. The slaughter of the Saxons vpon the discomfiture was great, speciallie in the chase, for the Scottishmen calling to remembrance that they had to doe with infidels, and with the enemies of the christian faith, were so eager vpon them, that they saved few or none that fell into their hands. About the same time was Maxtigner entered into Kent against Hengist and his Saxons there, and encountering with them in battell, slue ten thousand of them, and chased the residue south of that countie. Thus Kent returned unto the Britains, and the countries beyond Humber northwards unto the Scots and Picts, according to the tenor of the league before mentioned.

Hengist and his sonne Decca (who a little before this battell in Kent was come unto his father) with the residue of them that escaped, hasted with all speed toward Northumberland, in purpose to remaine in that countie till they had recovered their strength by some power to be sent ouer unto them out of their owne countie: but being repelled with no small slaughter from thence by the Scots and Picts, they withdrew vnto the mouth of Humber, where getting certelie vessels, they passed ouer into Saronie, leauing a great sort of their nation behind them, dispersed abroad here and there in this Ile, as fortune then best serued. Maxtigner hauing got the victorie, as before is mentioned, vsed not the same verie cruellie, for taking onlie from the Saxons which were taken prisoners their armor and weapons, he suffered them to depart into their countie: other of the same nation being but husbandmen, and as it were poore laborers of the ground, he permitted to tarie in the countie with their wiues & children, as seruants unto the Britains.

After this, Maxtigner gaue order for the repairing of churches, and restoring of the christian religion into the state of the former puritie thereof, as then sore decayed, partly through the euill example taken by dallie conuersation amongst the Saxons, and partly also by the infectiue heresie of the Pelagians, as then mightilie spread ouer the most part of Britaine. At length the said Maxtigner through treason of his

The Saxons must needs be driven out of Northumberland.

The Saxons encounter with the Scots.

The Saxons banquished by the Scots.

Decca fleeth by sea into Kent.

The Saxons banquished by Britains and expelled out of Kent.

The Saxons flee out of Britaine.

Maxtigner doth the victorie modestly.

The heresie of the Pelagians.

Stepmother was Maxtigner kingdome, the Saxons reigne people red thus vnto causing due to be executed of all inuasive reigne power his subjects towards him as by all other also to renew with like concluded lastlie. But notwithstanding to auoid all lie after Maxtigner till shifts, at Britaine, fle into Kent maintained the King Ambrosius Constantine calling Maxtigner house and a him, according to his father had said that this which are called as conueller illusion (a man) do liener of car.

In this like tale of not long but abiding piers 148 parted out rose a woman ther, so other the matter my pere, for length which increased looked for neath the led them by Gods told then a spirit, and that the pleat In the th maiters and find person, table est comfort and hope length offenses uen from should a pumpe cloud, winke, lie ther in great safetie

Stepmother reuenced be- rict Maxtigner and Picts.

Maxtigner banquished by the Scots.

Maxtigner doth the victorie modestly.

Maxtigner doth the victorie modestly.

Maxtigner doth the victorie modestly.

Maxtigner doth the victorie modestly.

Maxtigner doth the victorie modestly.

Maxtigner doth the victorie modestly.

Maxtigner doth the victorie modestly.

Maxtigner doth the victorie modestly.

Maxtigner doth the victorie modestly.

Maxtigner doth the victorie modestly.

Maxtigner doth the victorie modestly.

Maxtigner doth the victorie modestly.

Maxtigner doth the victorie modestly.

Maxtigner doth the victorie modestly.

The first en-
cluding of this inst Deca and ue heard) had s of Time and

The Scots
inuate the bo-vers of De-
thumberland,

berie earnest-
s and towers,
ood at defense,
i armie readie aining the multioubted least he them, he staled
the end percei-
his great disads people to set lie executing, it
r part the biao-
saxons not able expressing them ie: which Deca n them in from ding all that he ning regard to ame of rebuke
e them to their ght, the Scots

The Saxons
incounter
with the Scots.

The Saxons
banquished by
the Scots.

his nobles, and got a ship, and t danger, till at
s. The slaughter was great, spe-
en calling to re-
h infidels, and
th, were so eger
one that fell into s Cloxtimer en-
and his Saxons
battell, due ten due worth of that

Deca fleeth by sea into Kent.

to the Britains, northwards un-
o the tenour of o a little before his father) with ed with all speed
e to remaine in d their strength to them out of repelled with no
scots and Pias, umber, where uffed over into r nation behind in this Ile, as having got the ed not the same om the Saxons
rimoz and wea-
their countrie:
nd, he permitted
iues & children,

The Saxons
banquished by Britains and expelled out of Kent.

The Saxons
fle out of Britaine.

for the repairing
ian religion incof, as then fore ample taken by rons, and part elagians, as et of Britaine.
treason of his stepmother

The heretic of the Delagians.

stepmother Korena was poisoned, and died. Then was Cloxtigeme againe restored to the rule of the kingdome, first forced by oth to promise neuer to aid the Saxons, nor to receiue by way of aid ante forreine people into the realme. Cloxtigeme then restored thus vnto the crowne, shewed such diligence in causing due administration of iustice without rigor to be executed, and prouision made for the resisting of all inuasions that might be attempted by anie forreine power, that his praise was great amongst all his subiects, who to shew their good willes like wise towards him as to their naturall prince, were not slacke in honoring him as well by gifts and presents, as by all other manner of waies. He found means also to renew the league with the Scots and Pias, with like conditions and articles, as it was concluded lastlie betwixt them and his sonne Cloxtimer.
But notwithstanding his politike proceeding, thus to auoid all inconuenience that might happen; short-lie after Hengist returned, and that by force and sub-till shifts, at length got possession of the more part of Britaine, so that the Britains were constrained to fle into Wales, whither also Cloxtigeme fled, and remained there a certaine time, till at length Aurelius Ambrosius, and Aler, the sonnes of king Constantine came ouer out of little Britaine, and besieging Cloxtigeme in a castell, burnt him with the house and all, when they could not other wise come by him, according to that which Merlin the British soothsaier had prophesied before. It is soothlie supposed that this Merlin was got by a spirit of that kind which are called Incubi, that is to understand, such as conueiung mans seed from him (and there with by illusion taking vpon them the shape and figure of man) doe lie with women, and vse them after the maner of carnall copulation.

In this place Hector Boetius by the way reciteth a like tale of two, of such illusions of spirits, wrought not long before his time in Scotland, which somewhat abridging the same we haue here inserted. In the yeere 1480, saith he, it chanced as a Scottish ship departed out of the Forth towards Flanders, there rose a wonderfull great tempest of wind and weather, so outrageous, that the maister of the ship with other the mariners wondered not a little what the matter ment, to see such weather at that time of the yeere, for it was about the middelt of summer. At length when the furious pirrie & rage of winds still increased, in such wise that all those within the ship looked for present death, there was a woman underneath the hatches, called vnto them aboue, and willed them to throw hir into the sea, that all the residue by Gods grace might yet be saued: and there vpon told them, how she had bene haunted a long time with a spirit, daile comming vnto hir in mans likeness, and that euen as then he was with hir, vsing his fil-thie pleasure after the maner of carnall copulation.
In the ship there chanced also to be a priest, who by the maisters appointment going downe to this woman, and finding hir like a most wretched and desperate person, lamenting hir great misfortune and miserable estate, vfed such wholesome admonitions and comfortable aduertisements, willing hir to repent and hope for mercie at the hands of God, that at length the seeming right penitent for hir greuous offences committed, and fetching sundrie sighes euen from the bottome of hir heart, being witnessse (as should appeare) of the same, there issued forth of the pumpe of the ship a foule and euill fauored blacke cloud, with a mightie terrible noise, flame, smoke and stinke, which presentlie fell into the sea: And sudden-lie ther vpon the tempest ceased, and the ship passing in great quiet the residue of hir iourne, arrived in safetie at the place whither she was bound.

Not long before the hap hereof, there was in like manner a yong man dwelling in Carroth, within a village there, not passing 14 miles from Aberdine, verie faire & comelie of shape, who declared by waie of complaint vnto the bishop of that diocesse, how there was a spirit which haunted him in shape of a woman, so faire and beautifull a thing, that he neuer saw the like, the which would come into his chamber at nights, and with pleasant intisements allure him to haue to doe with hir, & that by no maner of means he could be rid of hir. The bishop like a wise man ad-uised him to remoue into some other countrie, and to giue himselfe to fasting and prayer, so to auoid his hands of that wicked spirit. The yong man following the bishops counsell, within a few daies was de-liuered from further temptation.

About the same time also, there was in the coun-trie of Spar, a yong gentlewoman of excellent beau-tie, and daughter vnto a noble man there, refusing sundrie wealthie mariages offered to hir by hir father, and other friends. At length she promised with child, and being rigorously compelled by hir parents to tell who was the father, she confessed that a certaine yong man used nightlie to come vnto hir, and kept hir companie, and sometimes in the day also, but how or from whence he came, or by what meanes he went awaie, she was not able to declare. Hir parents not greatly crediting hir words, laid diligent watch, to vnderstand what he was that had defiled their house: and within three daies after, vpon signification giuen by one of the maidens, that the forni-cator was at that verie instant with their daughter, incontinentlie there vpon, making fast the doores, they enter the chamber with a great manie of torches and lights, where they find in their daughters arnes a foule monstrous thing, verie horrible to behold. There a number comming hastilie in, to behold this euill fauored sight, amongst other there was a priest of verie honest life, not ignorant (as was thought) in knowledge of holie scripture.

This priest (all other being afraid) and some of them running their waies, began to recite the beginning of Saint Johns gospel, and comming to these words, verbum caro factum est, suddenlie the wicked spirit making a verie sore and terrible roaring noise, flue his waies, taking the rofe of the chamber awate with him, the hangings and coverings of the bed being also burnt therewith. The gentlewoman was yet preserved, and within three or foure daies after was deliuered of such a mishapen thing, as the like before had not bene seene, which the midwives and women, such as were present at hir laboz, to a-uoid the dishonor of hir house, immediatlie burnt in a great fire, made in the chamber for the same intent. Thus much out of Hector Boetius, which, with more, he hath written to proue that all is not feined which is written of the illusions of diuels and euill spirits, the credit whereof I leaue with the author.

Now to returne where I left touching Aurelius Ambrose. He shall vnderstand, that he hauing once subdued and dispatched his aduersarie Cloxtigeme, determined to make warres against Hengist and his Saxons, to proue if his chance might be to recouer the realme out of their hands, and so to restore againe the christian religion. But first yer he attempted anie exploit against the enimies, he sent ambassadors both vnto Congall the Scottish king, and also vnto one Loth a towardlie yong gentleman, and of verie comelie personage, as then reigning among the Pias, requiring them both to aid him in so necessarie an enterprise as he had in hand against the enimies of Christ and his religion. Where vpon both these kings, weling with themselves the dutie of all christian princes, in respect of the aduancement of
the

A yong man haunted with a spirit.

Aurelius
Ambrose parapolety to make warres against the Saxons.

Ambassadors
sent vnto the Scots and Pias to require their aid
against the Saxons.

The Scots
and Brits promise to aid
the Britains
against the Saxons.
The league renewed be= twixt Bri= tains, Brits,
and Scots.

the cause of faith, and suppressing of ethnike idolatry, promised their helpe to the uttermost of their powers against the Herons, who had in such tyrannike sort subverted and abolished the christian profession within the British confines. And therefore the old league, according to the articles and covenants afore time concluded betwixt the three nations, was once againe renewed, and an armie prepared by exhortie of them, to meet at a place and day appointed, for the better expedition of this their attempted voyage.

Burelins Embrose ma-keth an ozati-
 on.

First Aurelianus Ambrose, with such power as he brought with him forth of France, & joining thereto a great multitude of those Britains which had escaped the Saxons hands, either by withdraving themselves into Wales, or else by conueysing themselves into the countreies of the Scots and Picts, set forth toward the Scottish armie. But first calling together those Britains that he had about him, and going vp to a little hill, where he might be heard of them all, he made a long oration by waie of complaint, of the great iniuries and cruell practises vsed by Hengist, against the linage of king Constantine, and the whole estate of the British common-wealth: also of the horrible persecution made by him and his people the Saxons, against the professors of the christian religion. All which matter he handled in words so pittifull, his talke yet fauouring of the Romane eloquence, that the minds of the souldiers being kindled therewith, required nothing but battell, as men not doubting but by his wise and politike conduct to achieve some glorious victorie. And to the end all thing might be done in better order, according to his appointment, immediatlie they proclaimed him king. Which was by account of the Scottish chronicles, in the yere 498, after that Maximigierne with his sonne Maximian had reigned 17 yeres in the whole.

Murcius
Ambrose pro claimed king of Britains.

Commanus
generall of the Scots.

Nothing of the Dogs.

Aurelius in this tyme being established king of Britaine passeth forth with his people, and within six daies after met with the armies of the Scots and Picts. Generall of the Scots at that time was one Conranus brother to king Congall, who was troubled with the gout, so that he could not come himselfe in person. Both the Pictish king was there himselfe amongst his people, verie desirous to shew some proofe of his manlie prowesse and manhood. Aurelius Ambrose shewed all the honor that might be deuised, as well to the one as to the other of those two nations, promising to requite them with as much friendship when time and occasion should craue the like assistance. These three nightlie armies therefore being thus assembled, marched forth towarths a place called Spahschell, where they understood that Bengist with his power as then did sojorne. Where when both the camps were pitched, and one lieng not farre from the other: at the first certaine light skirmishes were procured by both parts betwixt the light horsemen, therewith at length being the more prouoked to displeasure, they come into the field with their whole maine battels, verie fiercelle countring ech other, so that (as it appeared) their force was not so great, but that their mortall hate was euen as much, or rather more, if the histories saie right.

The Albions and Saxons
in counter in battel.

The Atmosphere Breathe

The Armieske Britains with a new kind of order in their fight, sore troubled the Saxons, in persuing their battels, with their men arrayed in certaine wards, broad behind and narrow before, wedgewise. The Scots also & Pils bare downe both the wings of the Saxons, in such manner, that the standards of all the thre nations, Scots, Pils, and Britains, were at point almost to meet, having made waie thereunto through the middest of their enemies. Wherewith the Saxons (being sore discouraged) began to grue backe; and finallie, notwithstanding all that Hengist could saie or doo to haue slaid them, they fell to running awaie, and fled amaine, which when he thoughtlie saw, & perceiued that there was no recouerie, he himselfe (in manner the last man that abode) fled likewise his waies out of the field, with an ambushment of ho:men about him, but being pursued by Aurelius verie fiercely, he was run through the bodie by him with a speare, and so was there slaine out of hand, in the 488 yere of Christ, and 40 after his comming into this Ile. whol- licit the other of the Saxons conuered his sonne We- ra (being also sore wounded) awaie with them vp in to the next mounteins, whither they fled for their re- fuge, leaving the dead bodie of his father Hengist in the field, to the great reproch, there to be spoiled and abused of his enimies.

Aurelius Ambrose hauing thus got the better hand of his enimies, halsted forth with all speed into London, where hauing both the citie and towne deliuered into his hands, he recovered the whole plant from the possession of the Saxons: and such of them as were apt men, able to beare armor, and to serue in the warres, he commanded to depart forth of the land. The other that were minded to tarrie behind their fellows that were thus forced to depart, became subiects to the Britains, and couenanted to become christians. ¶ Thus much haue I written touching Aurelius Ambrose, according to the report of the Scottish writers, but more hereof ye may read in the historie of England, where ye shall find this matter set forth more at large. For that which we write here, is but to shew in what sort the Scottish writers make relation of the warres which their nation had with the Saxons, when they began first to set foot here in this land.

To our purpose then. In the meane time Aurellus hauing thus recovered the land out of the Sarons hands, and now remaining at London, did all the honoz he could imagine, both vnto Loth the Pictish king, and also vnto Conranus generall of the Scottishmen, and knowledging how that by their aid chiefly he had got the vpper hand of his enimies, and so he willed to haue it notified amongst his subiects. Hæreto he caused the league to be renewed betwixt the Scots, Picts, & Britains, the ancient ordinance for the countries beyond Yumber, being appointed to remaine vnto the Scottishmen and Picts: also that the Sarons should be repeated common enimies to all the threë nations, and that vpon inuasion made by anie fozen power, the Scots, Picts, and Britains, should aid one another as occasion serued.

This league being concluded with these articles of covenants, was the more strongly confirmed, by reason of such affinity and alliance as then also ensued. For whereas Aurelius had two sisters, the one named Anne, and the other Ada, virgins both; Anne being the elder, was given in marriage unto King Loth, by whose certaine peeres after he had issue two sonnes, Sporobed, and Malwan or Calwan, with a daughter called Thametes: Ada being the younger sister was married unto Conranus, generall (as is said) of the Scottish armie. Whobeing liued not past two yeares after, but died in trauell of child, which also died with the mother: and so ended the alliance of Aurelius and Conranus. The Britains being deliuered through the victorie and means afore rehearsed from the cruell hands of the Saxons, inioined full peace certaine yeares after, but in the meane time diuers of those Saxons which were licenced to remaine in Britaine, counterfeiting to become christians, vsed neuertheless to make sacrifice vnto idols, according to the manner of the gentiles, whereof their priests bring accused and condemned, suffered death by fire for that offence.

sense, accord Whilste these king of the S departed this na, otherwile
pompe and ac
uer the Scoti
and glozie.

Contr. 4-
WKS.
Contraries
great king
of Scotland
col. H.B.

After his great rebellion admitted. It is our 512, and Anastasius, the emperor, being that the former age, should be the governor of the masters, to discipline, according to the order of the quietness, no matter to his the disturbance within the circuit round all manner of business with or kin.

And among stood to be used this (as he th husbandmen a
ing euill intro hands, durst n
by reason whe
red anie man out remedie to therefore, tha
the maner of sired in a bo
fours thereto
that those wh wards be foun
matter plaine
then be sure to
of their offen

This custom inditements, Concranus him
present at affi ministred, eit within some fo
the iustices for Scots thus stu people, Aurel
sicke of a cons weakenesse, th
despaired; the Hengist being power of Sax Boetius saith)
land.

checking papers at office

areling embryo fell
of a consumption.

...ca and
...scientia
...turne into
...pitane.

10

sense, accordinglie as the law did then appoint them. Whilest these things were thus in hand, Congall king of the Scots being worne with long sicknesse, departed this life, and was buried in the Ile of Jona, otherwise called Colmekill, with all kinglie pompe and accustomed ceremonies. He reigned ouer the Scottismen about 20 yeares in great fame and glorie.

After his deceasse, his brother Conranus with a great reioicing of all the Scottish nation was admitted k. in the yeare after the birth of our Saviour 512, and the 22 of the reigne of the emperor Anastasius. This Conranus otherwise called Conranus, being established king, first tooke order that the sonnes of his brother Congall being within age, should be brought vp in the Ile of Man, vnder the gouernance of certeine wise instructors & scholemaisters, to be trained in learning and vertuous discipline, according to an ancient ordinance therof made and enacted. Also doubting least peace and quietnesse, now after long warres, should minister matter to his people of raising some commotion, to the disturbance of all ciuill order & politike gouernment within his realme, he rode as it had bene in circuit round about the same, making inquirie of all maner offenders, on whome he caused due punishment to be executed, without respect either of kith or kin.

And amongst other enormities which he vnderstood to be vsed in maner through all his countreies, this (as he thought) was most grieuous, that the husbandmen and other commons of the countrie, being euill intreated and misused at the gentlemen's hands, durst not complaine, nor procure anie redres; by reason wherof, when they were oppressed, or suffered anie manner of wrong or iniurie, they were without remedie to haue the same reformed; he ordeined therefore, that the names of all such offenders, with the maner of their offenses, should be secretlie registered in a booke euerie yeare, by certeine inquisitors thereto chosen and appointed. And if it chanced that those which were thus accused, might afterwards be found guiltie before the kings iustices by matter plainelie proued against them; they should then be sure to be punished according to the measure of their offenses.

This custome of accusations, commonlie called inditeiments, continueth euen vnto these our daies. Conranus himselfe (as is reported) vsed much to be present at assises and sessions to see the lawes duellie ministered, either else to passe the time in hunting within some forest or chase, nere to the place where the iustices sat. Now whilest Conranus king of Scots thus studied for the good gouernement of his people, Aurelius Ambrose the king of Britaine fell sicke of a consumption, which brought him to such weakenesse, that all recouerie of health in him was despaired; wherof Decca and Pascentius sonnes to Hengist being aduertised, returned with a mightie power of Saxons into Britaine, which (as Hector Boetius saith) they named at that present Hengists land.

After the brother of Aurelius late also at the same time sore sicke of a flir in the parties of Wales, so that to auoid dissention that was raised among the Britains, about the appointing of a generall to go against the enemies, Aurelius euen sicke as he was, caused himselfe to be caried forth in a litter; with whose presence his people were so encouraged, that incountering with the Saxons they won the victorie, although with such losse on their side, that Aurelius was glad to take truce for the space of foure moneths, and therewith breaking vp his campe, went into Wiltshire, and sent ambassadours vnto the Scottish and Pictish kings for aid against the time when the truce should expire, which was granted, and so he prouided for all things ready for the warres against the appointed time of their assemble. Decca also sent his brother Pascentius into Germanie for more aid, but as some write, he was driuen by contrarie winds into Ireland, & getting a great power of men together there, he came backe to his brother with the same. But whether he had those men out of Ireland or Germanie, sure it is that the power of the Saxons was greatlie increased therewith. In the meane time died Aurelius Ambrose, who was poisoned by a malicious monkie, a Saxon borne, named Copia or Cope (as some booke haue) that tooke vpon him to be skilfull in physicke, and a monkie by profession. His death was sore lamented of the Britains: but contrariwise, the Saxons reioiced greatlie thereof, so that immediatlie after, Decca with his power inuadeth the Britains, vsing great crueltie in all places where soeuer he came.

In the meane time the Scottish and Pictish armies were come forward towards Aurelius, according to promise made vnto his ambassadours; but when his death was certeinlie knowne amongst them, the capitains and leaders of both those armies, resolved to returne home againe, and so they did, for that they doubted in what state and order things should stand amongst the Britains now after the deceasse of their late king. After the death of Aurelius Ambrose, his brother Uter was made king of Britaine, and falling in loue with the wife of Gothlois duke of Cornewall, he did not onelie force hir to lie with him; but also to the end he might inioy hir the more freelie, he ceased not to pursue hir husband to rid him out of the waie, whome at length he tooke within a castell into the which he was fled, & forthwith caused him to be executed, surmising mater against him, for that he had forsaken one of the capitains called Paschaliod, in battell against the Saxons. By the wife of this Gothlois, Uter had issue the great Arthur, and because he had no legitimat sonne, he appointed that Arthur should succeed him in gouernement of the realme. Herewith Loth the Pictish king was not a little moued, disdainning that Arthur being a bastard, and begot of another mans wife in adulterie, should be preferred before his sons the rightfull heires of the British kingdome: and therefore by ambassadours he did what he could to dissuade Uter from making anie such ordinance. But when he saw that he could not remoue him from his opinion, he thought best to content himselfe with silence, till the time serued better for his purpose. At length when the wars were againe reuelled betwixt Uter and Decca the Saxon king, Loth in reuenge of the iniurie done to him and his children, ioined himselfe to the Saxons, and was with them at the battell, in which the Britains got the victorie by the presence of saint Germane that holie bishop of Aurer, as the Scottish writers make mention. Which battell as the same is set forth by Hector Boetius, because it touched the state of the Picts, we haue thought good here to expresse.

It was therefore about the feast of Easter, when the armies came into the field, the Saxons with the Picts on the one side, & the Britains on the other, of whom no small number (being either growen to be idolaters through conuersation with the Saxons, either els infected with the heresie of the Pelagians) euen there in campe, by hearing such good sermons as saint Germane preached amongst them, were conuerted to the true beliefe, receiuing at the same time the sacrament of the Lords bodie, together in companie with other of the faithfull christians. Finally when both parties were ready to giue battell,

J. ii. saint

Aurelius Ambrose poisoned by a monkie.

The Scottish armies returne home againe.

Uter begat Arthur.

S. Germane preacheth vnto the campe.

saunt Germaine tooke vpon him to haue the leading of the foze ward, wherein he had all the pæffes and ecclesiasticall miniffers, giuing commandement, that when he should crie Alleluia, they should all an-swere him with one intire voice.

Thus proceed they forth to the battell, saint Germane bearing the kings standard in the fore front, & upon the approach to the enemies, he with the rest of the priests crieng with a loud voice thrice together Alleluia, was answered by all the whole host, & utter- 10 ring and crieng the same crye so whole together, that the verie sound thereof caused such an echcho on each side by reason of the hollow mounteines and cliffes hard by them, that the Saxons amazed at this doubled noise, and doubting not onelie another power of their enemies to be hidden privilie among the billes which they saw on each side of them, but also least the verie rocks & mounteines would haue fallen downe upon their heads together with the frame of the ele- 20 ment, readie (as it seemed to them) to breake in sunder, they toke them to their feet in such dreadfull hast, that their breath was not able to suffice halfe the desire they had to continue their course. Panie of them made such hast, that running to the next river in hope to passe the same, were drowned therein.
To conclude, all of them generallie threwe away both weapon and armour, the more lightlie to make away. Thus through the policie of that blessed man saint Germane, the victorie remained with king Aster and his Britains, without anie bloodshed. 3

Hyperbole.

Saint Beda making mention of this battell, assigneth the time to be at the first comming of S. Germane into this land, where as Hector Boetius following Veremond, supposeth it to be at the second time of his comming hither, which was in the daies of king Alfer. But at what time soeuer this victorie thus chanced, certaine it is, the Britains waring proud thereof, nothing regarded the power of the Saxons, nor toke anie heed for prouision of further defense; but after that those holie bishops Germane and Seuerus were returned into their countrie, they fell to all kinds of gluttonie and excess, in following onelie their sensuall lusts and fleshlie concupiscence: which abuses, the bishops and other godlie men lamenting, ceased not most earnestlie to reprove, menacing destruction to the whole countrie, if the people leaving their wicked living and most heinous offenses towards God, did not amend and repent in due time and space.

The threatning of vengeance to succeed vicious living.

King Occa
Name.

The younger Occanephue
to the former Edca by his brother Discus.
Both contra-rie to his other of credence aided the Britains against
the Saxons.
Coigerne of Coigerne a Saxon is sent for by Occa.

sing for recompense of his trauell and aduagaing the Pias, to deliuer vnto him all such lands as lay beyond the water of Humber, which might be reco-uered out of the hands of the Pias, to inioyn vnto him and his for ever. Colgerne accepting the offer, landed shortly after in Northumberland, putting the whole countrey vnto fire and sword. Which cruell dealing caused a great number of Scots & Pias, which held diuerse castles in that quarter, to come forth into the field to defend the countrey, and following battell with their enimies were discomfited, their slaughter being much increased by the com-ming of Decca at vnwares vpon them. For he first taking truce with Alster king of the Britains, battening with all speed to ioine his power with Colgerne, after he heard once that he was come on land.

These newes being brought by such as fled away into Gallogway and Picland, caused both the kings, Moth and Contranus in most speedie wise to assemble their forces, and with the same to march forthwith towards the Saxons: but being come within sight of them ready to giue battell, great was the feare and terroz of both their hostes, to ioine in fight with such a number of fierce people, as they saw there before their faces. Which feare arose first through the Britains, of whome no small number was there, in aid of the Scots and Picts against the Saxons, declaring manie things of the great valure, strength of bodie, and huge forme of lims of the same Saxons, being so fierce and cruell in fight, as they allowed, that they were able to put their enemies to flight euen with their grim looks and terrible countenances. Whereof such feare and terroz was spread through both the whole armies, that if thaine had not partlie wrought amongst the men of warre, manie of them would haue fled their waies before anie battell had bene attempted at all.

The kings perceiving such discorde amongst their men, caused them to assemble together, and appointed one such as was thought meet for the purpose, to declare unto them on their behalves, how they could not but maruell to vnderstand such feare & lacke of courage, as appeared generallie through both the armies, considering there was no cause thereof, they being such a number of able warriors throughlie appointed, and therewithall led by such governours and capitains, as there was no reason why to be doubtfull of victorie, before they had seene some triall and iust occasion of disadvantage. For as touching the Saxons, they were no such men, but that they might be overcome well enough, as it might sufficientlie appeare, both by proofe of such victories as Wostimer the Westish king had obtained against them; and also Aurelius Ambrose, who had vanquished them in such sort, that when they durst not encounter with him in battell, they sought means by poison to make him awaie.

60 Then ſith the Britains (whome the Scots & Picts ſo often had ſubdued) had at ſundry times vanquiſhed the Saxons, why ſhould they feare in ſuch wiſe to fight with them in common deſenſe of their countrie, and reuenge of ſuch iniuries as they had lately receiued at their hands, ſith the righteous God (as all good men ought to truſt) is euer readie to aduance a righteous quarrell. And where it was byted amongſt them, that the Saxons were ſo huge of ſtature, and mightie of lims, that no force was able to withſtand them, it was certeinly knowne, that the Scots & Picts were indured with no leſſe mightinneſſe and ſtrength of bodie than the Saxons, ſo that if they were not of like ſtomachs, that reſt in their owne ſlouthfull cowardize, & not in nature twice, hauing done hir part in beſtowing hir giſts vpon them touching bodilie force, in ſuch plentions may ner,

Colgerne lant
beth in No:
thumberian

The king of
Scots and Wicks raised their power to resist the Daxons.

The Sec
and Dia
put in fee
the Box
balancu

The cause o
make a tion br people more out of hearts

The Scots
through comfortable
words of an oration recommend new cou-
rages.

The Scots
and Picts a to flight.

Edgerme
nd duke of Dorset
nd.

The Byle
rings ouer shown in tall by the berongs.
After withpaweth int
pales.
London re
tered by the stones.

The death
after poison
by drinking water of a well.

Both require with the King
some of B
King.

1

Proposed Woman.

The Byt
was refus receiue
for Lorth
one of his manes to signe oue
you,

ner, as no other nation did lightlie anie waies surmount them.

Spanie other arguments were alledged and laid forth to remove feare out of their hearts, and to incourage them to fight, insomuch that in the end it appeared the same wrought the wished effect, in such wise, that they generallic required battell, offering to live and die at their captains feet, and to follow them whither soeuer it should please their kings and liege lords to appoint them. Herewith the kings being satisfied, forth they march towards their enemies, whome they found readie to receiue them, and that with such rigorous violence, that in the end, after great slaughter made on both parts, the Scots and Brits were put to flight, the Saxons pursuing in the chase till the darke night caused them to withdraw & returne into their campe. The next day following, the Scottish king with the residue of his armie hastened away with all speed towards Gallo way, and the Brits king withdraw into Walsland. The Saxons using the victorie most cruellie, slue all such of the Brits and Scottish nations as they met with, in all places betwixt Ene and Tived. Then did Decca create the forenamed Colgerme duke of Northumberland, who repairing all such castles and strong houses, as he thought expedient to haue kept, placed garrisons of souldiers in the same to defend the countrie against all manner of eniries. After this, Decca turned his power against the Brits, which in the last battell had aided the Scots and Brits, as before is partly touched. The Brits tains reclaiming a great overthow in battell, after the Brits king was glad with such as might escape the enemies hands, to withdraw into Wales, leaving the residue of his countries unto the Saxons, who thereupon recovered not onelie the citie of London, yielding it selfe unto them for doubt of some long siege, but also all those countries and provinces which Hengist the first of the Saxons that reigned as king within the bounds of Albion at anie time, had holden or inioined, and ceased not after recouerie of the same, to bere and disquiet the Scots, Brits, and Brits, with continuall incursions, hoping by such means to keepe them still occupied. In the midst of this trouble after A. of the Brits tains departed this world, poisoned (as some haue written) by drinking water taken out of a fontaine which the Saxons had inuenomed. He died in the yeare after the birth of our Saviour 521, and in the eighteenth of his owne reigne. After his decesse, 50
Loth king of the Brits sent his ambassadours unto the lords, and other the states of the Brits dominions, requiring them, according to the accustomed lawes and ancient ordinances of the realme, to receiue him as king, sith he had married the sister and heire of the two brethren Aurelius Ambrose, and Uter, their two last kings, being as then both deceased, without leaving behind them any lawfull issue, by reason whereof their estate was fallen unto him, so inioy the same during his life, hauing married (as is said) their owne naturall and lawfull borne sister, and after the decesse of him and his wife the said sister, then it ought by course of the lawes of all realmes and countries to descend unto such issue as he had begot of hir, which was two sonnes, the one named Morozed, and the other Maluan, or Maluan, as some do call him.

The Brits did disdainfullie using the Brits ambassadours that came with this message, refused not onelie to come vnder subiection of Loth, but also denied that his sonnes begot of his lawfull wife, the sister of Aurelius and Uter, should haue any rule or gouernement amongst them, as those that were no Brits bozne, but strangers vnto them, being both bozne and vnpread in a forren countrie. Those ambassadours then hauing their answer, and being sent home with reproch, the Brits contrarie to the lawes of all nations, proclaimed Arthur, being a bastard bozne, king of their realme, and forthwith assembling their powers vnder his leading, marched on against the Saxons, in purpose to abate some part of their strength, before the Brits (which was doubted would shortly come to passe) should come with them.

Therefore hauing procured aid of the Armoike Brits within ten miles of London at the first, where the Saxons being at two severall times vanquished, were constrained not only to paie tribute, but also to receiue magistrates to gouerne them by the said Arthurs appointment, with other grievous articles of agreement, to the great reioysing of the Brits, for these so luckie beginnings in the first exploits of their late elected king. Afterwards was London castle won by the Brits, wherein Arthur remaining for a season, took advise with his nobles how to proceed in his warres against the rest of the Saxons. Finally hauing prepared a mightie armie, he determineth to go against those which inhabited beyond Humber northwards, with whome (as he had certaine knowledge) the Brits were joined: for Loth comming to agreement with Colgerme, concluded a league with him, whereby they were bound to aid one another against the Brits, as common enemies and aduersaries to them both.

The Brits at their comming into Dorsetshire pitched their campe not farre off from their enemies, who were already joined together and incamped abroad in the field. The next day after, knowledge being had that they should haue battell, Arthur appointed Howell leader of the Armoike Brits to encounter with the battell of the Brits, and he himselfe to match with the Saxons. Thus they met together on both parts verie fiercelie, and a sore battell was fought there betwixt them, so that for a good space it was doubtful whether part should haue the advantage of the day, but at length the Brits were put to flight, which advanced the Brits to the gaine of the whole field. For the Saxons, after they perceived how the Brits were discomfited, dreading to abide the whole hunt by themselves, betooke them also to their heels, and made their race towards Dorke, as fast as their feet might beare them.

Arthur pursuing them thither, besieged the citie almost three moneths together, but the Saxons defended the walles so stoutlie, making often issues forth upon the Brits, that till hunger began to constrain them, they cared little for the siege. In the end, when they were determined to haue yielded by the citie, they had knowledge, how there was a huge armie of Brits and Saxons newlie assembled, and readie to come forward to their succours, also that king Decca (escaping from the battell wherein he had received the overthrow at Arthurs hands, and fleeing afterward into Germanie) was now returned with a new power, and arrived within the mouth of Humber. Which newes caused them to deferre all communication, in hope that if they might abide the siege but for a small time, the Brits should shortly be compassed in on each side, and oppressed on the sudden.

Arthur heard of the comming of their succours in like manner, and iudging it no wisdome to tarie the comming of his so puissant enemies, considering what a number of diseased and sicke persons he had already in his host, by reason of their lying abroad in the field, raised his siege, and withdraw himselfe so speedilie as was possible with his whole armie into Wales,

Arthur proclaimed king of Britaine.

Arthur goeth forth against the Saxons.

The Armoike Brits in aid of Arthur.

The Saxons vanquished, are constrained to pay tribute to the Brits.

London is won by the Brits.

Arthur raiseth a power against the Brits.

A league concluded betwixt Loth & Colgerme.

Howell leader of the Armoike Brits.

The Brits put to flight.

The Saxons chased, made their race towards Dorke.

York besieged.

Decca returneth out of Germanie with a new power.

Arthur raiseth his siege.

Arthur returneth to London.

Arthur dis-cometh the Saxons
twice in battell & then againe laeth siege to yozke and winneeth it.

Arthur bleth
the victorie
with gentle-nesse.

The Bri-
tains sojourning for the winter time within yozke,
gave themselves
vnto banquet-
ting & voluptu-
ousnesse.

Christmasse
banquets resembling the feasts Bacchanalia.

The Bri-
tains through rest and ease
became vnapt
to susteine the paines of warres.
A league concluded betwixt Arthur
king of Britains, & Loth
king of Picts.

Wales, where he appointed the Armozike Britains to sojorne for that winter, with other of the meaner sort of his owne souldiers: whilst he took the residue of his chosen bands, and went to London, there to provide that no rebellion should be raised among the Saxons of Kent, or other of the countries nere about. In the beginning of the next spring, he gathered his host together againe, and with the same went forth against Colgerme and Decca, who being issued forth of Northumberland, were entered into the British confines, spoiling and wasting the countrey with their accustomed crueltie.

Whereupon encountering them twice in battell, he obtained the victorie, and then besieging Poyke, at length he entered into that citie, by meanes of a Britaine, who dwelling amongst the Saxons there, in the night season conueied a sort of Britains into the citie, the which breaking open the gates in the dead of the night, did let in all the whole host. Where Arthur would not suffer his men to make any great murder of the enemies, which were content to yield themselves, but bled them very gently, thereby to win more praise amongst all those that heard of his two victories. The Britains hauing thus conquered the citie of Poyke, manie feasts of armes were daily practised betwixt them and the Saxons, which held possession still of the countrey thereabouts. But the Britains lieng in that citie all the summer and winter following, at length began to take their ease, namelie in the depth of winter, and therewith gaue themselves to banquetting, drinking, plaie, and other kinds of voluptuous pleasures, so that it seemed they trusted more to their passed victories, than to their present force, not fearing such dangers as was like to follow.

It is thought of some, that about the same time, Arthur first instituted, that the feast of Christmasse should be kept with such excess of meats and drinks, in all kinds of inordinate banquetting and reuell for the space of thirteene daies together, according to the custome vsed still through both the realmes of England and Scotland euen vnto this day, resembling the feasts which the gentiles vsed to keepe in the honor of their drunken god Bacchus, called in Latin Bacchanalia: wherein all kinds of beastlie lust and sensuall voluptuousnes was put in vze. But whence soeuer, or by whom soeuer this insatiable gourmandise came vp amongst vs, suerlie a great abuse it is, to see the people at such a solemne feast, where they ought to be occupied in thanks giuing to almighty God, for the sending downe of his onelie begotten sonne amongst vs, to giue themselves in manner wholie to gluttonie, and excessive filling of their bellies, with such manner of lewd and wanton pastimes, as though they should rather celebrate the same feasts of Bacchanalia, and those other which the gentiles also kept, called Floralia, and Priapalia, than the remembrance of Christs natiuitie, who abhorreth all manner of such excess.

But now to my purpose. When the next summer was once come, Arthur led forth his Britains against their enemies, but by reason of such ease and pleasure as they had taken whilst they sojourned in Poyke, being now come into the field, they were able to abide no paines, so that no good was done of certaine yeers after, till finally Arthur joined in league with Loth king of the Picts. The conditions of which league were these. That Arthur during his naturall life should reigne as king of the Britains, and after his decease, the kingdome to remaine vnto Godfred and his issue, if he chanced to haue any. That the Picts should aid the Britains against the Saxons, and haue all such land as might be recovered of them beyond Humber. Also the league which was betwixt them and the Scots, they should duly obserue. Godfred should marrie the daughter of Calvolan a notable man amongst the Britains, and of highest authority next vnto Arthur himselfe: the children of this marriage to be brought vp with their grandfather in Britaine, till they came to yeeres of discretion. Calwan the brother of the foresaid Godfred, should serue king Arthur, and receiue at his hands large intertainment, and great possessions to mainteine therewith his estate.

Other articles there were comprised in this league, according as was thought requisite for the maintenance of stable friendship betwixt these kings and their nations. So that Arthur hauing concluded this league, and still being desirous to purge the whole Ile of all miscreants and enemies of the Christian faith, he sent vnto the Scottish and Pictish kings, requiring them on the behalfe of that dutie which they ought vnto the aduancement of Christs religion, to assemble their powers, & to meet him at Cimmouth, whither he would repaite to ioine with them, at such day as they would appoint, from thence to march forth against the Saxons.

Loth king of the Picts, and Contranus king of the Scottishmen, failed not in this so necessarie an enterprise, but agreeable to Arthurs request, within few daies after they came forward, and ioining with the Britains, forth they went against the Saxons, whom they vnderstood to be already in campe, vnder the conduct of their king Decca, in purpose to stop their passage. When both the armies were approached nere together, they prepared to the battell, and first Colgerme duke of Northumberland mounting vpon a light gelding, rode almost euen hard to the face of the Picts, where they stood in their order of battell right frontlie, and there uttering manie reprochfull words vnto Loth, and other of his nobles, for breach of their promised friendship to him and his Saxons, declared that he trusted shortly to see iust punishment light vpon them for this falshood and vntruths sake, in thus ioining with their former enemies against their most trustie friends and steadfast allies.

The Pictish king not greatly moued hereunto, commanded his standards to aduance forward, and the Saxons likewise halted apace towards them, so that the one being come within danger of shot of the other, the Picts let sic their arrowes verie freshlie. Arthur in the meane time hauing set his people in a raie, exhorted them to fight manfullie: and so lone as he perceived that the fraie was begun by the Picts, he in semblable wise commanded the Britains to giue the onset, so that immediatlie there ensued a fore conflict, the Scots being in the right wing, & cleaving Chelbyke one of the chiefeest captains amongst the Saxons, quicklie discomfited that wing with the which they were first matched. Colgerme with his Saxons incountring (as is said) with the Picts, placed in the left wing, rushed in amongst his enemies (vpon an earnest desire to be reuenged of his aduersarie king Loth) with such violence, that at their first encounter he ouerthrew the same Loth: but immediatlie thereupon two Pictish hoymen running at Colgerme sidelingwise, bare him quite through.

In the meane time, Loth by meane of his strong habergion escaping without hurt, was relieved by such as stood about him, and restored againe to his companie: but Colgerme being dead before he could be recovered from amongst the throng of his enemies, his men were so discomfited therewith, that straightwaies thereupon they fell to running away. The maine battell of the Saxons being thus left bare on both sides, began to giue backe, which Arthur perceiuing, the more earnestlie pressed forth vpon them, so that in the end Decca being constrained to

Decca constrained to flee.

Upon what condition Arthur receiued
the Saxons
vpon their submission.

Arthur first deth embel-
dysed vnto
the kings of Scots and
Picts.

Scots, Picts
and Britains
ioined together
against the Saxons.

Colgerme
proueth &

Arthur caused churches to be repaired.

Arthur partially to de-stroye the whole race of
the Saxons
in Albion.

The opinion which men had conceiued of Godfred
by his wit &
hardnesse.

Colgerme
run through by his aduers-
aries.

Arthurs
page.

Arthurs ex-
ultation to his people.

The Saxons
are put to flight.

Arthurs ex-
ultation to his people.

The Saxons
are put to flight.

Arthurs ex-
ultation to
his people.

ie obserue. How Cawolan a no-
of highest autho-
children of this their grandfather
es of discretion.

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

ed in this league,
e for the mainte-
these kings and ng concluded this o purge the whole
s of the christian Pictish kings, redutie which they hristia religion, to him at Tinnmouth,
with them, at such thence to march

ranus king of the ecessarie an enter-uest, within few
d joining with the
the Saxons, whom ampe, vnder the rpose to stop their re approached nere
tell, and first Col-mounting vpon a ard to the face of r order of battell manie reprochfull nobles, for breach
and his Saxons.
to see inst punishshood and vntruths former enemies and steadfast allies.

Colgerme
proueth

Colgerme
proueth

Colgerme
proueth

How Cawolan a no-
of highest autho-
children of this
their grandfather
es of discretion.

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

How
Should
his hands large
ns to mainteine

The Saxons
coming vpon Howzred
and Cawolan put them with their people to the sword.

What answer
the Saxons
ambassadors
had at Ar-
thurs hands.

The excuse of
the Saxons.

The sudden invasion made by the Britains vpon the Saxons.

The great
tumult in the Saxons
campe.

Howzred desires to be re-
uenged.

The Saxons
are put to the fight.

The crueltie
of the Brit-tains in slay-ing the Sax-
ons.

Arthurs ma-
nificence.

A conspiracie
practised against Con-
rane.

An enill officer.

A presumptuous act.

The determination of the
murderers to that side for a season: other of the Saxons hauing no leasure to arme themselves, nor to draw into anie order of battell, by reason of the sudden impression of the Britains, brake forth of the campe on the contrarie side, & fled so fast as their feet might beare them. But being pursued by the British horsemen, and beaten downe, a great number of them ran into the next riuer, and there were drowned, choosing rather that kind of death, than so cruellie to be murdered by the aduersaries hands: verelie the Britains shewed no mercie that day, for so manie as came within their danger, died without redemption. And this blondie battell made an end of such an huge number of Saxons, that it was thought they should neuer haue recovered againe anie puissance able to haue indamaged the Britains in anie manner of wise.

Arthur hauing thus vanquished his enemies, gaue licence vnto those nobles which he had detained (as is said) in his campe, being sent vnto him as ambassadors, to depart ouer into Germanie, appointing the residue of such Saxons as were men of no defence, to remaine still in the land, yielding a yerelie tribute vnto the Britains, and also with condition that they should become christians. The Scottis men and Picts which had aided the Britains in this tourne, sojourned a while after at London, where Arthur feasted & banketted them in most roiall wise, shewing them all the honor that might be deuised, and afterwards sent them home verie princelie rewarded with manie great gifts and rich presents. Whiles such businesse as ye haue heard was thus in hand betwixt the Saxons & Britains, the estate of the Scottis common-wealth was gouerned by great wisdom and policie, without anie notable trouble or disorder. But finally, when king Conrane began to wax aged, and that such as had the chiefe dowings vnder him, sought not the execution of iustice, but their owne commodities, to the hinderance of a multitude, the people began to repine thereat, and to practise a conspiracie with diuerse of the nobles against Conrane, and those which ruled by his appointment.

It chanced that there was one Concet, a man of base birth, assigned by the kings commission to be chiefe iustice, or as it were chancelor for the administration of the lawes in Murray land, a person passing full of rigorous crueltie, especiallie in iudgements of life and death, and in gathering vp of all manner of forfeitures of penall lawes, which he did onelie to purchase fauor of the king, by the enriching of his coffers, in respect whereof he had small regard either of right or wrong, so that there were hope of somewhat to be gotten. Amongest other the violent dowings of this Concet, he caused diuerse merchantmen of the towne of Forres in Murray land (as then the chiefe towne of all that countrie) to be accused of treason by a light information, and in the end executed without anie apparant matter, onelie vpon a couetous desire to haue their goods and riches, because they were men of great wealth and substance. Diuerse noble men of the countrie there abouts, and namelie of the towne of Forres, being partlie of kin vnto those merchants, were soze offended with this act, and herebpon they first came vnto Concet, and reuiled him with manie high reprochfull words, and afterwards fell vpon him in the place of open iudgement where he sat as then in his iudgement seate, & there murdered him, getting them forthwith vp into the mounteins, to auoid the danger which they knew impossible for them to escape, if they should happen to be taken while Conrane should be liuing.

After this, they deuised how they might increase their heinous deed and bold enterprize with an other farre moze horrible and notable, which was to slea the king himselfe, as the originall cause of all such mischief that then reigned in the realme through the vniuersitie gouernment of his trustie ministers and couetous magistrats, hoping withall to obtaine the fauor of some of the noble men, whome they knew to maligne the king and his counsell most extremelie, and thereby in short time to be assured of their pardon. Shortlie after it chanced that one Donald also with the king, had vnderstanding that these outlawes intended, and therebpon practised with them by priuie messengers, that they should come in secret manner vnto Ennerlochke, where the king sojourned, promising them by most assured meanes of oths and vowes, that they should haue all the furtherance he could deuise towards the atchiuing of their enterprize.

Wherebpon these outlawes, according to their instructions, came in secret wise vnto Ennerlochke, and were closelie conueied into Conrans bedchamber by Donalds meanes, who as though he had knowne nothing of the matter, got himselfe quickelie out of the waie when he saw them once entered within the doore of the chamber. Conrane the king perceiuing how he was betrayed, and that his enemies were got into his chamber ready to murder him, leapt forth of his bed, and falling downe vpon his knees besought them to take pitie of his age, and not to defile their hands in the blood of their naturall lord and king, considering the fault was not his, if they had bene anie waies wronged. Howbeit they doubting nothing but least he should escape their hands, straightwaies dispatched him out of life, and withall made haste awaie. This was the end of king Conrane, in the 20 yere of his reigne, being the 16 of Arthurs dominion ouer the Britains, the 11 of the emperor Iustinianus, and in the yere after the birth of our Saviour 531. But his corps was buried in the abbey of Jona, otherwise called Colme-kill, with such funerall pompe and erequies, as in those daies were vsed.

After him succeeded his nephew Eugenius, the sonne of his brother Congall, the which Eugenius (as aboue is said) was with Arthur in the last mentioned tourne against the Saxons. There were that counsellled him in the beginning of his reigne (which he began in Argile, being placed there vpon the chaire of marble) that he should see in anie wise the authors of his vncles death punished, to the example of others, that they should not attempt the like hereafter against their liege lord and crowned king: but he contrariwise did not onelie forgive the offense, but also receiued the forenamed Donald with other the murderers into his seruice, and made them of his priuie counsell, which caused manie men to suspect, least he himselfe had bene of counsell with them in committing that murder. The talke thereof was so common in all mens mouths, namelie amongst the common people, that the quene Dowager late wife to king Conrane, doubting not onelie the surtue of hir owne life, but also of hir two sons (which she had by the said Conrane, the one named Reginar, and the other Aidan) fled with them ouer into Ireland, where within few yeres after, she died with the one of hir sonnes, that is to say, Reginar: the other Aidan was honorable brought vp by the king of that countrie, according to his birth and degree.

Eugenius in the beginning of his reigne, to win thereby the peoples fauor, demeaned himselfe most gentlie in all his proceedings, doing nothing that talked in anie part of crueltie. He would oftentimes sit amongst the iudges himselfe, and if he suspected least anie man had wrong, he would licence them to

Donald
was
the king
of
the Picts
and M
G
king.

The
victorious conquest
of
the Picts
by Arthur.

Conrane
murdered within
his bedchamber
by traitors
meanes.
35. H.B.
20. H.B.
535. H.B.

Reginard
king
of
the Picts
ought
to be punished
for
the murder
of
his uncle
king Conrane.

The
quene Dowager
with her two sons
fled into Ireland.

The
quene Dowager
with her
two sons
fled into Ireland.

The
quene Dowager
with her
two sons
fled into Ireland.

Big of king Eugenius to be his people.

Comrade-
his opinion:
was.

The victorious conquest
of the Picts
by Arthur.

This cruelty
no small doubt
to the great disorder described vnto Arthur.

Geffrey of Monmouth.

The Brit-
tains repent
themselves
of
the league concluded
with
the Saxons.
The request
of
the Brit-
tains
to haue one
of their owne
nation appointed
to be king Arthur.

The
quene Dowager
with her
two sons
fled into Ireland.

The
quene Dowager
with her
two sons
fled into Ireland.

The
quene Dowager
with her
two sons
fled into Ireland.

plead their case anew. And such as he perceived were not of abilitie to follow their sute in anie cause of right, he would helpe them with monie of the common treasure. He ordeined also, that no orphan should be compelled to answer anie action, or otherwise be vered by sute of law. Moreover, that no widow should be constrained to come past a mile forth of hir owne doores for anie matter in controuersie betwixt hir and anie other person, to be heard afore a nie iudges or publike officers. Robbers, theues, and their receiuerers he caused to be dulle punished, to refrain other from attempting the like offenses. And also he had a speciall regard for the obseruing of the league betwixt his subiects and the Brits, with the Britains, according to the tenor of the same.

About this season should it be also that Arthur did atchieue all those worthie victories, which are ascribed vnto him against the Scots, Irishmen, Danes, Norwegians, and other northerne people. Moreover it is written by some authors, that he should subdue the most part of Germanie with the low countries, Britaine, Normandie, France, and the Romans, with the people of the east: but the credit hereof resteth with the same authors. Onelie it is certeine (as Hector Boetius affirmeth) that Arthur liued in the daies of Iustinianus the emperour, about which time the Gotthes, Vandals, Burgonions, & Frenchmen did invade sundrie parts of the Romane empire, plittillie wasting and spoiling the same, where yet such writers as haue set forth those warres, make no mention of Arthur at all. Therefore letting all doubtful things passe, I will proceed with mine author, and declare what he hath found written in such Scottish chronicles as he followeth touching the British Arthur, which for that it partlie varieth from the other our common chronicles, namelie Geoffrey of Monmouth, I thinke it worthie to be noted here, to the end that euery man maie iudge thereof as to him seemeth best.

To the purpose then. After that the Britains were deliuered from the terroz of the Saxons, and that with quietnesse they began to war wealthie, they repented them of the league, which they had concluded afore with Loth king of the Brits, speciallie for that they could not in anie wise be contented to haue anie stranger to reigne amongst them, and hereupon comming vnto Arthur, requied of him, sith he himselfe had no issue to succeed him, that it might please him yet, to name one of his owne nation to gouerne them after his decesse. Arthur not gainsaieng their request, willed them (sith their pleasure was such, in no wise to haue a stranger to reigne ouer them) to name one themselves, being descended of the blood roiall, and such a one as in whome they had perceived some towardlie prouise of wisdom and valiance: and he for his part promised to ratifie their election. The nobles with great reioicing of the people drawing together to consult for the choise of such a one, as might be acceptable to all the British nation, at length agreed vpon Constantine, the sonne of Cadore duke of Cornwall, a goodlie young gentleman, both for his person and other his worthie qualitties much to be commended. Who being brought by the pères of the realme into the counsell chamber, and there presented vnto king Arthur, as one most meetest to succeed him; Arthur accepted their election verie gladdie, and caused the same Constantine forthwith to be proclaimed heire apparant to the crowne, by the name of prince of Britaine, which notified him to be successor to the king in gouernement of the realme. Constantine being in such wise preferred, behaued himselfe so honorable, and with such a shew of gentle demeanour, that he wou him much praise, with an opinion of high worthinesse amongst all the British nation.

In this meane time was Loth the king of the Brits deceased, leauing his name as a perpetuall memorie vnto his countrie of Britland, the which euer since as a remembrance of his worthinesse, hath bene called Lothian, or Louthian; but his sonne Morozed, succeeding him in gouernement of the British kingdome, and hearing that Constantine was proclaimed heire apparant of Britaine, was sore moued therewith, and immediatlie sending his ambassadours vnto king Arthur, complained, for that contrarie to the honor of his kinglie estate, he had broken the league concluded betwixt him and his father late of famous memorie king Loth, wherein it was agreed amongst other things, that there should none succeed in the kingdome of Britaine, after Arthurs decesse, but the children begot betwixt him. Loth and his wife quene Anne, or such as descended of them; where contrariwise it was notified vnto the British people, that Constantine the sonne of Cadore was elected prince, and thereby inabled as heire apparant to the crowne.

They required him therefore to call himselfe to remembrance, and not so lightly to agree vnto the flattering persuasions of the Britains, aduising him vnto that thing which was maxellie repugnant to reason, and against both gods lawes and mans, admonishing him withall to obserue the league, according to the oth, which he had solemnlie taken vpon him, and to moue his subiects to doe the like, least for the contrarie, they should prouoke the wrath of almighty God against them, who is the iust reuenger of all such as go about to breake leagues and couenanted pactions. Herevnto answere was made by consent of the nobles of Britaine, that the league which was concluded betwixt Arthur and Loth, indured but for the life times of them two onelie, and to cease by either of their deaths: therefore Arthur had done nothing contrarie to anie pact or promise made, but according to the duetie of a prince that tendered the weale of his subiects, had prouided them one to succeed him of their owne nation, for doubt least the realme after his decesse should fall into the hands of strangers, which in no wise ought of right to be suffered. Therefore if the Brits sloued the suertie of their owne estate, it should be good for them to hold themselves contented with their owne bounds, least if they fought for other mens liuings, they might happlie within short time perceiue, that doth insue oftentimes vpon such rash and vnadvised attempts.

The British ambassadours returning home with this answer, caused the whole nation to take such disdain therewith, that immediatlie they resolved to reuenge their wrongs by open warres; but first they thought good to trie if they might procure the Scottishmen to take part with them, in reuenge of such iniuries as they had in like manner lately receiued at the Britains hands. Moreover, repenting themselves, that they had in times past aided the Britains against the Saxons, they purpose to trie if they might now moue the same Saxons to make warres vpon the Britains, thereby to be the better able to maintaine their owne quarrell against them. First, such ambassadours as were sent from Morozed vnto Eugenius king of the Scots, found him verie agreeable vnto their requests, and the sooner, for that such Scottish rebels as fled vnto Arthur, were not onelie receiued by him, but also maintained to make rodes and incurfions into the Scottish borders.

Arthur hauing knowledge of the deuises of his enemies (the warres being first proclaimed) he furnished all the sea-coasts with notable numbers of men, Lothian taketh the name of Loth the British king.

Morozed succeedeth Loth in the kingdome of Britland.

Morozed complaineth vnto king Arthur, for that Constantine was created his heire apparant.

The answer made to the British ambassadours.

The Brits purpose to be reuenged on the Britains by open war.

The Brits solicit both Scots and Saxons to make warre vpon the Britains.

Eugenius the Scottish king agreeable to the request of the Brits.

of all such dispatch the king alle.

These out-riouers, their paronals also and trust with them e in secret goiomed, of oth and perauance he their enter-to their in-merlochte, bedcham-ugh he had life quick-ce entered ne the king hat his ent-to murder owne vpon his age, and ir naturall not his, if Conuene is murdered South in his bedchamber by traitorous means. 35. H.B. 26. H.B. 535. H.B.

genius, the Eugeniu-which Euger in the last There were his reigne there vpon n anie wise ished, to the attempt the and crowned the forgiue the ned Donald ce, and made o manie men of counsell

. The talke ouths, name at the quene doubting not lso of hir two e, the one na eres after, the to say, Regl- brought up by his birth and reigne, to win himselfe most nothing that if he suspected licence them to plead

The queene Dowager with his sonnes into Ireland.

Constantine became prince of Britaine.

The humber and fauorable friend

The humber and fauorable friend

The humber and fauorable friend

Arthur set
teth forward toward the Scots and
Picts.
Humber a fa-
tail place for
the Britains
to be banqui-
shed in.

Bishops tea-well betwixt the parties to bring them to communication for a peace.

Howard and Eugenius
were persuaded unto peace.

The Bri-
tains would not consent to have anie
peace talked
upon.

The battell is begun.

A cruell bat-
tell.

A craftie po-
licie.
This was one of the Picts.

The Bri-
tains put to flight.

Twentie thousand of Scots and Picts slaine.
Howard is
slaine.

men, to withstand the landing of the Saxons, if they should fortune to attempt anie invasion. That done, he passed forth with the residue of his people towards the Scots & Picts, who were already assembled in campe, and were come as farre as the river of Humber, nere to the bankes whereof they had pitched their tents, as in a place fatall for the Britains to be banquished in. Both the armies being brought here into order of battell, the one in sight of the other, there were certaine bishops of those three nations that took great pains to ride to and fro betwixt them, to exhort the kings unto peace and concord, considering what mischief and great bloodshed should ensue, if upon wilfullnesse they would keepe to trie that by dint of sword, which they might make an end of by means of amiable treatie and friendly agreement. Again, they could not do the thing that might more content the Saxons, common enemies to christian religion, than if by their incountring together in battell, they should so infectible their whole powers, whereby the Saxons might have ready means and occasion offered to execute their greedy desires to conquer the whole Ile. Howard and Eugenius were persuaded by this earnest travell of the bishops, to put their matter in compromise, and to lay away their armour and weapon, if they might have assurance that the league made with king Loth should in euerie point be observed. Arthur likewise at the sute of the same bishops, would have bene contented for his part to have agreed hereunto; but other of the Britains, namely those that were of kin and alliance unto Constantine their prince, could in no wise be persuaded thereunto; but rather with manie reprochfull words rebuked the bishops for their unkinde sute, seeing the enemies ready ranged in battell at point to give the onset, so that (as they alledged) it might be doubted what they meant by their motion, unless they went about to betray the armie, under pretense of a cloked treatie for an unprofitable agreement. These of such like words were vnneth ended, when suddenly the noise being raised on both sides, the battels rushed together right fiercelie. The Britains had the disadvantage of the place, being so incumbered with mires, bogs, and mosses, that they could not well aid themselves, nor handle their weapons to anie purpose. Yet did the battell continue a long time, to the destruction of such numbers of men; that the river Humber (nere unto the which this field was fought) was so mingled with blood, that the water thereof being all coloured red, carried no small number of dead bodies downe into the sea. In the midst of the fight, there was one with lowd voice in the British tong cried out to the Britains (of purpose prompted thereunto) that Arthur with other of the nobles on his side were slaine, and therefore it were but follie to trust anie longer upon victory, but rather were it wisdom for euerie man by flight to prouide for his owne safetie.

This voice wonderfullie encouraged the Scottish men and Picts, but the Britains were put in such feare therewith, that the most part of them immediately hereupon fell to running away. Others of them iudging this to be but some craftie and subtil practise of the enemies devised of purpose, as it was in deed, to discomfort them with, abode by it still: manfullie continuing in fight, till they were beaten downe and slaine in maner euerie mothers sonne. This victorie being thus hardlie got, cost more mens liues than anie other had done of manie yeares before; for of the Scots and Picts being banquishers, there died in that mortall battell about 20000 men, together with Howard, and a great number of the nobilitie of both the nations. Of the Britains and such other as were with them in aid, there were slaine, what in battell and what in chase, at the point of 30000, among whom was Arthur himselfe, with Gawain or Galuan (as some booke haue) brother unto Howard, who bare such good will and intire loue unto his lord and maister the said Arthur, that he fought that day most earnestlie on his side against his owne naturall brother the said Howard. Also there were killed Caline and Galolan, with the most part of all the residue of the British nobilitie, and manie prisoners taken, by reason that Humber kept them in from fleeing anie way forth on the one side, which prisoners also were afterwards slaine, the gentlemen onelie excepted.

The day next after the battell, the campe of the Britains was rifled, and amongst other rich spoiles there was found queene Guainore Arthurs wife, with a great number of other ladies and gentlewomen. The whole spoile of the campe and field being equally divided by lots betwixt them, the Scots had for their parts certaine faire charets laden with rich stuffe and tewels, also horses and armours, beside sundrie noble men, whom they had to their prisoners. Unto the Picts fell for their portion queene Guainore, with the ladies and gentlewomen, and others of the noble men, besides a great quantitie of other rich preie and booties. These prisoners, which the Picts had, were conueied into a castell in Angus, called Dunbarre, a place of great strength in those daies, though at this present there remaineth nothing but the name with the ruines thereof. In which castell they were detained vnder sure ward, during the residue of their naturall liues. In witness whereof there be remaining vnto this day, the graues and monuments where manie of these captive Britains were buried, in the fields of a towne in that countrie called Hegill, not past 10 miles from Dundee: but amongst the residue, that of Guainore is most famous.

There goeth a plaine tale ouer all that countrie, told for an assured trueth, that if anie woman chance to tread vpon that graue, they shall remaine barren without bringing forth anie issue more than the said Guainore did. But whether this be true or not, certie it is (as Boetius writeth) that there dare no woman come nere that graue, not onelie eschewing it themselves, but also commanding their daughters to beware thereof. This bloudie battell weakened so much the forces both of the Scots, Picts, and Britains, that manie a day after they were not able to recover againe their former states and dignities. The yeare also that these three nations incountered thus cruellie together, was after the birth of our Saviour 542, the 26 of Arthurs reigne ouer the Britains, and the 11 of Eugenius his gouernement ouer the Scottishmen.

In the same yeere before the battell, were seene manie strange sights in Albion. Grassie and heards in Dorsetshire appeared to be all stained with blood. Nere vnto Camelot, a cow brought forth a calfe with two heads. Also an ewe brought forth a lambe that was both male and female. The sunne appeared about none daies all wholie of a bloudie colour. The element appeared full of bright starres to euerie mans sight continuallie for the space of two daies together. In Wales there was a battell betwene crows and pies on the one side, and rauen on the other, with such a slaughter of them, as before that time had not bene heard of.

But to proceed. Eugenius king of the Scots at his returne from the battell, gaue to those that had escaped with life, and abid by him in the chiefe danger of the fight, manie bounteous & large rewards. The sonnes and next kinsfolke of such as were

Arthur with 30000 Britains slaine.
Gawain
slaine.

Caline and Galolan
slaine.

Queene
Guainore
taken.
The spoile
of the camp divided.

Dunbarre Angus, not that in Angus.

The table
of queene Guainore
great buried in the grave.

542.
8. H.B.

Strange
and wonderful
signes.

Eugenius
king of
the Scots
542.
11. H.B.

small
element
of king
of Wales.

Eugenius
king of
the Scots
542.
11. H.B.

small
element
of king
of Wales.

Eugenius
king of
the Scots
542.
11. H.B.

slaine, be-land & li-
be a with their an-countrie,
warding
which no-
amongst he gover-ment, & immedia-
slaine, &
British
none am-
the same
such as belie mur-
wife run-
to saue the
They were grand fat-
familie ar-
died was

Eugenius governeth his people with clemencie.

Constantine
crowned king
of Britaine.

The crueltie
of the Britains in mar-
turing the innocent childre
of Howard.
The lineage of Howard
clearly extinguished.

The S ment tha
lie by the teine Arth
stitude of pare a mi same into beat down
B. Confir
part of the his name hane with reigned ce
been died,
forsooke hi
about and pleasing him at length monkie be

The Saxons
came into England, and
the Brit-
tains were
driven out.

Constantine
king of Wales, and
the Brit-
tains were
driven out.

Constantine
king of Wales, and
the Brit-
tains were
driven out.

Constantine
king of Wales, and
the Brit-
tains were
driven out.

Constantine
king of Wales, and
the Brit-
tains were
driven out.

Constantine
king of Wales, and
the Brit-
tains were
driven out.

Constantine
king of Wales, and
the Brit-
tains were
driven out.

Constantine
king of Wales, and
the Brit-
tains were
driven out.

Constantine
king of Wales, and
the Brit-
tains were
driven out.

Constantine
king of Wales, and
the Brit-
tains were
driven out.

Constantine
king of Wales, and
the Brit-
tains were
driven out.

Constantine
king of Wales, and
the Brit-
tains were
driven out.

Constantine
king of Wales, and
the Brit-
tains were
driven out.

Constantine
king of Wales, and
the Brit-
tains were
driven out.

Constantine
king of Wales, and
the Brit-
tains were
driven out.

After kill, & fores, his
in adminiinclination tuffie won-
tion towar-
put men in take it) that
be) he ha his getting

name, he also advanced to sundrie preferments of land & livings, that they inioining the same, might be a witness in time to come of the good service of their ancestors, shewed in defense of their king and countrie, and also of his princelie liberalitie, in rewarding the same upon their issue and progenie. Whiche noble benevolence, he wane him such love amongst his people, that afterwards it seemed how he governed the state of his kingdome more by clemencie, than by any rigour of lawes. The Britains immediately upon knowledge had that Arthur was slain, crowned Constantine his successor in the British kingdome, and for that there should remaine none amongst them alive to make any claime to the same kingdome, other than he with his issue, or such as he should appoint to succeed him, they cruelly murdered thousands children, in most pittifull wise running unto their mothers lap, beseeching him to save their lives, according to his motherlie dutie. They were brought up in Calvolane their fathers grandfathers house, and being thus made awaie, the familie and lineage of their father the foresaid Arthur was utterlie thereby extinguished.

The Saxons at the same time having advertised what losse the Britains had sustained, not onlie by the death of their most valiant king and chiefeine Arthur, but also for the slaughter of such a multitude of their nation as died in the battell, they prepared a mightie naule of ships, and passed over the same into England, where being landed, they easily beat downe the Britains, and drove them with their king Constantine into Wales, so recovering all that part of the land which Hengist sometimes held, & after his name was afterwards called England. Some have written, how that after king Constantine had reigned certaine yeeres in Wales, his wife and children died, whereupon wearing wearie of this world, he forsooke his earthly kingdome, in hope of that other above, and secretly departed into Ireland, where applying himselfe for a time in ministering to the poore, at length being knowne, by the persuasion of a monk he became one of his cote and profession.

Afterwards being sent by the bishop of the diocese over into Scotland, to instruct the people of that countie in the true faith and articles of the christian religion, he there suffered martyrdom by the hands of most wicked and godlesse persons, and was at length (but manie yeeres after his death) canonized a saint, and sundrie churches (as are to be seene even unto this day) built and dedicated unto him in Scotland by authority of the bishops there. At the same time that the said Constantine was driven into Wales, there reigned among the Englishmen one Iurmirike the first (as Beda saith) from Hengist. The same Iurmirike though he were not christened himselfe, yet he permitted the christian faith to be preached amongst his people, and concluding a league with the Scottishmen and Picts, kept the same inviolate during his life time most sincerely. The Scottish king Eugenius also lived in peace the residue of his life, without any trouble either by foreign enemies, or intestine sedition, & at length died in the 38 yeere of his reigne, after the birth of our Saviour 569.

After his funerall obsequies finished in Colmeakill, where he lieth buried amongst his ancestors, his brother Connall was chosen to succeed him in administration of the kingdome, a prince of such inclination to vertue and godlines, as all men may justlie wonder thereat. He bare such zealous devotion towards the worshipping of Christs passion as he took it that which way soever he rode (as it is reported) he had the same borne before him; and at his getting up and lighting downe from his horse, he with all the multitude of people standing about him, would worship it, kneeling downe, & reverentlie kissing it. This crosse was of silver with a crucifix thereon, and letters grauen in a plate fastened to the backe, containing these two words: Christianorum gloria. He commanded also that the signe of the crosse should be set upon the tops of steeples, and on the highest towers of the gates of castles & towne. Moreover he forbade the crosse to be grauen or painted upon any pavement, least any man should irreverentlie tread upon it. Furthermore he had priests and other religious men in such honor, as nothing could be more, appointing them to have the tenths of all those fruits which the earth yielded. Sundrie ordinances he made also, for the grave punishment of all such as in any wise misused a priest, or other religious person: as he that gaue any of them a blow, should lose his hand for it; and he that slue one of them, should forfeit his goods, and be burned quickie. Again, he bestowed manie rich felowes, and gaue divers great gifts unto churches, providing the ministers of sufficient livings, and appointed that they should have their houses nere unto their churches, to be ready to execute that which appertained unto their offices, when any need required.

The king being thus vertuously disposed, caused the whole number of his subjects by his example to be the better affectioned towards the advancement of religion. The report and fame thereof moured that holie man saint Colme or Colombe, to come over south of Ireland (where he had the governance of sundrie houses of monks) with twelvet other vertuous persons into Albion, and there gathering together a great number of monks, being here and there dispersed abroad in the countie, he placed them orderlie in such houses, as king Connall had builded and founded for that purpose, appointing amongst them rulers & ministers, such as he thought most convenient. But saint Colme himselfe, and the other twelve, which he brought over with him from Ireland, placing themselves to inhabit in the Ile of Jona, now called Colmekill, took great paines to instruct the Scots and Picts in the true articles of the faith.

Amongst the Picts at the same time the heresie of Pelagius had infected the minds of many, by means that diverse of that nation having dwelled a long time in Britaine, returning into their countie, brought that pestilent doctrine home with them, and taught it unto other. Saint Colme therefore informed hereof, passed into Louthian unto Brudeus as then king of the Picts, earnestlie travelling to instruct both him and his people in the right believe, and to extirpe out of their hearts all erroneous opinions of that damnable sect of the Pelagians lore. At the same time, that blessed man Kentigern, otherwise called Gungo, governed the church of Glasgow, as bishop of the same, who resorting into the companie of this saint Colme, had much conference with him, to both their comforts, concerning the true articles of our faith.

This Kentigern was descended of the blood royal of the Pictish kings, as son unto that vertuous woman Chametes or Chameis, daughter unto Loff king of the Picts, whome a young lustie gentleman, or (as some have written) the last mentioned Eugenius the Scottish king ravished by force, and begot of hir the said Kentigern. He was greatlie in favour with the foresaid Brudeus the Pictish king, as one that was neere of his blood. For the same Brudeus was nephew unto the foresaid Loff by his brother called Alethor, and therefore succeeded in the kingdome of the Picts, after that Brudeus was slain, Crosses set upon the tops of steeples.

Connall's devotion towards churchmen.

Connall's liberallitie towards churches.

Saint Colme continued out of south of Ireland into Scotland.

The heresie of Pelagius in Britaine.

Kentigern bishop of Glasgow, otherwise called Gungo bishop of Glasgow.

Chameis or Chametes ravished by Eugenius king of Scotland, of which ravishment she bare the foresaid Kentigern.

Arthur was slain, 30000 Britains slain, Calvolane slain.

Queen Guatnoze taken, the spoils of the Britains camp burned.

Donbarre in Angus, not that in Louthian.

The fable of quaine Guatnozes grave buried in Angus.

542. H.B.

Strange and unkinde deeds.

Eugenius rewarded his soldiers.

The castell of Calidon now
Dounkeld.

The bishops
see of Doun-keld.

Saint Colme
returneth into Ireland.

Saint Colme
cometh againe into Scotland, bringing with him Aidan some to king Conran.

The death of Conuall.
578. H.B.

Saint Colme
present at the buriall of king Conuall.

Kinnatill elected king of Scotland.

Saint Colme
and Aidan returned by Kinnatill.

The prophesy
of Kinnatill.

The death of Kinnatill.
Kinnatill li-eng upon his death bed, surrendereth his kingdome into Aidans
hands.

saire, as before is expressed. Kentigorne went with saint Colme vnto the castell of Calidon, otherwise called Dounkeld, where they remained six moneths in a monastirie there, builded by king Conuall, teaching and preaching vnto the people of Athole, Calidon, and Angus, that in great numbers came vnto them, to heare their goodlie instructions. There is in the same place, where the said castell sometimes stood, a church dedicated vnto saint Colme, built of satre square stone, being at this day a bishops see, com-monlie called Dounkeld, indowled with manie satre reuenues and great possessions, for the maintenance of the bishop and his canons.

At the six moneths end, those two vertuous persons taking their leaue each of other, not without shedding of teares, departed in sunder, Kentigorne returning into Glascow, and saint Colme into Ireland, where reporting manie things, touching the great vertue and holines of king Conuall, and with what deuotion he had bene receiued both of him and his people, he moued manie to wonder greatlie thereat, to heare that a king in the midst of all his allurements to pleasure, should yet be so mindfull of diuine meditations and goodlie exercises. In the yere following, saint Colme prepared to returne into Scotland, taking Aidan ouer with him thither, by commandement of king Conuall, which Aidan (as ye haue heard) to auoid the traines of Eugentius, fled ouer into Ireland with his mother, for doubt to bee made away by the same Eugentius. Saint Colme taking the sea with this Aidan, and comming on land on the coasts of Scotland, was no sooner there arriued, but that presentlie he had knowledge how the king was dead, being the yere of his reigne the 10, and after the birth of our Saviour 579.

Saint Colme then being throughlie certified of his death, and that the corps was forwarde on the way towards Colmekill, there to be buried, he thought it a peece of his dutie to go thither to be at the funerall, and so doing, was as one of the chiefest there in executing of the obsequies. Which being ended, and hearing that Kinnatill the brother of Conuall was inthronized king in Argile, by the free election of all the estates, he neuerthelesse kept on his former purposed iourne, and came vnto Kinnatill, bzinging Aidan with him (appointed by Conuall to haue receiued the gouernement of the kingdome if he had liued) they were both receiued with all beneuolence of the said Kinnatill contrary to most mens expectation: insomuch that imbracing Aidan, he had him be of good cheere, for it should shortly come to passe, that he should attaine to the possession of his grandfathers dominions, and haue issue that should succeed him, to the great reliefe of the Scottish common-wealth.

By what spirit of prophesie he vttered these words, it is uncerteine, but sure it is that his purpose was to haue giuen ouer the gouernement of the kingdome (as he confessed himselfe lieng vpon his death bed) and to haue restored it vnto Aidan who had a right therevnto. Whowbeit being preuented by death, he could not haue time to accomplish his desire, for within twentie daies after his coronation, being surpassed with a grieuous disease of a catarrhike rheume, and the squinancie, he was constrained to keepe his chamber, committing the publike administration of the realme vnto Aidan. Whereupon followed a feuer through increasing of a flegmatike humor, by long rest, that after 14 moneths space vnbodied his ghost, which by instruction of saint Colme, being present with him at the houre of his death, he rendred in most deuout wise into the hands of his redeemer; appointing his kingdome as it were by deliuerie of scissin, even there vpon his death bed vnto the foresaid Aidan.

After that the bodie of this Kinnatill was interred, according to the maner, in Colmekill, Aidan receiued the crowne, sitting vpon the marble stone, after the custome in those daies vsed, by the hands of that holie father saint Colme. Who willing that silence might be kept, laid his right hand vpon the kings head, and in his left hand holding his crosser stasse, made a brieue exhortation, as well to the king as to his people, admonishing them of their duties each towards other, but especiallie he exhorted them vnto peace and concord, and before all things to remember to walke in the waies of the Lord, for in so doing they might hope for wealth and prosperitie in the state of their commonwealth, with all other good graces, whereas otherwise, if either the people forgot their duties towards God, or that the king regarded not duilie to execute or fulfill his office, in giuing God thanks for his bountions liberalitie and high benefites bestowed vpon him, it should come to passe, that intestine seditions, conspiracies, and other mischiefes should rise among them, to the irrecoverable losse of the realme, by bzinging the same into danger to be ouerrun with some forrein power, if they did not repent in time, and call to God for his fauour, that it might please him to reduce them againe into the right path of his lawes and ordinances, whensoever they should so fall from the same. When saint Colme had made an end of these or the like his wholsome aduertisements, all the people reioicing thereat, promised with one voice, and therewith bound to follow the same, and to be euer readie to obeie the commandement of their prince, and the holie instructions of their bishops and other the ecclesiasticall ministers. The assemble being once dissolued, the king departed into Galloway, and there deliuered the countrie of certeine British ro-bers that had invaded it. After this, studing to mainteine god orders and quiet rule through his dominions, he appointed an assemble of the chiefest peeres of his realme, to be holden yereilie in three seuerall parties thereof, as in Galloway, Loughgubber, and Cathnesse, there to heare and determine all sutes and quarrels of his subiects, & to giue order for the administration of the lawes and all publike affaires, as they should see cause and occasion. He required also S. Colme to be present euer with them, that matters touching religion might be the better provided for, and that the people might take all things done in those publike sessions in right god part, because such an holie and vertuous father of the church was amongst them, and hauing the chiefest authoritie.

Thus continued the realme in quiet state for cer-teine yeres together, till it chanced that diuers of the nobles being together on hunting, fell at variance, and therevpon making a frate, sundrie of them were slaine. The beginners and such as were most culpable were sought for by the kings officers, to haue bene had to ward, but they in disobeying the arrest, stroke and beat the officers berie fore, and im-mediatlie therewith fled vnto Brudeus king of the Pictis, so by wilfull exile to safe gard their liues. King Aidan according to the maner in such cases accusmed, required to haue those outlawes deliuered vnto him, that he might do iustice vpon them according lie as they had deserued. Brudeus taking pittie of the yong gentlemen, alledged manie things in their excuse, still deferring to deliuer them, till at length he procured warre to himselfe and his countrie.
For Aidan the Scottish king, offended in that he might not haue those rebels and publike offenders restored vnto him, caused a number of his people, first to settie a great bottie of cattell and prisoners out

Aidan.

Aidan recei-ued his inu-
sured of the kingdome at
the hands of saint Colme.
S. Colmes
exhortation to the king and the people.

The repentance of king Aidan.

Saint Colme
returneth into
the king of the Pictis.

The promise of the people.

The kings
tourne into Galloway.

Aidan ap-peareth seeming to be baptized in the pactis of his realme.

Saint Col-
me present at the sessions
and sessions.

A fray between the nobles
being a hunting.

King Aidan
requirith to haue certain
Scottish
lawes deli-uered at the hands of Brudeus king of the Pictis.

Brudeus
excuseth himselfe
in manie things promising to deliuer
the Scottish
gentlemen
and prisoners
out.

A vague company be-cometh the Scottish
armie, with the article of the lawe.

out of Ang Wherev
code into
to a field,
from Calit with great
the victorie Arthurnus
sed not gre Colme tro
and declar fended alms
as had insu
for the bza such repen mitted him who being ded, the ki toiffe suffer vnto him
the matter length sai
red himsel
vnto Brude of diuerse section un uelling li
kings, th matters and their Thus sa
he came f
les vnto
some doc servants mandem uing by and occu tries, the ning seu kingdom ning nex
man of went by deus the Scots,
gainst th
to haue
so for th called A though hed the Scots
to the being v more ca sed vpo kingdo
Bude
motion counse
rupted will p forma gainst
with t
warre that h
the les amitie ceiuing
with t
resist
tains

out of Angus.

Wherewith the Picts being kindled, made a like rode into Galloway. Finallie the matter grew vnto a fiell, which was foughten in Dientie, not farre from Calidon castell otherwise called Dounkeld, with great slaughter on both sides, though in the end the victorie yet remained with the Scots; but losing Arthurnus the sonne of Aidan their king, they reioised not greatlie at the gaine. That holie man saint Colme troubled with such newes, came vnto Aidan, and declaring vnto him how grievouslie he had of- fended almightie God, in procuring such mischief as had insued of this warre, and reciting in particu- lar the branches thereof, he moued the king vnto such repentance for his trespasse, that he wholie sub- mitted himselfe vnto saint Colmes chastisement, who being about to depart in semblance soze offen- ded, the king got him by the sleue, and would in no wise suffer him to go from him, till he had declared vnto him some comfortable meanes how to redresse the matter, for the quieting of his conscience. At length saint Colme lamenting the kings case, suffe- red himselfe to be intreated, and thereupon repaired vnto Brudeus the Pictish king, mouing him by way of diuerse godlie aduertisements to incline his af- fection vnto peace. At length he did so much by tra- uelling sundrie times to and fro betwixt the two kings, that he brought them vnto agreement, for all matters depending in controuersie betwixt them and their subjects.

Thus saint Colme hauing accomplished that which he came for, returned againe into the westerne Isles vnto his wonted home, where he did by whole- some documents and vertuous examples instruct the seruants of God in the way of his lawes and com- mandements. In this meane time the Saxons ha- uing binen and put backe the Britains into Wales, and occupieng all the residue of their lands and coun- tries, they diuided the same into seuen parts, orde- ning seuen seuerall kings to gouerne the same as kingdomes.ouer that of Northumberland, adoi- ning next vnto the Picts, one Edelred reigned, a man of exceeding desire to enlarge his dominion. He went by all means he could deuise, to persuaue Bru- deus the Pictish king to renew the warres with the Scots, promising him all the aid he could make a- gainst them, not onelie for that he knew the Scots to haue bene ever enemies vnto the Saxons, but al- so for that he himselfe was descended of the nation called Agathypses, of the which the Picts (as was thought) were also come. But the cause why he wi- shed that there might be warres raised betwixt the Scots and Picts, was not for anie good will he bare to the Picts, but onelie to the end that their power being weakened through the same, he might haue a more easie preie of their countrie, the which he purpo- sed vpon occasion to inuade, and ioine vnto his owne kingdome of Northumberland.

Brudeus at the first gaue no care vnto his earnest motions and large offers, but at length through the counsell and procurement of some of his nobles, cor- rupted by bribes receiued at Edelreds hands, and still putting into the kings head sundrie forged in- formations of the Scotchmens daile attempts a- gainst the Pictish nation; he determined to ioine with the Saxons against them, and caused therupon warre to be proclaimed against the Scots, as those that had spoiled and robbed his subjects, contrarie to the league and all bonds of old friendship and former amitie betwixt them. The Scottish king Aidan per- ceiuing the practise of the Saxons, and togither ther- with the vntruth of the Picts, the better to be able to resist their malice, ioineith in league with the Bri- tains: this article being the chiefest in the whole couenant: that if the enemies first inuaded the Bri- tains, then an armie of Scots should be sent with all speed into Britaine, to helpe to defend the coun- trie against such inuasions: but if the Scots were first inuaded, then should the Britains in semblable maner come ouer to their aid.

The Saxons hauing knowledge of this appoint- ment betwixt Scots & Britains; to draw the Scots forth of their countrie, and so to haue them at more aduantage, procured the Picts to ioine with them: and so both their powers being vnited together, en- tred into the British confines. Aidan according to the covenante came straight vnto the aid of the Bri- tains. Edelred and Brudeus refused to fight for certeine daies, as it were of purpose, thereby to wa- rie the Scots with watch and trauell, being as then far from home. Also they looked daile to haue Cen- line king of the Westsaxons to come vnto their aid: but the Scots and Britains hauing knowledge ther- of, first thought it best to encounter with him, before he should ioine with the other, and thus vnderstan- ding that their onelie refuge remained in their ar- mois and weapons, gaue the onset so fiercelie vpon those Saxons, that at the first, slaying Cutha Cen- lines sonne, with a great number of other, they easi- lie distressed and put the residue to flight.

Aidan would not suffer his men to pursue too far in the chase, but called them backe by the sound of a trumpet, who being assembled hetherwith about their standards, made such ioy and triumph, as greater could not be deuised, what with dancing, singing, and plaicng on pipes and other instruments, accor- ding to the manner in those daies. But as they were thus in the midst of their chiefest mirth, suddenlie appeared the Saxons and Picts, which were with Edelred and Brudeus, appoaching towards them in god order of battell, with whome were also the resi- due of the Westsaxons, that had escaped from the late bickering. Whereupon the Scots and Britains amazed with the sight hereof, were suddenlie stri- ken out of countenance, inso much that Aidan went amongst them, and with a bold countenance exhor- ted them to remember how valiantlie they had al- ready put to flight the other of their enemies, so that there was great hope for assured victorie of these likewise, if they would now shew the like manlie courage against them, as they had shewed before in assailing the other. Manie other words he vsed in ad- monishing them to fight manfullie, till the onset gi- uen by the enemies caused him to make an end.

The Saxons laid about them so frontlie in the be- ginning, that they forced their aduersaries, with whome they were matched, to giue backe. Neither did Edelred faile in that occasion to encourage them to follow the aduantage now thus gotten. Bru- deus with his Picts likewise made great slaughter in that wing of the Scots, with the which he incoun- tred; so that finallie the same Scots perceiuing the Britains beaten downe and soze distressed on their side, fell through discomfort thereof to running a- waie. There were slaine in this battell on the Sco- tishmens side, Brennius lieutenant of (as they ter- med him) thane of the Ile of Man, with Dungan the kings third sonne, and no small number of other gentlemen beside. The king himselfe escaped by helpe of his sonne, who stateng to get his father out of the preasse, was slaine (as is said) amongst the residue. On the Saxons side, there was slaine Theobald Edelreds brother, and Cutha the king of Westsaxons his sonne, as before ye haue heard, with a great num- ber of other. Edelred himselfe lost one of his eyes. Brudeus the Pictish king was hurt in the thigh, and besides this, he lost a great multitude of his people. Thus Edelred hauing got such a notable victorie

The Picts & Saxons enter into the land of the Britains.

Cenline of the Westsaxons.

The Scots and Britains put the Saxons to flight, and slay Cutha the sonne of Cenline king of the Westsaxons. The triumph made by the Scots and Britains vpon their new victorie.

The Saxons and Picts.

The sudden feare of the Scots and Picts, after all their great top & triumphing.

Aidan exhor- ted his men to manfullie.

The Saxons fight stoutlie.

Edelred.

Brudeus & the Picts maketh slaugh- ter of the Scots.

The Scots run awaie.

Edelred lost one of his eyes. Brudeus hurt in the thigh.

B. J.

at

Deaglastone the place wher this battell was fought. Galloway invaded by the Scots.

Certaine companies of Saxons overthorne.

Passages thorough Shilleway lands.

The diligence of king Aidan in providing to resist his enemies.

The Scots and Britains dislodge. The Scots and Britains enter into Northumberland.

The fight betwixt Scots and Britains on the one side, and Saxons and Picts on the other.

The Saxons and Picts discomfited and chased.

at Deglastone in Britaine, he could not be so contented, but eftsoones assembling his people, and joining againe with Budeus and his Picts, the next summer after invaded Galloway, and began to rob and spoile that countrie, to the end he might either enforce the inhabitants, with other the countries next thereunto adjoining, to yeld unto him; either els to bring them into extreme povertie in wasting all afore him. But Aidan being advertised hereof, sent to the Britains for their couenanted aid, and committing forward with his owne people which he had assembled together, overthrew certaine companies of his enemies, as he found them dispersed abroad in seeking for prey: then passing by their maine armie, he cometh into Anandale, where he joineth with the Britains, being come so farre forward on their waie to meet him. The Saxons and Picts having knowledge of their enemies doings, wan such a place of advantage, as they thought it an easie matter for them in keeping the same, to distresse both the Scots and Britains through stopping by the passages, by the which they must of force passe, if they minded to come forth on that day. These passages late through certaine quicksands, and by a river which had but few fords passable.

The Scots and Britains, perceiving how they were thus inclosed, with all speed trenched their campe about, raising certaine bulwarks and turrets in places where they thought expedient, as though they had ment still there to have continued. Aidan himselfe toke such pains in seeing euerie thing done in due order, that his people moved more through his example than by anie exhortation, were most diligent in their duties, desirous of nothing so much as to have occasion ministered, to shew some proofe of their worthie valiances. At length, when the enemies were most at quiet, and (as was supposed) nothing in doubt of anie attempt to be made by the Scots and Britains in the night season, leaving a great number of fires in their campe, they suddenly dislodge, and passing the water by secret fords, they entered into Cumberland, and so after passing into Northumberland, they wasted and destroyed with fire and sword all that came within their reach: the report of which their doings brought Celsred and Budeus backe into that countrie to resist their invasion, neither resting day nor night, till they had got sight of their enemies.

The next day, the souldiers on both sides requiring battell, together they go with great noise and din both of men and instruments. So much hardinesse in the Saxons caused no small number of them to be slaine, rather chosing to die with reputation of manhood, than to give backe neuer so little ground to the enemy. Thus the battell continued for a space, verie doubtfull which waie the victorie would incline. On the Britains and Scottismens side, there were foure chiefe rulers amongst them, beside Aidan himselfe, as Constantius and Alencrinus Britains, Calian and Moridacke Scottismen. Of these taking a severall charge vpon him, did earnestlie applie their bittermost indevours therin, encouraging their hands to put awaie all cowardlie feare, and manfullie to sticke to their tackle, since by victorie there was hope of eternall fame, beside suertie of life, and advancement to the common wealth of their countrie; where otherwise they might looke for nothing, but the contrarie mischaps, as shame, rebuke, and importable servitude. So that the Scottismen and Britains encouraged herewith, pressed vpon the enemies so fiercely, that at length as well the Saxons as Picts were compelled to breake their arraie, & fall to plaine running awaie: the Scots following so cgerlie in the chase, that more of their enemies were thought to die in the fight, than before there had done in the battell.

S. Colme as yet being alive, and within his monasterie in the Ile of Iona, had knowledge by divine inspiration (as the Scottish chronicles make mention) of all these matters how they went: and at the verie time that the battells were in fight together, he had assembled a companie of verie vertuous and godlie disposed persons, making intercession for the prosperous speed of their king the foresaid Aidan: and at the verie instant (as it was knowne after) that the Saxons began to flee (as they which had the overthrow) that holie old father shewed great token of ioy and gladnesse, declaring vnto his brethren by the spirit of secret knowledge or prophesie, how Aidan had the better, and that his enemies were discomfited, willing them thereupon to give vnto God thanks for the same. There was an huge multitude slaine in this conflict, but namelie the death of Cealine king of the West Saxons, with other two worthie captains of that nation, made the slaughter more sorrowfull on that side, the one of them was called Caliane, and the other Dubhtelline.

The day next after the battell, the spoile of the field being gathered together, all that which was knowne to have bene taken out of Galloway, and other countries of the Scots, was restored by the kings authoritie vnto the owners againe. The residue which remained was divided amongst the souldiers, the tenth part onelie excepted, which was distributed vnto priests & curats, to bestow the same vpon ornaments for their churches. The banners and standards of the Saxons and Picts, with manie other rich offerings, king Aidan sent vnto the abbeie of Colmekeill, there to remaine as perpetual monuments and tokens of so notable a victorie. The yere next ensuing, that holie father S. Colme now almost wasted through age, and hereto also sore troubled with a rheumatike humor, fell sicke and died. Some saie he ended his life in his house amongst his brethren, within the Ile of Iona, otherwise called Colmekeill, but S. Beda writeth, how he died in an Island called Heu; where againe the Irish writers affirme, that he deceased in a towne in Ireland called Dume, & that his towe is there in verie great veneration of the people: vpon the which are these Latine verses ingrauen for the lookers on to read, if they list:

Hic in Duno, tumultu tumultantur in uno, Brigida, Patricius, atque Columbanus.

Saint Colme, Saint Patrike, and Brigitta pure, Thir three in Dune lies in ane sepulture.

Neither did Aidan the Scottish king live long time after, for hearing (as is said) that saint Colme was dead, hostile thereupon, more through griefe than by force of sicknesse, he departed this world, after he had reigned 37 yeares in gouernement ouer the Scottismen, he died about the yere of our Lord 606. In the daies of this Aidan there was sent into Albion from Gregorie the pope of Rome, diuers learned men (amongest whome were Augustinus and Mellitus) to instruct the English people in the faith of Christ, which as yet they had not received. By the earnest trauell and exhortation of these instructors, Ethelbert king of the Kentish Saxons was baptised with all his people. The British priests nor their doctrine the Saxons could in no wise abide, because (as is supposed) the one nation through a naturall hatred, still sought the destruction of the other. The South and East Saxons moved with the example of the Kentish Saxons, hostile after also renounced their old superstitious idolatrie, and likewise received the christian faith. Celsred king of Northumberland moved vnto displeasure herewith, sent word vnto these Saxons of the south parts (as

S. Colme vnto the spirit of secret knowledge.

Celine king of West Saxons.

The buriall of the spoile.

S. Colme departed out of this life.

which bein Bellenden translated.

Aidan being the Scotch king, men, departeth this world.

606.

Augustinus and Mellitus sent into Albion.

Ethelbert king of Kent.

The Saxons hated the British priests.

Celsred king of Northumberland.

then

then all of English institution he would me into there liu Scottish Picts, therefore parted on Basse, land with thier the there w bodie, as forth, th it, but mongest continu morning who was the buri found th red with man m mande the peop rallie b same b maine mon po A in bled to king. Keneth king o was i to the after into t lungs kingd hands of all was crasse T said, long of his day after death appo byu Cu got 606 you whi sch inge he g ter a N his tot self der self for re had done in the

and within his mo-
knowledge by di-chronicles make they went and at were in fight toge-nie of vertie vertumaking intercess-
king the foresaid
as it was knowne flee (as they which either shewed great being unto his be-ledge or prophesie,
his enemies were upon to give unto was an huge mulnamelie the death
ns, with other two made the slaughter
one of them was hitelline.

Sh. Colme in-bued with the spirit of secret knowledge.

Colme king of wellforn
name.
Whitelline of Whitelline

The division of the spale.

Colme
king of Scotland

Sh. Colme
king of Scotland

Colme
king of Scotland

Colme
king of Scotland

Colme
king of Scotland

Colme
king of Scotland

Colme
king of Scotland

Colme
king of Scotland

Colme
king of Scotland

Colme
king of
Scotland

then all of them generallie knowne by the name of Englishmen that sich they had forsaken the old institutions & ancient religion of their forefathers, he would sacrie from thenceforth be no lesse emnie unto them than unto the Scots and Britains.
There lived in these daies that holie man called a Scottish man borne, but dwelling amongst the Picts, whome he instructed in the right faith, and therefore was named the doctor of the Picts. He departed out of this life within the Glais called the Wasse, lying about two miles off from the maine land within the sea, where the Forth hath entrie between the same Isle, and an other called the Hebrides.
There were three parishes fell at contention for his bodie, as Alotham, Tinningham, and Dysson, so far south, that they were at point to have fought about it, but that by counsell of some discrete persons acmongest them, it was ordeined that they should continue in prayer for that night, and in the next morning stand to the order of the bishop of the Diocesse, who was come thither the same time to be present at the buriall. The next day in the morning these men found three bodies with three bodies decerned covered with clothes, so like in all resemblance, that no man might perceive any difference. Then by commandement of the bishop, and with great top of all the people, the said severall bodies were carried severallie unto the said three severall churches, and in the same buried in most solempne wise, where they re-maine unto this day, in much honor with the common people of the countreis nere adjoining.

After that the corps of king Aidan was buried in Colmehill, the nobles of the realme assembled together in Argile, about the election of a new king. Where, by the generall voices of them all, Iacynthus lair the sonne of Comgall (sometime king of the Scottis men, as before is mentioned) was now proclaimed king, and requied according to the manner; but he lived not past four months after, but died of a catarrhe the next falling down into the windpipe, and so stopping by his light and lungs. He delivered as it were the possession of his kingdome, by way of surrendering the same, into the hands of Eugenius sonne to king Aidan, by consent of all the nobles, a little before he died, for that it was knowne he had a right thereunto after the decease of Iacynthus.

This Eugenius was the fourth of that name, which had ruled over the Scottis men. As it is said, saint Colme prophesied that he should be king long before his fathers death, for when all the sonnes of king Aidan were brought before him, and that day demanded of him which of them should reign after him, he overpassing the residue (which he inferred by secret knowledge should die in the same) appointed fourth this Eugenius, called by some also Eudius, declaring that it should be onelie he. This Eugenius then being placed in the kinglie seat, forgot not such holie lessons and vertuous precepts, as the foresaid saint Colme had taught him in his youth, so that studying how to defend rather than which was his owne in peace and quietnesse, than to seek anie waies or means how to enlarge it, by wrongfull inroaching upon other mens possessions, he grew into such favour with all good men, as greater could not be desired. Unto all offenders he was a sharpe officer, not sparing anie transgressor of his lawes, neither in respect of nobilitie or otherwise, but rather those gentlemen which misused their felves in breach of god orders, he chiefelie gave order to see them punished; where if they behaved themselves worthilie, and according to their calling, there was no prince more glad than he to advance them unto honor.

By these and the like his piteous doings, he was both belovd of his people and also feared. He new-ther favoured the Picts nor Saxons of Northumberland, for that the one nation being schismatike, perfessed in their idolatrie, and the other called not by all manner of means to support them; but yet taking a truce with them both, he firmelie caused the same to be observed. In the tenth yeare of his reigne, Cynigell king of North Saxons & Elfred king of Wes-sex, both with aid of the Picts, banquished Ead-wald king of Britains, and chased him into Scotland, where he remained not long, sailing from thence into France, and purchasing aid of the king there named Cadwall, returned into Wales, where he conquering his enemies the Saxons, and despoiling many thousands of them, he was replaced againe unto his kingdome. About the same time was Eadwald king of Northumberland slain in battell, at a place called Wintonham, not far from the mouth of the Forth, by Eadwald and Ethelbert, the one being king of the east Angles, and the other of the middle Angles, in revenge of such injuries as the same Eadwald had done unto the Saxons of the countreie called Mercie, consenting as in the English historie more plainelie may appear) all those shires from the river of Thames unto the river of Merse in Lancashire. Then was one Cadwall a right christian prince appointed to reigne in his place, by the assignement of the two foresaid kings Eadwald and Ethelbert.

Whilist these things were a doing, there were seuen sonnes of the foresaid Eadwald, that defending the true dealing of the Picts, which refused to aid their father in his necessitie, and desiring to fall into the hands of Eadwald, got them to England the Scottish king for more succour of their lives.
Their names were Euseid, Oswald, Eadgar, Os-win, Eadric, Eadmund, and Eadric. Eadric the onelie daughter of Eadwald being taken amongst other prisoners, and escaping from hir taker, miraculou-lie got a boat in the river of Humber, and with the same taking the sea alone, without all humane helpe (as bathymie reported) she sailed forth, & at length safelie arrived at the point of land which stretched forth into the sea, in the mouth of the Forth, called can. King, this day after hir name, saint Eadric head, where being received by the bishop of that dio-cesse, she was professed a nun, and after continuing in great perfectness of observing that profession, she was instituted abbess of hir house, shewing still in trade of life an orderlie example for hir flocke to follow.

Eugenius the Scottish king did longlie receive the loves of Eadwald, though their father had ever been a cruell enimie against the Scottish nation; and within a while after their coming into Scotland, hearing oftentimes the godlie sermons and preachings of the bishops and monks, who in those daies continuallie gave themselves unto that exercise, they finally abhorred their superstitious idola-trie, and received baptism, that salutiferous signe and sacrament of our christian religion. Those churches also, which the Saxons in time of the warres had overthrowen and destroyed in Galloway and other countreies thereabouts, Eugenius caused to be repared; moreover also he redified sundrie castles in those marches, and placed in them garrisons of soldiers, to defend them against all invasions that might happen. Thus continuing his reigne the space of fiftie yeares or thereabouts in honorable peace, to the great advancement of the commonwealth of his subjects, he lastlie died in the yeare 420, and was buried amongst his elders in the Isle of Jona, with in the monastrie of Colmehill.

Cadwall bene quibed.

Cadwall is referred unto his kingdome.

Saxons
king of Eng-
land.

King Ead-wald.

Eadwald.

S. Eadric
head.

which being Bellenden
translateth.

Aidan king
the Scottis
men, departeth this world.

606.

Augustinus
and Agellin sent into Bri-toun.

Ethelbert
baptised.

The Saxons
baptised
the Britishe
people.

Elfred king of the English
people.

Elfred king
of the English
people.

Bonifacius a godlie pre-cher.

About this time, that reuerend father and bishop Bonifacius Mutinus came forth of Italie into Scotland, to instruct the people in the faith of Christ there. Whether he were pope, and resigning up the papalitie came thus into Scotland (as some haue supposed) or whether he was sent from the pope called Bonifacius that succeeded Saninianus, it is not certeinly knowne; but certeinly it is, as the Scottis wyrters affirme, that vpon his first comming into Scotland he arrived in the water of Tete, comming on land at the mouth of a little riuer, which blindeth the countrie of Colvrie from Angus. His name is yet famous amongst the Scots elien this day, for that he traueled through the worst part of the land, in preaching and instructing the people to the confirmation in the faith, and erecting diuers churches in the honor of almighty God, which he dedicated to the name of saint Peter. And amongst other he built one at the place where he came on land, another at a village called Tulline, the walking thre miles from Dundee, and the third at Kellenroth, where afterwards an house of chanoines of saint Augustines order was builded. At length he came into Kasse, continuing there the residue of his life, and is buried at Kellenmarken.

Molocke a preacher.

Molocke were preachers in those daies.

There was also at the same time amongst the Scots an ancient godlie man named Molocke, who following such rules & doctrine as in his youth he had learned of Brandon that reuerend abbat, he ceased not to exhort the people of Mar and Argile (in which countreies he was most reseruent) to flee and forsake their vicious liuing, and to endeavour themselves to imbrace vertue, to the comfort and health of their soules. This Molocke kept continuall companie with the forenamed Bonifacius after his comming into Scotland: and finally died also in Kasse, being about 94 yeares of age, and was buried in the church where Bonifacius lieth, though they of Argile say that his relikes rest among them in the church of Lismore, which is dedicated to his name.

Ferqu-hard.

Ferquhard
king of Scot-
land.

Fiacre giueth
himselfe for to liue a solitarie life in France

After the deccasse of Eugenius, his son Ferquhard succeeded in his place, for Eugenius had three sonnes, Ferquhard, Fiacre, and Donald, these being appointed by their father to be brought up with Connane bishop of Sodor (that is, the bishop of Man) in vertuous discipline, did not altogether follow his godlie precepts and lessons. Ferquhard and Donald gladly gaue eare to him, but they thought his instructions did not much appertene vnto their birth and degree: but Fiacre printing his diuine documents deepe in his heart, determined to forsake all worldly pompe and dignitie, and to get him some whither farre from home, where he might serue God more frelie without let or interruption of his friends or kinsfolke. This being supposed, he got vpon him simple apparell, and went ouer into France, where seeking a solitarie place, Pharas the bishop of Meaux gaue vnto him a peece of ground, in the which at this day he is worshipped with great deuotion.

There hath gone a tale in that countrie, that no woman might enter into the chappell where he lieth buried; for if anie doe, she hath some mishap that falleth vnto hir, as either the losse of sight, priuation of wit, or some such like. As touching the state of the Scottish commonwealth, vnder the gouernement of Ferquhard, the same was quiet enough, & without trouble of outward enemies; but his subjects among themselves fell at such diuision, that euery part of the realme was full of murder, burning, and other destructions of men and houses, with such spoiling, robbing, reining, and all kinds of other mischiefs, that no where was any quietnes of life or goods: all the which misorders sprang, were now risen and maintained through the kings owne diligence: for he mistaking his office and dutie, was of this opinion, that so long as the nobles and states of his realme were thus ready one to kill another, there was no likelihood they should haue time to practise anie rebellion against him; and herevpon he rather holpe to further such discord amongst them, than take order for to appease it. But it came to passe by this means, that he was nothing regarded within a while amongst them, so that by means of other arbitrators which they chose by common agreement, all matters in controuersie were taken vpon ended betwixt them, the king not once made priue therewith.

At the same time it was noised abroad in the realme, that Ferquhard, besides other his wicked behauiours, was also infected with the erroneous opinions of the Pelagian heresie. Which suspicion was the more increased, for that he used to haue sundrie Bristish priests in his companie: the which nation had bene euer noted with the spot of that damnable infection. The nobilitie of the realme moued herewith, summoned him by an herald to come to a counsell, which they had appointed to hold of all the states, that they might there vnderstand, if it were true or not which was commonlie reported of him. But he refusing to come at such summons, they assembled together, and besieged him in the castell wherein he had inclosed himselfe; and winning the place, got him into their hands, and immediately therevpon committed him to safe keeping. This done, they consult together for the administration of the realme, whether they should quite depose Ferquhard, or restore him to his place. In fine they rest vpon this agreement to send an honorable ambassage into France vnto Fiacre, to require him to returne home into his countrie, and there to receiue the gouernement of the realme.

Fiacre (as the report goeth) hearing that there were others of the Scottish nobilitie comming towards him vpon this message, in his prayers besought seruente of almighty God, that it might please him so to worke for him, that he might continue in his contemplatiue still, and not be occasioned to resort vnto the troubles of the world, which all contemplatiue godlie men ought to abhorre. And euen as he had wished, it came to passe. For when those that were sent vnto him, came to the hermitage wherein he had his lodging, they found him (as appeared vnto them) so disfigured with the leprosie, that vpon his earnest refusal to forsake his solitarie life (which he professed to lead as an heremite) for anie worldly preferment of kingle gouernement, they were content to returne with that answer, that his infirmitie (as they supposed) was such, as was not conuenient for him that should haue anie publicke gouernement. This Fiacre had a sister named Sara, which hearing of hir brothers vertuous trade of life, came vnto him with a companie of godlie virgins, and being of him confirmed in his purposed intent of chastitie, she repaired into Champaigne in France, where she with hir fellowes remained in great holinesse of life, leaving in those parties a worthy memorie not forgotten amongst them thre till this day.

The foresaid ambassadors returning forth of France, declared in what plight of deformitie they had seene Fiacre, and how earnestlie he had refused the offer which they had made vnto him in name of all the states of Scotland. The Scottish nobilitie herevpon assembling together, chose forth foure of the ancientest peeres amongst them, to haue the rule and gouernement of the kingdome, till it were otherwise prouided. These were named by that

Ferquhard
maintained
will vnto
him.

The desperat
end of king Ferquhard.

632

The king
hard and south the lagian etc.

Donald.
Donald is
of Scotland.

The king
summoned
an herald,
he is taken prisoner.

King Edwin
is slain.

Embassy
sent into France
Fiacre

Fiacre
is slain.

But,

Like an in-cell.

age, war as some time Fer ed with miseries
and so no
had bene mens liu
euer now
hard, wh
the lords
in Argile
by comm Eugenius
out of th
great toy
This Tadmir fathers r estate su
wealth,
gouerned
cello for grew into time Ca
king of
of Engla powers
thunder dome. & trie, and
toke a gr Brideus
for aid v
his intru
times pa
wins dea
the Brit
son of kingdom
This b still in where by inuested
which is time they berland
is said one Dr
great wi appeared ment to of his da ding the ring aga whole de faith, w instructi
But they
and most vnder th and Ben sembled
into Jo
with Dr
and toke mon p
which by Then
nen vnto
of the rig which he
on, the earnest

the kings owne
e and dutie, was nobles and states
to kill an other,
uld haue time to
; and hereupon he
amongest them,
But it came to nothing regarded that by means of y common agre were taken by once made priuie

Ferquhard
maintained
will becom

The desperat
king Ferquhard.

King Ferqu
hard intere
with the lagian eroy.

Donwald
Donwald
Scotland.

The King
summoned
an herald
He is taking prisoner.

by Edwin
plunt.

Ambassadors
sent into France
France.

France
France

thine.

Coler on the hill.

age, wardens, and had full authoritie to order things as seemed them good in all points. In the meane time Ferquhard remaining still in prison, and vex ed with sundrie diseases, to rid himselfe out of such miseries, flue himselfe in the 13 yeare of his reigne; and so nothing spared his owne life in the end, which had bene the occasion of the losse of so manie other mens liues in time of the ciuill discord, that he had euer nourished. After this wretched end of Ferqu hard, which happened in the yeare of our Lord 632, the lords of the land assembled themselves together in Argile, about the choosing of a new king, where by common consent, Donwald the third sonne of Eugenius, being called thither with bishop Conan out of the Ile of Man, was inuested king with great ioy and triumph.

This Donwald hauing taken on him the roiall administration, transforming himselfe into his fathers manners, restored againe into the former estate such things as appertained vnto the common wealth, and had bene anie wise decayed and mis governed by the slothfull negligence of his prede cessor Ferquhard, by means whereof he quicklie grew into great fauor of his subiects. In the meane time Cadwallo king of the Britains, and Penda king of those Englishmen which inhabited that part of England ancientlie called Mercia, ioining their powres together against Edwin king of Nor thumberland, depriued him both of life and king dome. After this, passing through the whole coun trie, and entring into the confines of Pictland, they toke a great part of the same by force of arms from Budeus king of the Picts, who in baine had sued for aid vnto Donwald king of Scotland, for that his vntuall had bene notified more than inough in times past. But Donwald being certified of Ed wins death, made means vnto Cadwallo king of the Britains by his ambassadours, that Cufred the son of Edelred might be restored vnto his fathers kingdome, which Edwin had wrongfullie vsurped.

This being granted, Cufred leauing his brethren still in Scotland, came into Northumberland, where by authoritie of Cadwallo and Penda he was inuested king of Bernicia, that is, of the countrie which is now called the marches. For at the same time they had diuided the kingdome of Northum berland into two kingdomes, appointing Cufred (as is said) to reigne ouer the one called Bernicia, and one Driake ouer the other called Deira, a man of great wickednesse, as by his works most plainelie appeared. For certaine yeares after his aduance ment to that dignitie, he found means to marie one of his daughters vnto the foresaid Cufred, persua ding the same Cufred to consent with him in resto ring againe the hethenish religion throughout their whole dominion, & bitterlie to renounce the christian faith, which they had latelie before receiued by the instructions of the two bishops Conan & Pauline.
But they inioined not long felicitie after so wicked and most diuelish a purpose, for the princes of Albion under the leading of Cadwallo & of the Britains, and Penda king of Mercia, with a great armie as sembled of Saxons, Britains, and Picts, entring into Northumberland, and incountring in battell with Driake and Cufred, discomfited their power, and toke them prisoners, who being put into a com mon prison, flue each other to auoid sharper tortures, which by due execution they daile looked for.

Then was the kingdome of Northumberland gi uen vnto Oswald brother to Cufred, both in respect of the right which he had thereto, and also of the zeale which he bare to the aduancement of Christs religi on, shewing himselfe in consideration thereof, an earnest enimie to his brother Cufred, and all his partakers, in so much that in the day of the battell, he was one of the forwardest captains against them.

Vnto this Oswald was sent a Scottishman called Corman, to instruct the Northumberland men in faith, and after him Aidan, as in the English historie ye may read more at large: finally he was slaine by Penda king of Mercia, as in the same historie appeareth. His death chanced in the third yeare of Donwald the Scottish king, who sore lamented the same, as of that prince whome he loued right intire lie. Neither liued the said king Donwald anie long time after the death of his deere friend; for that in the fifteenth yeare of his reigne, being got into a bote to fish in the water called Lochtaile for his re creation, his chance was to be drowned, by reason the bote sank vnder him. Certaine daies after, his bodie being found and taken vp, was buried amongst his ancestors in Colmekill, in the yeare of our Lord 647.

About the same time there liued in France three brethren of great holinesse of life, being sonnes vnto Hiltan king of Ireland, the which he begot of his wife Galghetes, descended of the linage of the kings in Scotland. The names of which three bre thren were as followeth, Furseus, Follanus, and Ultanus. Furseus professing himselfe a monke of saint Benets order, passed ouer into France, there to set forth and enlarge that profession, and being re ceiued of king Clodwis, began the foundation of a monasterie there called Latnie, in the which he pla ced monks of that order, and began to shew in those parties the seeds of the gospell, but not without the darnell of mens traditions, as John Bale saith in the 14 centurie of the British writers. His two bre thren Follan and Ultan followed him ouer into France, and both by word and example instructed the Frenchmen to embrace the faith of Christ, and to re nounce the religion of the gentiles.

So that it seemeth as yet, such as professed them selues to be monks, and men of religion (as they were called) had not left off to labour in the Lords vineyard, spending their time in reading the scrip tures, to instruct and teach others, and to exercise prayer and thanksgiving: so as no small number by their wholesome doctrine and good example were conuered to the christian faith. Follan at length was martyred in a monasterie which he had founded in France called Fosse. About the same time there was also a contention amongst them in Albion for keeping of the Easter day, the Scottish bishops and some of the Britains varieng in their account from all other prelats of the west: but at length through persuasion of the pope they confessed their error (if it ought so to be taken) and consented to celebrate that feast according to the account of other nations.
These things chanced in the daies of king Don wald.

After the decess of Donwald, his nephew Fer quhard the sonne of his brother, the other Fer quhard, succeeded in gouernement of the realme, a man of quicke and liuelie spirit, but inclined neuer theless rather vnto euill than vnto good, speciallie af ter he had attained the crowne, insomuch as it was commonlie spoken of him, that from a liberall and most gentle humane person, he was suddenlie chan ged into an insatiable and most cruell monster. Be fore he came to the crowne he was liberall beyond measure. There was no gentleman that wanted monie, either to redeeme his lands ingaged, or to bestow in doler for the marriage of his daughter, but if he had wherewith to helpe him, he might ac count himselfe sure thereof. Priests and other de uout persons, speciallie such as were poore and in any necessitie, he oftentimes most bountifullie relieued
to

I 2. H.B.

Donwald
the Scottish king drowned
645. H.B.

Anno 854.
Higebertus.
Fossens mon
asterium.
Strife about the celebra ting of the feast of Easter

Fer
quhard.
Ferquhard
the second of that name cre ated king of Scotland.
Ferquhard
being hung
was conuicted
before he was king, be lieved libe ralitie.

to their great ease and comfort. To be briefe, such a readinesse was in him to helpe all men, that (as was thought) he could better be contented to want himselfe, than to see other men haue need of anie thing that was in his possession, so that all men iudged him most worthy of all princelie authoritie. But after he was once placed in the kinglie seat, he so altered his conditions, that men could not but wonder much therat. Where before he was knowne to be liberall, well disposed, righteous, sober, and a reformer of offenses, he was now forthwith become couetous, wicked towards God, a tormentor of the iust and righteous people, and insatiable in all vnlawfull affections. That which before time he had giuen vnto anie of the nobilitie, he now without all shame most vn-courteously demanded to be to him restored, alledging that he did but lend it for the time. And such as went about to delay restitution, pretending anie excuse, he caused their goods to be confiscate, and also their bodies to be committed to prison. Now then he found means without cause or matter to put some of them to cruell death. Such of the prelates as he vnderstood to be wealthie, he rested not till he had picked one matter or other vnto them, whereby they were sure to forfeit all their treasure vnto his coffers, that neuer might be filled.

The bishops of the realme, namely those two reuerend fathers, Colman and Finnan, perceiving such wickednesse in the prince, blamed him sharpelie sundrie times for the same: and at length because they saw he regarded not their admonishments, he was by them excommunicated: whereof he so little passed, that when other went vnto the church to heare diuine seruice, he would get him to the woods and forrests to hunt the hart, or some other game. Neither were such wanting as were willing to keepe him companie: so readie is the nature of man at all times to follow licentious libertie. He used also, contrary to the custome of his countrie, to eat three meales a day, hauing such number of dishes and abundance of delicate fare, as the like had not bene used at anie time before those daies in that realme: and all to serue his greedy appetite, together with theirs that followed his companie.

Drunknes & other strong drinks he would partcipate abundantly at all times and places, without regard of health or honor, being exceedingly giuen vnto most beastlie drunkennesse. He customably vsed to sit at supper till it were verie late in the night, hauing his banquetting dishes and cupes to come in one after another, till he were so misshapen, that being laid to sleepe, he would streight vomit out such beauiie gorges, as he had in such most gluttonous wise receiued. Wherevnto he was so drowned in the filthie lust of the flesh, that he defiled his owne daughters: and for that his wife was about to dissuade him from such villanie, he slue hir with his owne hands. Thus continuing in his wickednesse certeine yeeres, at length the nobles began to conspire against him, so that they would haue deuised a meane how to haue rid him out of the way, if bishop Colman had not forbidden them that practise, prophesying as it were by diuine inspiration, that Fer-quhard shoulde be punished by the hands of almighty God, according to his deseruings.

And sure his words proued true: for within a mo-neth after, as the same Ferquhard followed in chase of a wolfe, the beast being all intraged by the pur-sute of the hounds, slue backe vpon the king, and snatching at him, did wound and bite him right soe in one of his sides, immediatlie wherevpon, whether through anguish of his hurt, or by some other occasion, he fell into a most filthie disease: for a venemous humor with a soft consuming heat, did so eat and waite his members and lims, that a lothsome sight it was to behold the same: for out of his legs, feet, and priue parts, there issued filthie corruption and matter, with so vile a sauour, that bnneth might any creature abide it. His bellie was swollen, as though he had bene infected with the dropsie, and thereto was it verie hard withall. Finallie lice bred so abundant-lie in his secret parts, that he might in no wise be rid of cleansed of them.

At length, when he had bene bered in this sort for the space of two yeeres together, or thereabouts, he began to call himselfe to remembrance, and to consider how this punishment was worthy fallen vpon him for his sinnes, and therevpon causing bishop Colman to be fetched vnto him, being as then about 20 miles off, he confessed vnto him the whole summe of his offenses, declaring himselfe right penitent for the same. Colman reioicing hereat, did not onelie release him of the sentence of excommunication, pronounced against him; but also willed him to be of comfort, and to put his confidence in the mercie of almighty God, who was readie to receiue all such sinners as turned vnto him with repentant hearts: so that being put in hope by these & the like words of Colman to haue forgiveness of his sinnes, with bitter teares he besought God to haue mercie vpon him: and humbly receiuing the sacrament, got him into simple clothing of heare and sackcloth. Then causing himselfe to be borne into the next fields, he there yelded vpon the ghost in the presence of Colman, who (according to the dutie of a good ghostlie father) was still about him, in exhorting him to commit himselfe wholly to the mercie of God, & not to doubt but he should be sure to attaine the same. This Fer-quhard ended his life, in the 18 yeere after he began his reigne ouer the Scottishmen, and in the yeere of Grace 664.

In this Ferquhards daies bishop Aidan departed this world, and then was Finnan sent for forth of Scotland, to take vpon him the gouernement of the church of Lindeferne, where the bishops of Northumberland as then had their see. This Finnan was well learned, and no lesse renowned for his vertuous life than his predecessor Aidan. He died anon after the deceasse of Ferquhard, and then was Colman remoued vnto that see of Lindeferne, who with his vertuous instructions and examples of ho-lie life conuerted a great multitude of Saxons vnto the true worshipping of the liuing God. And amongst other was Penda sonne to the former Pen-da, king of Mercia. There be that write how Pen-da the father also was baptised by this Colman: and that the same Colman trauelled through the most part of all the English prouinces, setting forth the word of life amongst the people, purchasing him great fame for his worthy merits. He came to the church of Lindeferne in the daies of Galdwin that succeeded the last mentioned Ferquhard.

This Galdwin was the sonne of king Donwald: and after that Ferquhard was dead and buried in Colmekill, he was inuested king: which function he right sufficientlie discharged, studieng to mainteine peace with his neighbors the Picts, Saxons and Britains: giuing thereby a good example to be followed of his subiects. Hereto he had a speciall care for the administration of the lawes in due forme and order, causing offenders to be punished, that other harmelesse persons might liue in quiet, so that by this meanes all things in the beginning of his reigne had prosperous successe. Afterwards there fell no small discord betwixt them of Lennor and Argile: for first through bralling among the hear-men, their maisters made a fraie, whereof rose such deadlie

Gifts are required as a loane.

Lo, what a pretense coue-tousnes hath.

For their goods sake prelates are troubled.

The king is excommunicated.

The king is hunting.

He was a glutton.

A drunkard
he was also.

A prophesie.

The king is
sicke.

The Westerne
Men take part with Dr-gile, Galloway with Lennor.

Galdwin
went about by to punish the author of this commotion.

The captiues began friends together, and so into the Picts.
The Pict-
men appeared the captives of the rebels.

He buildeth
the church of the abbey of Colmekill.

A great pestilence & death
vpon earth.

Scotland
was free of the pestilence
and plague.

His stoutnesse
the mother of licentiousnes.

Colman erected a monast-
ry.

Galdwin the Scottish king strangled in his bed.

did so eat and loathsome sight
his legs, feet,
corruption and eth might any len, as though
and there to was d so abundant no wife be rid

in this sort so;
ereabouts, he ce, and to con-
hile fallen up-
causing bishop as then about whole summe
right penitent did not onelie munication, prod him to be of the mercie of ceceue all such eritant hearts:
e like words of e times, with e mercie vpon ament, got him kerloth. Then next fields, he ce of Colman, ghoslie father)
him to commit
, & not to doubt
me. Thus Fer-after he began in the yere of 664 p Aidan depar-n sent for forth ouernement of bishops of For-

This Finian
notomed for his dair. He died a-
, and then was indelferne, who examples of hoof Saxons vi-
God. And a-he former Pen-uite holo Pens Colman: and ough the most etting forth the purchasing him
He came to the Galdwin that of king Done-

was dead and ed king: which yed, studieng to
to the Idias, Sar-god example to he had a speciall
es in due forme
nished, that o-
quiet, so that ginning of his terwards there of Lennor and ong the heard
herof rose such deadlie

deadlie enmitie betwixt the parties, by reason that the inhabitants of the westerne Isles aided them of Argile, and the people of Galloway the other of Len-nor: that if the king had not come into those parties to appease the businesse, and to haue punished the offenders, there had ensued much manslaughter, vnto the great danger of the bitter ruine of those countries.

The king at his arrivall amongst them minded not to pursue the people that followed their captains, but rather the captives and authors of this tur-mult themselves. Whereof they hauing knowledge, made an attouement together, being enforced thereto of necessitie, so to auoid the prepared punishment deuised by the king against them. And forthwith they fled ouer into the Isles, but the inhabitants doubting the kings displeasure, would not consent to succour them, but contrariwise took them and de-liuered them to the kings officers, whereupon they were safelie conueied to the places where they were borne, and there suffered their deserved execution.
Thus that commotion vnadvisedlie begun, was speedilie appeased, and the name of Galdwin by reason hereof so feared amongst his subiects, that during his reigne no such trouble chanced in anie part of all his dominions.

After this he went ouer into Iona or Colmekill, where perceiuing the abbete church, wherein his ancestors had their sepulchres, to be in decaye, he caused it to be pulled quite downe, and workemen forthwith set in hand to build it vp againe, at his owne proper costes and charges. Such speed also was vsed about this worke, that before he departed out of this life, the same was finished, and dedicated vnto our Saviour Christ, and saint Colme. About the same time there reigned throughout the most part of the world a sore and greivous pestilence, consuming a greater number of men (before it ceased) than there were left alive: for it continued the whole space of three yeres together. At length, through common praiers, fasting, giuing of almes, & other vertuous works, the wrath of almighty God was pacified, so that such great mortallitie by his mercifull appointment did cease and grow ouer.

The Scottishmen were free from that infection as well at that time, as also for manie yeres after. Yet ther were they in manner troubled with anie sharpe feuers, or agues, till time that omitting the ancient and wholesome spaciouse diet, which their fathers in times past had vsed, they fell vnto riotous banquet-ting and excessive feeding, whereby they became subiect vnto all kinds of diseases, through malicious humours growing therupon. Colman bishop of Lindes-ferne seeing wonderfull numbers of Englishmen perish daily of that contagious sickness, by licence of the king, to auoid the present danger of death, which by tarrying there he saw no meanes how to escape, returned into Scotland with his disciples, and after getting him ouer into one of the westerne Isles, he erected a manastrie there, wherein he remained during the residue of his life.

After the departure of Colman south of For-thumberland, the people of that countrie joining with the Idias, made fardie roads into the Scottish borders: which intire when Galdwin reuenged with more displeasure done to them of Forthum-berland, than the Scottishmen had received, it caused the Idias and Forthumbers to prepare themselves with all speed to haue made sharpe warres against the Scots: but in the meane time Galdwin died, being strangled in his bed one night by his owne wife, vpon suspicion of gelousie, for his vnlawfull company keeping with an other woman. The next day after he was apprehended with those that were pursue to the deed, and burnt openlie vpon an hill, according as the law most iustlie deserued. Galdwin was thus murdered in the yere after the birth of our Saviour 684, and in the 20 yere of his owne

reigne.

After him succeeded Eugenius the fifth of that name, nephew to Galdwin, as sonne to his brother Dongard. About the same time Eugenius king of Scots sent with all diligence his ambassadors vnto Egfred king of Northumberland, to moue him vnto peace. Egfred hauing heard the ambassadors which were thus sent, seemed as though he had bene willing to haue had peace, where he minded nothing more than to haue warres with the Scots, so lone as his prouision should be once readie and he revpon granted to them a trespasse for the space of 11 moneths, in which meane time he might make his preparation. Eugenius hauing learn secret knowledge of Eg-freds purpose, prouided likewise for the warres on his part: but for that he would not seme to giue the occasion, he streitlie commanded that none of his subiects should be so hardie, as to attempt anie thing founding to the breach of the truce.

In the tenth moneth Egfred hauing all his preparation readie, sent a companie of his men of war into the Scottish borders, to fetch some bottie, whereby the peace might be broken. Those that were thus sent, fetched not onelie from thence a great number of cattell, but also some bladders of the borderers that went about to rescue their beasts and cattell. In-mediatlie hereupon were sent ambassadors from Eugenius to demand restitution: but they not without much ado, after certaine vaines attendance, got audience, and boldlie declaring vnto Egfred their message, received for answer a plaine publication of warre. For he alleging how the Scots, since the truce was granted, had sundrie times fetched botties out of the confines of his dominions, and therefor had well deserued farre more damage than as yet they had received, whereupon he minded not to continue friendship with them that knew not how to keepe their hands from robbing and stealing from their neighbours: so that he commanded them to declare vnto their king, that within eight daies after, he should take his open warre at the hands of him and other his aduersaries.

Eugenius receiving this answer from Egfred, besought God, with the other onelie sought to violate the peace, that the vengeance might light vpon his owne head, that had thus giuen the occasion.
Wherewith gathering his power together, he repared into Galloway, into the which he had knowledge that his enemies would first enter. But before he could get thither, a great armie of Englishmen were come already into that countie, and had besieged a strong castell called Downie, the chiefest fortresse in that parte of all Galloway. And yet Egfred might haue the same, he was constrained to raise his siege, and to march forth to encounter with Eugenius, who haden fast towards him. They met nere to the banks of the water of Lewis, as then being verie deepe, by reason it was raised with abundance of raine which latelie before had fallen, where they fought a verie sore and bloody battell: for the Scots had vowed neuer to giue ground to the enemies, so long as anie life remained in their breasts.

At the first there was no great advantage perceiued on either side, the kings, according to the cu-stomes of valiant captives, exhorting their people to sticke to it manfullie: but in the meane time, certaine bands of Egfreds part getting themselves to the side of an hill, gaue the looking on, without consuming downe at all to aid their friends: which manner the residue of his people perceiuing, doubted of some

Eugenius
the fifth
king of Scotland.

Egfred king of Northumberland.

A trespasse
granted.

Egfreds
commandment.

The truce
broken.

Ambassadors
sent by Egfred vnto Eugenius for restitution.

Egfreds
answer.

Eugenius
gathered
armie.

The castell of Downie besieged.

King Egfred
slaine.
See more
hereof in England.

Twentie thou sand Saxons
slaine.

Hyndens
king of the
Picts.

Inuasion in to Northum
berland.

Cuthbert bi shop.

A slaughter amongst the Picts.

Egfred slaine by Picts and not by Scots.
Eugenius the first died.
688

Eugenius the first succeedeth Eugenius the first.

A league be tweene the
Scots and Northumber
land men.
Truce taken with the
Picts.

Some treason denised against them, and thereupon began to thinke backe. Egfred abused therof, came amongst the foremost ranks of his battell, desiring the Englishmen in no wise to giue place to their enemies: and for that daies seruice he promised them high rewards, and all the pleasure that afterward he might be able waies able to shew or do them. But whildest he was thus buslie occupied in comforting & exhorting his men to fight stoutlie, he himselfe chanced to be wounded in the face with an arrow so sore, that immediatlie he fell downe and died in the place. The Englishmen discouraged with this mischance, were quicklie thereupon put to flight and chased, a great number of them toke the riuer so to escape the enemies hands, of whome the more part being pressed downe by weight of their armor, were drowned in the raging waues of the flood, the residue by casting from them their armors and clothes, escaped by swimming ouer to the other side, but those that made their course by land, being cumbered in mires and moles, also amongst streits, rocks, mounteins and cliffes, were overtaken by the Scots and slaine. Few of that number escaped awaie in safetie, so that there died in the fight and chase at the point of twentie thousand Saxons with their king the foze said Egfred: of the Scots were slaine, besides those that were hurt and wounded, not manie about six thousand. By this ouerthrow the force of those Saxons or Englishmen of Northumberland was not onelie fore diminished, but also of such other Saxons, the which in no small number were come into Egfred, to aid him against the Scots in that iournie.

Hyndens the Pictish king having knowledge of this slaughter, which had chanced betwixt the Englishmen and Scots, was nothing sozie, as one that was friend to neither part, and now perceiuing that the Northumberland men were so weakened, that they were not able to resist an inuasion, he entred with his whole power which he had raised, into Northumberland, soze afflicting th inhabitants, insomuch that he had vndoubtedlie either subdued that countrie wholie into his dominion, either els utterlie destroyed it, had not the deuout prayers of S. Cuthbert (who then held the see of Lindesferne) preferred the people from that present desolation. For at length after the Picts had raged a while through the countrie, they chanced to fall at variance amongst themselves for parting of the spoile, and buckling together by the eares, there was an huge slaughter made amongst them. And this was the cause, that contenting themselves with those countries about Wertwicke, ancientlie called Deira, out of the which they expelled the Saxons, they abstained from all the residue, as not willing to deale withall. Neither were the Saxons of Northumberland, being thus scourged, able to recover their former forces againe, of manie yeeres after insuing.

Here is to be noted, that whereas the Scottish writers ascribe the victorie of that battell, wherein Egfred was slaine, unto their king Eugenius, Beda which then liued, declareth that the Picts were those that fought with him and slue him. Finallie, Eugenius departed this life in the 4 yeere of his reigne, and after the incarnation 688. After Eugenius the first, succeeded Eugenius the first, who was the sonne of Iferquhard, and by perswasion of bishop Adarnan (with whome he was brought up) & of S. Cuthbert, he entered into league with the Northumberland men: but he would at no hand ioine in amitie with the Picts, notwithstanding he was contented to take truce with them. But when he saw the same oftentimes by them violated & broken, to the great perill, damage, and hinderance of his subiects, he caused the warre to be proclaimed, and sent them his defiance by an herald. Hothobett, through the earnest prayers (as is supposed) of the two bishops, Cuthbert and Adarnan (who had laboured earnestlie to haue brought those people to a quietnesse) this warre continued without anie notable encounter, saue onelie by light incursions (wherein no great bloodshed chanced) enen vnto the death of Eugenius, which fell in the yeere of our Lord 697, and in the tenth yeere of his owne reigne. He was buried together with the other Eugenius, that lastlie reigned afore him, in the Ile of Colmekill, amongst their predecessors.

Manie wonderfull visions were seene that yeere in Albion, as the Scottish chronicles make mention. In the riuer of Humber there appeared in the sight of a great multitude of men, a number of ships vnder saile, as though they had bene furnished forth for the warres. In the church at Camelon there was heard a noyse, as it had bene the clattering of armor. Milke was turned into blood in diuers places in Scotland, and chaele conuerted into a bloudie masse or cake. Come, as it was gathered in the harvest time appeared bloudie. In the furthermost parts of Scotland, it rained blood. These sights being seene of some, & declared to other, caused a wonderfull feare in the peoples hartis, imagining some great alteration to insue.

Ambriskeleth the nephue, or (as some say) the son A of Eugenius the first, succeeded Eugenius the first in the government of the realme; who after his attaining to the crowne, shortly changed the rebwith his manners and good disposition: for where before he shewed himselfe to be an earnest defender of the poore and simple, that all men iudged that he would haue proued a patron of all vertue, he contrarie to that expectation, became suddenlie a paterne of all vices and couetousnesse, delighting in nothing but in following his sensuall lusts, as in taking exesse of meats and drincks, and wallowing in fleshlie concupiscence of lecherous lust. To be brieffe, when he toke nothing in hand worthe of his estate and degree, it was thought that of necessitie the forme of the publike gouernement must needs throught his negligent slouthfulness fall into decaye and ruine: whereupon Carnard king of the Picts, supposing he had convenient time to reuenge all former injuries receiued at the Scottish mens hands, gathered a great host of men, and with the same entring into the Scottish confines, made verie pitifull slaughter of the inhabitants.

At length Ambriskeleth (being soze blamed of his his nobles for his negligence, in suffering his subiects thus to be destroyed) gathered an armie together, & with no small feare to shew his head amongst his people (as those princes which through their owne default haue their people in mistrust, do euer stand in doubt of their owne safeties, and namelie when anie present danger beginneth to appere) forth he goeth without anie great god order (God wot) for that might be looked for at his hands, which was so ouerwhelmed with all kind of excessive gluttonie, immoderate surfeiting, insatiable lecherie, and deliting altogether in slouthfull ease, and sluggish idleness, the root from whence all such filthie vices taking their beginnings, are nourished & maintained.

To conclude, he liued as one that toke no manner of regard to that which chiefe appertained to his calling: whereby now when he should come into the field, he was neither able through lacke of practise to take paines to see things done as was behouefull, of himselfe, neither yet to giue order to others how the same ought to be done. Neuertheless marching forward with his armie, he came to the water of Tay, and nere to the banks thereof, he pitched downe his tents, where after he had supped, he was occasioned to

The death of Ambriskeleth.

Eugenius.

Eugenius the fourth is e lected king of
Scots.

The king is crowned.

The quene
dies in bed of her husband

The king is imprisoned of the murdres.

The murdres
are ban ished.

An example of a good prince.

The king
sleweth his murders by means to be punished.

His
men

to go forth of his lodging to doe the necessities of nature, and being onelie accompanied with two of his seruants that were groomes of his chamber, he was subuerſie ſhot through the head with an arrow; but from whence it came, or who ſhot it, there was neuer anie knowne that could tell. Holubert, the king immediatlie died of the hurt, after he had reigned not fullie two yeeres. He was buried in Colmeſkill amongſt his noble anceſtors.

The lords and peers of the land not greatlie lamenting the death of ſuch a monſtrous perſon, becauſe the armie for what of a goneruor ſhould not fall into anie danger; they elected Eugenius the ſeuenth, being the brother of the late ſolſeſis Ambirkeleth, to ſucceed as king in the gouernment of the realme; a prince of verie comelie port & perſonage; neither deſtitute of honorable qualities and good diſpoſition of mind. Being ſince proclaimed king, he cauſed generall muſters to be taken of the whole armie, and preceſſing by ſurueie thereof, that he was not able to match with his enemies, he found means to conclude a peace with the Pictiſh king, pledges being deliuered on either ſide, for redreſſe to be had of all wrongs and iniuries that had bene committed betwixt them. The Picts returning home, and the ſcotiſh armie diſſolued, Eugenius with the moſt part of the nobilitie went into Argyle, where he received his inueſture of the kingdom, ſitting by in the ſtone of ſtarble, according to the cuſtome and maner.

The bond of peace begun betwixt the kings, was the more ſtronglie confirmed by meanes of alliance, Spontana the daughter of king Carnard being coupled in marriage with Eugenius: the ſixt yeere following being great with child; was that thereb one night within the kings bed-chamber, in ſteed of the king himſelfe, by two brethren of the countie of Athole, who moued to diſpleaſure for their fathers death, had conſpired to murder the king, and had ſlain him in deed; had he not through his good hap laſen forth of his owne chamber the ſame night, Eugenius being ſuſpected of the murder, and euill ſpoken of for the ſame amongſt his ſubiects, was at length with great danger of life and honoꝝ enforced to make anſwer by wale of arraignment for clearing of himſelfe, before the nobles of his realme, appointed as competent iudges in that caſe: ſo greatlie beloved was Spontana amongſt all the degrees of the ſcotiſh nation. But in the end being found guiltye of the crime (for at the time that iudgement ſhould haue paſſed, the offenders were apprehended and brought in) he was acquit, to the great reioicing of all honeſt men. Thoſe that had done the deed, were condemned and hanged by naked on gibbets by the heeles, together with certefne cruell maſtiue dogs, the which might ſo denounce them.

But Eugenius being thus cleared of all former ſuſpicion, minded to haue bene renenged on thoſe that had ſallie accuſed him. Holubert through the goodlie admoniſhments of that reuerend father Adannan, he qualified his diſpleaſure. After this, giuing his mind to the aduancement of religion and poliſhke gouernement of his ſubiects, he ordeined that the hiſtoies of his anceſſors ſhould be written in bookes and volumes, that poſteritie might haue to read the ſame for example ſake. Theſe monuments he alſo appointed to be kept and reſerued in the abbeie of Iona, now called Colmeſkill, for a perpetuall memorie: and ſuch as ſhould write the ſame, to remaine and haue living there in the abbeie. Moreover, ſuch ſpirituall promotions as he perceived to be to meane and ſlender for the maintenance of the miſtiſſer that ſhould ſerue the cure, he cauſed to be augmented in ſuch wiſe as was thought ſufficient. He concluded a league with the Sarons and Picts, and obſerued the ſame during his life, which he ended at Abernethie, when he had reigned about 17 yeeres, whereof the laſt fell in the yeere after the incarnation of our Sauter 717, the 15 indiction. His death was greatlie lamented, both of his lords and commons; as they that intierlie loued him for his noble and moſt princelie qualities.

A little before his death, he betooke the poſſeſſion of his kingdom vnto Morbach that ſucceeded him. This Morbach was the nephew of Eugenius the ſeuenth, by his brother Ambirkeleth: who as he was knowne to be of a gentle, meeke, and liberall nature, before his aduancement to the crowne; ſo he ſhewed himſelfe to be the verie ſame man during the whole courſe of all his naturall life, after he had attained to the ſame. Aboue all things he wiſhed a generall peace to continue amongſt all the princes of Albion, and thereupon for his part eſtabliſhing a peace with the Picts, Britains, and all the Engliſh kings, he firmitie kept euerie article therein contained. In thoſe daies (as S. Beda doth teſtifie) foure ſeueral people liued in peace and quietneſſe within the bounds of Albion, though differing in manners, language, lawes, and ordinances: Sarons whome he called Engliſhmen, Britains, Scots, and Picts. His words are theſe that follow.

The nation of the Picts at this time is in league with the Engliſhmen, and glablie is partaker of the vniuerſall peace and veritie with the catholike church. Thoſe Scots which inhabit Britaine, contenting themſelues with their owne bounds, go about to praſtiſe no neceſſfull traines, nor fraudulent deuices againſt the Engliſhmen. The Britains, though for the moſt part through a familiar hatred doe ſumpagne the Engliſh nation, and the ſtate of the whole catholike church, obſeruing not rightlie the feaſt of Eaſter, beſides other naughty blages, yet both the diuine power and humane force vterlie reſiſting them, they are not able in neither behalfe to attaine vnto their purpoſed intentions; as they which though partlie free, yet in ſome behalfe are thral and mancipat to the ſubiection of the Engliſhmen: which Engliſhmen now in acceptable peace and quietneſſe of time, manie amongſt them of Northumberland, as well of the nobilitie as other, lateng away armour and weapon, applie themſelues to the reading of holie ſcripture, moze deſirous to be in houſes of vertuous conuerſation, than to exerciſe ſeats of warre. What will come thereof, the age that followeth ſhall perceive and behold. With theſe words doth Beda end his hiſtoie, continued till the yeare 734, in the which yeare Morbach the ſcotiſh king ended his life.

He repaired ſundrie churches and religious houſes, which being defaced with violence of the enemies inuaſions in time of warre, had not bene re-edified by his anceſſors. But amongſt other, he beſtowed much coſt vpon the church where the bodie of S. Martin lieth, in the towne ancientlie called Candida Caſa, & now Whitterne or Huſtterne. Saint Beda calleth that place Pictiminia, and the biſhop which at the ſame time held the church there, he nameth Acta, auouching how he was the firſt that was biſhop thereof after the daies of ſaint Martin. Which if it be true, it muſt needs be that afterwards ſome vacation happened in that ſee for a time, ſith it is notified in the ſcotiſh hiſtoies, that the weſterne Fles, Galloway, and other regions nere adioining, were ſubiet vnto the biſhop of Sodor (whoſe ſee is in the Ile of Man) vnto the daies of Malcolme the firſt, who reſtored rather than ordeined the biſhops ſee in Candida Caſa againe, after ſuch vacation as befoze is ſpecified.

Eugenius the ſeuenth departed out of this life. 716. H.B.

Mordack. Morbach ſucceeded Eugenius the ſeuenth.

A lover of peace.

Peace thorough out all the land of Albion.

The teſtimonie of Beda.

734. Morbach ended his life the ſame yeare that ſaint Beda made an end of his hiſtoie.

Candida Caſa now called Whitterne.

But

*Ethfne.Ethfne suc-cedeth Mordake.A peaceable prince.Four gou-
ernors vnder
the king.Trust gouernement.Donald of the Ales mainteneth robbers.The oppression of the commons of Galloway.Mordake the kings lieutenant beareth
with offenders.The deceasse of Ethfne.
762. H.B.Eugenius.Eugenius the eight invested king of
Scots.
Donald of the Ales appeared.Donald and his complices
put to death.*

But now to retorne touching the gouernement-Of the Scottish kingdome, I find that after the deceasse of Mordake last remembred, his nephue named Ethfne, the sonne of the seventh Eugenius, succeeded in the state; a man naturallie inclined vnto peace and maintenance of iustice. The league which his predecessors Eugenius and Mordake had kept with their neighbors the Britains, Englishmen and Picts, he duellie likewise obserued. His chiefe studie was to purge his realme of all such as were knowne to be open barretors and offenders in anie wise, against the peace and common quiet of his subiects; so that causing sundrie notable examples of iustice to be executed vpon such euill doers, he was had in such reuerend dread amongst his subiects, that none of them durst once whisper anie euill of him. Neither had they verelie anie cause so to doe, while he looked to the administration himselfe.

But after he was once fallen into age, he appointed foure peeres in his realme to haue the chiefe gouernance vnder him; as Donald the treasurer of Argile, Collane of Athole, and Mordake of Galloway his lieutenants, and Conrath the thane of Murrey land. These hauing the procuration of all things touching the gouernement of the realme, vsed not themselves so byrightlie in manie points as they ought to haue done; but winked now and then at faults & trespasses committed by their kinsfolks and alics, permitting the nobilitie to liue according to their old accustomed manner of licentious liber-tie, to the small ease or commoditie of the other inferiour states. Donald of the westerne Ales, a man of goodlie personage, but of disposition inclined to all naughtinesse, maintained a great number of robbers and spoilers of the countrie, liuing onlie vpon raine. For looke what they wanted, they would not faile to catch it, if it were in anie place broad where they might laie hands on it; so that all the husbandmen and commons of Galloway, in which countrie they most haunted, were brought in to wonderfull thalldome and miserie.

Neither did Mordake the kings lieutenant there, go about to chastise such insolent misdemeanors, either for that he was of Donalds alliance, either else priuie to his doings, and partaker of the spoile.
The people hereby vered with continuall iniuries, brought manie pittifull complaints before Mordake, who nothing regarded their lamentable lutes and supplications, but the more they complained, the worse they were handled. Neither was there anie hope of redresse or amendment, till Eugenius the eight was admitted to the kinglie administration after the death of king Ethfne, who in the latter end of his daies continuallie being sicke and diseased, could not attend to take order for the publike gouernement, by reason whereof such wilfull misdoers infused. He died in the yeare of our Lord 764, after he had continued his reigne ouer the Scottish-men the space of thirtie yeares, his bodie being buried in Colmekill with all funerall obsequies.

His successor, the foresaid Eugenius the eight that was the sonne of king Mordake, was invested king in Argile with such pompe and ceremanies as in that case appertained, and immediarlie therevpon he hasted forth to catch Donald of the Ales, not resting till at length he had caught him, though that came not to passe without some losse of his people. After he had taken both him and his chiefest complices, he put them openlie to death; neither so satisfied, he caused Mordake to be arraigned, who confessing himselfe partlie guiltie of such things as were laid to his charge for mainteining of the fore-said Donald, he likewise suffered death, and his goods being valued and diuided into parts, were bestowed amongst the commons of Galloway, vnto compense of such losses, as through his contrited fallshod they had sustained. Also he did put Donald, Collan, and Conrath to their fines, for that they did suffer Donald to rob & spoile without chastisement.

Through which causing of iustice thus to be executed, in reliefe of his commons, he was him wounderfull loue, not onlie in Galloway, but also throughout all his realme; and therewith were offenders put in such feare, that they durst in no place commit anie such misdoers against the simple and meane people. And for the more increase of his subiects wealth, he also continued the league with the Picts, Britains, and Englishmen, accordinglie as his late predecessor had done. But yet, as the nature of man through licentious libertie is euer ready to offend in one point or other, so it came to passe by this way the prince Eugenius, who in such wise as is before expressed, reigning in peace and quietnesse a-mongest his louing subiects, yet fell into most vile lust to accomplish his vnassailable fleshlie concupis-cence, seeking all means he could deuise to deuoure young virgins and honest matrons, and that as well those of the nobilitie as other. And such comparisons as could best further his purpose in that behalf, and deuise new means and waies of fleshlie companie, those he set by, and greatlly made of, delisting altogther to haue them in his companie.

Thus being drowned in lecherous lust, and filthy concupiscence, he fell baillie in more greuous vices, as into excessive couetousnesse and beastlie crueltie, consenting to make awaie his wealthie subiects, to the end he might intoy their goods. This wickednesse remained not long unpunished, for the lords and peeres of his realme, perceiuing how he proceeded baillie in his abhominable and tyrannicall doings, not once giuing eare to the wholesome aduertise-ments either of God or man, they slue him one day amongest them as he sat in iudgement about to haue condemned a great rich man, though not guiltie in the crime thereof he was accused. They caused also a great companie of those mates to be apprehended, which had bene of his counsell, and prouokers vnto all his wicked and vile doings. Which to the great contentation of the people were hanged, as they had well deserved. And such was the end of Eugenius, after he had gouerned the kingdome about thre yeares: his bodie was buried in Colmekill amongst his ancestors, though the people thought it little worthie of that honor, which had misused it selfe so inordinatlie in this present life.

After him came the administration of the realme vnto Fergus the third, the sonne of king Ethfne, in the yeare 767, who being established in the same, began frelie to practise all kinds of vices, which most abundantlie reigned in him, howbeit till that day wonderfullie dissembled and kept couert.
He seemed to strue how to passe his predecessor in all points of wickednesse. He took no regard at all to the gouernement of his realme, but gaue himselfe to excessive gluttonie, in deuouring of delicate meats and drinks, and therewith kept such a number of vile strumpets in house with him, whome he used as concubines, that his wife was no better esteemed than as an handmaid, or rather a kitchen-maid. Who being a woman of great modestie, and sober aduisednesse, could not yet but take some griefe and indignation hereat: and therefore sundrie times assaied by way of wholesome perswasions, to turne his mind from such sinfull vices and filthy trade of liuing.

If smallie, when she saw there was no hope to conuert his depraved mind, nor by anie means to reforme him, but that the more she laboured to doe good vpon

*Mordake
lieutenant of Galloway is put to death.
The commons recom-
pensed.A righteous king.Offenders put in feare.Eugenius perverted
with sensu-all lust and concupiscence.A filthy light.Conetoulch linked with crueltie.Eugenius murdered.The end of Eugenius
the eight.Fergus 767.Fergus the third created
king.A wicked
prince.B. Fergus
the third
was called by his wife.Wholesome persons are sacked.The queene condemned the murder.He giueth
the come-
mence.The queene with excom of his self.*

upon him, the worse he was, through verie displeasure of such injuries as the daile sustained at the hands of his concubines, the found meanes to strangle him secretlie one night as he lay in bed, choosing rather to be without a husband, than to haue one that should deceiue hir of the right and dutie of marriage; and that in such sort, as the must be faime to suffer the reproch daile before his face, being misbused of them whom he kept as paramours in most despitefull manner. The day after the wrought this feat, the bodie being found dead, was apparelled in funeralsl wize, and brought forth vnto the place of iudgement, where inquisition was freclie made what they were that had done so heinous a deed. For though there were but few that lamented his death, yet some of his friends were verie earnest to haue the matter tried forth, that such as had committed the murder might suffer due punishment.

Spanie were apprehended and had to the racke, but yet could none be found that would confesse it. The quene was void of all suspicion, as she that had bene taken for a woman at all tines of great temperance. But yet, when she heard that a number of innocent persons were tormented without desert, sore lamenting (as should appeare) their miserable case, she came basilie into the iudgement hall, and getting hir aloft vpon the bench, there, in the presence of all the companie, she had these or the like words vnto the whole assemblie. I know not (god people) I know not what god moueth me, or what diuine reuengement bereth me with sundrie thoughts and cogitations; that of all this day and morning preceding, I haue had neither rest in bodie nor mind. And verelie when I heard that certein guiltlesse persons were cruellie tormented here in your presence; had not wrath giuen place, partly vnto modestie, whereof I must confesse there is left but a small portion in me, I had forthwith rid my selfe out of the way. The kings death was mine act. Conscience constraineth me (setting apart mine owne safeguard) to confesse the truth, least the guiltlesse should wrongfullie perish: therefore vnderstand ye for truth, that none of them whom ye haue examined are pziue to the offense. I verelie am she, that with these wicked hands haue strangled this night last past Fergus, about whose death I see you in trouble, moued so to doo with two as sharpe prickes as may rest in a woman, to wit, impatient forbearing of carnall lust, & trefull wrath. Fergus by his continuall vsing of concubines, kept from me the due debt that the husband oweth to the wife: wherevpon when there was no hope to reconcile him with open aduertisements, vehement force of anger rising in my hart, dzoue me to doo so wicked a deed. I thought rather therefore to dispatch the adulterer, than being destitute of my husband, & defrauded of all quenele hono) to liue still subiect to the perpetuall injuries of such lewd women as he kept & vsed in my stead. Lose ye therefore those that be accused of the kings death, & as for me ye shall not need to proceed against me as guiltie of the crime by order of law: for I that was so bold to commit so heinous an act, will accordingly doo execution vpon my selfe even here instantlie in presence of you all: what hono) is due to the dead, loke you to that. ¶ Having thus made an end of hir tale, she plucked forth a knife which she had hid vnder hir gowne, and stroke herselfe to the heart with the same, falling dead vpon it downe to the ground. All such as were present wondered greatlie at hir stout and hardie stomach, speaking diuerlie thereof, as some in praise, and some in dispraise of these hir monstrous doings. The bodie of Fergus was carried forth to the Ile of Colmekill, and there buried in the third yere after his entring into the gouernement, and in the yere of our Lord 769. The quens corps was not buried in sacred ground, for that she flue herselfe.

Soluathius the sonne of Eugenius the eight, was admitted to the rule of the Scottish estate next after the death of Fergus: a prince swertie bothe to the accomplishment of high enterprises, if through hap of froward destinie he had not bene hindered. For in the third yere of his reigne he began to be vered extreamelie with the gout, which ingendered by cold in lieng abroad in hunting; and so continuing with him during his life, staied him from manie worthie exercises, as well in peace at home, as abroad in time of warres. Thus he being in maner impotent & lame of his limbs, there were some commotions and misorders the more boldly attempted: and first amongst them of the out Isles. For Wane Shakedonald, gouernor by the kings appointment of the Island called Aire, got all the castles and fortresses of the Isles into his owne hands, & strengthened with a rout of vnrulie and mischeuous youtfull persons, took possession of all the said Isles, causing himselfe to be proclaimed king of the same.

Not contented herewith, he gathered a number of ships together, wherein transporting himselfe with a great armie ouer into Lozne and Cantire, made great waste and spoile of those countries, till Duthquhall gouernor of Athole, and Culane of Argyle, being sent with a chosen power from the king to defend the countrie, chanced to encounter with him, and putting him with his people vnto flight, chased them to such a streid, as where there was no way to get forth, save onlie that by which they entered. This place is in Lozne, with a streid passage to enter into it: but when ye are within it, the same is verie large and broad, inuironed about with craggie mountains, chained together with a continuall ridge, a deepe riuer compassing them in beneath in the bottom, with such steepe & sibelong banks, that there is no way to passe forth of the same, but by that through which ye must enter into it. The said Wane with his folks being entred at vnwares into such a streid, and perceiuing there was no way to issue forth, but by the same where he entred, he returned backe thither, and finding the passage closed from him by his enemies, he was in a wonderfull maze, not knowing what shift to make to escape. Finallic, falling to counsell with the chieffest of his armie vpon the danger present, and so continuing for the space of two daies without ante conclusion available, on the third day dzauen of necessitie through hunger, they required of their enemies to be receiued as yelded men vpon what conditions they would prescribe, onlie hauing their liues assured. But when this would not be granted, in the euening tide they rushed forth vpon their enemies, to trie if by force they might haue passed through them. But such was their hap, that there they died euerie mothers son: for so had Duthquhall & Culane commanded, to the end that other rebels might take example by such their wilfull and rebellious outrage.

The kings capteins after this passing ouer into the Isles, brought all things there into the former state of quietnesse. Yet after the appeasing of this tumult, there chanced a new businesse in Galloway: for Gillequhalme, sonne to that Donald, which (as ye haue heard) was executed by commandement of Eugenius the eight, gathered together a great number of vngreatious scape-thitts, & did much hurt and mischeue in the countrie. But shortly after, being vanquished by the same capteins that had suppressed the other rebels of the Isles, the countrie was rid of that trouble, and the ring-leaders punished by death for their offenses. In this meane while, the Englishmen

Soluathius.

Soluathius admitted king of Scotland.

Soluathius an impotent, & lame.

A rebellion. Shakedonald proclaimed king of the Isles.

He invaded Lozne and Cantire. A power from the king is sent against him.

The kings power passed ouer into the Isles.

Gillequhalme the sonne of Donald.

up, in re-ntrited Donald,
they did
sement.
we execu-
in won-through dors put mmitt a-meaner subiects
he bids,
e as his nature of die to of se by this e as is beetnesse a-most vile concupis-
d. desoure
at as well partisans halfe, and companie,
ing alto-
and filthie
ous vices,
e cruellie,
subiects, to wickednes
e loz and e proceed
l doings, aduerfite-
m one day
t about to gh not gail They cau-es to be ap-ll, and pro-
gs. Which were han-ch was the d the king-
as buried in ugh the peo-
e, which had sent life.
e the realme
of king Eth-ished in the
ds of vices, howbeit till
kept court.
e decessor in regard at all
ue himselfe
of delicate such a num-
e, whome he no better ea kitchen-
at modestie,
out take forefore sundrie rualions, to s and filthie hope to con-arances to reed to do good vpon

Fergus
was by
his wife.

A right
king.
Oftentimes
put in leare.

Engenius
peruer-
ed with sensuall lust and concupis-
cence.

A filthie light.

Conetoulme
linked with cruellie.

Engenius
murdered.

The end of Engenius
the eight.

Fergus.
767.

Fergus the third created
king.

A wicked
prince.

Engenius
murdered
by his wife.

men & Welsh Britains through multitude of kings and rulers warring each against other, had no leasure to attempt anie enterprize against strangers. Neither were the Isles free of some secret displeasures, which one part of them had conceived against another, so that the Scottishmen were not troubled at all by anie foireine enemies. And so Soluathius hauing continued his reigne the space of 20 yeres, about the end of that tearme departed this life, in the yere of our saluation 788.

Soluathius
departeth
this life.

788.

Achaius.

Achaius created king of
Scotland.

Then after Soluathius was once buried in Colmekill amongst his ancessors, Achaius the son of king Ethfine (a man highlie renowned for his earnest zeale to iustice and byright dealing) was aduanced to the gouernance of the realme: who for that by his former conuersation amongst the nobilitie, he perfectlie vnderstand what grudge and secret hatred remained in their hearts, one wishing anothers destruction; he foresaw what danger the commonwealth stood in, if the same were not by some good meanes qualified: and therupon calling them togither, he handled the matter with such wisdom and dexteritie, that before their departure from him, all the roots of former displeasures being vtterlie extirped and auoided, they were made friends on ech side, and promised in his presence to continue. Thus hauing laid the foundation of a quiet state amongst his subiects, now in the beginning of his reigne, he was at point to haue had no small warres with the Irishmen: for a number of them being arrived in Cantire, were there slaine by them of the westerne Isles, which vpon request of the inhabitants of that countrie were come to aid them against those Irishmen.

He maketh
the nobilitie
to agree.

This losse the rulers of the Irish nation proposed in all hast to reuenge vpon them of the Isles. But Achaius hearing thereof, sent ouer an ambassage vnto them, to haue the matter taken vp before anie further force were vled: alledging how there was no cause wherfore warres should be moued for such a matter, where the occasion had bene giuen but by a sort of roners on either side, without commandment or warrant obtained from anie of their superiours. Vnto what the nobles of Ireland (for there was no king amongst them at that time as it chaunced) moued altogether with indignation for the slaughter of their countymen, made a direct answer, that they would suerlie be reuenged of the reproch which they had receiued, before they would common of anie peace. And therefore whilst the Scottish ambassadors returned out of Ireland with this answer, a great number of them in ships and craiers passed ouer into Isla, where getting togither a great preie, and fraughting their vessels therewith, as they were returning home wards, they were sonke by force of tempest, so that neither ship nor man returned to bying tidings home how they had sped in Scotland.

The Irish-
men will reuenge.

Irishmen
take a preie in Isla.

Irishmen do seek peace.

The stout stomachs of the Irish lords and rulers being well qualified with this mischance, they were glad to seeke for peace shortly after vnto Achaius. Those also that were sent ouer to treat of the same, found him at Enuerlochthe; where hauing declared there message, & confessed how iustlie they had bene punished by the righteous iudgement of almightie God, for the wrongfull attempting of the warres against them that had not deserued it: Achaius answered, how the Irish nation was so stubborne, that they knew not how to vse reason, except they were throughlie scourged; and therefore had the righteous God taken iust reuenge vpon them, to the example of other, for their contumacie, in mouing warres against them that had so earnestlie sought for peace. Neuerthelesse, setting apart all iniuries past, as well new as old, to shew him selfe to be the follower of Christ, who in so manie passages had praised, commended, and set forth vnto vs peace and tranquillitie, he was contented to grant them peace, which now they sued for. Thus was the peace renewed betwixt the Scottish and Irish nations, to the no lesse comfort of the Scots themselves, than of the Irishmen, as those that had learned now by experience and triall (hauing inioied peace a good season) how much the same was to be preferred before cruell warres.

10

In this meane time, Charles surnamed the great, as then reigning in France, and vnderstanding how the Englishmen did not onelie by dallie routing disquiet the seas, to the great danger of all such merchants and other as trauelled alongst the coasts of France and Germanie; but also now and then coming on land vpon the French dominions, did manie notable displeasures to his subiects: he thought good by the aduise of his peeres, to conclude a league (if it were possible) with the Scots and Isles, with this article amongst the residue: That so oft as the Englishmen should attempt any enterprize or inuasion into France, the Scots and Isles should be readie freightwates to inuade them here at home; and when they should make anie warres against the Scots or Isles, then the Frenchmen should take vpon them to inuade the west parts of England.

There were sent therefore from Charles vnto Achaius certeine ambassadors to bying this matter to passe, who arriuing in Scotland, and comming to the kings presence, declared effectualie the summe of their message, shewing that the conclusion of such a league should be no lesse to the wealth of the Frenchmen, than of the Scots (considering Englishmen to be a people most desirous of all other to get into their hands other mens goods and possessions) for thereby they might be somewhat restrained from such bold and inturious enterprizes, as they dailie took in hand against their christian neighbors: but it should make most of all (say they) for the aduancement of the whole christian commonwealth, whereas otherwile through their insolent doings, such force as was already prepared against the Saracens (the common enemies of the christians) should be called backe, therewith to keepe off the said Englishmen, to the great danger of those parts of christendome, vpon which the Saracens then bordered as neighbors.

This message being heard with good deliberation by such as were present, the ambassadors themselves being honorable personages, and graue of countenance, were receiued most louinglie of the king, and lodged in his owne palace, hauing all the chere and honorable intertainment that might be deuised: but touching their message, there were sundrie disputations amongst the nobles, whether the concluding of such a league as they required, were expedient for the Scottish commonwealth or not. And for that the matter seemed to be doubtfull, the king thought it necessarie to haue the aduise of his counsell: and thereupon calling them togither, and appointing diuers of them to go with the ambassadors on hunting, to shew them some sport, whilst he consulted with the residue (because he would not haue them present) he commanded one Colman, gouernor of Mar (a man of great authoritie amongst the Scottishmen for his approued wisdom) to say first his mind touching the request of those French ambassadors, who there vpon standing forth, began as followeth.

No man ought to maruell, I perceiue, king Achaius, if manie of this our nation be desirous to haue this league concluded with the Frenchmen, as they that are perswaded how nothing can be better, nothing more profitable, more honorable, or more pleasant

Carolus Magnus
league with
the Scots.

Ambassadors
sent into Scotland.

The ambdors are readie inter-
taind.

pleasant to almightie God, than to ioine in league and friendship with a nation of greatest power and wealth in these daies, of all other within the bounds of Europe: for by that meanes should the Scottish name be highlie renowned and spoken of through the whole world. But trulie these considerations contenting so well at the first, are not so much to be regarded as the evils which hereafter may grow thereupon: for suerlie a naughtie and pernicious end of this determination shall euidentlie teach vs (though to late) how farre we haue gone beside the way of reason in establishing this league, if we once consent to conclude the same. Is it anie other thing (I beseech you) to make a league, and to ioine in socitie with the Frenchmen against our neighbors the Englishmen (whose friendship might be most expedient for vs) than euen to haue from henceforth a more and in manner a domesticall enimie at hand, whereas our supposed friends shall be farre off from vs, and separated from our countrie by a great and large sea, at whose pleasure also we must make wars against our neighbors, and fight for other mens safegards, putting our bodies in hazard of death and wounding for their cause, which dwell nothing nere vs; yea & in their quarell to commit our kingdome, goods and liues vnto extreme perill of vtter destruction: I would thinke it god therefore to take better advisement and deliberation herein, least whilst we seek for vaine glorie and counterfeite honor, we do not, through prouoking the Englishmen our next neighbors, lose our owne liberties got with much trauail by our elders, for the which they so often fought with the Britains, Romans, Picts, and final-lie with the Saxons. Can there be anie thing more pernicious vnto a free nation, and people bozne in libertie, than to measure lawes of peace, chances of warre, and in fine libertie it selfe, by the lust and pleasure of another nation, and so to enter (as it were) into bondage: For the auoiding whereof, not onelie men, but also all other liuing things are readie to fight, euen to the vttermost. If the Frenchmen in the chiefeest heat and most earnest bunt of the warre (which we shall take in hand for their sake, according to the articles of the league) shall chance to forsake vs, and conclude some manner of peace or league with our enemies, leauing vs in all the whole danger; shall we haue anie iudge afore whome we maie bring them to answer for their default, and by whose authoritie they may be constrained to see vs satisfied for such losse and injuries as we shall happily susteine at the Englishmens hands: Are we of that force and power to reuenge our wrongs vpon them, after we are vanquished and in maner brought to vtter confusion by those warres which we shall enter into for their cause: If euer we be brought vnto that point (as God forbid we should) that through want of substance, and decaye of force, the Frenchmen shall also vtterlie forsake vs, & that thereby we shall not be able to resist the English puissance: afore whome (I beseech you) shall we accuse them for breaking of this league: We shall daillie haue to doe with our enemies after the conclusion of the league (if it be concluded at all) and but seldome times with our friends. In the midst of our enemies we shall be still occasioned to practise for our defense, where we haue a long way both by sea and land to passe ouer to our friends, in case anie need shall inforce vs there:
vnto commodities are brought vs out of Spaine, France, and Germanie, not such as we desire, but onelie such as the Englishmen do permit. Againe, when our merchants shall passe into France, what hauens shall we leaue them to resort vnto in time of dangerous tempests, which often chance to all such as be sailing: Whether must they perish and be cast a way through rage of seas, either else fall into the hands of our enemies together, with all their goods and fraught. What discommodities hereof shall rise, your grace (most prudent prince) and you right circumspet counsellors, do well enough perceiue. I therefore would thinke it expedient, that we should continue in the former peace concluded with the Britains, Saxons, and Picts, according to the custome of our late predecessors, who saw well enough what was most beneficiall for the wealth of the Sco-tish nation, and not to court a new amitie with an vnknowne people, hauing deserved little or nothing as yet at our hands (whose intent I cannot but haue in suspition, sith they seeke for amitie so farre off) except we shall manifestlie resolue with our selues to imploie and leopord both life and libertie for the safe-gard of the French, without regard of our owne.

¶ Spanie in that assemblie shewed themselves fore offended with Colmans words, supposing the league with the Frenchmen to be both honorable and necessarie.

Then one Albion, a man of great nobilitie (whome the king had latelie before instituted his lieutenant in the Isles) spake in this manner. If it were possible that there might be one sure and inuolable consent amongst those foure people, which at this date haue their habitations within the bounds of Albion, or that the Englishmen knew what it were to stand and abide by faith and promises made and giuen, we would not denie but that those considerations and advises which Colman hath here vttered, ought to be followed; bicause that then there should be no occasion at all, why we should conclude anie league with a nie foren nation. But forsomuch as there was neuer man that found more vntruth and breach of promise in anie nation, than hath bene found in these Saxons (the which hauing got the rule in Albion, are now called Englishmen) as the Scots, Picts, and Britains haue by triall sufficientlie proued; I suppose it is euidentlie knowne vnto you, that either we must of necessitie fight and stand at defense against the Englishmen, readie to assaile vs both with open force and secret craft, either els linke our selues with such allies and confederats, as by their support we maie be the better able to withstand the malice of such vnfaithfull people. Call ye this faith, or treason, I praise you: The Saxons in times past being required of the Britains to aid them against their enimies, were most longinglie receiued, and highlie rewarded for their seruice: but they contrarie in recompense of such kindnesse, shewed themselves in stead of aiders, enemies; in stead of defenders, destruc-ters: turning their weapons points against the Britains, by whome they had bene so sent for to their aid; and now haue not onelie destroyed a great number of them by fire and sword, but also they haue spoled them of their kingdome & libertie. What league or truce haue they at anie time kept (you your selues are not ignorant of this which I speake) where either they saw occasion to be their neighbors, or hoped to gaine anie thing by falsifying their faiths, as they that haue neuer bene ashamed so to do, where hope to haue commoditie (if I may so call it) hath at anie hand bene offered. Into what sundrie and most miserable calamities hath the trecherie of the Saxons brought the illie Britains: How oftentimes haue they broken the peace established with vs, and also with the Picts; euen when we least thought vpon anie such thing: Yea and that more is, amongst them selues at this season the Englishmen warre one against another, more with craftie traines than with open force, in such wise that in Northumberland so manie kings, and so manie noble men haue bene traitorously murdered and made auaite, that scarce H. J. may

com-
quill.
which
melew
to lesse Trilly
erience
i) how cruell

great,
anding
rouing ch meroasts of en com-
did ma-
thought a league s, with t as the or inua-
d be rea-ome; and inst the uld take
land.

into A-matter umming to e summe
on of such
th of the ng Eng-
other to o possesiestrained they dal-
ighbors:
or the ad-
wealth,
d wings,
I the Sans) should aid Eng-ts of ch-
bordered

Embassad-
sent into Scotland.

liberation
hemselues of counte-
king, and there and uised: but e disputacluding of ent for the
that the ught it ne-
and there,
ng diuerse
unting, to d with the resent) he ar (a man
men for his ouching
who there

The ambassadors are hom-vabile inter-
tained.

, king A-sious to chmen, as
be better,
e, or more pleasant

for confide-
reance.

for counsell
at peril
of
the off.

for counsell
at peril
of
the off.

The ambassadors are hom-
vabile inter-
tained.

, king A-sious to chmen, as
be better,
e, or more pleasant

Colmans
counsell is mistaken.

Albion his ration.

The English
Saxons breakers of promise.

To induce others to his purpose, he taketh the advantage of casual haps, charging the whole nation with the fault of a few particular persons.

may there be anie found that will take vpon him the supreme gouernement of that countrie. It is not manie yeres ago, since Edwin king of that countrie was rid out of the wate through treason of Oswie that succeeded him in the kingdome, and was after depriued both of life and kingdome by Oswike, whome Egbert desirous to reigne in his place, found meanes by traitorous practise to dispatch. Egbert was slaine by Hollo, and Hollo by Alfred, which Alfred was after slaine by the guilefull craft of Ethelbert. Neither had Ethelbert anie better successe in the end, for now of late betrayed by his owne subiects, he was by them shamefullie slaine and murdered. Neither with lesse traitorous shifts and deuises do the Englishmen mainteine their warres in all places where they are inhabiting within Albion. The reuerend fathers of the spiritualtie, and other godlie men addicted to vertue, vnto whom the setting forth of Gods word hath bene committed, weare of and abhorring this wood madnesse, rage and wicked demeanour of that nation, haue left their bishoprikes, abbeies, monasteries, and cels, and from thence haue remoued into forren regions. Therefore where the Englishmen doe absteine at this present from making vs warres, it is not to be imputed to anie reuerence they haue vnto faith, equitie, or respect of the league, which they haue made with vs, but onelie vnto such ciuill sedition and discord, as now both reigne amongst them. Neither ought anie of vs of right to doubt, but that when the same once ceaseth, they will immediatlie take weapon in hand against vs, notwithstanding all leagues or covenants of peace confirmed to the contrarie. To repress therefore and abate their subtil practises, I can find no readier meane than to enter into friendship, and conclude a league with that people, which being ioined with vs, may chastise such outrageous furie of this wicked nation, as cause and oportunitie shall require. For tune hath offered vnto vs a conuenient meane and occasion herevnto. For here be at this present the French kings ambassadozs, offering that vnto vs, which (being so great a benefit) we might scarce wish for. That is, they require to haue vs to ioine in league against the Englishmen, with their king, whome France, Spaine, and no small part of Germanie doe acknowledge for their souereigne. Dought this to be despised of men that haue their perfect senses? Dought the societie of the French nation to be refused of vs, inhabiting here in the uttermost parts of the earth, the same being frelie offered by them, vnto whom for their sincere faith both towards God and man, the large empire of the world is granted? So that if we shall thankfullie receiue this most notable benefit, the same shall purchase vnto vs the friendship of the Spaniards, Frenchmen, Germans, and all those nations which acknowledge king Charles for their head and souereigne lord. Herevpon also free passage for merchants shall be open, to passe to and fro vnto vs, with all kind of merchandise and wares of traffike. I trust therefore that euerie one of you (so that he weie the thing with himselfe throughlie) will easilie iudge that the friendship and societie of the Frenchmen (verie pulstant both by sea and land) and thereto of approued faith and steadfastnesse in promise, ought more to be esteemed, and is more beneficiall to the Scottish commonwealth, than the vntedfast promises and great dissolutie of the Saxons. To which of you is it unknowne that the English nation studieth no lesse to bring vs vnder the yoke of seruitude, than they do the Welshmen, if their force might answer directlie to their wils? Therefore if we desire to auoid the violent power of most cruell enemies, if we meane to auoid their craftie practises, if we regard the christian religion; for the which the Frenchmen are continually in danger, if we set more by vertue and constancie than by vnfaithfulness and breach of covenants and promises, if we labor for the glorie and honor of our nation, if we couet to aduance our countrie, our owne rest, and quietnesse, and to be briefe, if we passe vpon life and libertie, the most dearest things that may happen to man, let vs with full hartes establish this league with the Frenchmen, and firmitie continue in the same, vpon assured trust and confidence that it shall bring perpetuall commoditie and renowne to vs, both for the safegard of our realme, & restraint of the Englishmens vnlawfull attempts and wrongfull iniuries, which hereafter they either shall or may at any time enterprise against vs. By this oration Albion drew the multitude easilie vnto his purpose.

The Frenchmen in those daies possessed not onlie that part of Gallia, which we now call France, but also the most part of the countries now inhabited by the Dutchmen or Germans, namely on this side the river Rhene.

Then Achaius vnderstanding how the minds of all his subiects were in manner wholie inclined to the league, commanded all the companie to be there in the same place againe the next day. And so being by their assemble for that time, the king made the French ambassadozs that night a costlie supper with a banquet, and after hauing conference with his nobles and lordes of the counsell, it was agreed by generall consent amongst them, that for the solemne ratifieng of this league with king Charles, according as he had required, there should go with his ambassadozs at their returne the lord William the brother of king Achaius, with foure other honorable and learned personages, being men of perfect knowledge and skill, and such as were esteemed most meet for such a purpose. Also, that they should take foure thousand men ouer with them to serue against the infidels and enemies of the christian religion, where and in such sort as king Charles should appoint them.

Herevpon the next day going first to church, and there making their common supplications vnto almightie God, according to the rites and ancient customes, they after reioyced vnto the counsell chamber, where Achaius opened and declared vnto the French ambassadozs all that was concluded by him, and other the estates of his realme, touching the message which they had brought from king Charles. Who reioysing (as should appere) greatlie hereat, gaue most hartie thanks vnto him, and to all the residue for their beneuolent wils herein shewed towards king Charles their maister, and all the French nation. After this, remaining certaine daies with Achaius, who made them all the chere that might be imagined, they departed towards Hungus king of the Poles, vnto whom at their comming to his presence they made the like request on their maisters behalf, which they had made before vnto Achaius.

It is said that Hungus gaue the Frenchmen most hartie thanks for their good wils, but yet he would not grant to conclude anie league with them at that time, for that (as he alledged) the matter being weightie and of great importance, required no small time to deliberate and take aduise for a full resolution therein. The ambassadozs herevpon returned vnto Achaius without speed of their purpose with Hungus, and the second moneth after, all things being readie for their returne, and the passage of those that should go with them, the lord William the kings brother, together with the same ambassadozs, & such foure persons as the king had chosen forth amongst all the learned clergie of his realme (whose names were Clement, John, Raban, and Alcuine) and also hauing with him those foure thousand men of war, which were at the first appointed to go with him, passed forth towards France, where he with all the whole companie landed within few daies after in safetie, according to their owne wished desires. At their

The league with the Frenchmen agreed vpon.

The league concluded.

Hungus king of the Poles.

Hungus refused to conclude anie league with the Frenchmen.

The French ambassadozs returned home.

Clement, John, Raban, and Alcuine.

The Scottish: their receiue all the ers whi of the f ling the owne i

The league published by heralds.

The articles of the league.

The league with the Frenchmen agreed vpon.

The league concluded.

The armies of Scotland.

The balance of wils.

The French ambassadozs returned home.

Clement, John, Raban, and Alcuine.

their comming into Fraunce Charles the emperoz received them in most gladsome wise, doing them all the honor that might be deuised, and the souldiers which were come to serue him vnder the leading of the foresaid William, he retained in wages, w sing them after the same sort and rate as he did his owne naturall people the Frenchmen.

owne naturall people the Frenchmen.
Shoztly after also at the request of the Scottish ozatozs, according to the charter signed by Achaius, and confirmed by consent of king Charles, the league betwixt the Frenchmen and Scots was solemnlie published by heralds at armes, according to the maner in those daies used, the same to indure betwixt those two nations and their posterities for ever. The chiefest articles comprised in this league were as fol-loweth. The amitie and confederation betwixt the Frenchmen and Scots to be perpetuall and firme, to indure betwixt them and the posterities of both nations for ever. The iniuries and warres which the Englishmen should attempt against either nation, should be accounted as common to them both.
The Frenchmen being assailed by warres of the Englishmen, the Scots should send their aid of soul-diers, having their charges bozne by the Frenchmen as well for furniture, as wages, and all other things necessarie. The Frenchmen should contrariwise aid the Scots in time of wars against the Englishmen at their owne proper costs and charges. Whatsoever he were, privat person or publike of these two confederat nations, that against either of them should aid the Englishmen with armour, counsell, bittels, or in anie other manner of wise, the same should be reputed for a traitor vnto both their princes and countries. Neither might either of them conclude a peace, or take anie truce without the consent of the other. These were the principall articles of the league, as then confirmed betwixt the Scots and Frenchmen, indited in Latine, and faire ingrossed in parchment, and referued as a monument in both realmes, for a witnesse vnto such as should come after of this friendship thus begun, as the Scottish chronicles affirme.] And for further increase of the thing, Achaius did augment his armes, being a red lion in a field of gold, with a double trace seamed with floure delices, signifieng thereby, that the lion from thence forth should be defended by the aid of the Frenchmen; & that the Scottish kings should valiantlie fight in defense of their countrie, liberties, religion, and innocencie, which are represented by the lilles, or floure delices, as heralds do interpret it. The lord William, the said Clement, and John, remained still with king Charles, but Ra-bane & Alcuine returned into their countrie. In all such warres and iournies as Charles afterwards made against anie of his enemies, the said lord William was a chiefe dower in the sachie, so that his fame and authoritie dailie grew in all places where he came. His seruice stood king Charles in notable stead in his expeditiōs against the Sarons, Hungarians, and other; but namelie his estimation in Italie was most highlie aduanced, at what time the said Charles reedified the citie of Florence, appointing this William to be his lieutenant in Tuscan, and to haue the chiefe charge for the restoring of the said citie, which he with such diligence applied, that with in short time the same was not onelie fortified with new wals, repared and replenished with great numbers of houses, churches, and other beautifull buildings, but also peopled and furnished with citizens, a great companie of nobles and gentlemen being called thither out of euerie citie and tostone thereabouts for that purpose.

The citie being thus restored to hir former estate and dignitie, through the bounteous benefit of king

Charles, and the diligent administration of his lieutenant the foresaid William, the citizens to shew themselves thankfull, deuised for a perpetual memorie to beare in their armes a red lillie, resembling one of those which the kings of France giue, saue that it differed in colour, to testifie thereby, that their citie (after the destruction thereof by the Goths) was reedified and reſtozed to the former dignitie, by the benefit of the Frenchmen. And to acknowledge the diligence herein of the lieutenant, they did institute publike plaies to be vsed and celebrated euerie yeere, wherein with manie pompous ceremonies they crowne a lion. And further that there should be kept vpon the charges of the treasure within the citie certaine lions (for the foresaid lord William gaue a lion for his cognisance) and therevpon as the Scottish chronicles affirme, those beasts grew to be had in such honoz amongst the Florentines. Thus this valiant captaine, the foresaid lord William, passing his time in notable exercises, and worthy feats of chivalrie vnder king Charles, is accounted in the number of those twelue martiall warriors, which are called commonlie by the Scottishmen, Scoteshilmoze.

And for that he was continuallie occupied in warres, he was neuer married, whereupon growing in age, and purposing to make Christ his heire, he builde diuers abbies and monasteries both in Ita-lie and Germanie, richlie endowing the same with lands and rents, sufficient for the finding of such number of monks, as he appointed to be in the said abbies, wherein none might be admitted, according to the ancient ordinance by him deuised, except he were a Scottishman borne. In witnesse of which ordinance, there are sundrie of these houses remaining in Almaine euen vnto this day, nothing changed from the first order or institution. Before the accomplishment of these things, by the foresaid lord William, brother (as is said) to the Scottis king Achatus, I find that the vniuersities of Paris and Achaus were instituted by king Charles, chieftie by the helpe and means of these two fore-remembered Scottishmen, John and Clement, inasmuch that Clement was appointed chiefe president of all the students at Paris, and John of the other at Achaus.

But now to returne to the other doings of Achaius, ye shall vnderstand, that about the same time, or not much differing from the same, Adelsfane the sonne of Ethelwoolfe king of Westsaxons, taking vpon him the dominion of Kent, Eastsaxon, Mercia, and Northumberland (which Egbert his grandfather had receiued into his gouernement) desirous now to enlarge his kingdome, entred into that part of the Britissh dominion, which ancientlie hight Deira, and contained the marches about Beruikie, alledging how the same appertained to his kingdome of Northumberland, and had bene fraudulentlie taken from his ancestozs by the Brits: but forsomuch as there was a commotion raised the same time in Mercia, he was called backe to appease it, and here vpon putting all to the fire and sword in Deira, slaying such prisoners as he brought away with him, he returned. Hungus the Britissh king fore from ching this iniurious enterprise of the Englishmen, determined to reuenge the same in all possible hast, and therefore made instant sute vnto Achaius (who had married his sister) to haue his aid against them.

Archaius of his owne accord minding to doe the Englishmen a displeasure , sent forthwith vnto Hungus to the number of ten thousand men. With which, and with his owne power, king Hungus in-uaded the borders of Northumberland, fetching from thence a great bottie of goods and pilsoners; but yet he forbore slaughter of men, and burning of houses,

The arms of Florence.

A lion crowned.

Lions kept at Florence.

h Scotsgill-inoze.

William bns married m^{rs} keth Chz st
his heire.
Monasteries of Scottish men in Ger
manie.

The Builders
Site of Paris and Davis.

ai^o Adelstane ent-02 tereth into he Deira.

ere Deira wasted sa by fire and m sword.

who em.
the
into
with

Kingus atded with Scotishmen
inuaeth Northumber-
land.

He warred without slaughter and burning.

Athelstane
pursueth Hungus.

Athelstane his cruell proclamation.

The Picts
are amazed.

The Picts
enter the
campe.

Athelstane
doth challenge his enemies.

The Picts
prepare themselves vnto
battel.

The English-
men are put to flight.

Athelstane is
slaine.

Willsons forð.

A dreame.

The crosse of saint Andrew.

houses, for a reuerence which he had, as is supposed, towards the christian religion. Athelstane being certified hereof, omitting his iournie into Mercia, turned all his power against the Picts: and hearing that they were withdrawn into their countrie, he followed them so nere at the heeles, that verie earlie in one morning he was vpon their backs where they lodged by a brooke side, not passing two miles from Haddington, before they had any knowledge of his approach. Athelstane vpon a fierce courage, hauing thus found his enemies according to his wished desire, and herewith conning vpon them in such order of battell, as they had no waie forth to escape without fight, he commanded a proclamation to be made by one of his heralds, that all the whole number of the Picts should passe by the edge of the sword.

The Picts thus seeing their enemies at hand, and hearing this cruell commandement, were wonderfullie amazed with the strangenesse of the thing, and oppressed so with feare, that they wist not what might be best for them to do. At length by commandement of Hungus their king, they fell vnto fortifying of their campe; but yet they quicklie perceived how that it would not long preuaile them, considering that their enemies had gotten into their hands not onelie the spoile which they had brought with them out of Northumberland, but also all other their prouision, trusse, and baggage, which they had left in a field there adioining vnto the side of their campe. Herevpon manie reasons were put forth amongst them, which way they might escape out of that present danger. In which meane time Athelstane hauing brought his people into good order of battell, prouoked the Picts to come forth of their strength into the plaine field, there to trie their forces. But for that day no notable thing was done; the Picts keeping themselves still within their campe.

In the night following, after sundrie consultations had amongst them, it was agreed by generall consent, that the next day they should giue battell to the Englishmen. And so herevpon preparing themselves for the purpose, euen vpon the breake of the day, forward they make towards their enemies with fierce willes, speciallie encouraged thereto by the comfortable words of Hungus. The Englishmen halfe amazed at the hardie approach and onset of the Picts, were not long able to susteine their fore impression; so that beginning somewhat to swaue, at length they were forced to flee vnto the place, where ye heard how they toke the baggage and spoile of the Pictish campe: where they were beaten downe in greater numbers than before, insomuch that such prisoners as they had before taken of them that kept the said spoile, greatlie now to aduance the victorie of their fellows, shewed more crueltie towards the Englishmen than any of the rest, now that they saw once how the victorie was inclined to the Pictish side.

In fine, such slaughter was made, that of the whole English host which was there assembled, there vnneth escaped five hundred. Athelstane himselfe at the first was run through the bodie with a speare, and so died, giuing name to the place of the battell, which continueth euen vnto this daie, being called Athelstans forð. This victorie fell to the Picts by miracle: for in the night season, as Hungus was laid downe to sleepe (after it was agreed that they should giue battell) there appeared vnto him the apostle saint Andrew (as the tale goeth) promising him and his people victorie against their enemies on the day next following; and for an assured token thereof, he told him that there should appeare ouer the Pictish host in the element such a fashioned crosse, as he sometime suffered vpon. Hungus awakened, and beholding the skie, saw the crosse, as the apostle had told him: wherevpon calling his people together, he not onelie shewed them the same sight, but also declared vnto them what vision had appeared vnto him in his sleepe; willing them therefore to be of good comfort, sith there was cause of such assured hope to haue assistance from above against their cruell enemies.

The signe of the foresaid crosse was not onelie sene of the Picts and Scots being there with them in aid, to both their great comforts and gladnesse, but also of the Englishmen to their no lesse discouragement, as they that vnderstood saint Andrews to be patron and protector of the Scottish and Pictish nations. For it did put such a feare into their hearts, that when they came to the point of joining, their stomachs so failed them, that with small resistance they were easilie vanquished (as is said) and put to flight. For this so manifest a miracle, after the battell was once ended, and the victorie obtained, Hungus repaired with his people following him, vnto the church of that blessed man saint Regulus, now called saint Andrewes, where they made their offerings with humble deuotion vnto the reliques of the apostle, rendering thanks vnto him for their victorie with deuout praier after the accustomed manner. They bowed there also at the verie same time (as the same goeth) that from thenceforth as well they as their posteritie in time of war should weare a crosse of saint Andrew for their badge and cognifiance. Which ordinance continuallie after remained with the Picts, and after their destruction and extermination with the Scots euen vnto our time. The bodie of Athelstane was buried in the next church vnto the place where the field was fought, howbeit, some haue left in waiting that his head was cut off from the bodie, and brought to Inchgaruie, there being set vpon a stake, it was shewed to the people in reproch of his iniurious enterpryse.

Hungus the Pictish king to shew himselfe yet more mindfull of the due honoring of the holie apostle, by whose aid he acknowledged himselfe to haue got the victorie aforesaid, not onelie augmented his church with new buildings & needfull reparations, but increased the number of priests for the celebrating of diuine seruice; he also gaue manie rich and collicke ornaments vnto the same, as chalices, cruets, basons, & such like. Moreouer, he caused to be made the images of Christ and his 12 apostles of fine gold and siluer, which he bestowed there; with a case also of beaten gold, therein to inclose the reliques of saint Andrew. And besides this, he ordeined that the spiritaltie should haue the tenths of all increase of goods: as of coine, cattels, herbage, and such like through his realme; and further that spirituall persons should not be compelled to answer before any temporall iudge. But these beneficiall priuiledges the Pictish clergie did not long inioy. For Feredeth that was the fourth, which reigned amongst the Picts after Hungus, toke from them all such gifts as this Hungus had giuen them, and further ordeined to the derogation of their priuiledges, that they should answer for secular crimes afore secular magistrats; and that liuing vpon their former reuenues, souldiers & men of war should inioy the other which Hungus, had so frelie bestowed vpon them.

The nobles of the land mainteined Feredeth in his doings, reckoning all that spirituall persons had to be but cast away, which was the cause (as some thought) that their kingdome came into such ruine, as shortly after followed. There be some chronicles that write how these things, which are mentioned of Hungus, and Athelstane, chanced not altogether

Some say
that the crosse was patron.

Some say
that the crosse was patron.

Why should men be fearful
of the crosse in warre?

Athelstane
burnt.

Hungus
slept in a cassell.

Images
of gold
and siluer.

Tenths
to be giuen
to
the clergie.

Feredeth
toke
from
the clergie
their priuiledges.

Priests
to be tried afore secular iudges.

Priests
to be tried afore secular
iudges.

Alpine
was receiued
of Don-gall.

Johnes departeth out of this life.

819.

Conuall.

Conuall faccedeth A-chilus.
Aunc and a-mule.

Hungus sal-
eth in a consumption.
Conuall deceaseth also.
802. 10. Ma.

Don-
gall.

Don-gall suc-
cedeth after Conuall.

A severe pu-nisher of malicious.

Alpine con-
strained by the nobles, taketh
vpon him to be crowned
king.

Alpine con-
strained by the
nobles, taketh
vpon him to be crowned
king.

Alpine con-
strained by the
nobles, taketh
vpon him to be crowned
king.

Alpine con-
strained by the
nobles, taketh
vpon him to be crowned
king.

Alpine con-
strained by the
nobles, taketh
vpon him to be crowned
king.

Alpine con-
strained by the
nobles, taketh
vpon him to be crowned
king.

about remor
he talk
of the
for tha
the fan
sented places
put for ration
pose to twitted
to abin
the fan
not w
B
of Pic throw ple in tempt wards Achai
this li bout t
the P codin cessor
and of shop also b bethe ledge
dit au
A
king fith li
the P mitic
how betw
and q Hung
ceasse
of his
of kin
him, I parte nesse.
D states and g what
of the diuer
one the cr
but e
there
into king
the n coun amon state and a feth
of D prom
the st vnto
noth

about this season, but Hector Boetius followeth Veremond in most of his accounts, as the author whom he taketh to be most certaine, as well for the account of the time as in the course of the whole historie. And for that we meane not to presume wholie to derogate the same Boetius his credit, we haue not much dissented from him, but rather followed him in most places, leaving such doubts as may be worthe put forth of that which he writeth, vnto the consideration of the diligent reader, sith it is not our purpose to impugn, but rather to report what we find written by others, except now and then by the way to admonish the reader of some vnlikelihoods (as the same doth seeme to vs and others) and happilie not without iust occasion.

But now to our purpose. As well Hungus king of Picts, as Achaisus king of Scots, after the overthrow and death of Athelstane, liued with their people in good quiet and rest: for the Englishmen attempted nothing against the Scots and Picts afterwards, during the time of their reignes. At length Achaisus, after he had reigned 32 yeares, departed this life, in the yeare of our Lord 819, which was about the first yeare of Hungus his dominion ouer the Picts. His bodie was buried in Colmekill, according to the manner of kings amongst his predecessors. In the daies of this Achaisus (beside Clement and others, of whose before we haue heard) liued bishop Geruadius a notable preacher in Gurey land, also bishop Clacian with Godan and Godan two brethren, all doctors and men of singular knowledge, in respect wherof they were had in great credit and estimation with the people.

After the deceasse of Achaisus, Conuall that was his uncles sonne Dongall, the brother of king Ethane, succeeded in gouernement of the Scottish kingdome. Betwixt this Conuall and Hungus the Pictish king, there was wonderfull loue and amitie shewed, both of them studieng by all means how to mainteine the ancient league and alliance betwixt their people, whereupon ensued great wealth and quietnesse vnto both their kingdoms. Finally Hungus waxed with a continuall consumption decreased, deliuering by his kingdome into the hands of his sonne Dorsologus, and that in the presence of king Conuall, who likewise liued not long after him, for in the six yeare of his reigne he likewise departed out of this world, by force of naturall sickness.

Dongall the sonne of king Soluathus was reueined to succede by the common consent of the states of all the realme, a man of singular wisdom and great knowledge. But for that he was somewhat seuer in punishing the misordered behaviours of the nobilitie, and misgouerned youth of his realme, diuers of the nobles conspired against him, forcing one Alpine the sonne of Achaisus to make claime to the crowne; who perceiuing there was no remedie, but either to follow their minds, or else to be murdered amongst them, consented to go with them into Argile, where they purposed to crowne him king sitting vpon the chaire of marble, according to the manner. Whereat, at his comming into that countrie, he found means to conuey himselfe from amongst them, least through his means the quiet state of his countrie should be brought into trouble: and forthwith being escaped out of their hands with a few other that were prouide to his intention, he maketh all the hast he could, till he came to the presence of Dongall, who receiued him in most iollifull wise, promising that if it should be thought necessarie by the states of the realme, he would gladlie resigne vnto him his whole crowne and dignitie, desirous of nothing more than to see the aduancement of the house of Achaisus. Such (saith he) were the merits of that famous prince towards the preservation of the Scottish common wealth, that it were too much wickednesse to go about to defraud his issue of the inheritance of the realme.

Alpine giuing the king most hartie thanks, besought him to continue in the administration, praising God and the world to witnesse, that he minded nothing lesse than to be about to claime the gouernement of the kingdome so long as he liued. For as touching his offense, in that he had gathered an armie, and led the same into Argile, it was not his fault, but the conspirators which had forced him thereto, being determined to haue slaine him, if he had not consented vnto their desires. Within three yeares after, there came messengers from the rebels to excuse themselves also, & to put all the fault in Alpine: but king Dongall giuing small credit to their forged words, gathereth his power, and maketh such speed towards the place where he understood the said rebels were assembled together, that he was vpon them yea they had a little knowledge of his setting forwards. So that before they could make anie shift to escape out of danger, which they went about to do, they were apprehended, and immediatlie condemned and put to death. Which execution put other presumptuous persons in feare, so that the state of the realme remained afterward a great deale more in quiet.

Whilest things passed thus in Scotland, Eganus the second sonne of Hungus the Pictish king, found means to murder his brother Dorsologus, to the end he might reigne in his place: and through support of some of the nobilitie he attained to his purpose. And for that he would assure himselfe the more firmelie in the estate, he frankelie bestowed his fathers treasure amongst his lords and chiefeest peers of his realme, and toke to wife Benna the king of Mercia his daughter, whom his brother the forenamed Dorsologus had married, that thereby he might assuage the said king of Mercia his displeasure, which otherwise he should happilie haue conceived for the death of his other sonne in law the same Dorsologus. His feare was great on each side, and therefore had small affiance in anie person, doubting lest one or other should seek to reuenge his brothers death. He durst neuer go anie waies forth abroad without a guard of men of warre about him, whome he had wonne & made his fast friends by his passing great largesse and bountifull liberalitie. At length yet, his wife to reuenge his former husbands death, found means to strangle him as he lay one night fast asleepe, hauing drunk a little too much in the evening before, and in this sort he came to his end, after he had reigned much what about the space of two yeares.

Thus both Eganus & Dorsologus being made away, without leauing anie issue behind them, so much as now there remained none of the posteritie of Hungus to succede in gouernement of the Pictish kingdome, Alpine nephew to the said Hungus, by his sister Ifergusiana, with the aduise of king Dongall, made claime therevnto, and therupon sent his messengers vnto the lords and peers of the Pictish dominion, to require them on his behalfe, that he might be receiued to the gouernement of the kingdome due vnto him by lawfull inheritance, as they well understood: and that if they thoughtlie considered of the thing, they might perceiue it was the prouision of almighty God, that for want of lawfull succession lineallie descended from Hungus, now to succede in the estate of the Pictish kingdome, by this meanes both the nations Scots and Picts should be ioined in one, to the abolishing of all such mortall

L.ij. warres,

Alpine his excuse vnto Dongall.

Dongall hath an armie against the rebels.

Eganus murdereth his brother.

Eganus feareth in feare.

Eganus is strangled of his quene.

An ambassador sent vnto the Picts.

Saint Andrew the Scottish patron.

Saint Andrew.

Why Scottish men be called Andrewes.

Athelstan's buriall.

Hungus reuenged his death.

Images of gold and silver.

Tenthredin's gift to the church.

Feredeth's gift to the church.

Feredeth's gift to the church.

Feredeth's gift to the church.

Feredeth's gift to the church.

warres, as by discorde and contention might arise betwixt those two people, in like sort as before time there had done, to the great perill and danger of both their utter ruines.

The Picts chose Feredeth to be king.

The ambassadoys come in to the court.

King Feredeth his answer vnto the Scottish ambassadoys.

Dongall his displeasure with the Picts and ambassadoys sent against.

Ambassadoys are not received.

Warre is pronounced vnto the Picts.

The Scots willingly giue themselves vnto the war.

The Pictish nobilitie, hauing knowledge that these messengers with such kind of message should shortly come from Alpine, with generall consent and whole agreement, chose one Feredeth to be their king, a man of great authoritie amongst them, supposing this to be a meane to defeat Alpines title, and that thereby he should seeme to be excluded from any further claime. Within few daies after, came vnto Camelon the Scottish ambassadoys, where Feredeth with his nobles at that present were assembled: they being admitted therefore to declare their message, when they began to enter into their matter of the right which Alpine had to the kingdome of the Picts, the people would not suffer them to proceed anie further therein, but began to make such an uprore, that to appease the noise, Feredeth himselfe took vpon him to make answer vnto the ambassadoys: and therupon commanding silence, declared vnto them that the Picts neither might nor ought to admit any stranger to reigne ouer them: for there was an ancient law among them, of most high authoritie, that in case of necessitie they might transpose the crowne from house to house: and further, that by the same law there was an ordinance decreed, that if anie man were once made and created king, he might not be deposed during his naturall life. And therefore though it were so, that Alpine were the nephew of Hungus by his sister Fergusiana: yet because he was a stranger borne, and considering withall, that the people by their full authoritie had translated the regall administration vnto an other house, of the which one was alreadie proclaimed and inuested king, there was no reason now, why Alpine should make anie further claime or demand vnto the kingdome.

Vpon the messengers returne home with this answer, Dongall thewed himselfe to be in no small chafe, that the Picts should thus go about by such subtil arguments and contriued inuentions to defraud Alpine of his right. And thereupon the second time he sent his ambassadoys vnto them, requiring them either to doe him reason without anie further surmised cauations; either else within thre moneths space after to looke for open warres at the Scottish mens hands. These ambassadoys passing forth on their iourneie, at their approaching vnto Camelon, certaine sergeants at armes met them, and did forbid them to enter the citie: also they further commanded them in name of Feredeth their king to auoid out of the confines of his dominions within foure daies space, vpon paine of death.

The ambassadoys being terrefied with such manner of inhibitions, they went no further: but yet according as they had in commission, they pronounced the warre in the name of Alpine and Dongall, requiring those that thus came to meet them, to giue signification therof vnto their maister Feredeth, and to the whole Pictish nation; and so returned home the same way they came. Then did the Scottish lords repaire vnto Dongall, who at the same time late in Carrike castell, and there taking counsell for the maintenance of these warres, not one was found amongst them which offered not to spend both life, lands, & goods in Alpines iust quarell. By this means was great preparation made on both sides for the warre, the Scots minning to set Alpine in his right, and the Picts determining not to receiue any prince of a strange nation to reigne ouer them. But whilst Dongall goeth about to provide all things readie for his enterprise, he chanced to be poisoned in the river of Speie, as he was about to passe the same in a bote. This mishap chanced him in the first yere of his reigne, and after the birth of our Saviour 830. His bodie was buried in Colmekill, with all funeral obsequies.

After Dongall was Alpine receiued to the Acrotone and gouernement of the realme, by the generall voices of all the people, whose chiefe studie was vpon his first entring into the estate, to follow his sute touching his title to the Pictish kingdome: and hereupon with all diligence preparing a mightie host and all other things (which were thought requisite for the furthering of his enterprise) he passed forth towards Angus, not staid till he came to the castell of Forfair, which he besieged; but the third day after his comming thither, Feredeth the Pictish king with a great armie of his subjects arranged in good order of battell, came and presented himselfe in sight of the Scots, wherupon immediatlie nere vnto the towne of Kessennoth they met, and joining there in battell, fought right fiercelie. At the first encounter the right wing of the Scottish armie was nere hand ouerthwonne; but Feredoch lieutenant of Athole came speedilie to the succor with 400 of his countriemen, and restored the battell on the Scottish side: wherby ensued a right fore bickering with great slaughter, and no signe of shrinking on either part, by meanes wherof it seemed doubtfull for a long space vnto whether side the victorie would incline.

At length Feredeth perceiuing the middle ward of his battell a litle to shrinke, speedilie pressed forth to succor the same with a chosen companie of such as he had appointed to attend him: but entring thus with great violence amongst the thickest prease of his enemies, he was closed in on each side, and excluded so from the residue of his owne people, that he could neither returne the same way he entered, neither yet by anie other, so that he with those that were with him, perceiuing their liues to be in present danger, did cast themselves into a ring, determining yet to reuenge their owne deaths, wherupon rather wearied with continuall fight, than vanquished, or with any feare oppressed, they were slaine all the whole number of them, together with Feredeth their king. Yet herewith did not the other Picts giue ouer the battell, so long as anie daie light was on the skie. So that the night in the end parted them in sunder, both the armies withdrawing to their camps with small toy or triumph, by reason of the great slaughter which had bene made on both sides.

The captains of the Picts weleng with themselves the losse of their king, and great multitude of their men, thought it not best to abide any longer in the field: wherfore leauing their wounded people behind them, with all their baggage in the campe, they fled incontinentlie the same night, some into one place, & some into another, where they thought best for their owne wealth and safetie. The Scots had fled immediatlie likewise, but that word was brought them as they were about to depart, how the Picts were gone alreadie, and had left their campe void of men of warre to defend the same. Wherupon the Scots taried till it was day, not farre from the place of the battell. In the morning there were certaine horsemen appointed to ride abroad, and to view the field, thereby to vnderstand whether the Picts ment anie deceit by their departure, as by laying of some ambushments, or otherwise: but vpon the returne of those horsemen, when it was once knowne how there was no such matter, but that they were fled in deed, the Scots reioicing thereat, fell to and gathered the spoile of the field, diuiding the same amongst themselves according to their accustomed order.

Alpine.

Alpine crended king of Scotland.

Feredoch the thirde of the Picts.

Feredeth is slaine.

The night parted the armies.

The Picts fled by night.

The Scots received and promised.

The Scots came to the field, and some of the

Alpine

Alpine from 3 people part of and the cencin their t pere ned the Scots utter sance field) incur so to it we did by they n bold (whon ther with Scot but a fice, peop before year Fere For com with arm the f mar pet p and His capt kept furt chof man into the Sc on vnt lye cter Sc sw lie, till rig tha the lica C H sun ber for hte his de the att all

Alpine himselfe commanded the bodie of his enemye Feredeth to be laid in christian buriall not farre from Fofair. After this causing the multers of his people to be taken, he found that he had lost the third part of his armie in that mortall and cruell battell, and thereupon brake vp his campe for that time, licensing those that were left alieue to returne vnto their homes. This battell being fought in the first yere of the reignes of the two foresaid kings, weakened the forces of both nations, so farre forth that the Scots doubting to bring the realme into danger of utter ruine (if they should commit their whole puissance effionnes to the hazard of another foughten field) determined to pursue the warre by making of incursions and inuades onelie vpon their enemies, so to vex the Picts, and to bring them vnto reason, if it were possible. And so much verely the Scottishmen did by such their continuall robes & incursions which they made into Angus, that the countrie was left void and desolate of all the inhabitants.

Neither did Brudus the sonne of Feredeth, (whome the Picts had chosen to succeed after his father in the kingdome) find anie spædie redresse to withstand those daile inuasions thus made by the Scots vpon his countries and subiects. For he was but a slothfull person, and verie negligent in his office, whereupon he was had in derision of his owne people, who in the end slue him amongst himselfes before he had reigned fullie the terme of one whole yere. Then succeeded Keneth, the second sonne of Feredeth, with no better hap or end than his brother. For gathering together an armie of his subiects, and comming with them into Angus, he came no soner within sight of his enemies, but that casting off his armor, he fled incontinentlie, leaving his people in the field; and for that his haste, was slaine by a plowman that met him by chance, and knew him not, but yet perceiuing how he had fled from his companie, and therefore deserued not to haue anie other fauour. His people seeing themselves destitute of their head capitaine and gouernor, retired from their enemies, keeping themselves in order of battell without anie further attempt.

After this infortunate end of Keneth, the Picts chose to their king one Brudus, a man of a stout and manlike stomach, who immediatlie vpon his entring into the estate, comming into Angus (which region the Scots had made waste) caught there certeine Scottish robbers, and forthwith hanged them vpon gibets. After this, he sent forth his ambassadors vnto king Alpine for reformation of all iniuries and wrongs betwixt the two nations, and to haue the ancient league renewed betwixt them. Alpine and the Scottish lords, hauing quicklie aduised what to answer, declared vnto the Pictish ambassadors plaineilie, that they would not heare anie treatie for peace, till the Picts had deliuered the kingdome vnto the right heire. Brudus vnderstanding by this answer, that the Scots would still follow the warres against the Picts, to be the better able to withstand their malice, he purposed to procure the friendship of the Englishmen, to haue their aid against the Scots. He sent therefore his ambassadors with a great summe of monie vnto Edwine king of Northumberland, requiring him of his fauour, and to haue some number of his people for his wages to serue him against the Scots.

Edwine receiuing the monie, promised to come himselfe with a mightie armie, at what time & place Brudus should appoint, to go against the Scots in defence of him and his subiects the Picts. And anie of the Picts reioiced greatlie, that they should haue aid thus of the Englishmen, hoping thereby to haue assured victorie of their aduersaries. Other mistrust ted not a little the Englishmens offers, by reason of the old enimitie betwixt the Picts and them. In this meane season the Scots take and seize vpon all the countrie of Angus, euen from the mountaine of Cranzebene vnto the riuer of Tait, whereof Brudus being certified, sendeth a post with all speed vnto king Edwine king of Northumberland, requiring him to send to his aid a powder of Englishmen, to helpe to resist the Scots, which at that present inuaded his countrie. To which demand Edwine made this answer, that he was not onelie troubled with ciuill war made against him by other Englishmen, but also had beerie requested by Ketwies surnamed Pius, as then French king, in no wise to indamage the Scots his confederats, so that for that yere present he might not conuenientlie send to him anie succours, but if he would defer the warres till the next yere, he should haue the best helpe that he were able to shew him.

Brudus perceiuing himselfe thus mocked and deluded by the Englishmen, commanded by sollemne summons, that all such of his subiects, as were able to beare armor, should assemble in nether Calidon within eight daies after, with conuenable provision of vittels, there to know his pleasure. His commandement was obeyed: so that a mightie armie of men at the day and place appointed came together, which being mustered, they streitwaies remoued vnto Calidon castell, now called Dunkeld, where they passe the riuer of Tait, and so enter into Angus, not without some difficultie: but being once gotten ouer, they march forthwith towards the place where they vnderstood their enemies did lie. Brudus the night before the day in the which he thought they should haue battell, by the aduise of certeine expert warriours, which he had with him, appointed all the horses that were in the campe, seruing for burden, to be bestowed amongst the women, lackies, and cowstrels, part of them being clad in armor, and part in white linnen, with long poles in their hands like to speares and ianelins. Amongst them also he ordeined an hundred horsemen to be placed, whome he made priuite as then to his intention, by whose leading that feat which should be wrought in this behalfe, was to be achieved. These he caused to lie conertlie within a wood nere vnto the place where the battell should be fought, giuing them in commandement not to shew themselves till the battell were begun.

King Alpine all this while held himselfe in a castell which stood vpon an hill, a little from Dundee, being now decayed, so that little thereof remaineth to be seene at this day. Vpon the north side of the hill, therelieth a great large plaine, compassed on each side with mounteins, as then full of woods & launds, but now for the most part bare and without anie trees or bushes. In this plaine were the Scots incamped. Alpine beholding forth of the castell, how the Picts approached to giue battell, got him into the campe, & exhorting his people to shew themselves valiant, placed them in arrie. The Picts no lesse desirous to fight than their gouernors would haue wished them, began the battell before they had commandement, with such violence, that the right wing of the Scots was sore disordered. But Alpine perceiuing that, came speedilie to their succours, greatlie reprovuing them for their faintnesse of courage. To be short, he did so much to imbolden them, that by his means the fight was renewed in most cruell wise: insomuch that those which before were put backe, began to winne ground againe, and to beate downe their enemies verie fiercelie.

But heerewith did the counterfet troupe of horsemen, which was hid in the wood suddenlie come forth, and shewed themselves vpon the backe halfe of the Scottish Englishmens assistance. The Scots take Angus.

Brudus sendeth vnto Edwine for aid.

Edwine deferreth his aid.

Brudus being deceived of the Englishmen, called his owne subiects to the swaie, assembling them at the foot of Calidon wood.

Brudus entereth into Angus with an armie.

A wonderful policie used by Brudus.

The incamping of Alpine his armie.

Battle the Picts begin the battell.

of
ur 830.
ll fume.

to the
by the
it studie
o follow
dome:
a migh-
ght ree passed
ie to the Alpine with an armie in-uaded the
land.

Alpine with an armie in-uaded the
land.

able war assed forth
of such as ing thus peale of and exclu-
that he tered, ne-
that were n present
J, deter-ther vpon
n banqu
e slaine all Feredeth is
slaine.

The night
parted the armies.

The Picts
sied by night

with them
altitude of longer in ded people
the campe,
some into ey thought
The Scots
word was rt, how the their campe

e. Where farre from there were ad, and to whether the e, as by lai-

: but vpon
t was once
, but that
ing threat,
, diuiding
to their ac-

Alpine

Alpine.
Alpine crowned king of Scotland.

Alpine with an armie in-uaded the
land.

Feredeth
the thine of
the.

Alpine with an armie in-uaded the
land.

Feredeth is
slaine.

The Picts
sied by night

with them
altitude of longer in ded people
the campe,
some into ey thought
The Scots
word was rt, how the
their campe

e. Where farre from there were ad, and to whether the e, as by lai-

: but vpon
t was once
, but that
ing threat,
, diuiding
to their ac-

Alpine

The Scots being deceived with a counterfeit trope of horsemen led.

King Alpine taken by his enemies and after beheaded

Kenneth the sonne of Alpine inuested king of Scotland.

8 3 4.

The Picts give thanks unto God for their victorie. They make a vow to continue the warre.

The good counsell of graue men is despised.

The Scots are animated.

The Picts fall at variance within themselves.

Brudus died.

Druiken R. ouer the Picts

The head of king Alpine is stolne, and solemnly buried with the bodie.

Scottishmen, appearing in fight to be an huge number, & farre more than they were in deed: with which fight the Scots being brought into a sudden feare, least they should be compassed about with multitude of enemies, they brake their arraie, threw off their armor, and took them to their feet, so to escape and saue themselves by flight. Thus few were slaine in the battell, but a great number died in the chase, & were beaten downe on each side as they were ouertaken by the Picts. Alpine himselfe was taken, and hauing his hands bound behind him, was led to the next towne, and there beheaded. The place beareth the name of him vnto this day, being called Palsalpine. His head also was set vpon a pole, and borne vnto Camelon, and there set vp vpon one of the highest turrets of the wall. The Scots that escaped from this sorrowfull ouerthrow, got them with all speed into Argile, where they inuested Kenneth the sonne of Alpine king of their realme. This was in the yere of our Lord 834, and the fourth yere after Alpine entered first into the estate.

The Picts hauing atchiued this great and full victorie, assembled at Camelon by commandement of their king, where causing a solemn procession to be made, in rendering thanks to almighty God for their good successe in their passed iourne: they take a generall oth vpon the gospell booke, that from thenceforth they would not cease to make the Scots war, till they had utterly destroyed the race of them: and here with ordeined a law, that if anie man made mention of anie peace or league to be had with the Scots, he should lose his head for it. There were indeed some ancient personages amongst them, that spake against this insolent outrage of the people, alledging that in time of prosperous successe men ought to vse a modestie: but certaine youthfull persons offended with such graue aduise, thrust the authors thereof out of the church, within the which they were as then assembled. The Scots being certified hereof, were nothing herewith discouraged, but rather put in god hope of better successe, sith the enemies abused themselves thus in time of felicitie.

The next summer after, the Picts assembled their power together, and setting forward towards the Scots, thorough a light occasion they fell at variance amongst themselves, and fought with such hatred together, that the king was not able to appease the frate, till night parted them in sunder. Then calling the lords afore him, he assaied alwaies to haue agreed the parties, but when he saw it would not be, in the morning he gaue them licence to depart euerie man to his owne home, breaking off his iourne for that time. Brudus liued not past three moneths after, for thorough griefe that things went not forward as he wished, he fell into a greuous disease, and finally thereof died. After whose decess, the Picts chose his brother named Druiken, to succeed in gouernment of the kingdom, who applied his whole induerment vpon his first entring into the estate, to appease the ciuill discord amongst his subiects.

But whilst he was thus busilie occupied about the same, there were certaine Scots, which sore disdained to vnderstand that the head of their late king should remaine vnburi'd, in such reprochfull sort amongst their enemies. Whereupon hauing perfect knowledge of the Pictish tong, they feined themselves to be merchantmen of that countrie, & coming vnto Camelon, watched their time, till they found meanes in the night season to steale to the wals, and secretlie taking awaie the head, escaped with the same home into their owne countrie.

This act of theirs was not a little commended: and so now the head of king Alpine being recovered, was closed in a ledden coffin, and Kenneth himselfe, hauing in his companie a great number of his nobles, went with it ouer into Colme hill, where he buried it in the abbey, amongst the sepulchres of his elders, together with the residue of the bodie in verie solemn way, as appertained. And further, those persons that had put their liues in aduenture to fetch the same head from the wals of Camelon, were by Kenneth rewarded with rich gifts and lands in perpetuities, to remaine to them and to their heires for euer. After this, Kenneth deuising for the suertie of his subiects, furnished all the holds and castles on the frontiers of his enemies with men and munition, according as he thought expedient: and moreover took order, that all the youth of the realme should be in a readinesse vpon an houres warning, to go forth against the Picts, if they attempted anie new inuasions.

But the Scottish lords had no great lust to take anie enterprize in hand against the Picts, remembering how infortunatlie they had sped the last time: so that for the space of three yeres there was no great exploit atchiued, saue certaine roads and incursions, which both the nations continually used to make one vpon an other, as time and occasion serued. At length king Kenneth being verie desirous to be reuenged of the Picts, for the death of his father king Alpine, and other iniuries by them done and attempted against the Scottish nation, in the fourth yere of his reigne, he assembled the peers and chiefest nobles of his realme, trusting to persuade them to aid him in all such enterprizes as he ment to take in hand against the Picts, whome he purposed to pursue with open warres, till he had them at his pleasure. But calling his lords and peers thus assembled on a day before him, and going earnestly about to moue them to the warres, he could stir them no more to his purpose, than if he had bene in hand to haue counselled them vnto that which in no wise had appertained vnto their duties: which their lacke of stomach, Kenneth perceiving, he began to deuise a pretie shift, whereby to induce them to his accord.

First therefore, breaking vp the assemble for the same day, he commanded that they should come together againe on the next morrow, to consult further for the state of the realme, as they should see cause. The same euening also he had them all to supper, which being prolonged till farre in the night, it was late before they went to bed, so that being ouerwatched, when they were once gotten to rest, they were sone brought into a sound sleape. Now had the king appointed for euerie one of their chambers one man apparelled in garments pretilie deuised and made of fish skins unskaled, bearing in one of their hands a staffe of such rotten wood as shyneth in the night, and in their other hand a great ore borne, to the end that uttering their words through the same, the sound of their voices should seme farre differing from the usual speech of man.

Thus appointed in the dead of the night, they enter the chambers to each of them assigned, where (as is said) the lords laie fast asleep, who being at the first as it were halfe awakened, were wonderfullie amazed at the strangenesse of the sight (doubting whether it were but a dreame, or some true and vnfained vision.) Here with also were heard certaine seuerall voices, far greater than those of men, declaring that they were messengers sent from almighty God vnto the Scottish nobilitie, to command them to obeye their king, for his request was iust: the Pictish kingdom due vnto him by rightfull heritage, & ought to be recovered from that people, which for their great offenses and sins towards almighty God, should shortly come to utter destruction: such was the determinate pleasure of his diuine maiestie, in so.

Kenneth caused the realme.

Kenneth called his nobles to reuenge his fathers death.

A pretie shift deuised by the king to persuade them to battle.

The lords declare their desire vnto the king.

The answer of king Kenneth.

Kenneth entered into Sterling-shire. Druiken had thus invaded his enemies.

The Englishmen fled.

Druiken sent to the Englishmen.

Of such sights there were many in those daies: no doubt esteemed to be beneficiall in so.

The Picts are vanquished.

iekie, against the which might neither counsell nor puissance of man be able to resist.

When the counterfeited messengers had thus made an end of their words, they stile his their skauers under their innermost garments, and therewith quicklie conueied their uppermost vestures made of fith skales (as I haue said) into their bosoms, in such light and nimble wise, that it seemed these visions had suddenlie vanished awaie. Those lords that had scene these sights, laie still for that night, great-lie musing on the matter. In the morning being got up, and assembled in the counsell chamber, they declared to ech other what they had scene and heard in the night passed. And for that all their visions which they had scene by ech others report, were in euerie behalfe like, and nothing differing one from an other, they belaued verelie it was some celestiall oracle & message sent from God. Therefore presentlie they go vnto the king, declaring vnto him how they had beene admonished from aboue, to continue the wars with all their forces against the Picts.

The king told them he had scene the like vision, but they ought to keepe it close, least by glozing too much in the fauour thereof by almightie God toward them, they might happilie displease his diuine maie-stie, which other wise they might perceiue was readie in their aid. When finally might the vision be published, when thorough his fauourable assistance, the warres were brought to a luckie end. This aduise of the king was well liked of them all, and commandement giuen, that all manner of prouision should be prepared with all speed for an armie to be set forth into Pictland. The lords going busilie about to pro-uide themselves of all things necessarie, mustered their men in all parts, so that there was leued a greater host than had beene scene in those parties of long time before. When the whole power was come togther, Kenneth marched forth with the same, entring by great violence into the Pictish borders about Sterling.

Duskien the king of Picts aduertised hereof, and hauing his armie in a readinesse both of Picts and such Englishmen as he had retained, to serue him for his wages, fetcheth a compasse about, and passing by the Scottish armie in the night, incampeth betwixt them and home, in so much that the day did no somer appere, but the one part desirous to be in hand with the other, without token of trumpet, or commandement of capteine, they rushed together most fiercelie. The hastie speed of the Picts to ioin, put them to no small disadvantage; but the departure of the Englishmen, withdrawing themselves aside to the next mountaine, most of all discouraged them: for the Scots therewith giuing a shout, declared themselves to be highlie recomforted with that sight.
Duskien in all haste sent vnto those Englishmen a messenger, willing them with large promises of reward to returne to his aid: but the Englishmen answered, that their vse was not to fight without order and commandement of their generall, and that the Picts like vnskillfull men had cast awaie themselves to be slaine by the enemies hand, where it appertained vnto warlike knowledge to auoid the battell, when no hope of victorie appered.

The middle ward of the Picts seeing themselves left naked on the one side, and assailed on the backs; whereas the Englishmen should haue kept their ground and defended them, they began to shrink: which the Scots perceiuing, broke on the more fiercelie, till at length the Picts not able to withstand their force, fell to running awaie. They made their course towards the water of Forth, which was not farre from the place of the battell, where being undertaken, they were beaten downe & slaine in great numbers: for Kenneth gaue commandement that they should spare none of the Picts nation, neither gentleman nor other, that fell into their hands. The Englishmen whilst the Scots and Picts were thus occupied in the fight and chase, withdrew homeward with all speed; and by reason of the mounteins which they had to passe, that toke awaie the sight of them from the Scots, they escaped into their countrie without any pursute. Duskien himselfe so sore as he perceiued how the field went against him, got him to his horse, which he had appointed to be readie for him at hand vpon all occasions, and so escaped out of danger with a few other in his companie.

The Scots returning from the chase, remained in the place of the battell all night, keeping strong watch about their campe, for doubt least the Englishmen had bene lodged in some secret place nere by to haue set vpon them at vnwares, if they might haue scene any advantage; but in the morning when it was knowne how they were quite gone their waies, and returned into their countrie (as before ye haue heard) then was the spoile of the field and Pic-tish campe gathered and befolowed amongst the soul-diers, after the ancient custome of that nation. And then were they all licenced to depart euerie man to his home, with thanks for their seruice and paines in this iourne so manfullie imployed. Within few daies after, the Pictish king Duskien sent his ambassadors vnto king Kenneth to sue for peace. Kenneth was contented to heare him, and promised to grant a peace, so they would surrender into his hands the gouernement of their kingdome due vnto him by right of inheritance. But this condition being vtterlie refused of the Picts, was the cause that the warre was effones renewed with more cruel-tie than before.

The yere next ensuing this battell, Kenneth got Hernes, Angus, and Fife into his hands, furnishing all the castles and holds with men, munition, and vitells. But whilst he went about to subdue the countreies about Sterling, word was brought him that such as he left thus in garison in those countreies, were betrayed by the inhabitants, and slaine euerie mothers sonne. Kenneth wonderfullie kindled in wrath for the newes, left off his treatie, which then he had in hand with the people of Mentheth and Ster-lingshire for their submission, and returned in great hast towards Fife, where being arrived, he put all to the fire and sword, not leaving one aliue of the Pic-tish nation within all those quarters. The like cruel-tie was shewed through the whole countreies of Hernes and Angus, for an example to other to beware how they falsified their faiths once giuen by waie of allegiance.

In the meane time that Kenneth with his Scots raged in such wise through those countreies, Duskien assembling all the power of his countreies, came forth into the field to meet the Scots, meaning either to put them backe out of the confines of his dominion, either else to die with honoz in the attempt thereof. Thus passing through the countrie, at length he came vnto Scone, where afterwards stood a famous abbie of Chanons of saint Augustines order, and here he found Kenneth with his armie already incamped. The next day, when both parties were re-die to haue giuen battell, Duskien wishing rather to aske peace whilst his power was yet in safetie, than after he were once vanquished (if such were his misadventure) to intreat for the same in vaine, sent an herald at armes vnto Kenneth, willing that he might talke with him before he ioined, for that he had to say certaine things, which being followed, might turne to the great benefit and commoditie of both the Scottish and Pictish nations.

Kenneth

The English
men escape.

Duskien ef-
caped by sight

The Picts
sue for peace.

Kenneth getteth Hernes, Angus, and Fife.

Fife is put to the fire and sword.

Hernes and Angus is cruelie punished.

Duskien commeth to rescue his people.

Kenneth fortified the realme.

Englishmen
deserted
vnto the
king.

Englishmen
deserted
vnto the
king.

Kenneth called his nobles
to reuenge his fathers death.

Englishmen
deserted
vnto the
king.

Englishmen
deserted
vnto the
king.

Englishmen
deserted
vnto the
king.

Englishmen
deserted
vnto the
king.

Englishmen
deserted
vnto the
king.

The persuasion of peace
by Dzusken.

Agnes, Angus, and Fife is required of the Picts to release.

Kenneth his answere.

The order of
the battell.

King Dzusken embolden-eth his people the Picts.

The women were a cumbrance to the Picts.

Kenneth for that he would not seeme to refuse a nie indifferent offers, was contented to come to a communication, and so thereupon both the kings in presence of both their armies arranged in the field readie to fight, came together in a place appointed, either of them being accompanied with a like number of their nobles, as by the heralds it was accorded. Here Dzusken with manie reasons going about to persuade peace, shewed how necessarie the same was betwixt the two nations: and againe, how doubtfull fortune was to them that trusted too much in hir vnstedfast fauour: at length he grew to this end, that if Kenneth could be contented to grant a peace, the Picts should release all such right, title and interest as they had in the countreies of Agnes, Angus, and Fife, vnto him and his successors the Scottish kings for ever, so that he should make no further claime vnto anie other of those countreies which the Picts as yet possessed.

Herevnto Kenneth answered, that he well vn-derstood how vnstable fortunes lawes were, but sithens the Picts fought in an vnjust quarrell, as to defraud the posteritie of their lawfull king Hungus, who latelie reigned amongst them, of the rightfull inheritance of their kingdome, they themselves had iust cause to doubt fortunes chance, where the Scots hauing put vpon lawfull armour, and seeking to atteine that by warre which by other means they could not atteine at the hands of the vnjust possessors, they had lesse cause to mistrust hir fauour, & therefore if the Picts were desirous of peace, they ought to cause a surrender to be made of their kingdome into his hands, accordinglie as they well knew it was reason they should. And what commoditie might thereof insue to both nations, being by such means once ioined and vniued into one intire kingdome, he doubted not but they vnderstood it sufficientlie inough.
And as for other conditions of peace than this, he told them plainelie there would be none accepted.
Thus did the kings depart in sunder, without anie agreement concluded: and being returned to their armies, they make readie to trie the matter by dint of sword.

Kenneth exhorted his people that day to shew themselves men, sith the same should iudge whether the Scots should rule and gouerne the Picts, or the Picts the Scots. With these and manie other effec-tuall words when he had encouraged his folks to the battell, he diuided them into three wards, as two wings and a maine battell. In euerie of them he set first archers and arcuballisters; and next vnto them pikes and speares, then bilmen and other with such short weapons: last of all, an other multitude with all kind of weapons, as was thought most expedient. The fore ward was committed to the leading of one Bar, a man right skilfull in all warlike knowledge, the second one Dongall gouerned, and the third was led by Donald the kings brother. The king himselfe with a troope of horsemen folloved them to succour in all places where he saw need.

Then commanded he his trumpets to sound to the battell, which the Scots began with such a cherefull shout, that the Picts euen vpon the first onset were so amazed, that if Dzusken had not with comfortable words relieved their fainting stomachs, the most part of them had fled without anie stroke stricken. But being encouraged through the presence of their king, shewing himselfe with cherefull countenance amongst them, and therewith exhorting them to stand by him at that present, there was fought a right sore and cruell battell betwene them. The women that were amongst the Picts, of whom there was no small number, speciallie in the right wing, made such a woollull noise, when they beheld the men one kill an other, that they were a more cumbance to the Picts, than aid, when it came to the point of seruice: by reason whereof that wing was shortly beaten downe, and put to flight. Which when Kenneth beheld, he set in with his horsemen on the backs of the Picts, now left bare by the running thus away of those in the foresaid wing: and so entring in amongst them, disordered their arraie in such wise, that by no means they were able to aid themselves, or come into anie order againe: so that in the end they were faine to throw downe their weapons, and take them to their fate, thereby to escape the danger. Such heaps of slaine men, armour, & weapons laie here & there strewed in the place of the battell, that the Scots were forced in following the chase to breake their arraie, so to passe the more speedilie: by means whereof, falling amongst whole bands of the Picts, manie of them were slaine.

This mischiefe Kenneth perceiuing, commanded to sound the retreat, and so gathering his people about their standards, he appointed certene companies in warlike order to pursue in chase of the enemies, whilst he himselfe with the residue abode still in the place (where the field was fought) all that day and the next night following. The Sco-tish captains that were sent to follow the chase, earnestlie executing their kings commandement, made great slaughter of Picts in all places where they might ouertake them. Dzusken the Pictish king himselfe being pursued to the river of Tair, for that he could not passe the same, was there slaine with the whole retinue which he had about him. It is said, that the Scottishmen incountred with the Picts that day at seven sundrie times, and in seven sundrie places, and still the victorie abode with the Scots. The day after the battell, such as had folloved the chase returned to the campe; where they presented vnto Kenneth their king, the armour and other spolie of Dzusken the Pictish k. which they brought with them, besides great abundance of other pillage and riches, which they had gotten of the enemies that were slaine. Dzusken's armour and other things belonging to his owne bodie, was offered by to saint Colme, in the church dedicated to his name within the Ile of Colmekill, there to remaine as a monument of this victorie to such as should come after.

After this the whole preie and spolie was gathered and diuided amongst the souldiers. Kenneth was counselled to haue discharged his armie, and to haue departed home; but he purposing now to make an end of the whole warres, sith he was in such a for-warrenesse, called together the multitude, and in this wise began to viter vnto them his mind and purpose. ¶ It is the dutie of a god capteine, when he hath the victorie in his hands, & as yet the warres not ended, if he mind the preferuation of himselfe and his countrie, and to vse the victorie as he ought, not to cease from pursuing the enemies once vanquished, till he haue either made them his friends, or else vtterlie destroyed & rid them out of the way; for if anie man shall thinke it best to suffer the enimie to remaine in quiet, after he be once weakened and brought to a low ebbe, till time peradventure he shall haue recovered his forces againe, he shall procure to himselfe (as I gesse) more danger than happilie he is well ware of. And that we may speake somewhat of this danger now present, the state of the Pictish kingdome (as ye know) is sore infabled, their power being diminished by force of warre, is brought to that point, that it resteth in our hands vtterlie to destroye and exterminat the whole nation.
Which act ought to be abhorred, if it were possible for vs by anie means to draw them (our hono^r saue) vnto

Kenneth sawe
the hostilite disordered the Pict's arraie.

The right wing of the Picts was to flight.

Kenneth commanded the retreat to be sounded.

The king of
the Picts
slaine.

Island per-vnto bis-
men.

From names
arguen vn-uerie
region, Angus,
Agnes.

Southian.

Reuord given vnto Bar which was the fortress of Dunbar.

The familie
of Dunbar.

unto our friendship. But the Picts are of such a stubbozne nature, and so desirous of reuenge, that so long as there remaineth anie one of them aliuie, they will beare in their hearts a desire to reuenge all such losses as they haue in anie wise sustained by this warre. Wherevpon I doe verelie believe, that there is none of the Pictish nation from henceforth, will beare anie faithfull friendship towards the Scots. Therefore sith we can not make the Picts, thus latelic scourged by vs, our friends, I thinke it best (except we will neglect our owne safeties) to sterlie to destitute the whole nation, by putting to the sword not onelie both men and women, but also all their youth and young children: least they being descended of that linage, hereafter in time to come, arme themselves to the reuenge of their parents deaths, and that not without perill of the bitter losse of our countrie and kingdome.

This sentence of the king, though it seemed too cruell to many, yet whether for that they saw the same to stand with the kings pleasure, or that they thought it most expedient for the suertie of the Scottish common-wealth, it was allowed and ratified by them all. Such crueltie herevpon was forthwith shewed throughout all the Pictish regions, that there was not one liuing creature of humane shape left aliuie, saving such as saued themselves within the walles of Camelon, or in certeine other holds and fortresses, and also about two thousand of those that fled into England: for all the residue were most unmercifullie murdered and slaine, without respect either of age, sex, profession, or estate. Thus Kenneth hauing dispatched the inhabitants, seized the countrie into his owne hands, making partition of the same as he saw cause, and diuiding it amongst his nobles, according to the merits of euerie of them duly weighed and considered, he added new names vnto euerie quarter and region (either after the name of the gouernor, or else of some promontorie, riuer, or other notable water or place, according as was the ancient custome of the nation) that the memorie of the Pictish names might end together with the inhabitants.

The countrie ancientlie called Horestia, was giuen vnto two brethren, Angusian, and Spennan, by reason whereof the one part of the same countrie was called Angus, and the other the Spennan. The linage of those two noble men remaine vnto this day. The region which till then was named Otholinia, was turned after wards to the name of Fife, after the name of one Fife Duffe: whose valiancie was throughlie tried in these last warres with the Picts. There remaine vnto this day tokens and old ruines of a castell situate betwixt the riuer of Lenix and saint Kenneths church, which (as yet appeareth) was fenced about with seven rampres, and as manie ditches, wherein the posteritie of this worthie man after his decesse had their habitation by the space of manie hundred yeeres. Louthian retained still the former name, so honorable was the remembrance of that famous prince king Loth amongst all men. The strongest castell of the whole countrie, Kenneth bestowed vpon that valiant capteine named War, whose counsell and forward seruice stood the Scots in no small stead in those warres, in which the Picts were thus subdued. That fortresse euer since (after his name) hath bene called Dunbar, that is to say, the castell of War.

There descended of him a noble house or familie, bearing the name of this castell, continuing in great fame and honor, euen vnto our time, of the which the earles of March had their beginning, and continued long in that dignitie from one to another, with sundry branches of right famous memorie. The names of diuerse dales were also changed, but yet some kept their old names still. Ddolucia hostile after began to take the name of Annandale, of the riuer of Annan that runneth through the same. And so likewile Tweedale took name of the water of Tweed. And Cludsdale of the riuer of Clude. In like maner manie other countries, townes, and castells had their names changed at the same time, after they came into the possession of the Scottishmen, vpon sundrie considerations, for a witnesse of their victorious acts achieved against the Picts. Furthermore, into the citie of Camelon were withdrawne the most part of all the noble mens wiues of the Picts, with their children, vpon trust to be in safetie in the same, as well by reason of strength of the place, as also of the strong garrison which was appointed to defend it.

Kenneth therefore hauing taken his pleasure abroad in the countrie, came thither with a mightie armie to besiege the citie. And first sending vnto them within, to know if they would yield, he was answered, how sith it plainelie appeared, that the Scots could be satisfied with nothing but with the slaughter of all such as fell into their hands, as well of women and children, with impotent aged, as of others, they were minded neuer to surrender their hold with life. Wherevpon the siege continued by the space of manie daies. Whilest the Scots in the meane time got together a great number of sagots, and other such brush and stufie to fill the ditches withall, which were berie deepe and broad, at length when they within began to want vittels, they required a truce for three daies, in the which meane time they might take aduise for the surrender of the citie. Kenneth mistrusting no deceit, granted their request, and therevpon commanded his people to cease from all manner of annoiance of the enimies, for that terme.

But in the meane time the Picts prepared themselves of all things necessarie to make an issue vpon the Scots. There was also an old gate forlet and stopped by with earth and stones vpon the one side of the citie, so that of a long time before there had bene no way forth by the same. Wherefore in the darke of the night the Picts ridding away the earth and ramell therewith it was closed vp, about the third watch they passe forth at that gate in good order of battell, setting first vpon such Scots as kept the standing watch, who were in doubt of nothing lesse than of anie issue to be made on that side, by means whereof they were easilie oppressed, and likewise the other that kept the inner watch, insomuch that the slaughter went on almost euen to the kings tent with great noise and clamor, as is commonlie seene in such sudden tumults, expectallie chancing in the night season.

When the day began once to appeare, the Picts withdrawing towards the citie by the same waie they came, were pursued by the Scots, and no small number of them slaine at the entring. The citie also had bene taken at the same time, but that the Picts out of the turrets and loupes of the walles, discharged a wonderfull number of quarels, darts, arrowes, stones, and other things vpon the Scots, as they approached nere to the gate, where their fellows (that made the issue) hastened to enter againe into the towne. There were slaine of the Scots at this bickering aboue six hundred, wherevnto Kenneth was so kindled with wrath, that detesting the fallowd of the Picts, he solued by open oth that he would not depart from the siege, till he had put the citie and them within to fire and sword, without sparing of anie, either one or other.

Sundrie times he attempted to haue woone the citie by force of assault, but the Picts still defended their

The changing of the names of the dales. Annandale. Tweedale. Cludsdale.

The gentlewomen are preserved in Camelon.

Kenneth sendeth vnto Camelon, commanding them to yield.

They of Camelon require truce for three daies.

The Picts issue vpon the Scots with great fortune.

An extreme blow made by king Kenneth

The constancie of the Picts when they were besieged.

their walles so stoutlie, that he could not atchieve his purpose. Whereupon the siege continued for the space of foure moneths together. So that such scarcitie of all kinds of vittells still arose amongst them, that the wretched citizens abstained from nothing that might in anie wise be eaten, though it were neuer so much to be abhorred. And yet although they were brought into such miserable state, that there was no hope longer to defend themselves, if anie man notwithstanding all such extremitie, were heard make mention of surrendering, he was forthwith slaine by his fellowes, as an enimie to his nation and a friend unto the Scots. It was thought that Kenneths oth made them so obstinate in their wilfull contumacie, because they saw nothing but death, which way soeuer they inclined.

A pretie craft used by Kenneth.

The Scots
enter the citie.

The Picts
are miserable slaine, without regard of person.

Ladies and gentlewomen desire the king to be pardon-ed of their lives.

All the Pictish nation
destroyed.
The citie of Camelon is throwne
downe.

The castell of Maldens is left of the Picts.

At length when the citie was thus reduced into all extreme miserie, and the ditches filled with faggots and other such stufte, Kenneth one night appointed six hundred of his choicest souldiers to lie in ambush within a wood, joining nere to one side of the citie, so that in the morning when he should give the assault on the contrarie side, they might suddenlie come forth and scale the walles on that other. These souldiers, according to that which they had in commandement, shortly after the breake of day, hearing that Kenneth had begun the assault on his part, quicklie came forth of the wood, and having their ladders readie, came to the walles, reared them vp, and swiftlie getting into the citie, opened one of the gates where one part of the armie entered; the citizens standing in no doubt at all of anie attempt on that side: so as being gotten together to defend the walles on that part where Kenneth gaue the approach, and now hearing how the enimies were got into the citie, and comming on their backs, they were wonderfullie amazed, but yet so long as they were able to make anie resistance, they did that lay in their uttermost power to beat backe the Scots, and to drive them out of the citie againe.

The slaughter therfore was great which the Scots made of the Picts in euerie passage & corner of the streets, insomuch that the Scottish lords and other captains, in reuenge of the late receiued losse of their men, through the false practised policie of the Picts, commanded in a great furie to set fire on the houses, and to kill and slea all such of the Pictish nation as came in their way. Thus the murder proceeded upon all estates, as well religious as other, and like wise vpon women and children, without anie difference. A number of ladies and gentlewomen, getting them into the presence of king Kenneth, besought him in most lamentable wise, to haue pitie vpon their wooll estate, and to saue their liues from the hands of his most cruell souldiers. But such was the rage kindled in the Scottishmens hearts, that there was no more fauor shewed toward them than toward the other, and so immediatlie were they also slaine without all compassion. So farre forth was the murder executed on all hands, that there was not one left aliue of the Pictish nation, neither man, woman, nor child to bewaile that miserable destruction of their countrie and kinsfolkes. When were the walles throwne downe & made euen with the plaine ground. The houses and buildings as well priuate as publike, with churches and chappels, were set on fire, and that which might not be consumed with the rage of fire was ruinated and destroyed with hand, so that there remained of all that famous citie, nothing but the ashes, with heapes of the broken and burned stones, and likewise of the pauement and foundation of some part of the walles.

At the same time the castell of Maldens, now called commonlie Edenborough castell, was still kept with a mightie garrison of Picts, but they hearing of the miserable destruction of Camelon, and doubting to fall into the like mischance, left the castell void, and fled to Forthumberland. Thus ended the kingdome of the Picts in Albion, in the yere after they first began to reigne therein 1173, and in the yere after the birth of our Sauioz 839, from the first comming of Fergus 1166, and after the creation of the world 4806, if the Scottish chronicles be true. ¶ But where as the truth concerning the time of the first comming into this Ile, as well of the Scots as Picts, resteth doubtfull, and that as well by authoritie of approved writers, as by reasonable coniectures, we haue in the historie of England more largelie written thereof; we referre those that be desirous to see further of that matter, vnto the same, following here in this historie of Scotland the report most an end, as we find it in Hector Boetius, and other the Scottish writers, not taking vpon vs so frankelie to set downe our owne opinion in this Scottish, as in the English historie, though want of such helps in the one, as we haue got in the other.

There were scene the same yere two comets or blazing starres of dreadfull aspect to the beholders, the one went before the sunne rising in harvest season, and the other followed the going downe thereof in the spring of the yere. There was oftentimes also scene in the aire a vision of fire armies, running together with burning stauces, and the one being vanquished, they suddenlie both of them vanished away. Also at Camelon, as the bishop was at sermice holding his crozier staffe in his hand, it was kindled so with fire, that by no meane it could be quenched, till it was burnt euen to ashes. About none daie, the aire being faire and cleare, as well in the countries of the Scots as of the Picts, there was heard such a noise and clattering of weapons and armor, with braieng of horses, as though two armies should haue bene together in fight, whereby manie of either nation which heard it, were put in great feare. These vnconouth wonders were interpreted by diuiners diuerlie: some of them affirming the same to betoken toy and happy prosperitie, and other alledging, how they signified rather mishap and bitter calamitie.

But to returne to our purpose. King Kenneth having thus destroyed the Pictish kingdome, together almost with the whole nation, caused the marble stone (which Simon Breke sometime brought out of Spaine into Ireland, and the first Fergus out of Ireland into Albion, as before is recited) to be brought now forth of Argile (where till that time it had bene diligentlie kept) into Courie, which region before appertained to the Picts, there to remaine from thenceforth as a sacred token for the establishment of the Scottish kingdome in that countrie: he placed it at Scone vpon a raised plot of ground there, because that the last battell which he had with the Picts was fought neare vnto the same place, the victorie (as before is specified) chancing to the Scots. ¶ Upon this stone (as before is rehearsed) the Scottish kings were used to sit, when they receiued the inuesture of the kingdome. ¶ Some writers haue recorded that by commandement of Kenneth, at the same time when this stone was thus by him removed, those Latine verses were grauen vpon it, whereof mention is made before, where we spake of the foresaid Fergus the first his comming ouer forth of Ireland into Albion there to reigne.

Now in the meane time, when those felo of the Picts, which by sight had escaped the Scottishmens hands, and were gotten into England, could by no meanes persuade the Englishmen, being troubled with intestine warre, to aid them in recouerie of their countrie, some of them passed the seas ouer fir-

8
1421. 11. 11
60: 8. 11. 11

Prodigia
colena lane
in the air.

The interpretation of the tokens.

The marble
stone is remoued from Argile into Courie, in the place called Scone.

The rest of
the Picts
were dispersed.

The Scots
are in quiet.

Kenneth married his spouses.

Lamers ne-
cessarie.

The tables of the law to be kept.

Prisoners to be hanged.

Execution
for theft and murder.

A woman condemned to be burned quick.

Blasphemers
have their tongues cut out.

The punishment for a heretic.

A man accused to be condemned by an obsequie
of men.

Robbers to be put to the sword.

Magabondes
were whipped and burnt in the chaire.

The wife that was fatter for the husband was hanged.

The conclusion and his were to haue a like punishment.

to Norway, and some into Denmarke, and diuerse other of them remained still in England, where they got their living either by some manuell occupation, either else by seruice in the warres. The Scots from thenceforth liued in quiet, during the life time of R.
Benneth, who deserued eternall fame, by the inlar-ging of the bounds of his kingdome, so mightilie and in such wise, that where he found the frontiers, he made the same well nere the middest of his kingdome. Other things he did also teaching the politike gouernement of his subiects in time of peace, no lesse worthie of praise than his noble and famous conquests: but speciallie he ordeined certeine lawes for the wealth of his people, whereby his iudges and other officers should proceed in the administration of iustice, of the which I haue thought requisite to rehearse part as yet being used, that aswell the author, as the time of their first establishment, make the better appeare, vnto such as shall peruse this historie.

The Chapters of those lawes which yet remaine to be obserued, are these.

Et euerie shire haue certein men skilled in the lawes appointed to be resident in the same, according as in the beginning it was instituted. Let their sonnes also in their youth be brought vp in knowledge of the same lawes.

Let them onelie keepe in their custodies the tables of the lawes, with the register bookes of the kings & paires of the realme.

If any of them be conuicted of extort bribing, or other the like vniust dealing, let him die vpon the gallowes, and his bodie remaine vnburied.

Such as are codemned for theft, let them be hanged, and those that are proued guiltie of murder, let them lose their heads.

A woman which is condemned to die, either let hir be drowned in some riuer, either else let hir be buried quicke.

He that blasphemeth the name of God, of the saints, of his prince, or of the captaine of his tribe, let him haue his tong cut out.

He that is conuicted of a lie to his neighbours hinderance, let him haue his sword taken from him, and be banished out of all mens companie.

Such as be accused of any crimes that deserue death, let them passe by the sentence of 7 honest men, either else of 9, 11, 13, 15, or more, so that the number be odd.

Robbers by the high waies, destroyers of corne growing in the fields, as is bled by enimies in time of warre, let them die by the sword.

Fugitiues, vagabonds, and such other idle persons, let them be whipt and burnt in the chake.

Let not the wife suffer for the husbands offense, but the husband shal answer for the wifes misdoings, if he be priuie thereunto.

Any mans lemman or concubine shall suffer the same paines that he dooth which offendeth with hir.

He that rauisheth a maid shall die for it, vnlesse she require for safegard of his life, to haue him to hir husband.

If any man be taken with an other mans wife in adulterie, the consenting vnto him therein, they shall both suffer death for it.
But if the consent not, but be forced against hir will, then he shall die onelie for the same, and she shall be released.

If the child hurt the father either with tong, hand, or foot, let him first be deprived of that member, and then hanged, his bodie to remaine without buriall.

A murderet, a dumbe person, or he that is vnthankfull to his parents, shall not inherit his fathers patrimonie.

Juglers, wizzards, necromancers, and such as call by spirits, and vse to seeke vpon them for helpe, let them be burnt to death.

Let no man sow in the earth any graine before it be purged of all the weeds.

He that through negligent slouth, suffereth his arable ground to bee choked by and ouergrowne with weeds; for the first fault let him forsaite an ore, for the second ten oxen, and for the thirde let him forgo the same ground.

Thy companion in the warres, or thy friend being slaine, see him buried, but let the enimie lie vnburied.

Anie straie cattell that commeth into thy grounds, either restore them to the owner, either els deliuer them to the searcher out of thæues, commonlie called Tonoderach, or to the parson or vicar of the towne:
for if thou reteine them in thy hands by the space of thre daies, thou shalt be accounted guiltie of theft.

He that findeth anie thing that belongeth to an other man, let him cause it to be cried in the market, or els he shall be iudged for a fellow.

He that striketh him, with whom he goeth to the law, about anie matter in con-trouersie, shall be iudged guiltie of the action, and the other set free.

If oxen or kine chance by running togither to kill one another, the truth being not known which it was that did the hurt, that which is found without hornes shall be iudged the occasion of the skath, and he that is owner of the same, shall haue the dead beast, and satisfie him for the losse to whome it belonged.

If a sow eate hir pigs, let hir be stoned to death, and buried, so that no man eate of hir flesh.

A swine that is found eating of corne that groweth in the field, or worring vpon the tilled grounds, let it be full for anie man to kill the same without danger.

Other kinds of beasts, where in other men haue anie propertie, if they breake into thy pastures, or eate by thy corne, impound them, till time the owner haue satisfied thee for the quantitie of the damage.

These were ciuill ordinances belonging to the good gouernement of the people, or ther there were, which appertene to religion.

Rauish-ers of maids shall die.

Adulterers
shall die.

A child hurting his father
shall die.

who are not to inherit.

Juglers and
wizzards, &c.

Sowing of graine.

Guill husbandrie.

Buriall of friends.

Wailes and
straics.

Things
found.

Ownerles
in late of lawe.

Oxen or kine hurting ech other.

A sow.

Swine.

Beasts damage faitant.

Articles ten-ching religion

gion: as these.

Thou shalt deuoutlie reuerence the altars, temples, images, oratozies, chapels, priestes, and all men of religion.

Keeping of ho-
lie daies.

Thou shalt obserue with due reuerence festiuall and solemne holie daies, fasting daies, vigils, and all maner of ceremonies instituted by the godlie ordinance of man, in the honoz of our S. Christ & his saints.

Priests.

To hurt a priest, let it be accounted an offense woorthie of death.

Ground to be left vntilled.

That ground wherin anie that is slaine lieth buried, leaue it vntilled for seven yeres space.

Graues.

Repute euerie graue holie, and adorne it with the signe of the crosse, so as thou shalt be well aduised that in no wise with thy feet thou tread vpon it.

Buriall.

Burie the dead according to the quantitie of his substance.

Buriall of noble men.

The bodie of a noble man & of him that hath well deserued of the common-wealth, shall be buried in solemne and pompous wise, but yet in mourning sort & dolorous manner.

Let there be two knights or esquires to attend his bodie to the graue. The one being mounted vpon a white horse shall beare the coate-armoz of the dead, and the other in mourning apparell with his face couered shall ride vpon a blacke horse; who after the corps is brought to church, turning his horse from the altar, shall crie out how his maister is dead: and there with the people making an outcry against him, he shall streitwaies depart and get him with all speed to the place fro whence he came; the other going streight to the altar, shall there offer by vnto the priest his coate-armoz with his horse, as a token to signifie thereby that his maister doth inioy euerlasting life, in the land of permanent light and ioies eternall.

¶ But this custome of buriall, as that which was supposed not appertaining to the order of the christian religion, the age that followed did vtterlie abolish, appointing to the priests in steed of the horse and armor, five pounds sterling in monie for the offering. With these and diuers other ordinances, which time and other statuts by other kings deuised haue abrogated, Kenneth gouerned his people in great felicitie during his life time.

S. Kenle his church, now called Saint Andrewes.

The bishops see, which before had bene at Abirne, this, he translated vnto the church of that holie man S. Kenle. Euer since which time the towne hath been called S. Andrewes, and those which gouerned the same church a long time after, were called the great bishops of Scotland; for the realme was not diuided into dioceses till the daies of Malcolme the 3, who by diuine inspiration (as is said) ordeined the see of Perthlake, now called Abirten: but such as were reputed of vertuous behauiour and knowledge meet for the office, vsed the authoritie & rowne of bishops, in what place soeuer they were resident. Met such was the continuance of those which gouerned the church of S. Andrewes, that there haue bene about the number of fortie bishops resident there, since the first institution of that see; manie of them for the opinion conceiued of their holinesse, being numbred according to the manner in times past in the register of saints. But now to returne vnto Kenneth, who hauing (as is said) enlarged the bounds of his kingdome, so as the same stretched forth vnto the confines of Northumberland on the one side, and to the Isles of Orknie on the other, the sea compassing the residue, at the length after he had reigned about twentie yeres in great renowne and glorie, he departed out of this life, through too much abundance of rheumatike matter, at Forthuiot, in the yere of our Lord 856. His bodie was conueied into the Ile of Colmekill, and there honozable buried amongst his ancestors.

After his deceasse succeeded in gouernment of the realme his brother Donald, farre differing in qualities from his noble brother the foresaid Kenneth; but yet before he came to the rule of the realme, he disclosed not his vicious nature, for doubt of offending the king his brother. Neuerthelesse he had continued scarce two yeres in the estate, but that he had subuerted all good orders in his realme, by his naughtie examples of dissolute liuing: for his mind was set on nothing but on wanton pleasure; as in the vnlawfull vse of concubines, riotous banquetting, keeping of hawkes, hounds, & horses for pleasure, and not for the vse of warres, whereof he had no regard at all: for such charges as he should haue bene at for maintenance of men of warre to keepe the frontiers of his realme, were imployed on a sort of rascals, that serued him in the furtherance of his wanton delights and voluptuous desires, as huntsmen, falconers, cookes, balwdes, ruffians, and such like lozzels.

Wherevpon diuers of the nobles remembzng what appertained to their duties, spared not but freely admonished the king what danger would insue of his misordered behauiour, if he reformed not his manners, nor restrained the licentious doings of his seruants and familie. But when they perceiued that their words were not regarded, but for the same they themselves ran into displeasure; they sorrowed not a little, to see so small hope of amendment of such enormities, as euerie where reigned through the regon: for all youthfull persons giuen to sensuall lust followed the same without anie feare or care of correction, so that there was no measure of offending and haunting of euill rule in all parties, insomuch that hostlie, through want of all good gouernance, wrong was placed in steed of right, and contempt of Gods honoz embraced euerie where in place of vertue and godlinesse.

In this meane while, the residue of the Picts remaining amongst the Englishmen, ceased not to solicit the gouernors of the countrie to aid them towards the reconuerie of their dominion out of the Scottishmens hands, promising to be subiects vnto the English nation, if by their helpe they might be restored to their ancient seates. At length Othert and Ella kings of Northumberland were perswaded through instant sute to take that enterprise in hand, the rather vpon trust of good successe, for that they vnderstood what lacke of politike gouernement then remained amongst the Scots, by reason of the kings naughtie demeanour; and most inordinat trade of life. But first there was a league concluded with new articles of agreement betwixt the Englishmen and Britains, as yet inhabiting alongst the coasts of Cumberland, by meanes of which league both Britains and Englishmen ioined their powers together, and in most speedie and forcible wise passed the water of Tweed, first pitching their campe in the countrie of Mers. From whence immediatlie king Othert (being appointed as generall in that ioyntie) sent

The bound
of the Scottish
kingdome.

King Kenneth
departed
out of this life
856. H. B.

Donald.
Donald the fourth that name succeded his brother Kenneth.
The king is
of dissolute
liuing.

The king is admonished
of his nobles.

The Scots
campe (under the name of the Englishmen).

Othert and Ella kings of Northumberland.

The English
men and Brit-
tains (together
their powers
together).

The English
men and Brit-
tains (together
their powers
together).

The English
men and Brit-
tains (together
their powers
together).

sent an herald vnto Donald the Scottish King, bidding him either to surrender vnto the Picts, or to forsake all such regions as the Scots had taken from them; either else to looke to haue the Englishmen and Britains no lesse their enemies than the Picts, whose cause they had taken vpon them to mainteine and defend.

Donald being at the first sore troubled with these newes, yet at length (by the aduise of his nobles) he took a good hart vnto him, and in defense of his realme caused musters to be taken throughout all his dominions, and forthwith came into the field to encounter his enemies, whome he found at Jedburgh ready to giue battell: where after some fight, in the end Osbert with his people was chased to the next mountains. Donald hauing thus obtained the victorie in this conflict, supposed all had bene his owne, and thereupon remoued ouer Tweed with all possible hast, marching forth till he came to the mouth of that riuer, where there late at anchor certaine English vessels, laden with provision of vittels and all other things necessarie for the furniture of an armie. Donald setting vpon these ships, with small resistance took them, spoiled them of all such things as were found aboard, and after set fire on them. The spoile was diuided amongst the souldiers and men of warre, which serued them to small vse or commoditie: for all the youth of the armie, through example of their prince, was so corrupted in vicious customes, that the campe was replenished with houses, bawds, stews, and dicing tables, in such wise, that all such provision as should haue serued for foode and staple of vittels, was spent in riotous banquetting without anie order or measure: so oftentimes (as it chanceth where politike gouernement lacketh) there happened amongst them in the armie, discorde and variance with sundrie murders and slaughters.

When the enemies were aduertised how far out of order all things stood in the Scottish campe for want of good and discret chieftains, Osbert with all speed got a mightie host together againe, and before his approach was looked for of the Scots, he commeth vpon them one morning in the breake of the day, and assaileth them in their lodgings, wherein he found them so vnprovided of all helps to make resistance, that it was a wonder to see the disorder that appeared amongst them: some of them running vpon their enemies naked without all discretion, other breaking forth of the campe to save themselves by flight, not sparing hill nor dale where they saw anie way to escape the enemies hands, though it were with present danger of breaking their necks downe the sliding banks and craggie rocks, being forced thereto by the fierce pursute of the Englishmen and Britains, who most eagerlie pleased vpon them in all places, to reuenge the late receiued ouerthrow and slaughter of their friends and kinsfolks. There died of the Scots in this mortall bickering about twentie thousand persons. King Donald being fast asleepe at the first assault of the enemies, as he that had drunke ouer night more than enough, was taken before he could make anie shift for himselfe, with the residue of the nobilitie, that escaped with life.

The Scottish campe, the next day after this ouerthrow, was rifled, the spoile being diuided amongst the Englishmen and Britains. But when the fame of this infortunat battell was noised once through the realme of Scotland, how the king was taken prisoner, his campe woone, the armie discomfited, and almost all the souldiers and men of warre slaine, those few of the nobles which were left aliue remaining prisoners in the enemies hands, there was such dole and lamentation made ouer all, as though the realme had already bene lost without recoderie. Some there were that blamed fortune, some cursed the wicked trade of life in the king, other bewailing the great calamitie of this mischance put the fault in diuers other things, as in such cases commonlie it falleth out: for in sundrie heads are euer sundrie opinions. Panie ran vp and downe the streets and high waies, to inquire the certaintie of all things, and whether there were anie hope at all left to resist the enemies, also which way the enemies held, whereabout they went, and what they purposed to doe.

Anon after, when it was certeinly knownen that the Englishmen were entred by Louthian, and the Britains by Galloway, there was such feare mixed with sorrow (for losse of their friends and kinsfolks) stricken into the peoples hearts, and namelie into the womens, that a greater hath not bene heard of in anie region. So that all provision to defend their countrie was quite neglected, so amazed were the Scots with the sudden change of fortunes saue. The Englishmen here vpon took all the countrie euen to the water of Forth, and likewise the Britains seized into their hands all that which lieth from the bounds of Cumberland vnto Sterling bridge, finding no resistance in their way at all. Wherevnto as well the Englishmen as Britains vsed the victorie verie cruellie, sparing neither one nor other of the Scottish blood, that by anie means fell into their hands, but priests and all passed one way, that is, by the edge of the sword.

King Osbert purposed to haue passed the water of Forth, that waie to haue entered into Fife, & so ouer Taie into Angus: but hearing that the Scots had gathered a power to impeach his passage, he staied certaine daies. At length understanding that the enemies were nothing of that puissance or number, as at the first they were reported to be; he determined to set ouer in certaine boats ten thousand of his men; but through a sudden tempest of wind and weather, that rose in that instant, there were fise thousand of them drowned, the residue being constrained to land againe on the same side from the which they lased, hauing lost through violence of the weather all their tackle and whole furniture of their vessels. Osbert being also admonished with this misfortune, thought good to attempt no more the furious rage of the water, but determined by land to go vnto Sterling, where he understood he should find the Britains, with whome he might soine his power, and passe ouer the bridge there, and so invade other of the Scottish regions which lay thereabout.

But at his comming thither, certaine Scottish ambassadors came vnto him to sue for peace, which they humbly required at his hands in name of the whole realme, beseeching him to consider well the state of the case as it stood, and not to trust too much on brittle fortune, the which he weth hit selfe neuer stable; but commonlie vseth to call backe againe his grant of prosperous successe, where the receiuer hath not skill to vse it moderatlie, and the vanquished seemeth to haue bene sufficientlie corrected. As for the Scots, though it might appeare that their force was greatlie abated, & that resistance should little auail them: yet were they minded to die in defense of their liberties, rather than to submit themselves vnto anie conditions of vile seruitude. The words of these ambassadors being throughly weighed (though some took them in great disdain) yet in the end it was supposed that after victorie thus had against the enemies, honorable conditions of peace ought to be preferred before doubtfull warre.

Wherevpon answere was made to the ambassadors, that both the English and British people with The Englishmen invade Louthian, the Britains Galloway.

The Scots left comfortlesse.

The Britains as yet kept possession of Cumberland, and those other countries lying by the coast of those west seas. The victorie vsed cruellie.

A great manie Englishmen drowned.

Ambassadors sue for peace.

Fortune is brittle.

The Englishmen and Britains sought their powers with the Picts.

The Englishmen and Britains sought their powers with the Picts.

The Englishmen and Britains sought their powers with the Picts.

Peace granted with conditions.

Articles of peace proposed.

The Forth called the Scottish sea.

Dunbretton. It was called before Caer Breith, that is, the citie upon Clud, as H. Lhoid holdeth.

Hofages are required.

The Scots mislike the articles of peace.

Calene his grave counsell taketh place.

The multitude contented unto Calene his sayings.

The Scots receive the peace.

their kings were contented to haue peace with the Scots (though it laie in their hands now to destroy the whole nation) if so be the Scots would agree to resigne aswell to the Englishmen as Britains all such lands and countreies as they had now gotten into their possessions, without anie claime or title to be made to the same from thenceforth, either by them or anie of their posteritie, so that the water of Forth on the east halfe, should diuide the Scottish dominions from the confines of the Englishmen & Britains, and be called from that time ever after, the Scottish sea. On the west the water of Clide should diuide the Scottish lands from the Britains; the castell of Alcluith, standing at the mouth of the same river, to remaine in the hands of the Britains, from thenceforth to beare the name of Dunbretton, that is to say, the castell of the Britains. And furthermore, that if anie of the Scots should attempt to passe the said bounds into anie of the British or English borders, he should die for that offense. And if by force of tempest it chanced anie of them to be driven to land on the south shore, within anie of those parties, they should take nothing away with them but water or vittels, and depart within thre daies, except some reasonable cause of staie constrained them to the contrarie. Moreover, they should not fortifie anie townes or castles on the frontiers nere to the English or British confines. And further, they should covenant to pay vnto the Englishmen and Britains, within the space of twentie years, the summe of one thousand pounds of siluer. For performance of which articles of agreement, the Scots should deliuer thre score hostages, being the sonnes and heires apparant of the chiefe noble men of all their realme and countrie. And if it so were that they misliked and refused anie of these articles, he commanded that there should no other ambassadour come to him for anie other treatie of accord.

The ambassadours returning home, and declaring how they had sped, manie of the Scots thought the articles nothing reasonable for fre people to accept; other iudged that either they must come to some agreement with the Englishmen and Britains, or els put the land in extreme perill. Thus had the people bene diuided into two contrarie opinions and factions, had not one Calene a noble man, bozne of high parentage, and gouernour of Angus, with sober reasons and strong arguments appealed this contention, perswading them to haue respect to the time. And fith the force of the realme was so infested, abated, and brought vnder lot through aduerse fortune: better it was to yield vnto necessitie in sauing part at that present, in hope after, when occasion serued to recover the residue, than through obstinat willfulnesse to lose the whole. For considering the present danger, it could be reputed no dishonour to receiue conditions of peace at the enemies hands, fith there wanted not the like example of the Romans, who gladly accepted such articles of peace, as that noble prince king Calo appointed them: and yet it is not to be iudged, that there wanted men of great knowledge and wisdom amongst them, and such as regarded their honor, so far forth as reason in anye wise did reach.

The multitude moued with these wordes of Calene, whose graue authoritie (by reason of his age, and countie) was of no small reputation amongst them, hauing lost nine of his owne sonnes in the last battell, they finally determined to follow his opinion, in receiuing the same conditions of agreement which Mbert had prescribed: and thereupon sent againe their ambassadours with the hostages, appointed for the establishing of the peace, in manner as is before rehearsed, which being throughly accomplished in such solemne wise, as in those daies and in the like cases was accustomed, Mbert set Donald with his nobles at libertie, sending them home together with the ambassadours, being earnestly required so to do, both by the English lords, and also by the Britains.

The agreement being thus made, the lands were diuided betwixt the Englishmen and the Britains, in such sort as the Britains had for their part all that which lieth from Sterling vnto the west sea, betwixt the rivers of Forth and Clide, vnto Cumberland; and the Englishmen possessed the other parcels, lieng from Sterling vnto the east sea, betwixt the Scottish sea and Northumberland: so that by this means, Clide water, Forth, and the Scottish sea (where Forth runneth into the maine sea) diuided the Scots from the Englishmen and Britains. And thus was the towne of Sterling a common march vnto those thre people; the same towne with the castell remaining vnto Mbert, as it was covenanted amongst other articles of this peace. Here (as the Scottish writers haue) he ordeined his mint, and his coiners of monie to inhabit, whereupon came by the name of Sterling monie: but therein they are deceiued, for (as in the historie of England shall appere) that name came not in vse till manie yeeres after. Mbert also in this place caused a stone bridge to be made ouer the water of Forth, in stead of the wooden bridge which the Picts had made there, and was now pulled downe, and in the midst of this new stone bridge he set by a crosse, whereon were ingrauen these verses, to be read of the passers by:

Anglos à Scotis separat crux ista remotis, Arma hic sunt Bruti, sunt Scoti hac sub cruce tuti.

I am free march as passengers maiken, To Scots, to Britains, and to Englishmen.

The Picts which had bene with the Englishmen in this iourne, euer hoping to be restored to their lands and former possessions by Mbert, when they saw how he retained the same in his owne hands, appointing his subiects to inhabit therein, they doubted that which afterwards came to passe in deed, least the Englishmen or friends would now become enemies, seeking the destruction of the whole Pictish generation, thereby to assure themselves in the possession of those lands and liuing, whereunto the Picts (as they thought) would euer make some claime and title, whilst anie of them remained aliue.

Upon this mistrust therefore did those Picts, which were amongst the Englishmen, make the best shift they could for themselves, so that manie of them got ships, and sailed into Norwaye and Denmarke, vnto their countreimen there: the other that could not make shift to get away, were slaine anon after by the Englishmen, so that one of them was not to be found aliue within anie of the English dominions. And such was the end of the Picts that fled vnto the Englishmen for succour. In this meane time the Scottish king Donald being restored againe to his countrie, was receiued with more ioy and honor than he had deserved, in hope yet by this scourge of aduerse fortune, that he would haue reformed his former abuses. Nevertheless, he had not bene at home anie long time, but that he fell to his old vicious trade of life againe, removing from his company such honorable personages as wished the suertie of his estate, with the aduancement of the common welth, to the reliefe and ease of his poore miserable subiects. At length the nobles of the realme, perceiving the danger that their countrie stood in, by reason of Donalds insolent misorder, vndiscreet rule and gouernement, they found means to agree with him, and commit him vnto safe keeping. But the monstrous creature, within a few daies after he

King Donald with the nobles are sent home againe.

London ded betwixt the Englishmen and Englishmen.

Reads roving died.

Wishes like in hope to men.

Advers and Englishmen fell downe out of the suite.

A bridge of stone made at Sterling.

Belendeth Scot.

The Picts hope is used.

The Picts went into Norwaye and Denmarke.

King Donald's fallerth to his old vicious game.

King Donald's fallerth to his old vicious game.

King Donald's fallerth to his old vicious game.

The Scottish king himselfe in prison.

Young babe gueth war-nung vnto his mother.

Reads roving died.

Wishes like in hope to men.

Advers and Englishmen fell downe out of the suite.

A bridge of stone made at Sterling.

Belendeth Scot.

The Picts hope is used.

The Picts went into Norwaye and Denmarke.

King Donald's fallerth to his old vicious game.

King Donald's fallerth to his old vicious game.

King Donald's fallerth to his old vicious game.

to as himt 860.

houn forco the old a that enim Sco stur stran shap dead ther of the sanc beaf thro ston

festi

nal

alva

star

kin

dine

frim

han

hau

trie

his othe

wea

saie

and ber

pea

nite

nin

Sp'ndores

are recopled.

uife

as

first

tho

ing

hoz

four

his pe

ber

(to

for

on

dis

eit

the re

ti

sto

er

tr

fe

fa

no

pl

he was thus put in ward in great desperation due himselfe, in the first yeare after he had begun his infortunat reigne, and in the yeare of our Saviour 860.

The same yeare that the realme of Scotland was brought unto such miserable state by the puissant force of the Englishmen and Britains, as above is rehearsed, there were sundrie wonders heard of in the countrie: as in Louthian a child of one moneth old and a halfe, admonished the mother to flie out of that countrie: for it would come to passe, that the enimies should come and take that region out of the Scottishmens hands. Walts also, as they were passing abroad in the fields there, roaring after a strange sort, suddenly died. Fishes likewise, in shape resembling the figure of man, were found dead in the sands of the Scottish sea. In Galloway there fell such abundance of adders and snakes out of the skie, that the aire being corrupted with the savour of them lying on the ground, both men and beasts died of certeine diseases, which they took through infection thereof.

Such as were accounted to be skilfull in divination, affirmed that these things did signifie an infortunat reigne, with an euill end unto king Donald, as afterwarde it happened, who hauing made away himselfe in prison (as before is exprest) Constantine the sonne of king Kenneth was crowned king at Scone, in the chaire of marble there, according to the maner as then vsed. After his first entering into the estate, he would gladlie haue gone in hand with the wars against the Englishmen, to haue recovered out of their possessions, those countreies which they had lately taken from the Scots in his predecessors time: but his counsell aduised him otherwise, declaring that the state of the commonwealth was so decayed by the misgouernance of his said predecessor, that till the same were reformed, and such intestine discorde, as through licentious libertie reigned amongst his subjects might be appeased and quieted, there was no hope to atchiue anie worthie enterpryse abroad against forreigne enimies.

Whereupon by their aduertisements and good aduise, he deuised a reformation of all such misorders as were growen by in all parts of his realme: and first for the spiritualtie, he ordeined that priests should attend their cures, and not to intermeddle with anie secular businesse, but to be free from going forth to the warres: neither should they keepe hawks, hawks, or hounds. And if anie of them were found negligent in doing his dutie appertaining to his vocation, he should for the first fault forfeit a peece of monie, but for the second he should lose his benefice. For the youth of his realme he took order (to biddie them the better from wanton delights and sensual lusts) that none of them should haue past one meale a day, and that of no fine or deintie delicats, and to abstaine from all such drinke as might dissemper their braine, so that if anie yong person, either man or woman were knowen to be drunken, they should die for it.

He commanded further, that all the youth of his realme, should exercise running, wrestling, shooting, throwing of the dart and bowle: so to auoid slothfullnesse, that their bodies might with such exercises be made the more able to indure paines and trauell: and for the same purpose he took order, that they should lie upon the bare bodys, with one mantle onelie throwen under them, so that they should fast nothing neither by day nor night, that might molest them in anie wanton delights or effeminate pleasures. It was also ordeined, that all such as kept bittelling houses for banquetting there, should be banished the realme, with those that kept brothell houses. Thus were the Scots by obseruing of these ordinances, made within short tyme of gluttons and excessive feeders, sober and temperate men: of delicat and easfull persons, hard, tough, and able to abide anie trauell or labor: were the same neuer so painfull: and hereof the state of the commonwealth began to grow to good perfection, so that Constantines administration was liked of the most part of all his subjects.

The first that went about to disquiet the prosperous reigne of that worthie prince, was one Euan, a man of an ancient house, & borne in the westerne Isles. Such haue bene the vnquiet nature of the Scottishmen, euen from the beginning, neuer to lue contented anie long time either with peace or warre: for being once wearied with the charges of the warres, they streightwaies wish for peace; and hauing in tyme of peace heaped togither some wealth, then can they not suffer the gouernement of their superiors, but either are ready to fall out with some forreigne enimie, or else to raise some commotion amongst themselves. This Euan therfore being the kings lieutenant of his castell of Dunstaffage in Louchquhaber, practised a conspiracie against the king, with a number of other light persons being gentlemen borne, mistaking the administration of things, onelie for that they saw hold their inordinat libertie to oppress inferiour persons, and to vse such wild and insolent misdeameour, as they had done afore time, was now restrained by lawfull iustice and execution of due punishment for the same.

But as these conspirators went about to haue moued the people of Louchquhaber, Murray land, Koffe, and Cathness, to haue ioined with them in their traitorous interpryse, some of them in whom Euan put most trust, secretly aduertised the king of all the whole matter, who gathering a competent number of men togither, made such speedie hast towards Dunstaffage, where the chiefe captaine of the rebels as then lay, that he came before the same veranie inking were knowen to them within of his approach. By meane thereof comming vpon them so at vnwares, he had the castell some at his pleasure; and immediatlie hereupon caused Euan to be trusted by on a high paire of gallows, for a spectacle to all his complices. And furthermore, least the other conspirators might prouide them of some other chiefe tyme, he apprehended diuerse of the nobilitie that were accused to be of Euans confederacie, the which he put in streit prison, there to be safely kept, till the peeres of the realme had determined with good deliberation, what should become of them. This busines being in this wise appeased, when all men looked for quietnesse, there suddenly folloved a greater and more pernicious trouble: for such is the course of the world, that when men least thinke of mischief, they fall oftentimes into most danger.

Cadane king of Denmarke, pretending a title to all such lands as sometimes belonged to the Picts, for that the residue of that nation which had escaped the hands of the Scots and Englishmen, had resigned vnto him all their right & interest of the same lands, he determined in that quarrell (and in reuenge of the injuries which the Picts alledged they had suffered) to make warres both vpon Scots and Englishmen. He caused therfore an huge number of ships to be prepared, and a mightie armie of men to be put in a readinesse, to passe in the same ouer into Albion, vnder the leading of his two brethren, the one named Hungar, and the other Iubba. These two chieftains hauing their ships and men with all prouision appertaining once readie, took the sea, and sailed houses by burned.

Scots were made sober and able to abide hardnes

Euan disquieted the king and realme.

The vnquiet nature of Scottishmen.

Euan lieutenant of Dunstaffage conspired against the king.

The king is aduertised of Euan his treason.

The king cometh to Dunstaffage with an armie.

Euan is executed.

Euan kept in prison.

One trouble followeth another.

Cadane king of Denmarke

The cause that made the Danes to make warre against England and Scotland.

A great nauie sent into Scotland.

pp. 111. f. 137

The Danes
ble great crueltie.

The inhabitants fled the countrie.

They that fled into May Iland were
slaine.

The uncerten-tie of writers in this matter of these martyrs.

Constantine
assembled a mightie army.

forth till they came to the coasts of Scotland, where they took land within the countrie of Fife, before any tidings were heard of their coming thither.

The Danes being set on land, spared no kind of crueltie that might be shewed against the inhabitants, and namely for that they had not as yet received the faith of Christ, they raged without all measure against priests, and religious persons, overthrowing and burning up churches and chapels, wheresoever they found any in their way. Whereupon the Englishmen that inhabited in Louthian, and the Scots that dwelled in Fife, left their houses and possessions, fleeing into other parties, where they thought they might best escape the hands of their new come adversaries. A great companie also of such vertuous and godlie persons, as about the same time laboured busilie in setting forth the word of life vnto the people in those parties, fled with one Adrian as then bishop of the Scottishmen, into the Iland called Orkney, which lieth in manner in the midway of the passage ouer the Forth betwixt Fife and Louthian, where as then there was a famous monasterie of monks. But neither the reuerence of the place, neither the innocencie of those harmles creatures could restrain the Danes from polluting their wicked hands in murdering that deuout companie, as they were then esteemed.

This is that reuerend band of martyrs, which the Scottish people haue had in such reuerence in the foresaid Iland of Orkney; a few names of some of that multitude as yet remaining in memorie amongst writers, as the foresaid bishop Adrian, Glodian, Galus, or (as others write) Monanus archdeacon of saint Andrews, and bishop Stobrand: the names of the residue are forgotten. Some there be that affirme how this companie were Hungarians, the which fleeing out of their countrie, from the persecution which was their exercised by men of misbeliefe against the christians, they arrived here in Scotland, and applied themselves to the instructing of the Scottishmen in the way of saluation. Other write that they were Scots and Englishmen thus assembled there together. But of whence soeuer they were, certaine it is that by custome they were become Scots, and instructed the Scots (as before is said) in the way of saluation. After this cruell slaughter thus by the Danes committed, they continued in their wofull rage, as they passed through Fife and the other countries nere bordering vpon the same, till all the inhabitants were auoided out of their houses, either by flight or slaughter.

Constantine the Scottish king being kindled in the meane time with passing great displeasure, for these so notable iniuries receiued at the hands of the Danes, thought good with all speed to go against them, and to attempt the chance of battell before they had wasted any further within his dominions, so greatlie to the diminishing of his roiall power and estimation amongst his subjects. Hereupon leueng his people, and assembling a mightie host together, he passed forth with the same towards his enemies, the which were lodged in two seuerall camps, the one being distant from the other about a quarter of a mile, seuered in sunder with the course of a little riuer called Leuth, the which (vpon the approach of the Scots vnto that part of the campe that lay on the further side next vnto them) chanced to be raised on such hight, thorough abundance of raine, that in two daies after vnneth it might be passed ouer at the fords.

After this sore and tempestuous weather, the aire cleared up and wared verie faire and calme, giuing occasion to the Scots to worke their feat against one part of their enemies, whilst the other could not come ouer vnto their aid and succor. In this campe which lay on that side the riuer next vnto the Scots, Hubba was lodged, who did what he could to haue stated his men from issuing forth of the campe, to giue battell when the Scots drew nere to the same, and assailed all waies by prouoking the Danes with skirmishes to come forth and fight with them in plaine field. But notwithstanding all that he could do, forth they rushed in such wise by plumps, and with so great noise and clamour, that the captiues were constrained of necessitie to let them in order of battell, with they would needs giue the onset vpon their present enemies.

The Danes did weare aloft vpon their armor, cereteine linnen garments, wrought with red silke, the which were faire and white both at hand and a far off. Their weapons were of such sort as serued for the push rather than for downe-right blowes, the points being of such a handsome strong fashion, that no armor might lightlie hold forth against them. These kind of weapons, together with the multer of their huge bodies, was dreadfull at the first for the Scottishmen to behold, as they marched towards them in araic of battell. But anon coming nere together ready to ioine, the Scots manfullie taking to them new courages, set vpon the Danes with great violence, who likewise began the battell verie stoutlie, so that the same continued right fierce and cruell a good space. At length the Danes being assailed on each side, both afront before, and on their backs behind, oppressed as it were with multitudes, did throw downe their weapons and fled amaine. Many of them making towards their campe were overtaken and slaine, diuerse of them falling into the ditches were oppressed with throng, as well of their owne companie, as of their enemies, as they passed ouer them in following the chase, and struing to enter the campe vpon such as stood to defend them from entering. Other there were that leaping into the water in hope to get ouer, were drowned in the whirling waues of the streame; though some, through helpe of their fellowes (which stood on the other side ready to haue passed the water, if they might so haue done without manifest danger of drowning) escaped and got ouer, amongst whom Hubba was one, to the great reioicing of his brother Hungar, to see him thus deliuered thusse from perill of death, as first from amongst his enemies, and secondlie out of the roying streame of that deepe and swift raging riuer.

The Scots hauing thus put one part of their enemies to the worse, with that hapie success: took such comfort and immoderate ioy, as though they had bene now sure of victorie ouer all the residue, so that for two daies together, there was such dancing, singing, and piping amongst them, as the like hath not bene heard of. Pea so farre proceeded their insolent outrage, that they began to contend amongst themselves for the prisoners and spoiles, which they counted now their owne, as though already they had the same whole in their possession: and further reasoned, not without altercation, whether the Danish captiues after they had them once in their hands, should be put to death, or els be kept alieue to be shewed to the people in triumph or no. Great adoe and manie baine words were spent hereabout, in such earnest sort, that they were at point to haue fallen out amongst themselves: but there was no mention at all made touching the ordering of their battels, and other the necessarie proceedings against their enemies. At length, when the riuer was fallen and come to his old course againe, so that it might easilie be passed, Constantine in order of battell got ouer with his people, to the other side where the Danes were lodged, who hauing more mind to set themselves in such order, whereby

The Scots
Danco
their battle

The Danes
appeared

The Danes
weapons.

The men of bodie and lims.

A battell

The Danes
take the flight

Hubba was saved from drowning.

The Scots
take of this victorie im-
moderate ioy.

The Scots
for ioy ready
to fall out.

Constantine
proceeded gainst his enemies.

The order of placing of the Danes armie.
Hubba had the right wing where he had the left wing.

Hungar kept
the battell.

Hungar made a bow.

The soldiers
did make the like bow.

King Constantine placed his men in like manner.

In incongrue
ment given to the soldiers.

The Danes
approch towards the Scots.

The Danes
foot quarels
and the Scots
foot arrows
and darts as
the Scots
saw.

The Scots
are put to flight.

Constantine

whereby they might gaine the victorie, than to deuise for the diuiding of the spoile, perceiuing occasion now offered to giue the onset, forthwith araided their people in this sort.

Hubba with six thousand Danes, was placed in the right wing. The left was led by one Buerne an Englishman bozne, who was fled out of his countrie, for that he could not beare such iniuries as Albert offered him in forcing his wife, to the great reproch and dishonour of his house and name. He had with him in this left wing certaine bands of Englishmen, with those Pias that had escaped ouer into Denmarke (as before is mentioned.) Hungar with all the residue of the armie, kept the battell of middle ward, exhorting his men to shew their force & manhood that day, with the same should either put them in possession of the whole land of Albion, with all the substance and riches contained therein, either else bring them perpetuall seruitude with ignominie amongst their most cruell and fierce aduersaries. He therefore himselfe openlie in presence of them all, vowed with solempne oth, either to returne with victorie to his campe, either else to die in the place, willing them all to make the like couenant. Whereby, on the vniuersall multitude allowed him so much for this his motion, that there was not one amongst the whole number, which agreed not to sweare the like oth. Constantine keeping in manner the like order, placed in the right wing his brother Ethus, in the left Duncane the lieutenant of thane of Athole, appointing to either of them ten thousand men a peece.

All the residue were set in the battell where he himselfe stood. And first he gaue them all hartie thanks in that they had so balliantlie achieved the victorie in the last battell, requirring them now not to blemish their former glorie with anie faintnesse of courage, recreant cowardise, or dishonorable flight: and further he willed them in no wise to be asfear of their enemies, in respect more for their hugeness of bodie, than for anie of their balliant stoutnesse of heart: for if they assailed them with one whole and entire consent, according to their wonted forwardnesse & manlike prowes, they should quicklie put them to flight, and obtaine a full victorie. Whereby he also warned them not to run rashlie vpon the enemies, but to suffer them first to giue the charge: for by that meanes he thought the Danes would with their earnest violence disorder themselves, and so should it be more easie for the Scots to breake in amongst them.

But this deuise did not a little abate the Scottish mens courages. For the Scots vse is, when they shall enter into battell, to make a great shout and noise, and therewith to run vpon their enemies, by which meanes (as they suppose) they both put the enemy in feare, and incourage themselves to the battell. The Danes at the sound of the trumpet marched forth towards the Scots, where they stood thus in order of battell: but when they perceiued that the Scots came not forward, they also staid in the mid way to refresh themselves, least at the joining they should be out of breath. Anon after, passing forward an easie pace, they shot quarrels, and threw darts at their enemies verie freshlie, and the Scots let die at them againe with arrowes and darts as thicke as it had bene a storme of haile.

After this they rushed together with great violence on both sides: but within a while, the Danes had put both the wings of their enemies to flight, and after compassing the maine battell round about, they constrained the same in the end with great bloodshed and slaughter to giue backe and flee out of the field. Ten thousand Scots died that day in this unfortunate battell with Constantine himselfe, who being first taken was had into a caue by the sea side & amongst the rocks, and there cruellie murdered by the enemies. The place was called certeine yeeres after, the blacke den: but now they name it the diuels den, in memorie of that heinous murder there committed. The Scottish nation also had bene better, like as then destroyed, had not Ethus the brother of Constantine, perceiuing how the field was lost, escaped awate with two companies of his best men of warre, so reseruing himselfe to the time of more luckie fortune.

The people likewise doubting for want of a gouernour to be the sooner overcome by their enemies, did lead the said Ethus to Scone, where they crowned him king, in the yeere after the birth of our Sautour 874, and the 13 after Constantine began to rule the estate of the realme. The same yeere were manie wonders and vnketh sights seene with in the Scottish dominions. In the mouth of the Forth, otherwise called the Scottish sea, there appeared fishes in great numbers, like vnto men in shape, swimming vp and downe in the streame with halfe their bodies aboue the water, and hauing a blacke skin, which couered their heads and necks, from their shoulders vpwards like an hood. These are called Bassinates, and vse to go in great companies together, as though they were skulles of herrings, signifieng (when they are seene) some great misfortune vnto the countrie, as the common people haue long had an opinion. Also the loches, riuers, and all maner of other waters were frozen from the beginning of Nouember, till the latter end of Aprill; and when the frost brake, and the snowe melted, there was such a flood flowing ouer all the plaines euen to the roots of the mounteins, as the like had not bene seene. Furthermore, when the same shunke and went away, in the mud and slime there was such a sort of frogs left, that when they were dead, and began to putrifie, the aire was so infected, that manie deadlie diseases ensued, whereof great numbers of the inhabitants did perish. Moreover, there was a mightie starre or comet seene with fire raies issuing forth of the same, which both night and day folowed the mone during the moneth of Aprill, to the great horroz of all that beheld it.

But to proceed. The Danes (as is said) hauing vanquished the Scots, and wasted the countrie of Fife, passed ouer into Louthian, where robbing and spoiling all before them, they pursued the inhabitants into Northumberland, whither they fled for refuge. There the Danes being assted with certeine Englishmen in fauour of Buerne, due in battell both Albert and Ella, kings of that countrie. The crueltie of the Danes was such after they had achieved the victorie, that few escaped with life, but such as saved themselves by flight. But chiefe there rage appeared most against priests, and such as professed themselves men of religion. For the Danes being Ethniks, persecuted most egerlie those that in anie wise professed Christ. The like outrageous murdering of the christians was practised thorough out the countrie, and at length came vnto that blessed king saint Edmund, reigning as then ouer the people of the East Angles, as in the English historie more plainlie maie appere. Howbeit other of the English kings maintained the warres with these Danes certeine yeeres after this, with variable fortune; the most part of those people which inhabited on that coast toward the Germane seas, either being slaine or brought into miserable bondage into thair home. But Alured, which succeeded his brother king Godfred, not in the kingdome of Northfolke and Suffolke (as Hector Boetius affirmeth) but in the kingdome of the Westsaxons, rebelling a great part of this miserie, into the which the countrie was thus to taken and murdered. The blacke den of faue.

Ethus brother vnto Constantine was saved by flight.

Ethus.

874.

Fishes like vnto men in shape.

Bassinates.

A long winter

Frogs in the mud & slime.

A comet.

The Danes went into Louthian.

King Albert & Ella slaine.

This crueltie inuaded Northfolke also.

King Alured rebelling those barons. Hector Boetius misliketh thus is at my e Scots,

to haue ampe, to the same,
nes with them in he could ps, and captains
n order of sct vpon

rmor; cer
like, shew
off. Their e push ra nts being no armor
se kind of r huge bo ishmen to n arais of r readie to n new cou eence, who so that the good space.
h side, both ppressed as wne their n making slaine, di e oppressed
nie, as of following
e vpon such ther there
o get ouer,
e streame;
wes (which led the wa t manifest r, amongst Hubba was sued from owning.

The Danes
apparel.
The Danes
apons.

Tell men of bodie and lungs.

A battell.

The Danes
take the flight.

The Scots
take of this victorie im
derate tog.

The Scots
for tog readie
to fall out.

The Danes
approch to wards the Danes.

The Danes
shot quarrels
at the Scots.

The Scots
shot arrowes
at the Danes as thick as hail.

The Scots
were put to flight.

Constantine
proceeded ag
gainst his ene mies.

Constantine

whereby

divers matters touching the report of our histories.

Æthas furnamed Lightfoot

Æthas neglected the op-portunitye.

A conspiracie
made against king Æthas.

King Æthas
is arrested,
with his fa-
vourers.

Gregorie is chosen king.

Gregorie.

876. H.B.
875. 10. Ma.

A convocation of the clergie.
Priests are free of all tribute.

They should not be called to serve in the warres.
Authoritie given unto bishops to order
kings.

thus brought by the Danes, by subduing them in sundrie conflicts, and sleaing their two capitaine the foresaid Hungar and Hubba, as in the same English historie is further expressed.

But now to retorne unto Æthas, I find that he was of such swiftnesse of foot, that he would match and make waie in running with harts and hounds, and thereupon was surnamed Lightfoot: but of what nimble lightnesse of bodie soever he was, truth it is that he was of disposition in mind unfit to haue the order of anie publike regiment. For whereas he might haue recovered Fife and Louthian with other regions, whilst the Englishmen and Danes were together by the eares, he passed ouer that occasion, delighting more in following the pleasures of the bodie & sensuall lusts, than to bestow his time in feates of chualrie and other warlike exercises. The nobles of the realme perceiuing him thus to abuse the two the gifts of his person, mistrusting least his insolent doings should indamage the publike state of the common-wealth, they toke counsell together how they might apprehend him, and to send him some whither out of the waie where to be safelie kept, and then to place some other in the gouernement of the realme, that might rule the same with more discreti- on & better aduise. And least their resolution should be disclosed before it took effect, they slackt no time, but went speedilie about their businesse. And coming to the king, whome they found a hunting in Calidon wood, they suddenlie arrested him, and there with committed him to safe keeping: & those whome they knew to be fauourers of his euill rule and mis- gouernance, they put them also fast in irons, till they had answered vnto such articles as should be laied to their charge. This done, they proceeded to the election of a new king; and in the end by the perswasion of one Dongall gouernor of thane of Argile, they chose Gregorie the sonne of that Dongall, which reigned before Alpine, who was not past two moneths old when his father died.

This Gregorie being knowne to be a man wor- thie of the rone, though he himselte onlie was against it, at length by perswasion receiued the inue- sture of the kingdome at Seone, with all due solemn- itie. Æthas hearing thereof, through anguish of mind died within thre daies after, in the second yeere of his reigne, and 876, after the birth of our Saviour. There be that write how he was strangled in prison by Dongall his procurement, least by ad- uenture he might haue bene restored vnto libertie, and withall haue made claime to the crowne againe. Gregorie being thus established in the estate, consi- dering that the suertie of all realmes rested in the hands of the diuine maiestie, to begin his gouern- ment with some luckie enterprise, caused a conuoca- tion to be holden at Forfate, for the aduancement of Christs religion: where amongst other things, it was ordeined, that priests from thenceforth (to the end they might more freelie attend to their vocation) should be exempt from paying of tribute and all ma- tier of exactions. Also that they should not be con- strained to go vnto the warres, neither to come be- fore anie temporall iudges, but onlie before their or- dinaries and bishops, by whome they should be iud- ged in all causes. The same ordinaries and bishops should also haue authoritie to order all men, both publike and priuate, as well for the keeping of faith gi- uen, as to constraine them to confirme the same, and to punish such as should be found in the contrarie; likewise in causes of controuersie touching matri- monie, tithes, testaments, legacies, and such like: moreover the correcting of those that blasfeme ei- ther God or his saints.

Heretikes and necromancers, with other the like offendoers against the lawes and articles of the chri- stian religion, was assigned vnto the bishops and their substitutes, so that all those which were found dis- obedient vnto them, and refused to be at their com- mandement, they should haue authoritie to excom- muncate them out of the church, and from compa- nie keeping with anie of the cōgregation, so as they that were thus excommunicated, should be deprived of all abilitie to intoy anie inheritance or right to lands or possessions whatsoeuer they were. Neither should they be accepted as a witness in anie maner of cause, neither beare anie office or rule in the com- mon-wealth. This Gregorie also (as is said) was the first authoer of that ordinance, by the which the Scottish kings at their coronation use of ancient cu- stome to vow by soleimne oth, that during their liues, they shall mainteine and defend the church with his ministers, in all ancient liberties and priuileges, and not to suffer anie man to hurt or intringe the same.

There was suerlie in this Gregorie a certeine na- turall inclination to vertue, with such aduisednesse in all his wordes, that he vitered few or none but that the same seemed to be spoken with verie great con- sideration. He was neuer married, but continued in chastite all his life time. Of meate & drinke he was verie spare, delighting in all kind of sobrietie, more watchfull than giuen to slepe. But his fame increa- sed most for his mainteining of iustice and ciuill ad- ministracion concerning the state of the common- wealth, not omitting the practise of warre, where ne- cessitie required. The first expedition which he took in hand, he made into Fife, to reconquer that countrie to the crowne of Scotland. At whose entrance into the same, the Picts, whome the Danes had left in those parties at their departure thence, being stricken with feare to fall into the hands of the Scots their ancient enemies, fled forthwith into Louthian, leauing Fife in manner void, and without anie that would offer to defend it against the Scots.

Whereupon Gregorie so finding it desolate of inhabitants, sent for people out of other parts of his realme, appointing them dwellings in that countrie as he thought most expedient. This done he passed into Louthian, where taking the fortresses and pla- ces of defense, some by force, and some by surrender, he easilie reduced that countrie into his subiection, so that within a few daies, hauing there all at his plea- sure, he came vnto Berwike, where there were a great number of Danes ioined together with the Picts, as men not minding to flee anie further, but to fight with the Scots euen there, if they should come forward vpon them. But when they saw what number the Scots were of, and here with doubting the Englishmen to come on their backs if the ma- ter went not well with them; they thought it best that such Danes as were of anie great reputation of nobilitie, should withdraw into Berwike before the enemies were at hand, and the residue to passe o- uer Tweed into Northumberland, there to ioine with other Danes that in those parties were latelie arrived.

But the Englishmen within Berwike, abhorring nothing more than to be vnder subiection of the Danes, in the euening after the receiuing of the Danish nobles into their towne, deliuered it toge- ther with their ghests vnto the Scottishmen, who suf- fering the Englishmen at their pleasure either to go their waies with all their goods, or to remaine still in their houses, slue the Danes, without sparing either man, woman, or child. Then leauing a strong garr- ison of Scottishmen within Berwike, Gregorie marched forth with the residue of his people into Northumberland, to visite that countrie to other of his

Herbert threatened the Scots.

The Danes
prepare to the battell.

The Scots
agierlie invade their enemies.

King Grego-
rie his sailing
to the south-
wes.

The Danes fled to their camp.

The king
inhabitant in Fife.
He subdued Louthian.

Herbert assembled his men together.

Herbert went toward Rain, chiefe generall of the Danes in England.

They fled into Northumberland.

The Danish
nobilitie fled
into Berwike.

Herbert remained in camp.

King Grego-
rie his sailing
to the south-
wes.

his dominions that bordered vpon the same.

In those parties at that selfe time there were two armies lodged in the fields, the one of Danes not far from Forke, vnder the leading of one Herdunt, who had latelie taken and sacked that citie, and the other of Englishmen that laie 20 miles off from the said Danes. Herdunt hearing of the slaughter which the Scots had made of his countreimen at Berwikke, threatened sore that he would not leaue a man alive of the Scottish race within anie part of the confines of Albion. Which bow manie of the companie, following their capteins example, likewise made. Shortly after, hearing of their enemies approach, the whole host by commandement of Herdunt issued forth of their campe to giue battell.

Here the Scottish king standing with his people in order of battell, had thought to haue vsed some comfortable speech vnto them, thereby to incourage them to fight: but such haile was made by the Scots to preece vpon their enemies, that he saw it more needfull to take heed to the ordering of them in perfect arate, than to stand about to exhort them, whome he saw readie inough of their owne accord to fight. Therefore he said no more vnto them, as he went amongst the ranks, but onelie willed them to remember how cruellie Constantine their king was sometime murdered, after he had yelded himselfe prisoner to these enemies, with whome they should now ioine.

The Scots herevpon running to the battell with no lesse stoutnesse of mind than violent force, gaue their enemies scarce space to charge their weapons, but bare them downe with long speares and iavelins, and withall the bilmen following them made great slaughter on ech side, so that there needed neither exhortation of capteins, nor diligence of widders to keepe them in arate: For the wrathfull stomachs of the souldiers onelie wrought the feat in such sort, that the Danes were quicklie put to flight and chased. Those that could not escape to the campe, got them vnto the next mounteins, who chanced vpon better lucke than those that escaped to the campe, for the egernesse of the Scots was such in chasing the enemies, that neither ditch nor rampire could staie them from entring the campe vpon the Danes where they made greater slaughter than they had done in the field.

The next daie Herdunt goeth about to assemble his men togither againe, being disperfed here and there: but when he vnderstood how he had lost the more halfe of his whole host, he cursed that unhappie day, and determined to retire vnto Kassin, who as then was capteine generall of all the Danes that were in England. But Herdunt by reason of his wounded men, whome he was faine to carrie with him, could not make forward with anie great speed, so that he was scarce fortie miles got forth on his waie, when word came to him, that Kassin fighting with the Englishmen vntwarilie, at a place called Helcadeas, chanced to be slaine with a great multitude of his people: and therevnto his head was carried abroad by and downe the countrie from towne to towne to be seene. By such mishaps the prosperitie of the Danes so much flourishing of late, began now manifestlie to decaye.

Herdunt although he was not a little discouraged therewith, yet he chose forth a plot of ground most meet for his purpose, where he determined to abide in campe, till he might vnderstand what the Danes in other places were minded to do. But Gregorie king of Scots, hauing thus expelled the Danes forth of Northumberland, brought that countrie vnder his subiection: neuertheless he permitted the inhabitants to intop all their possessions will, onelie re-ceiuing of them in name of souereigntie a yecrelie tribute. So that within a few daies after, he brake vp his armie, and went himselfe into Berwikke, where he remained all the winter season in consultation with his nobles about the publike affaires of the realme.

In the beginning of the next summer, he prepared againe for warre, and raising an armie, he purposed to make a iourneie against the Britains, who held (as before ye haue heard) a great part of Scotland. But he was not diuine to vse anie force in this warre: for the Britains being bered afore this time with warre by the Danes, had compounded with them for an huge summe of monie to haue truce for tiewentie yeres space: but the Danes without regard to their promise, shortly after (with a greater power than at the first) entered into the British borders, renews the warre so fiercelie, that albeit their force was sore enfeebled, by reason of the two last overthrowes; yet the Britains doubting the worst, feared to encounter with them, and therefore after consultation had, they thought it best to assaie if they might happilie allure the Scots, of their enemies to become their friends. Wherevpon sending vnto the Scottish king an herald, they require to ioine with them in armes against the Danes, common enemies to both their countreies, promising that if they would so do, they would willinglie render into his hands all such possessions which they held at anie time belonging vnto the Scottish kingdome.

Gregorie weeing with himselfe how necessarie this friendship should be, not onelie to the publike weale of all the whole land of Albion, but also of the god suertie and aduancement of Christiens religion, whereof the Danes were greivous aduersaries (for this he thought, that if Scots, Englishmen, and Britains did ioine in one, and knit themselves togither in aiding each other, there was no nation in the world that they needed to feare) he consented vnto the request of the Britains, and so accepting their offer, he had all those regions which pertained sometime to the Scots, and were now in possession of the Britains, surrendered into his hands, and so by this means were the Scottish confines enlarged and extended vnto their owne ancient limits and former bounds.

This dissention and variance being ceased after this maner, it greatlie reioiced the minds of all the inhabitants of this Ile; but contrariwise, the Danes looked for nothing more than present destruction to insue vpon them, if this amitie should continue anie while amongst their enemies. Wherefore they practised sundrie means to breake th amitie thus remaining betwixt their aduersaries, Scots, Englishmen, and Britains. Wherein they needed not greatlie to trauell, for within a short time after the conclusion of the same league, the prosperous successe of the Englishmen (which for a season had followed them vnder the conduct and gouernement of their king Alured against the Danes) occasioned the Britains also (hauing now no further feare of the Danish puissance) to repent themselves of the league, which they had latelie made with the Scots, so that Constantine, whome a little before they had receiued to be their king after the deceasse of his father, raised a power, and with the same entered into Annandale, to recover that countrie out of the Scottish mens hands. But hearing in the end that Gregorie was coming with a great armie to succour his subiects, whome the said Britains on each side had sore afflicted, they began to draw backe towards Cumberlanc with their botie, thinking there to be in safetie, vntill a time more convenient.

But king Gregorie coasting the countrie, met with tates of Northumberland to intop their lands.

King Gregorie wintered at Berwikke.

King Gregorie prepared an armie against the Britains.

The Britains send to king Gregorie.

King Gregorie his consideration.

A peace concluded, and lands surrendered to the Scots.

The Britains repent them of the league made with the Scots.

the d...
undis...
com...
com...
as they pruned
light to neither maner
the com...
d) was
which the
icent cu...
r lines,
with his uileges,
nge the
eine na...
ednesse
but that eat con...
nued in
he was e, more increa...
civil ad...
mmun...
here ne... toke in ntrie to
into the
in those en with ancient ng fife
uld offer

when the Scottish
kings first
gon to pro... mise by oth...
maintene the libertie of the church.
King Grego...
rie was giuen
whollic vnto
goodnesse.
King Grego...
rie was neuer
married,
he was fob...

Herdunt
chained the Scots.

The Danes
prepare to the battell.

The Scots
come inuaide
their enemies.

King Grego...
rie was giuen
whollic vnto
goodnesse.

The Danes
doe their worst.

The king let inhabitants
in fife.
he subdued
Louthian.

The Danes
and Scots
ioine them... selves tog...
ther.

They fled into Northumber...
land.

The Danish
nobilitie fled
into Berwikke.

The Danes
are slaine in Berwikke.

Herdunt as... sembled his
armie togither.

Herdunt went to Kassin capteine ge... nerall of the Danes in England.

Herdunt re... turned in the night.

King Grego...
rie was giuen
whollic vnto
goodnesse.

The Scots
ouerthrow the Britains.

Constantine
is slain.

Herbert king
of Britaine
sent ambassa-dours to Gregorie.

King Grego-
rie his ans-
were.

Gregorie required a religion of Cumberland and Westmer-
land.

Peace was concluded.

Humf. Lhoid.
870.

with them at Lochmaben, and there gaue them battell, wherein when Constantine perceiued how his people began to shrinke backe, as one hauing more regard to his hono^r than to the suertie of his life, he rushed forth into the foremost prease, there to succour and relieue his standards: but being compassed about amongst a great companie of his enemies, his chance was there to be slaine with a number of the chiefest lords of all the British nation. The other multitude seeing the day go thus against them, fled to saue their liues, leauing the victorie to vnto the Scots.

This ouerthrow did put the Britains in danger to haue bin utterly ouerrun, what by the Scots on the one side, and Danes on the other: for as for forren aid to be looked for of the English, they had plaine answer they should haue none, sith they had so vniustlie broken the league concluded with their confede-rats the Scots, to the great hinderance of the prosperous proceedings of all the inhabitants of this Ile, against their common enemies the Danes.
Yet the better to establish the estate of their coun-trie, and in hope of some recouerie of their former damages; they crownded to their king one Herbert or (as some copies haue) one Hebert the brother of the last Constantine, and herewith sent ambassa-dours vnto Gregorie king of the Scottishmen to excuse themselves, in that they had so wrongfullie attempted the warres against him and his people, laieing all the fault in Constantine, who against the wills and contrarie to the minds of his subiects, did take vpon him that dishonorable and most infortunat enterprife.

Gregorie hauing heard the message of these ambassadors, for answer declared vnto them, that he vnderstood well enough, that the Britains now sued for peace vpon no reuerend consideration they had vnto their othes of couenant; but onelie for that they saw how if they should pursue the warre still, they were sure that in the end they should be like to haue the foile: and therefore he was fullie thus resol-ued, not to conclude anie peace or truce with such disloyal people, till they had resigned ouer into his hands the whole possession of the countries of Cumberland and Westmerland, with assurance neuer to pretend anie claime or title vnto those dominions from thenceforth: and herewith for performance of couenants, to render into his hands not onelie the keies of all the towines, castels and fortresses in the same countries, and to auoid quite their waies into Wales to ocher their countriemen there, but also to deliuer sittie noble mens sonnes and heires apparant as pledges to remaine with the Scots.

The ambassadors returning home with this message, and reporting it accordingly vnto their king, when all men had said their aduise, in the end they condescended to conclude a peace with the rehearsed conditions prescribed by the Scottish king, sith they saw no better meane to preferue their nation from present destruction. And thus deliuering the appointed number of pledges, they left the countries of Cumberland and Westmerland void, surrendering into the Scottishmens hands the possessions of all the towines, castels and fortresses, and therewith departed into Northwales, where they placed themselves in the countrie betwixt Conuay and the riuer of Dea, out of the which they expelled the Englishmen (that were then in possession thereof) and therewith they erected a kingdome there, which they named Stradelud, maintaining warres against the Englishmen manie yeares after.

King Gregorie hauing thus enlarged his kingdome, assembled his nobles at Carleill, where he resolved (with their aduise) to follow such good fortune as by Gods prouidence dallie chanced vnto them. Whereupon it was agreed, that they should go first vnto Powke to conquere that citie, whilst the Englishmen in Kent were occupied with the Danes that were come thither; so as neither the one nation nor the other could attend to make anie attempt to hinder the Scottishmens enterprife. But in the meane time came ambassadors vnto Gregorie from king Alured, to congratulat his prosperous successe against his enemies the Danes and others. These ambassadors also willed to haue the ancient league betwixt Englishmen and Scots renewed, by which means both their powers might ioine together against their common enemies, when they should attempt anie wrongfull inuasion.

This request was granted, so that hostilie there-vpon peace was established betwixt those princes and their people, with confirmation of the old league, thereto were added these articles; That the Scots should inioy possession of Northumberland without anie claime to be made to the same by the Englishmen; If the Danes chanced to inuade either of their dominions, the warre should be accounted as common to them both; Neither should the Scots grant passage to anie enemy of the Englishmen through Scotland, neither the Englishmen suffer the Scottishmens enemies to passe through England; If anie Englishmen did rob or scale anie thing out of Scotland, that should not breake the league; but the offenders with the receiuers should be deliuered to the Scottish magistrats, to be punished according to the qualitie of the offense; and the like should be obserued by the Scots towards the Englishmen.

Thus things being quieted with the Englishmen, as Gregorie was about to lay armour aside, word came to him of new troubles forth of Galloway, by reason of an inuasion made by the Irishmen into that countrie. For the Irishmen hauing knowledge that the inhabitants of Galloway had spoiled two ships of Dublin arriuing on their coast, sent ouer a great power of men, the which landing in Galloway, made great slaughter of the people on each side.
King Gregorie being aduertised hereof, straightwaies made towards them, but they hauing knowledge of his coming deu to their ships with a great prey of goods and cattels, and returned therewith immediatlie backe into their owne countrie.

Whereupon Gregorie without delaie got together his ships and followed the enemy with all his armie, and landing in Ireland, put the nobles of that realme in great feare, who as then were in contention together which of them should haue the gouernement, by reason their king was lately dead, and had left a sonne behind him being but a child in yeeres, to succeed him in his throne. Some therefore of the wisest sort, and such as tendered the wealth of their coun-trie, went earnestlie about to agree the parties, but when they saw that it would not be, they did so much prouaile, that a truce was taken betwixt them for a while, least fighting still amongst themselves, they should put their countrie in danger to be ouerrun of the Scots: against whome when they had agreed vpon the foresaid truce, either of the factions raised a power, one Brian being generall of the one, and Con-nelius of the other; for these two princes were heads of the parties, betwixt whom the controuersie for the gouernement of the realme rested, and thereupon by consent of the residue had the leading of all them that were of their faction.

These two captiues with their armies inuaded themselves vpon the bankes of the riuer Bane, under the mountaine called Fute: their camps being seuered by a small distance the one from the other, in such a strong place, that it was not possible for
the

The picture of
the Scots
haue taken Powke.

King Alured
sent ambassa-
dours vnto
king Grego-
rie.

Peace confirmed.

Accomplishment of peace.

No passage to be granted
vnto the enemy.

Punishment
of robbers.

Galloway to be granted to the Irishmen.

A truce was taken betwixt
the two parties.

The two Irishmen gether their powers.

Two armies
one master the other.

The Irish
vnto place etc.

The Scots
made provision of bittles afoye
and.

The kings
enimie.

Smith
callen.

King Grego-
rie allied the Irishmen.

The Irish
partied.

John Bogan
died.

Women and children are kept harden.

Warmed
men were killed.
Wills were commanded to be provided.

Dungary
Dungary
died.

Two armies
one master the other.

the enger to was t
had fa
with t affion
Irish
those shoul calfon
bread drink they where nile g ton r
people
I reflec
mean enim seaso
of the
the t
was that might
the r mies
hill t
bers sofft
to fig
I
on h bout wate
man
hand they vpon
bein thei
Strik
took a fe from
The
peop fort wai inon four
with
the Scot
the ried
and fein he c
two ham also seru ther
the
the Gr
seru
thro
uic
fan

the enimies to appoach them without manifest danger to cast away themselves. Their chiefe purpose was to prolong the time here in this place, till they had furnished the Scottish armie, and then to deale with them at their pleasure. But the industrious prouision of Gregorie passed the politike deuise of the Irishmen: for he had commanded that euery one of those Scottishmen, which passed the seas with him, should purueie himselfe of vittels, according to the custome of the countrie, for fiftie daies space, as of bread, cheefe, butter, lard, and powdered biefe: as for drinke, they knew they should not need to care, fith they were sure to find water inough in euery place where they chanced to come: for as yet filthie & seruile gluttonie had not softened nor inured with wanton delicacie the warlike natures of the Scottish people.

In the end Gregorie, hauing for certeine daies rested himselfe and his men, and deuising in the meane time which way he might best indamage the enimies; at length concluded to fend in the night season two thousand of his souldiours vp to the ridge of the forenamed mountaine called Fute, through the thicke bushes and woods, wherewith the same was couered, to the end that getting to the top of that hill, right ouer where the Irish camps laie, they might in the morning (at what time Gregorie with the rest of the armie went about to assaile his enimies) tumble downe stones from the browes of the hill vpon them, thereby either to destroy great numbers of them, either else to constrain them to come forth of their strength into the plaine fields, and so to fight with them in a place indifferent.

Kenneth Cullan the thane of Carrike, toke vp on him to haue the conduct of them that should go about this interprise, who conueieng his band ouer the water of Bane, and so vp on the backside of the mountaine, in the morning when their fellows fell in hand to assaile the Irish campe, where Bzen lodged, they tumbled such plentie of mightie stones downe vpon the Irishmen, that aboue a thousand of them being slaine, all the residue were forced to forsake their ground, & to flee in maner without anie stroke stricken. The Scots that were sent to pursue them, toke a great number of them prisoners, and slue but a few, hauing befoze hand such commandement from their prince.

Whilist this mischiefe fell vpon Bzen and his people, Cornelius with his folkes cursling that infortunate date, left their lodgings, and marched their waies in good order of battell, till they were farre enough out of danger. The bodie of Bzen also was found amongst other in the rising of the campe, with the head bruised in peces, and the braines passed out with some stone throwne downe by the Scottishmen from the hill side: which Gregorie at the request of some of the prisoners, caused to be buried in chistian sepulchre. He caused also women and children to be sent awaie harmlesse, onelie retaining the men of able age prisoners. Furthermore he commanded that they should vse neither fire nor sword, but against such onelie as with weapon in hand made anie resistance: and commanded them also that they should prouide themselves of vittels to serue them, whilst they should lie abroad & remaine there in that countrie.

Hereupon manie of the Irish people thus tastig the mercifull clemencie of the Scottish king, yielded themselves vnto him with sundrie fortresses, so that Gregorie finding sufficient prouision of vittels to serue his host for a long season, he went vnto the strong citie of Doungarg, or Doungard, which he enuironed about with a strong siege, & continuing the same certeine daies, at length they within wearied with continuall trauell and lacke of vittels, opened the gate, and suffered him to enter. He would not permit his men to meddle with anie of the spoile, but appointed the colonelmen to redeeme the same (their armour excepted) of his souldiours for a peece of monie.

Afterward, tarieng in this citie by the space of thre daies, he departed and came afore another citie called Pontus, which he receiued by surrender, and therfore preserued the citizens from all hurt & annoyance. From thence he purposed to haue gone vnto Dublin, about 14 miles distant from Pontus, but as he marched thitherwards, he was aduertised that Cornelius was comming towards him with such an huge armie, as the like had not bene sent with, in the memoirie of man in that Ile. Whereupon Gregorie changing his purpose of going to Dublin, vpon report of these newes, he got him vp into the next mountaine.

The next day came the Irishmen ranged in thre battels. In the first there was a great multitude of Bernes with darts and bowes: in the second were a great number of mightie tall men, armed in cotes of male, with bucklers and great long swords, which they carried vpon their right shoulders. In the third battell, wherein stood their generall Cornelius, with all the chiefe nobles of the countrie, were an infinite companie of all sorts of souldiours, chosen forth of all the whole numbers. The Scots (according to their custome) diuided themselves into two wings, and a middle ward, in euery of the which were thre sorts of souldiours: as first archers, and those with long speares, then bilmen, and last of all such as bare long swords and leaden mallets.

Thus the battels being ordered on both parts, forward they make one towards another to begin the fight. The Scots (after their shot and throwing of darts was spent, and that they came to foine) kept off their enimies with long speares or ianelins, in such sort, that they were not able to come nere them: which disadvantage Cornelius perceiuing, commanded on high, that they should with their swords cut those ianelins in sunder. And as he lifted vp the visor of his helmet, the better to exhort his people to the execution hereof, he was so wounded in the face with a speare, that he was faine to withdraw apart out of the field. The Irishmen supposing he had fled, incontinentlie to saue themselves, threw off their armor and fell to running awaie. Thus did the victorie incline to the Scottish standards.

There died but a few (to speake of) in the battell, howbeit in the chase there was a wonderfull number slaine: for the Scots pursued them euen vnto Dublin gates, which citie the next daie Gregorie beset on each side with a mightie siege. There was got into this citie at the same time a wonderfull multitude of people, what of such as were recciued into it fleeing from the battell, as also of other which were there assembled befoze, in hope of assured victorie and safegard of their goods. By reason wherof being thus besieged, they began quicklie to want vittels, so that either they must of necessitie yield, either else by some issue auoid that danger wherein they were presently bewrapped.

But forsomuch as they saw no great likelihood of good successe in that exploit, in the end it was concluded amongst them, that (sith there was no meane for those noble men which were inclosed within that citie to escape the enimies hands, and that there were none other of ante reputation abroad able to defend the countrie from the Scottishmens puissance) they should fall to some treatie with the Scottish king for a peace to be had, with so reasonable conditions as might be obtained: for other remedie in that present

The towne was yielded.

A gentle ranome.

Dontus was surrendered also.

Cornelius came with an huge armie.

The Irishmen came in thre battels. Bernes.

These mightie men were called longlasses, if they had bene furnished with axes.

The Scots came in two wings.

Two battels ioine.

Cornelius was sore wounded.

The Irish ran away.

Dublin was besieged.

They consulted vpon a treatie of peace to be made.

sent mischief they could devise none, and therefore this was iudged the best waie of the whole number, namelie of Cozmach bishop of Dublin, a man for his singular vertue and reputation of byright life, of no small authoritie amongst them.

Cozmach B. of Dublin went vnto R. Gregorie.
Duncane.
A Wittie saieing.
King Gregorie his wife & godly answer.

He took vpon him also to go vnto Gregorie to breake the matter, & so comming afoze his presence, he sought him most humble to haue compassion vpon the poze miserable citie, and in such sort to temper his wraath, if he had conceived anie pece of displeasure against the citizens, that it might please him yet vpon their humble submission to receiue them vnto his mercie, and further to accept into his protection his cousine yong Duncane, vnto whome the kingdome of Ireland was due of right, as all the world well vnderstood. He besought him also to remember, that it appertained more to the honoz of a king, to preserve the lawfull right of other kings and princes with the quiet state of cities and countreies, than by violent hand to take their destruction.

Wherevnto the king answered, that he was not come into Ireland for anie couetous desire he had to the realme, or to the intent to spoile his kinsman of the gouernement thereof, but onelie to reuenge such iniuries as the Irishmen had done to his subiects. Not the Scots but the Irishmen themselves were they that had giuen the occasion of the warre, which they had deseruie bought with no small portion of their blood (which had bene shed) as punished for that crime worthislie by the iust iudgement of almighty God. But as touching an end to be had of his quarrell, & for the reseruing of the kingdome vnto yong Duncans behoufe, when he had the citie at his pleasure, he would then take such order as he should thinke most conuenient.

Dublin is first rendered vnto R. Gregorie.

This answer of the Scottish king being reported vnto them within the citie, they determined forthwith to set open their gates to receiue him: who, when he had caused search to be made whether all things were truelie ment according to the outward shew or not, he marched forth towards the citie to enter the same in order of battell, with all his whole armie, into the which he was receiued with procession of all the estates: for first there met him all the priests and men of religion, with the bishop the foresaid Cozmach, who hauing vpon him his pontificall apparell, bare in his hand the crucifix: then followed the nobles with the other multitude.

Gregorie was receiued with procession.
Cozmach bishop of Dublin becometh a crosse-bearer.

Which order when Gregorie beheld, he commanded his battell to staie a little, and therewith he himselfe advanced forth on foot till he came to the bishop, and falling downe vpon his knees, he reuerentlie kissed the crucifix, wherevpon receiuing humble thanks with high commendation of the bishop for such his clemencie, he entered the citie, not staieing till he came into the market place, where commanding one part of his armie to keepe their standing, he went with the residue vnto the church of our ladie, and after to that of saint Patrike, where hearing the celebration of diuine seruice, when the same was ended, he entered the castell, where his lodging was prepared. In the morning he caused execution to be done of certeine brutall persons of his armie, who in the night passed had broken vp the houses of some of the citizens, and rauished diuerse women. And for this act Gregorie being had in high reuerence of the Irish people, lodged part of his armie within the citie, and part he commanded to lodge without in the campe.

He kissed the crucifix.
He entered the castell.

At length hauing remained a season in this estate at Dublin, he caused the Irish lords to assemble in counsell, where in the end the peace was concluded betwixt him and them, with these articles and covenants. First it was agreed that the yong king

A peace concluded with Ireland.

Duncane should be brought vp vnder the gouernement of wise and discret persons, to be instructed in all princelie knowledge, within a strong castell, (wherein he had hitherto remained ever since his fathers decease) till he came to yeeres of discretion. And that in the meane time Gregorie should haue the gouernance of the realme, receiuing all the treasures into his possession. He should also haue the appointment of the magistrates, who should see iustice ministred according to the old statutes & ordinances of the Irish kingdome. That the Irishmen should receiue neither Englishman, Britaine, nor Dane, into their countreie, no not so much as for trade of merchandize, without safe conduct to be granted by him. So that things being thus brought to a quietnesse in Ireland, he receiued an oth of the chieffest of them for performance of the covenants, and here with taking with him threescore hostages, he returned with his victorious armie backe into Scotland.

After this there chanced no notable trouble to the Scots, neither forreine nor ciuill, by all the time of king Gregories reigne, so that passing the rest of his life in quietnesse, he studied chieflie for the politike gouernement of his people in god order and rule, to the advancement of the common-wealthe: and finally died an happie old man, in a castell called Doundore within the countreie of Garioch, in the 18 yeere after his entring into his estate, and after the birth of our Sauisur 893. He was neuer married, but liued in continuall chastitie: for his famous victories and other his princelie doings, he deserued of the Scots to be numbered amongst their most high and renowned princes. Amongst other his princelie acts which he set forward in his life time, to the aduancement of his countreie and common-wealthe, Aberdine (of a village) was aduanced by him to the state and dignitie of a citie, and the church there indowed with faire reuenues, and sundrie priuileges. His bodie was conueied vnto the abbey of Colmekill, and there buried with all solempne pompe and erequies: ouer the which his next successor, Donald the first of that name, caused a faire towne to be erected.

The king died.
893.
Wherby he made a citie.
King Gregorie is buried in Colmekill.

In the daies of this Gregorie also, there liued that famous clearkie John Scot, a Scottishman in deed borne, but brought vp in studie of god literature at Athens, where hauing learned the Greake tongue, he was sent for into France, to come vnto the emperor Lewis, with whom he remained in seruice for a time: and by whose commandement he translated the booke of saint Dionysie, intituled Hierarchia, into Latine. Afterwards being sent ambassadoz from the same Lewis vnto Alured or Alfred king of England, he continued with him and taught his children, hauing a place thereto appointed him within the abbey of Apalmeburie, where he had such resort of hearers and scholers, that it was a wonder to behold. Notwithstanding, at length when he ceased not to blame and sharpe to reprove the corrupt maners of such his scholers, as were giuen more to libertie than learning, he was by them murdered with daggers, as he was reading vnto them, and was afterwards registred amongst the number of martyrs.

John Scot. Some hold that he was an Englishman. Bale.
Dionysie. The pagina was translated by John Scot. He taught Alured in England. He taught in Apalmeburie.
He was killed by the scoles.

But to our purpose. After Gregorie succeeded Donald the 5 in gouernement of the kingdome, he was the sonne of Constantine the second; who finding the state of the realme in god quiet and flourishing in welth, he applied his whole studie to maintaine the same in semblable plight and condition. And before all things he caused iustice to be done to anie poze person, escaped unpunished. Christ the Lord of all vertue had giuen him such a godlie disposed

Donald.
Donald the first.
He was a good iustice.
He was religious.

Donald the 5 in gouernement of the kingdome, he was the sonne of Constantine the second; who finding the state of the realme in god quiet and flourishing in welth, he applied his whole studie to maintaine the same in semblable plight and condition. And before all things he caused iustice to be done to anie poze person, escaped unpunished. Christ the Lord of all vertue had giuen him such a godlie

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

James of Scotland.

disposed m
his glazie
other his be obseru uifedlie bl
in cursing to his hell lie follow his twong worth the in sufferin shed and others and cursings
time, as out great
pelled.

But
of Dona ledge ho pissant
and had out doin
was vnc
a conque warres
all dang land; ho
nie, but alreadie English
fournie, ping by least 40
ting leat denlie t thumber backe.

But
was on ding to 5000 S and all maine
for a tim to retun mond for end the Scots
men aft
not able ned imm
with the ioy com
that and pro
were pl commis
and w peace c
Why
a piece rep lan
not a li theues
time, se ties fre
made r
but aff skirmi
space,
of the little o

Donald sent 1000 men to the aid of the Englishmen.

Donald is worthwhile
by R. Alured.

The Dances
to be baptised,
and to remain in England.
Gomond is baptised with name mo.

They of Scot.
limate Surreyland.

disposed mind, whose religion (to the advancement of his glorie) he had euer in high veneration. Among other his godlie ordinances, he made this statute to be obserued as a law, that such as by swearing blasphemouslie blasphemed the name of almightie God, or in cursing and banning called vpon the name of the wicked fœnd, and betooke anie chrisitian creature vnto his hellish power and domination (a vice naturallie following the people of that nation) should haue his tong thrust through with a burnig iron. But two worth the negligence of such as haue succeeded him, in suffering so necessarie an ordinance to be abolished and worne out of vs, considering the horrible curses and blasphemie, with the bitter and dreadfull cursings so much frequented of all estates in this our time, as well in Scotland as elsewhere, as without great hozroz of the hearers cannot bee halfe expressed.

But to our purpose touching the gouernement of Donald, it chanced afterwards, that he had knowledge how Gozmond a Dane was landed with a puissant armie vpon the coasts of Northumberland, and had pitched his campe nere vnto the shore, without doing anie damage to the countrey: so that it was vncertaine what he intended, whether to begin a conquest there, or to passe ouer Humber to make warres on the Englishmen. To preuent therefore all dangers, Donald hastned towards Northumberland; howbeit he was not farre forwards on his iourne, but that word came to him, how Gozmond was already passed ouer Humber, and entered into the English borders. But yet did not Donald staie his iourne, till he heard certainelie that Gozmond keeping vpon his way, was aduanced forward at the least 40 miles off from the riuer of Humber, doubting least happilie he had ment some deceit, as suddenly he haue returned vpon the Scots in Northumberland, when the king had bene once gone backe.

But now, when it was knowne that his purpose was onelie to assaile the English countries, according to the league newlie confirmed, Donald sent 5000 Scottishmen vnto the aid of the Englishmen; and also appointed two thousand horsemen to remaine with him in Northumberland (where he staid for a time) discharging the residue, & licencing them to returne vnto their homes. Shortly after Gozmond fought with Alured at Abingdon, where in the end the victorie abode with the Englishmen and Scots, though the same was got with such losse of men after long and doubtfull battell, that they were not able to pursue the enimies in chase, but constrained immediatly after to conclude a necessarie peace with them, on condition that the Danes should enjoy common seats with the Englishmen in Albion, & that Gozmond with his Danes should be baptised and professe the chrisitian religion. Wherevpon also were pledges deliuered on both parts, and Gozmond comming to receiue baptisme had his name changed and was called Athelstane, during whose life the peace continued betwixt the two nations.

Whilist things passed thus in England, there rose a peece of trouble betwixt the inhabitants of Surrey land and Kosse, which disquieted king Donald not a little. The occasion grew by reason of certaine theues, which comming forth of Kosse in the night time, secretlie entered into Surrey land, to fetch booties from thence. At the first they of Surrey land made resistance against them as well as they might, but after calling their neighbours to aid them, they skirmished in such wise, that within two moneths space, there were slaine betwixt them two thousand of the one side and of the other. Donald being not a little offended to haue his peace broken with inter-time discord, gathered a great power, and with the same hastned into Surrey land: where calling the chiefe doers and maintainers of this businesse to make answer to that which was laid to their charge, when they were not able to cleare themselves of the crime, he put them to open execution of death, to the example of other. This trouble being in this sort quieted, he went into Northumberland, to be there in a readinesse, if the Danes or Englishmen (whome he suspected) should attempt anie thing against his subjects in those parties: where in the end, after he had reigned almost 11 yers, he departed this world. His bodie was buried in Colmekill amongst his ancestors, with a marble tome set ouer his graue, as the manner in those daies was customablie vsed.

After Donald the fift, there succeeded in rule of the realme Constantine the third of that name, the sonne of Ethus the swift, beginning his reigne in the yere after the incarnation 907. He was more apt for ciuill gouernement, than for the ordering of warlike affaires. King Edward that latelie succeeded Alured in rule ouer the Englishmen being ware thereof, sent vnto him an herald at armes, commanding him to restore vnto his subjects the Englishmen, the countries of Northumberland, Cumber-land, & Westmerland (which the Scottish king Gregorie had in times past by occasion of the trouble, some season taken from the right owners by force) either else to take for warres at his hands within forty daies after this summons.

Constantine herevnto answered, that if king Edward were minded to make him wars for those lands which he held by rightfull title, he with his people would be readie to defend themselves, hoping in the almightie God that he would turne the punishment on them that vniustlie had piked the quarrell. Wherevpon ensued manie rodes and forraies betwixt the Englishmen and Scots, made (as occasion serued) into ech others countrey, with diuers skirmishes and light bickerings for twelue moneths space together, without anie notable incounter of their maine powers. In which meane time the Danes increased in puissance, more than was thought requisite for the suertie either of the Englishmen or Scots, which moued king Edward by persuation of his nobles, to make meanes vnto Constantine to haue the peace renewed: wherevnto Constantine lightlie agreed: so that the league was confirmed againe with the former articles betwixt the English and Scottish nations.

Shortly after also the warre was renewed betwixt the Englishmen and Danes, and a peace againe confirmed by conclusion of a marriage betwixt Sithrike king of Northumberland, and Beatrice daughter of king Edward, till at length Sithrike was poisoned by his wife the said Beatrice: and then because Aualassus (whome the English writers name Aulase) and Godfrie, the sonnes of Sithrike, put the same Beatrice to death, hir father king Edward moued warre against them, and in foughten field discomfited them, but was slaine in that battell himselfe (as Hector Boetius saith.) But for the further truth of this matter, ye may read more in the historie of England.

The Danes being certified, that king Edward was thus slaine, conceiued such hope of good successe after to come, that albeit they were at this time vanquished, they immediatlie made new preparation for the warre, and first of all Aualassus the one of the two brethren before mentioned, sent vnto Constantine the Scottish king, to allure him to ioine with them against the Englishmen, which with great gifts and large promises he easilie brought to passe, the league notwithstanding which remained betwixt

The king went with an armie into Surrey land.

The chiefe doers were put to death. The king went into Northumberland.

Donald died.

Constantine.

Constantine the third.

907. King Edward sent an herald with defiance.

The answer of king Constantine.

Forerunners of war.

The peace was renewed and the league confirmed.

The Danes were discomfited.

The Danes conceiued hope of good successe.

The Scots earl faile to the Englishmen.

The Scots and Danes confederate themselves together. Malcolm is made chief general of the armie. He is created also here apparent. The earle of Cumberland here apparent to the king of Scots. The Scots and Danes join their powers together. They begin a cruel warre.

Athelstane bane sonne vnto king Edward.

Athelstane come against the Scots. 937.

The Scots and Danes out of order.

The Scots and Danes ouerthrowne.

The nobilitie went to Swazke.

Athelstane took Northumberland.

Westmerland and Cumberland reconciled.

Malcolm escaped his hurts.

A counsell called by Constantine.

the English and Scottish nations. Hereupon both the Scots and Danes made the greatest promise that might be, thinking verelie to subdue the Englishmen, and to bring them to utter destruction.

Malcolm sonne to king Donald was appointed by king Constantine to haue the leading of the Scottish armie, containing the number of twentie thousand men. The same Malcolm also at the same time was created here apparent of the realme, hauing Cumberland assigned vnto him for the maintenance of his estate. And euen then it was ordered, that he which should succeed to the crowne after the kings deceasse, should euer intoy that prouince. Malcolm joining his power with Aualassus and Godfric (who had assembled in like manner a mighty host of Danes) they all togither brake into the English confines, sparing no kind of crueltie that might be deuised, murdering the people without any pitie or compassion in all places where they came, to the intent that the Englishmen moued with the slaughter of their kindred and friends, should come forth into the field to giue battell, supposing they should not be able to withstand the force of the Danes and Scottishmen now joined in one armie togither.

But the more villanie they shewed in their doings, the sooner were they punished for the same. For Athelstane the bane sonne of king Edward (whome the Englishmen had chosen to succeed in gouernment of their kingdome after his fathers deceasse) with all speed sought to be reuenged of such inuiurious doings. Whereupon getting togither an armie, he encountered with them at a place called Bruningsfield, or Brunenburgh, in July, in the yere 937, where the English at the first of purpose gaue something backe, as though they had fled: which manner when the Danes and Scots beheld, supposing the Englishmen had fled in deed, they began to pursue amaine, leauing their order of battell, eche of them struing who might be the foremost.

The Englishmen (according to the order appointed to them by their capteins) suddenlie fell into array againe, and fiercelie returning vpon their enemies, did beat them downe in great numbers, & so attained a most triumphant victorie. There died in this most tall battell manie thousands of Danes and Scottishmen, but chiefly the Scottish nobilitie bought the bargaine most deere, who choosing rather to die in the field than to suffer rebuke by dishonorable flight, it came so to passe that few of them escaped. There died on that side (as some write) 20000 men in this battell, togither with Willfert king of the Gentes, Hanwall king of Britains, and seuen dukes that came to helpe the Scots and Danes. Athelstane by good aduise following the victorie, entred into Northumberland, and finding the countrie dispurueied of men of warre, he easilie made a full conquest thereof, hauing all the holds and fortresses deliuered into his hands.

Then without further delaye he passed into Westmerland, and after into Cumberland, where the inhabitants of both those regions bare-footed and bare-headed, in token of most humble submission, yielded themselves vnto him, promising from thenceforth to continue his faithfull subiects. In the meane time Malcolm being sore wounded in the battell, escaped; yet with great danger, and in an horse-litter was conueied home into his countrie, where he declared to king Constantine the whole circumstance of the ouerthrow and losse of his countreies aforesaid. Whereupon Constantine caused a counsell to be called at Abirneschie, where he perceiued how sore his realme was infeebled through lacke of such of the nobilitie as were lost in the last battell, by reason the residue that were left, seemed through want of vertue, neither able by counsell nor by force to defend the realme, so as he utterlie despaired either to be of power to beat backe the enemies, or to gouerne his realme in such politike sort as he would haue wished. And therefore, to rid himselfe of all such cares and troubles, and withall despising all such worldly pompe as might withhold him from diuine contemplation (whereunto he was partly bent) he gaue ouer his kinglie estate, and became a canon within the abbey of saint Andzeles amongst the couent there.

This was in the yere of our Saviour 943, and in the fortieth yere of his owne reigne (as Hector Boetius saith;) but if he did thus forsake the world, and entred into religion immediatlie after the battell fought at Bruningsfield or Brunenburgh (for so we find it named by some writers) then must it needs be before this supposed time alledged by the same Boetius, for that battell was fought anno 937, as the best approued amongst our English writers doe report, so that it should rather seeme that Constantine refused in deed to deale with the gouernement of the realme, about the same yere of our Lord 937, or shortly after; and that Malcolm gouerned as regent and not as king whilst Constantine liued, who departed this life (after he had continued in the abbey of saint Andzeles a certaine time) in the foresaid yere 943, falling in the fortieth yere after he first began to reigne. He was first buried in the church there amongst the bishops, but afterwards he was taken vp and translated vnto Colmekeill, where he had a tombe set ouer him, as was conuenient for the memorie of his name.

In the 36 yere of his reigne there were two monstrous creatures bozne in Albion, the one amongst the Danes being an hermaphrodite, that is to say, a child with both sexes, hauing the head like a swine, the best standing forth moze in resemblance than the common shape of man, a fat bellie, with feete like a gose, legs like a man, full of bristles, and a verie euill fauored thing to behold. The other was bozne in Northumberland, onelie hauing a mans sex, with one whole bellie from the nauill downe, but about the same diuided with two bellies crested or compassed ridge-wise, and not broad like to the shape of man: beside this it had foure armes and two heads. And euen as from the nauill upwards it was thus diuided into two bodies, so did it appeare there was two contrarie wills or desires in the same, euer lusting contrarie, as when the one did sleepe, the other would wake; when the one required to haue meat, the other passed for none at all. Oftentimes would they chide and bzaile togither, insomuch that at length they fell so far at variance, that they did beat and rent either other verie pitifullie with their nailes. At length the one with long sickness wearied away and finally deceassing, the other was not able to abide the greivous smell of the dead carcasse, but immediatlie after died also.

About the same time there issued forth a fontaine of blood out of the side of a mountaine in Gallo-way, and flowed in great abundance for the space of seuen daies togither, so that all the riuers therabout (whereof there is great store in that countrie) had their waters mixed with blood, and so running into the sea, caused the same to seeme bloudie certaine miles distant from the shore. These prodigious sights put men in great feare, for that diuinitie did interpret the same to signifie some great bloudshed to fall vpon the Scots shortly after. They were also the better belaued, for that within a while after, that great ouerthrow happened at Bruningsfield, as before is specified.

After into sonne of Constantine: who force of the no hope to study wa ders of the to procure was about Athelstane dible in thumberl with him newes p he under skilfull a counsell t sembled p it might b conclusi broken by was brow had chanc ing alien right cru remaini pursue th appeared i Aualassus ther a Ter and with there bye span, an sed from time kin of his per nie into no man Which in that ther ons made thanks t by this n Shortl stane vni be concl onis, acc motion h set a cou not whet that (as parts, k former l and sco should b After was nel their pecc compiz added th now rep should r land wi conditio the crow ing heir do hom perpetu establish of Con Cumber land. After

After that Constantine (as is said) was entred into religion, the before named Malcolme the sonne of Donald was admitted king; or rather regent: who although he perceived right well how the force of the realme was so infiebled, that there was no hope to mainteine warres abroad; yet his chiefe studie was by all means possible to defend the borders of the Scottish dominion, and before all things to procure peace with the Englishmen. But as he was about to haue sent ambassadours vnto king Athelstane, to haue treated for peace, he was credibly informed, how Athelstane had giuen Northumberland vnto Aualassus, and made a league with him to haue his aid against the Scots. Which newes put Malcolme in wonderfull dread, for that he vnderstood how his realme was unpurueied of skilfull capitaine to make resistance. Yet he caused a counsell to be called, wherein when such as were assembled proponed manie fond and childish reasons, it might happen there was small hope of anie good conclusion; but euen as they were at a point to haue broken by without anie certeine resolution, word was brought how through seditions discord, which had chanced betwixt the Danes and Englishmen being assembled together in campe, they had fought a right cruell and bloodie battell, the victorie in the end remaining with the Englishmen, who ceased not to pursue the Danes in chase, so long as anie day light appeared in the skie.

Aualassus with such Danes as he might get together after that overthow, fled into Westmerland, and within three daies after, in such ships as he found there vpon the coast, he sailed ouer into the Ile of Man, and spoiling the same, with all the preie he passed from thence ouer into Ireland. In the meane time king Athelstane hauing lost no small number of his people in the foresaid battell, omitted his iourne into Scotland, and lay still in Northumberland, no man vnderstanding what he intended to doe. Which newes were so pleasant to the Scottishmen, that there was common supplications and processions made through the whole realme, in rendering thanks to almightie God for deliuering the people by this means from so great and present a danger.

Shortlie after came ambassadours from Athelstane vnto Malcolme, to moue means for a peace to be concluded betwixt the Scottish and English nations, according to the articles of the old league, which motion was foolishly heard of Malcolme, though he set a countenance of the matter as though he passed not whether he had warre or peace: but in the end, for that (as he said) peace was most necessarie for all parts, he shewed himselfe willing to haue the old former league renewed betwixt the Englishmen and Scots, with anie reasonable conditions which should be thought requisite.

After the returne of the ambassadours, the league was newlie confirmed betwixt the two kings and their people, with the semblable articles as were comprised in the old league, with this article onelie added thereto; that Northumberland, being as now replenished most with Danish inhabitants, should remaine to the Englishmen; and Cumberland with Westmerland to the Scots: vpon this condition, that he which should succeed as heire vnto the crowne of Scotland after the kings deceasse, being heire apparant, should hold those regions, and doe homage vnto the king of England as his vassall perpetuallie for the same. The peace being thus established betwixt these nations, Indulph the sonne of Constantine the third was proclaimed prince of Cumberland, and inheritour to the crowne of Scotland.

After this, Malcolme passed the residue of his life in good quiet, without anie troubles of warre, as a man onelie studieng to mainteine the state of his realme in good order, as well for the wealth of the temporallie, as spiritualle, whereunto he was equallie inclined. At length, as he rode about the prouinces of his realme, to see the labours duly ministered, at Urine a village in Murray land, where he caused iustice to be somewhat specially executed vpon offenders, he was murdered in the night season by treason of a few conspirators, in the fiftieth yeare of his reigne. But such as did this wicked deed with their complices, by diligent examination were tried out, and on the next day being apprehended, suffered due execution, according as they had deserved, being taine in peeces with wild horses, and those peeces sent vnto sundrie cities, where they were hanged vpon the gates and towers, vntill they rotted away.

They that were the doers of the murder also, and procured the doers thereto, were thrust quite through vpon sharpe stakes, and after hanged by aloft on high gibbets; and other of the conspirators were put to other kinds of death, as the case seemed to require. The death of Malcolme chanced in the yeare after the death of our Sautour 959. Here we haue thought good to put you in remembrance, that either the Scots are deceived in their account of yeares; or else mistake the names of the kings of England: for where they write that this Malcolme departed this life about the 22 yeare of Athelstane king of England, that can not be; if Malcolms deceasse chanced in the yeare 959, for Athelstane was dead long before that time, to wit, in the yeare 940, and reigned but fiftene yeares.

Moreover, where the Scottish writers make mention of the warres which king Edmund that succeeded Athelstane had against Anlaf and the Danes of Northumberland, in the daies of king Indulph that succeeded Malcolme, it can not stand by anie means (if they mistake not their account of yeares) for the same Edmund was slain in the yeare 948. But verelie this fault in the last account of yeares is but too common in the Scottish historie, and therefore to him that should take vpon him to reforme the errors thereof in this behalfe, it were necessarie to alter in a maner the whole course of the same historie. And therefore we will not with anie man to giue anie credit vnto their account in yeares, touching the reignes of the English kings, further than they shall see them to agree with our writers, whome in that behalfe we may more safely follow, and by conferring the same with the Scottish writers in some places, happily perceiue the true time, as well of the reignes of their kings, as of acts done, to fall out in yeares and seasons, much differing from their account: whereof to admonish the reader, as well here as in the English historie, we haue thought it not impertinent.

And albeit that some may aske what reason we haue to moue vs to doubt of their account of yeares, more than we doe of that in our owne writers? We will referre the same vnto their iudgements that are learned, and haue travelled indifferently alike, as well in perusing the one as the other without affection. But as the errors are sooner found than amended, so haue we thought good to set downe in the margent of this booke, the yeares as we find them noted in the Scottish writers, specially in places where we differ anie thing from them, because we will not seeme by way of controuersie to preiudice the authors, further than by due consideration the well abused reader shall thinke it expedient.

But to my purpose. After the corps of Malcolme was once buried (according to the custome) amongst King Malcolme was murdered.

The conspirators were put to execution.

The murderers were taine with horses.

The procurers of the murder were stoned.

959. The mistake of the names and times of the English kings in the Scottish writers.

Indulph.

mongst his predecessors in the abbie church of Colmekill, Indulph prince of Cumberland was placed in the marble chaire at Scone, there receiving the crowne and other the inuestures of the kingdome. In the administration whereof he continued for the space of five yeares without anie notable trouble, in the end of which terme, he was required by messengers sent vnto him from Aualassus, to ioyne with him in league against the Englishmen, in reuenge of that ouerthrow, which aswell the Danes as Scots had receiued at Hozningfield, alledging that opportunitie was now offered, sith after the decess of Athelstane, the Englishmen had created Edmund to be their king, a man of a dull wit, & not fit for the administration of high affaires: neither did the league concluded betwixt Athelstane and Malcolme inforce anie impediment, but that he might enter the warre against the Englishmen, considering that both the princes that were the authors of that league were departed out of this life, by whose decess the said league was ended.

But Indulph for answer hereunto declared, that the league was concluded betwixt Malcolme and Athelstane, by great deliberation of aduise, and by consent of all the estates of both realmes, taking their solenne oth for the true obseruing thereof, so that he could not, vntlesse he should violate that oth, attempt anie thing to the breach of peace with the Englishmen, procuring the iust indignation of almighty God against him and his people in that behalf. Whereupon the Danes accounting Indulph but a slouthfull and negligent person for this kind of answer, as he that regarded not the honoz of his realme and people, in letting passe so great opportunitie to be reuenged of the Englishmen for the death of such Scots as died in the ouerthrow at Hozningfield, determined not to be noted with the like spot of reproch: but with all speed sending for aid into Norwaie, prepared to passe ouer into England, vnder the conduct of Aualassus, who ioining his power with the Norwegians, which came to his aid vnder the leading of a right ballant capitaine called Katnold, transported with all speed ouer into Northumberland, vnto whome the gouernour there named Elgarine, acknowledging himselfe to be descended of the Danish blood, yelded all the castles, townes & forts, promising to aid Aualassus against king Edmund to the uttermost of his power.

These newes comming to the knowledge of Edmund, with all speed he gathereth his power, and sending into Scotland for such aid as he ought to haue from thence by covenants of the league, there came vnto him ten thousand Scottishmen with ready wils to serue him in these his wars against the Danes. Then ioining his owne people with those Scottishmen, he set forward towards the enemies. There were an 8000 Northumberland men with Aualassus, the which vpon the first incounter with the Englishmen, fell streight to running away, which made an open and readie breach vnto the English part, to attaine the victorie: for the Danes being not able to resist the violent force of their enemies, encouraged now with the sight of the Northumbrians, were quicklie constrained to giue backe, and in the end to flee auaie, the Englishmen and Scots following in the chase with such fiercenesse, that all such as they ouertoke died vpon the sword, though they submitted themselves neuer so humbly in requiring mercie.

Elgarine yet chancing to fall into his enemies hands was taken aliuie: for so had Edmund commanded, that if anie man might take him, he should in anie case saue his life, that he might put him to death in most cruell wise, to the example of other.

After this, and for the space of three daies after the battell, Edmund lay still in the fields nere vnto the place where they fought, and then repaired vnto Forke, where Elgarine for his treason was taken in peeces with wild hordes. There chanced also no notable trouble in Albion, during the space of foure yeares after this said ouerthrow of the Danes with their capitaine Aualassus, who is also otherwise called Aulase, as is to be seene in the English histories, where the same make mention of the foresaid king Edmund, whome likewise they affirme to be the brother of Athelstane, mid not his sonne, as before is partly touched. Indulph in this meane time did with great diligence see to the good order of his realme, shewing therein what belonged to the office of a worthy prince. But euen as all things seemed to rest in peace & quietnes through the whole Ile of Albion, Hagon king of Norwaie, and Helrike king of Denmarke, of purpose to reuenge the slaughter of their countymen latelie made in Northumberland, came with a mightie nauie vnto the coasts of Scotland, assailing to land with their whole armie, first in the Forth, then in the riner of Taie; but yet through such resistance as the Scots made, being assembled together to keepe them off, they were faine to withdraue, and waiking along the coasts of Angus, the Sparcs, Spar, and Buthghane, at length fauning as though they would haue taken their course homewards, they launched forth into the high seas. But within foure daies after returning againe to the Forth, they landed their people earlie in one morning vpon the coast of Boen, at a place called Cullane, a countrie ioining vnto Buthghane, putting such of the countrie people to flight, as presented themselves to impeach their landing and inuasion.

But Indulph being aduertised hereof, forthwith assembling the whole power of his realme, drew towards that part with such speed, that he was come into Boen before his enemies were certified that he was set forward. So sone therefore as they heard he was come, such as were abroad forraing the same countrie, were called backe to the campe. But Indulph without protracting of time came still forward, and vpon his approach to the enemies, he prepared to giue battell, and with a short oration began to encourage his people to fight manfully. But before he could make an end, the Danes gaue the onset with such violence, that the battell a long space continued doubtfull on both sides, the Danes on the one part and the Scots on the other, doing their uttermost indouours to atchiue the victorie, till at length they of Louthian with their captains Dunbar and Grame began to appeare on the backe halfe of the Danes. With which sight they were put in such feare, that those which fought in the fore ward, retired backe vnto the middle ward, whome the Scots eagerlie pursuing, beat downe euen till they came vnto the reare ward, which coueting rather to die in the fight, than to giue backe, and so to be slaine in the chase (for those in the reare ward were heauie armed men) continued the battell more with a certaine stiffe stubbornnes of mind, than with anie great force or forcast, being so ouermatched as they were, & forsaken of their fellows: for other of the Danes, namelie the archers and berres fled their waies, some towards their ships, and some here and there being scattered abroad in the fields, fell into the moles, the marsh grounds, and other streits, where they were slaine euerie one by such as followed in the chase.

Indulph himselfe with certaine companies about him, departing from his maine battell to discover the fields, as though all had bene quiet on each side, fell by chance vpon a whole band of the Danes, where Indulph is provoked by Aualassus to warre against England.

His persuasions.

Indulph his answer.

The Danes not pleased with such an answer procure warre against England.

The Norwegians come to the aid of Aualassus. Katnold a ballant capitaine.

Elgarine yielded the forts vnto the Danes.

8000 soldiers sent vnto king Edmund.

Elgarine is taken prisoner.

Elgarine is taken in peeces.

King Indulph was charged in his office.

The king of Denmarke and Norwaie enter with their armie into Scotland.

The enemies are put off.

The king of Boen.

King Indulph by anie means was not to be overcome.

King Indulph prepared the battell.

The Danes gaue the onset.

A supple sent vnto the Scots.

The Danes fled.

The king with few in his company.

Indulph into the enemies danger through negligence.

King Indulph was slain with a dart and died.

10. 968.

Duff.

The king went vnto the Scottish king.

he purged the king.

Barretors taken and put to death.

Barretors compelled to make an occupation.

The nobles were discontented with the kings doings.

The occasion murmuring of the nobles.

The king fell sick.

the same lay fled from the battels, with shot through not before he whole number place. His town of Colmekill, after his predecessor reigned about though infor nation 968, a

After the Colmekill of Malcolme due solennitie lene the countie of Cumberland transported order there for robbers and p arrivall among fles afoze he would avoid of such maleficer ther common of such barret onlie vpon o

The thane king, tooke n lie by publick for them wher fort, the whic that they ha kind of people either else to with to get th uer so great with this ert gainst their accounting th cended of no their living l appertained a degree as tw of the nobilit ment by orde fort to be mai and condition

Furtherm themselves, to the comm respect to the to be an utter thie to haue vnles he kne This murmur in the fles, his realme, euill of the g tume the king greuous as could percei seane in him lie, siegme, o abound, whe such decate a bnneth anie

And other ward signes nothing faile fresh and fair hat more w

the same lay in covert within a close vallie, being fled from the field thither upon the first joining of the battels, with the which entering into flight, he was shot through the head with a dart, and so died; but not before he was revenged of those his enemies, the whole number of them being slaine there in the place. His bodie was first buried in Cullane, a towne of Horene, and after translated unto the abbie of Colmekill, and there interred amongst of ther his predecessors the Scottish kings. Indulph reigned about nine yeares and died thus valiantlie, though infortunatlie, in the yeare after the incarnation 968, as saith Hector Boetius.

After the corps of Indulph was removed unto Colmekill and there buried, Duffe the sonne of R. Malcolm was crowned k. at Horene with all due solemnitie. In the beginning of his reigne, Cuthbert the sonne of R. Indulph was proclaimed prince of Cumberland: immediatlie whereupon the king transported over into the wessterne Isles, to set an order there for certeine misdeemeanors used by divers robbers and pillers of the common people. At his arrivall amongst them he called the thanes of the Isles afore him, commanding strenghtlie as they would avoid his displeasure, to purge their countreies of such malefactors, whereby the husbandmen and other commons might live in quiet, without verasion of such barretors and idle persons as sought to live onlie upon other mens goods.

The thanes upon this charge given them by the king, took no small number of the offenders, partlie by publike authoritie, & partlie by lying in wait for them where they supposed their haunt was to resort, the which being put to execution according to that they had merited, caused the residue of that kind of people either to get them over into Ireland, either else to learne some manuell occupation therewith to get their living, yea though they were neuer so great gentlemen borne. Whobett the nobles with this extreme rigor shewed thus by the king against their linage, were much offended therewith, accounting it a great dishonor for such as were descended of noble parentage, to be constrained to get their living with the labor of their hands, which onlie appertained to plowmen, and such other of the base degree as were borne to travell for the maintenance of the nobilitie, and to serve at their commandement by order of their birth, and in no wise after such sort to be made in maner equall with them in state and condition of life.

Furthermore, they murmured closelie amongst themselves, how the king was onlie become friend to the commons & cleargie of his realme, having no respect to the nobilitie, but rather declared himselfe to be an bitter enimie thereof, so that he was unworthy to have the rule of the nobles and gentlemen, unles he knew better what belonged to their degree. This murmuring did spread not onlie amongst them in the Isles, but also through all the other parts of his realme, so that they ceased not to speake verie euill of the gouernement of things. In the meane time the king fell into a languishing disease, not so grievous as strange, that none of his physicians could perceiue what to make of it. For there was saine in him no token, that either choler, melancholie, siegine, or any other vicious humor did any thing abound, whereby his bodie should be brought into such decaye and consumption (so as there remained but anie thing upon him saue skin and bone.)

And thus it appeared manifestlie by all outward signes and tokens, that naturall moisture did nothing faile in the vitall spirits, his colour also was fresh and faire to behold, with such liuelines of looks, that more was not to be wished for; he had also a temperat desire and appetite to his meate & drinke, but yet could he not sleepe in the night time by anie prouocations that could be deuised, but still fell into exceeding sweats, which by no means might be restrained. The physicians perceiving all their medicines to want one effect, yet to put him in some comfort of helpe, declared to him that they would send for some cunning physicians into foreigne parts, who hapilie being cured with such kind of diseases, should easilie cure him, namelie so sone as the spring of the yeare was once come, which of it selfe should helpe much therewith.

Whobett the king, though he had small hope of recouerie, yet had he still a diligent care vnto the due administration of his lawes and good orders of his realme, dealing oft with his counsell about the same. But when it was understood into what a perillous sicknesse he was fallen, there were no small number, that contemning the authoritie of the magistrats, began to practise a rebellion. And amongst the chiefest were those of Murrayland, who slaying sundrie of the kings officers, began to rage in most cruell wise against all such as were not consenting to their misordered tumult. The kings physicians forbad in anie wise, that the king should be aduertised of such businesse, for doubt of increasing his sickness with trouble of mind about the same. But about that present time there was a murmuring amongst the people, how the king was vexed with no naturall sicknesse, but by sorcerie and magicall art, practised by a sort of witches dwelling in a towne of Murrayland, called Fores.

Whereupon, albeit the author of this secret talke was not knowne: yet being brought to the kings eare, it caused him to send forthwith certeine wittie persons thither, to inquire of the truth. They that were thus sent, dissembling the cause of their iourne, were receiued in the darke of the night into the castell of Fores by the lieutenant of the same, called Donwald, who continuing faithfull to the king, had kept that castell against the rebels to the kings vse. Vnto him therefore these messengers declared the cause of their coming, requirng his aid for the accomplishment of the kings pleasure.

The souldiers, which laie there in garrison, had an inkling that there was some such matter in hand as was talked of amongst the people; by reason that one of them kept as concubine a young woman, which was daughter to one of the witches as his par amour, who told him the whole manner vied by his mother & other his companions, with their intent also, which was to make auaile the king. The souldier having learned this of his lemmann, told the same to his fellows, who made report to Donwald, and hee shewed it to the kings messengers, and therewith sent for the young damosell which the souldier kept, as then being within the castell, and caused hir vpon strict examination to confesse the whole matter as she had sene and knew. Whereupon learning by his confession in that house in the towne it was where they brought there mischievous mysferie, he sent forth souldiers about the middest of the night, who breaching into the house, found one of the witches roasting vpon a wooden broch an image of war at the fier, resembling in each feature the kings person, made and deuised (as is to be thought) by craft and art of the diuell; an other of them sat reciting certeine words of enchantment, and still basted the image with a certeine liquor heric buillie.

The souldiers finding them occupied in this wise, took them together with the image, and led them into the castell, where being strenghtlie examined for what purpose they went about such manner of enchantment, they answered, to the end to make away

The king being sicke, yet he regarded justice to be executed.

A rebellion practised.

The rebellion was kept from the kings knowledge.

Witches in Fores.

Inquire was made.

The matter appeared to be true.

A witchs daughter is examined.

The witches are found out.

An image of war roasting at the fire.

The witches were examined.

The whole matter is confessed.

The nobles
of the countrie set the witches on work.

The witches were burnt.

The king is restored to health.

The king
with an armie pursued the rebels.

The rebels are executed.

Captain Don-
wald craved
pardon for them but not granted.

Donwald
conceiveth hatred against the king.

Donwalds
wife counsel-
led him to murder the king.

The woman's evil counsell is followed.

the king: for as the image did waste afore the fire, so did the bodie of the king breake forth in sweat. And as for the words of the enchantment, they served to keepe him still waking from slepe, so that as the war ever melted, so did the kings flesh: by the which meanes it should haue come to passe, that when the war was once cleane consumed, the death of the king should immediatlie follow. So were they taught by euill spirits, and hired to worke the feat by the nobles of Murray land. The standers by, that heard such an abhominable tale told by these witches, straightwaies brake the image, and caused the witches (according as they had well deserved) to be burnt to death.

It was said, that the king at the verie same time that these things were a doing within the castell of Forres, was deliuered of his languor, and slept that night without anie sweat breaking forth upon him at all, & the next daie being restored to his strength, was able to doe anie maner of thing that lay in man to doe, as though he had not bene sicke before anie thing at all. But howsoever it came to passe, truth it is, that when he was restored to his perfect health, he gathered a power of men, & with the same went into Murray land against the rebels there, and chasing them from thence, he pursued them into Ross, and from Ross into Cathness, where apprehending them, he brought them backe vnto Forres, and there caused them to be hanged vp, on gallows and gibets.

Amongest them there were also certaine young gentlemen, right beautiful and goodlie personages, being more of kin vnto Donwald captaine of the castell, and had bene persuaded to be partakers with the other rebels, more through the fraudulent counsell of diuerse wicked persons, than of their owne accord: whereupon the foresaid Donwald lamenting their case, made earnest labor and sute to the king to haue begged their pardon; but hauing a plaine deniall, he conceiued such an inward malice towards the king (though he shewed it not outwardlie at the first) that the same continued still boiling in his stomach, and ceased not, till through setting on of his wife, and in reuenge of such vnthankfulnesse, he found meanes to murder the king within the foresaid castell of Forres where he vsed to sojourn. For the king being in that countrie, was accustomed to lie most communlie within the same castell, hauing a speciall trust in Donwald, as a man whom he neuer suspected.

But Donwald, not forgetting the reproch which his linage had susteined by the execution of those his kinsmen, whome the king for a spectacle to the people had caused to be hanged, could not but shew manifest tokens of great griefe at home amongst his familie: which his wife perceiuing, ceased not to traueill with him, till she vnderstood what the cause was of his displeasure. Which at length when she had learned by his owne relation, she as one that bare no lesse malice in hir heart towards the king, for the like cause on hir behalfe, than hir husband did for his friends, counselled him (sith the king oftentimes vsed to lodge in his house without anie gard about him, other than the garrison of the castell, which was wholie at his commandement) to make him awaie, and shewed him the meanes whereby he might soonest accomplish it.

Donwald thus being the more kindled in wrath by the words of his wife, determined to follow hir aduise in the execution of so heinous an act. Whereupon deuising with himselfe for a while, which way he might best accomplish his cursed intent, at length gat opportunitie, and sped his purpose as followeth. It chanced that the king upon the daie before he purposed to depart forth of the castell, was long in his or-ratorie at his prayers, and there continued till it was late in the night. At the last, comming forth, he called such afore him as had faithfullie serued him in pursute and apprehension of the rebels, and giuing them heartie thanks, he bestowed sundrie honorable gifts amongst them, of the which number Donwald was one, as he that had bene euer accounted a most faithfull servant to the king.

At length, hauing talked with them a long time, he got him into his priue chamber, enclie with two of his chamberlains, who hauing brought him to bed, came forth againe, and then fell to banquetting with Donwald and his wife, who had prepared diuerse delicate dishes, and sundrie sorts of drinks for their reave supper or collation, wher at they sate by so long, till they had charged their stomachs with such full gorges, that their heads were no sooner got to the pillow, but asleepe they were so fast, that a man might haue remoued the chamber ouer them, sooner than to haue awaked them out of their drunken slepe.

Then Donwald, though he abhorred the act greatlie in heart, yet through instigation of his wife he called foure of his seruants vnto him (whome he had made priue to his wicked intent before, and framed to his purpose with large gifts) and now declaring vnto them, after what sort they should worke the feat, they gladlie obeyed his instructions, & speedilie going about the murder, they enter the chamber (in which the king lay) a little before cocks crow, where they secretlie cut his throte as he lay sleeping, without anie busking at all: and immediatlie by a posterne gate they caried forth the dead bodie into the fields, and throwing it vpon an horse there prouided readie for that purpose, they conuey it vnto a place, about two miles distant from the castell, where they staid, and gat certaine labourers to helpe them to turne the course of a little riuer running through the fields there, and digging a deepe hole in the chanell, they burie the bodie in the same, ramming it vp with stones and grauell so close, that letting the water in the right course againe, no man could perceiue that anie thing had bene netolie digged there. This they did by order appointed them by Donwald as is reported, for that the bodie should not be found: & by blinding (when Donwald should be present) declare him to be guiltie of the murder. & for such an opinion on men haue, that the dead corps of anie man being slaine, will bleed abundantlie if the murderer be present. But for what consideration soeuer they buried him there, they had no sooner finished the worke, but that they flue them whose helpe they vsed herein, and straightwaies thereupon fled into Dunkie.

Donwald, about the time that the murder was in doing, got him amongst them that kept the watch, and so continued in companie with them all the residue of the night. But in the morning when the noise was raised in the kings chamber how the king was slaine, his bodie conueied awaie, and the bed all beraied with blood; he with the watch ran thither, as though he had knowne nothing of the matter, and breaking into the chamber, and finding cakes of blood in the bed, and on the floor about the sides of it, he forthwith flue the chamberlains, as guiltie of that heinous murder, and then like a mad man running to and fro, he ransacked euerie corner within the castell, as though it had bene to haue seene if he might haue found either the bodie, or anie of the murderers hid in anie priue place: but at length comming to the posterne gate, and finding it open, he burdened the chamberlains, whome he had slaine, with all the fault, they hauing the keies of the gates committed to their keeping all the night, and therefore it could not be otherwife (said he) but that they were of counsell in the committing of that most detestable

Some toller
than other.
The master
suspected.

The king
was sweated by friends.

The king
went to bed.

His chamberlains were banquetting.

Culene

The king affected the cause of the foule
weather.
The bishops answer vnto
the king.

The king required pub-
like prayers to be had.

The king
made an ory.

The king
went with an armie into Murray land.

A guiltie conscience accusith a man.

Donwald getteth him se-
cretlie awaie.

The murder of the king is reuealed.

The castell of Forres is taken and all the inhabitant's
slaine.

the murder Final
the seuer
herein,
matter,
should in much as whole rul-
tie togith-
till time hereupon
For the
nons musunne by realme,
all clouds
rose, with were in
I the
the son panted in the realme croune ming the cause the made an shewed
for that vnlesse
for that tion of mishmen Culene
publike cises to parts of wrath in in femb
was. W it with assembl
ged the tants of
The
mor, fol-
out furt tants of
cause of fear: l ence, bo-
he infor making ther of him, he Spey, k
same, Forwa
confic sture o
sight n this D suspect
crime full ser-
not thu
now de ting hi uerted punish son in Spey
that h
fire D

ble murder.

Finallie, such was his ouer earnest diligence in the seuerer inquisition and triall of the offenders herein, that some of the lords began to milke the matter, and to smell forth shewd tokens, that he should not be altogether cleare himselfe. But for so much as they were in that countrie, where he had the whole rule, what by reason of his friends and authoritie together, they doubted to tetter what they thought, till time and place should better serue them vnto, and hereupon got them awaie euerie man to his home. For the space of six moneths together, after this heinous murder thus committed, there appeared no sunne by day, nor moone by night in anie part of the realme, but still was the skie covered with continuall clouds, and sometimes such outrageous winds arose, with lightnings and tempests, that the people were in great feare of present destruction.

In the meane time Culene prince of Cumberland, the sonne (as I haue said) of king Indulph, accompanied with a great number of lords and nobles of the realme, came vnto Scone, there to receive the crowne according to the manner: but at his coming thither, he demanded of the bishops what the cause should be of such vntemperate weather. Who made answer, that vndoubtedly almightie God shewed himselfe thereby to be offended most highlie for that wicked murder of king Duffe: and suerlie unless the offenders were tried forth and punished for that deed, the realme should feele the iust indignation of the diuine iudgement, for omitting such punishment as was due for so greivous an offense. Culene hereupon required the bishops to appoint publike processions, fastings, and other godlie exercises to be vsed of the priests and people, through all parts of the realme, for the good appeasing of Gods wrath in this behalfe; and in such sort and manner as in semblable cases the vse and custome in those daies was. He himselfe made a solemne vow, confirming it with a like oath, before all the peeres & nobles there assembled, that he would not cease till he had reuenged the death of king Duffe vpon the false inhabitants of Murrey land, to the example of all other.

The multitude being present, getting them to arms, followed their prince, taking his iournie without further delay towards Murrey land, the inhabitants of which region hearing of his approach, and the cause of his coming, were stricken with exceeding feare: but namely Donwald, being guiltie in conscience, doubted lest if he were put to torture, he should be enforced to confesse the truth. Whereupon without making his wife priuie to his departure, or anie other of his familie, saue a few such as he took with him, he secretlie got him to the mouth of the riuer of Spey, where finding a ship readie, he went aboard the same, purposing to haue fled his waies by sea into Norwate: for this is the peculiar propertie of a guiltie conscience, to be afraid of all things, and either in gesture or countenance to betraie it selfe, accounting flight most sure, if occasion may serue thereto. For this Donwald, whome no man (though some partlie suspected him) might well haue burdened with the crime of his maisters death (by reason of his faithfull seruice shewed towards him aforetime) had he not thus sought to haue avoided the countrie, was now detected of manifest treason, euerie man detecting his abominable fact, and wishing him to be overwhelmed in the raging floods, so to paie the due punishment, which of right he ought, for his vile treason in murdering his naturall lord.

Culene being hereof aduertised, passed ouer Spey water, and taking the castell of Forres, slew all that he found therein, and put the house to sacke and fire. Donwalds wife with his three daughters were taken: for Culene commanded that whosoever could light vpon them, should in anie wise saue their liues, and bring them vnto him. Which being done, he had them to the racke, where the mother vpon hir examination confessed the whole matter, how by hir procurement chiefe hir husband was moued to cause the deed to be done, who they were that by his commandement did it, and in what place they had buried the bodie. Where would the multitude haue run vpon hir and tozied hir in peeces, but that they were restrained by commandement of an officer at armes. The King with the residue for that night rested themselves, and in the morning took order for due provision of all things necessarie to take vp the bodie of king Duffe, and then to conueie it vnto Colmekill, there to be buried amongst his predecessors.

But as they were busie hereabout, word came that the traitor Donwald was by shipwracke cast vpon the shore within foure miles of the castell, as though he were by Gods provision brought backe into his owne countrie to suffer worthe punishment for his demerits. Whereupon the inhabitants of the places next adjoining took him, and kept him fast bound till they knew further of the kings pleasure: who verie glad of the newes, sent forth immediatlie a band of men to fetch him. They that were sent did as they were commanded: and being scarce returned, there came in diuerse lords of Koffe, bringing with them Donwalds foure seruants, which (as before is said) did execute the murder. Thus all the offenders being brought together vnto the place where the murder was both contriued and executed, they were arraigned, condemned, and put to death in manner as followeth, to the great reioicing of the people that beheld the same.

They were first scourged by the hangman, and then bowelled, their entrails being thowen into a fire and burnt, the other parts of their bodies were cut in to quarters, and sent vnto the chiefe cities of the realme, and there set vp aloft vpon the gates & highest towers, for example sake to all such as should come after, how heinous a thing it is to pollute their hands in the sacred blood of their prince. This head-fall end had Donwald and his wife, before he saw anie sunne after the murder was committed, and that by the appointment of the most righteous God, the creator of that heauenlie planet and all other things, who suffereth no crime to be vnreruenged. Those that were the takers of the murderers were highlie rewarded for their paines and trauell therein sustained, being exempt from charges of going forth to the warres, and also of all manner of payments belonging to publike duties, as tributes, subsidies, and such like.

These things being thus ordered, the bodie of king Duffe was taken vp, and in most pompous manner conueied vnto Colmekill, accompanied all the waie by Culene, and a great multitude of lords both spirituall and temporall, with other of the meaner states. There be that haue written how his bodie (though it had laine six moneths vnder the ground) was nothing impaired either in colour or otherwise, when it was taken vp, but was found as whole and sound as though it had bene yet alieue, the skarres of the wounds onelie excepted. But to proceed, so far as it was brought about the ground, the aie began to cleare vp, and the sunne brake forth, shining more bright than it had bene sene aforetime, to anie of the beholders remembrance. And that which put men in most deepe consideration of all, was the sight of manifold flowers, which sprang forth ouer all the fields immediatlie thereupon, cleane contrarie to the time and season of the yeere.

Within a few yeeres after this, there was a bridge made

The murder is whole confessed.

King Duffe his bodie to be taken vp.

Donwald is taken prisoner.

Donwalds foure seruants were taken also.

Donwald with his confederates are executed.

Rewards giuen vnto the takers of those murderers.

The bodie of king Duffe honorablie buried.

Marvellous things are sene.

Killog.

Whores eate their owne
flesh.
A monstrous
child.
A sparhawk strangled by an owle.

972.

King Culene
did not continue as his beginning was.

He folloves his sensuall lustes.

Guill doers
were not punished.

God counsell was not heard

The kings
answer vnto
his graue
pæres.

He should not displease.

made ouer the water in the same place, where the bodie had bene buried, and a village builded at the one end of the bridge, which is called vnto this day, Kil-log, that is to say, the church of flowers: taking that name of the wonder there happened at the remouing of the kings bodie, as the same authoꝝ would seeme to meane. But there is now (or was of late) a rich abbeie, standing with a vertie faire church, consecrat in the honoꝝ of the virgine Marie. Spontaneous lights also that were seene within the Scottish kingdome that yere were these: horses in Louthian, being of singular beautie and swiftnesse, did eate their owne flesh, and would in no wise take anie other meate. In Angus there was a gentlewoman brought forth a child without eyes, nose, hand, or foot.
There was a sparhawk also strangled by an owle.
Neither was it anie lesse wonder that the sunne, as before is said, was continuallie covered with clouds for six moneths space. But all men understood that the abhominable murder of king Duffe was the cause hereof, which being reuenged by the death of the authoꝝ, in manner as before is said; Culene was crowned as lawfull successor to the same Duffe at Scone, with all due honoꝝ and solemnitie, in the yere of our Lord 972, after that Duffe had ruled the Scottish kingdome about the space of foure yeres.

The beginning of Culenes reigne, begun with righteous execution of iustice, promised a firme hope of an other manner of prince, than by the administration which followed he declared himselfe to be:
for shortly after loosing the reins of lasciuious wantonnesse to the youth of his realme, through giuing a letw example by his owne disordered doings, all such as were inclined vnto licentious living, followed their sensuall lusts and vnbridled libertie, abandoning all feare of correction more than euer had bene seene or heard of in anie other age. For such was the negligence of the king, or rather maintenance of misordered persons, that whatsoeuer anie of the nobilitie did either against merchants, priests, or anie of the commons, though the same were neuer so great an iniurie, there was no punishment bled against them: so that all men looked for some commotion in the common-wealth thereupon to in-sue, if there were not other order prouided therfore in time. The ancient pæres of the realme also being griued thereat, spared not to admonish the king of his dutie, declaring vnto him into what danger the realme was likelie to fall through his negligent be-hauour.

Culene answered them, that he wist well enough how young men were not at the first bozne graue and sage personages, like to them with hoarie heads: wherefore their first youthfull yeres could not be so stable as they might be hereafter by old age and continuance of time. But as for such rigorous extreni-tie as diuerse of his elders had bled towards their subiects, he minded not (as he said) to follow, being taught by their example (as by the kings, Indulph, Duffe, and such other) into what danger he might in-cure by such sharpe feneritie shewed in the government of the estate. Whereupon he was determined so to rule, as he might giue cause rather to be beloued than feared, which was the onelie meane (as he thought) to reueine his subiects in due and most faith-full obedience. His answer was such, that although it seemed nothing agreable for the preservation of the publike state in quiet rest and safetie, yet was there no man, by reason of his regall authoritie, that durst reprove the same, but diuerse there were that praised him therein, as those that hated all such as loued the byright administration of iustice.

But such ancient counsellors as had trulie ser-ued in rule of the common-wealth in the daies of the former kings, Indulph & Duffe, minding the state of that present world (wherein the youth of the realme, namelie all such as were descended of noble parentage, and bled to be about the king, followed their wilfull & sensuall lusts, growing euerie day through want of correction to be worse and worse) departed from the court, and withdrew to their homes, without meddling anie further with the publike administration. In whose place there crept in others, that with their flatterie corrupted the residue of such sparks of god inclination as yet remained in the king, if anie were at all; insomuch that in the end he measured supreme felicitie by the plentiful inoleng of voluptuous pleasures and bobbie lusts. He fancied onelie such as could deuise prouocations thervnto, and in filling the bellie with excess of costlie meates and drinks, those that could excell other were chieslie cherished, and most highlie of him este-med.

Wherewithall he was giuen vnto lecherie beyond all the bounds of reason, sparing neither mat, widow, nor wife, prophane nor religious, sister nor daughter (for all was one with him) that to heare of such villanie and violent forcings as were practised by him and his familiars, it would loth anie honest hart to vnderstand or remember. He was so farre past all shame in this behalfe, that when his lecherons lust by too much copulation was so tired, that he might no more exercise his former lewdnesse, he toke speciall pleasure yet to behold other to do it in his presence, that his decayed lust might be the more stirred by with sight of such filthinesse. This abhominable trade of life he practised for the space of thre yeres together, giuing occasion of much spoile, rauine, manslaughter, forcings, and rauishments of women, with all such kind of wicked and diuelish transgressions: no execution of lawes (instituted by authoritie of the former kings, for restraint of such flagitious offenses) being put in vye, through negligence of this monstrous creature.

So farre forth also increased the libertie of thieues, robbers, and other offenders, maintained by such of the nobilitie as consented vnto their vnlawfull doings, and were partakers with them in the same, that if anie man went about to withstand them, or refused to accomplish their requests and demands, he should be spoiled of all that he had, and hapilie haue his house burnt ouer his head, or otherwise be misused in such outrageous and violent sort, that it would griue all those that had anie zeale to iustice, to heare of such enormities as were daile practised in that countrie. Howbeit, at length the death of king Culene brought an end to all such wicked dealings: for falling into a filthie disease (through abuse of excessiue drinking and lecherie) called the wasting of nature, he consumed awaie in such wise by rotting of his flesh, that he appeared more like vnto a dead carcase, than vnto a liuelie creature, insomuch that his owne seruants began to abhor him.

Whereupon the lords and other honoꝝable personages of the realme, vnderstanding his case, caused a parlement to be summoned at Scone, where they determined to depose king Culene, and appoint some other (whome they should iudge most meetest) to reigne in his place. Culene also not knowing therefore this counsell was called, as he was going thitherwards, at Herten castell, being almost in the mid waie of his iourne, was murdered by one Cadhard the thane of that place, whose daughter he had rauished before time amongst diuerse other. This end had Culene together with all his filthie sensuali-tie: but the reprochfull infamie thereof remaineth in memoꝝie with his posteritie, and is not like to be forgotten

Ancient counsellors leave the court.

The youthfull court followeth their sen-
suall lusts.

Whiche
time of balage
was finished.

A lecherous
king.

Forcing of women kind
exceeded.

Whiche be-hauour!

All honestie
spiled.

Robberie,
theft, &c. were maintained.

Death made an end of all.

Conitrad.

A parlement.

King Culene
was murdered.

976.

Kenneth.

Whiche is renamed.

King Keneth was of a vicious li-
uing.

He loved strangers.

He abhorred
truth.

He did punish his doings.

He kept in Lamerie.

He grile ran
mad.

He king dissembled with his doings.

He king
came to visit
Saint Pirian.

He king
consulted how he should restrain the transgressors of his iudge-
ment.

An assemblie had at Scone.

Armed men were in wait.

gotten whilste it
dispatched in the birth of our Sa-
of the realme re-
loved not of the

After that A conueied
mongst his eld-sembled togethe-Kenneth the son
vnto Duffe, his his reigne, he le-from their wil-
which they were ment of his prociuil demeanour
is, that first the people transforprince: therefore living shew an litie, and mode-
vice, but refrai-
nished all such ther him or othsures. He mai-as with his oth-
all such as soug-of meanes. He
to auoid sloth, erces, iudgi-
to aduance the flourishing sta-

Thus when ders of his semeanes he con-
the lawes and
and to purge
and other such peace. At Lan-appointed to certeine offen-
at their cominfest proofes
crimes as they able to excuse noble men vi-
cretlie their vi-
some into oth-pedient for sa-
uing that thir-
his purpose v-nister iustice lawes, he dis-ced euerie in-onelie except sit saint Pirian.
he had made
rence which a deuise, wher-vnto iudgen-
pære follow-
bare them go-
of, they wou-
purpose.

At length
all the lords Scone, as bout some realme. He ther into the his faithfull
close in a se-
to their capti-his bands till gotten whilste the world goeth about. He was thus dispatched in the fift yere of his reigne, and after the birth of our Sauour 976, the nobles & great pères of the realme reioicing at his death, though they allowed not of the manner thereof.

After that the bodie of king Culene was once conueied vnto Colmekill, and there buried amongst his elders, the nobles and great pères assembled together at Scone, where they proclaimed Kenneth the sonne of Malcolme the first, and brother vnto Duffe, king of the realme. In the beginning of his reigne, he had inough to doe to reduce the people from their wild and sauage kind of life (into the which they were fallen through the negligent government of his predecessour) vnto their former trade of ciuill demeanour. For the nature of the Scotchmen is, that first the nobles, and then all the residue of the people transfigure themselves to the vsage of their prince: therefore did Kenneth in his owne trade of liuing shew an example of chastitie, sobrietie, liberallitie, and modestie, misusing himselfe in no kind of vice, but restraining himselfe from the same. He banished all such kind of persons as might prouoke either him or other vnto anie lewd or wanton pleasures. He mainteined amitie aswell with strangers as with his owne people, punishing most rigorously all such as sought to moue sedition by anie manner of meanes. He toke busie care in causing the people to auoid sloth, and to applie themselves in honest exercises, iudging (as the truth is) that to be the waie to aduance the common-wealth from decaye to a flourishing state.

Thus when he had somewhat reformed the misorders of his subjects, he inuenged himselfe by all meanes he could deuise to punish offenders against the lawes and wholesome ordinances of the realme, and to purge all his dominions of thieues, robbers, and other such as went about to disquiet common peace. At Lanerke, a towne in Rile, was a sessions appointed to be kept for execution of iustice, where certaine offenders were summoned to appeere. But at their comming thither, perceiving that such manifest proofes would be brought against them of such crimes as they had committed, that they were not able to excuse the same, through perswasion of diuerse noble men vnto whom they were of kin, they fled secretly their waies, some into the westerne Isles, and some into other places, where they thought most expedient for safeguard of their liues. The king perceiving that through the dissolall meanes of the lords his purpose was so hindered, that he might not minister iustice, according to the institution of his lawes, he dissembled his wrath for a time, and licensed euerie man to depart to their houses, his traine onelie excepted. Then went he into Galloway to visit saint Finian for performance of his vow, which he had made so to doe. Where he inuenged (by conference which he had with some of his priue counsell) a deuise, whereby he might fetch againe the offenders vnto iudgement: but this was kept close till the yere following, for doubt least if those lords which bare them god will had come to anie inkling thereof, they would by uttering it haue disappointed his purpose.

At length, after a yere was passed, he appointed all the lords and nobles of his realme to assemble at Scone, as though it had bene to haue communed about some weightie affaires touching the state of the realme. The night then before they should come together into the councill-chamber, he caused by some of his faithfull ministers, a sort of armed men to be laid close in a secret place, with commandement giuen to their capitaine, that in no wise he should stirre with his hand till the next day that all the lords were assembled together, and then without delaye to execute that which should be giuen him in commandement.

On the morrow after the nobles comming together into the councill-chamber, they had no sooner taken their places, euerie one according to his degree about the king, but that the armed men before mentioned, came rushing into the house, placing themselves round about them that were set, according to the order prescribed by former appointment. The lords with this present sight being much amazed, beheld one another, but durst not speake a word. Then the king perceiving their feare, began to declare vnto them the whole cause of his calling them to councill at that time, and why he had appointed those armed men to be there attendant. The effect of his oration there made vnto them was, that he had not caused those armed men to come into the chamber for anie harme ment towards anie of their persons, but onelie for the publike preservation of the realme. For so much as they knew, there was one kind of people much noisome to the common-wealth, being confederate as it were together by one consent to exercise all sorts of mischief and oppression against the poore people, as to rob, spoile, and take from them all that they had, to rauish their wiues, maids, & daughters, and some times to burne their houses: the which licentious libertie in such wicked persons, through want of due punishment in the daies of king Culene, what danger it had brought vnto the whole state of the Scotch common-wealth, there was none but might well vnderstand.

For sith it was so, that the lords and other high estates liued by the trauell of the commons, then if the same commons should in anie wise decaye, the lords and such other high estates could in no wise prosper: for if the labourer through iniurie of the robber were forced to giue ouer his labour, where should the lord or gentleman haue whereupon to liue: So that those which robbed the husbandman, robbed also the lord and gentleman; and they that sought to mainteine such loitering persons as used to rob the poore man, went about the destruction both of king, lord, and gentleman; yea and finallye of the vniuersall state of the whole common-wealth. Therefore he that loued the common-wealth, would not seeke onelie to defend the commons from such iniuries as thieues and robbers dailye offered them; but also would helpe to see iust execution done vpon the same thieues and robbers, according to the laudable lawes and customes of the land. The last yere (saide he) you your selues remember (I thinke) how I purposed by your helpe and counsell to haue proceeded by order of the lawes against all enemies and perturbors of the peace. At Lainrike was the day appointed for them to haue appeared, but there was not one of them that would come in, but contemptuously disobeying our commandement kept them awaie, by whose counsell I know not. But I haue bene informed by some how diuers of you fauoring those rebels, by reason they were of your linage, were of counsell with them, in withstanding them selues so from iudgement.

The often sending of messengers betwixt them and you, well nere persuaded vs to thinke that this report was true. But yet not withstanding, I haue put away all such sinister suspicion out of my head, wishing you (as I trust you be) void of all such dissimulation. And now I require you, not as fauors of the rebelles, but as defenders of the common-wealth, though hapilie somewhat slacke heretofore in discharge of your duties, to shew your selues such in helping to apprehend the offenders, as that the world may perceiue you to haue made full satisfaction for your fault and error, if before in you there were

The king and lords sitting, the armed men step forth.

The king perceiving the lords out of doubt.

An oration made by the king.

A rehearsal of all enormities Lainrike, or Lanerke.

were anie. In the end he was plaine with them, and told them flatlie that they should assure themselves to haue those armed men which they saw there present, to be continually attendant about them, till he might haue all the rebelles at commandement.

The lords hauing heard the kings speech, and perceiving what his meaning was, first partly excused themselves so well as they might of their cloaked dissimulation, and then falling downe upon their knees afore him, besought him to put away all displeasure out of his mind, and clearelie to pardon them, if in anie wise they had offended his maiestie, promising that they would with all diligence and faithfullnesse accomplish his desire, in causing the offenders to be brought in vnto iudgement: and till the time that this were brought to passe, they were well contented to remaine in such place where he should appoint them to abide. The counsell then being broken by, the king with those lords passing ouer the riuer of Tait, went vnto Bertha, which towne during the kings abode in the same, was straitlie kept with watch and ward, that no creature might enter or go forth without knowledge of the officers appointed by the king to take heed thereunto. If anie idle person were espied abroad in the streets, straightwaies the sergeants would haue him to ward.

The nobles remained in the kings house, or in other lodgings to them assigned, procuring by their friends and ministers to haue such offenders as vied to rob and spoile the husbandmen, apprehended and brought to the king to Bertha, there to receiue iudgement & punishment according to their merits: for so they perceiued they must needs worke, if they minded the safegard of their owne liues. Hereof it followed also, that within short space after, there were brought vnto Bertha to the number nere hand of five hundred such idle loiterers as vied to liue by spoile and pillage, manie of them being descended of famous houses: all which compaignie being condemned for their offenses to die, were hanged by on gibbets about the towne, and commandement giuen by the king, that their bodies should not be taken downe, but there to hang still to giue example to other, what the end was of all such as by wrongfull means sought to liue idelie by other mens labours.

The rebelles being thus executed, king Kenneth licenced the lords to depart to their owne houses, exhorting them to remember their duties towards the common-wealth, and to studie for preservation of peace and quietnesse according to their vocation. After this, the realme continued in quietnesse without anie forraigne or inward trouble for the space of certeine yeares following, and had remained in the same state still, if the Danes had not made a new inuasion, who being soze greued in their hearts for such displeasures as they had sustained in Albion, determined now with great assurance to reuenge the same. Whereupon gathering an huge multitude of men together, they were imbarcked in vessels provided for them; and sailing forth, they purposed to take land vpon the next coast of Albion where they should chance to arrive; & being once on land, to destroye all before them, except where the people should submit & yeld themselves vnto them. This nauie being once got abroad, within short time arrived at that point of land in Angus, which is called the red Bzaies, or red head, not far from the place where the abbie of Abirborth, or Abirborthoke was afterward founded.

Here the Danish fleet first casting anchor, their capteins fell in consultation what they were best to do. Some of them were of this opinion, that it was not most expedient for them to land in that place, but rather to passe from thence into England; for at the Scottishmens hands being poore, and yet a fierce and hardie nation, there was small good to be got, being thereto accustomed to giue more overthrowes than they commonlie receiued. Againe, the soil of that countrie was but barren, and in manner ouergrown with woods (as it was in deed in those daies) with few towne & small habitations, and those so poore, that no man knowing the same, would vouch safe to fight for anie possession of them: wherein contrariwise England (that part namelie which lieth towards the south) was so fruitfull of corne and cattell, so rich of mines, and replenished with so manie notable cities and towne inhabited with men of great wealth and substance, that few were to be found comparable thereto. So that the matter being well considered, they could not do better, than to saile into Kent, where they might be sure of rich spoile, without anie great resistance. Other there were that held how that this iourne was attempted by the counsell of their superiours, onlie to reuenge such iniuries as the Danish nation had receiued at the hands of the Scottishmen, and not to attaine riches or anie dominion.

The Scots also being a cruell people, & ready to fight in defense of other mens possessions (as in the warres of Northumberland it well appeared) would suerlie be ready to come to the aid of the Englishmen into Kent, euen so some as it was known that the Danes were on land in those parts: so that by this means they should be constrained to haue to do both with the Scottishmen and Englishmen, if they first went into Kent: where if they set on land here in Scotland, they should encounter but onlie with the Scots. Therefore, the best were according to their first determination, to land amongst the Scots, with chance had brought them vnto those coasts; adding that when they had somewhat abated the arrogant presumption of their enemies there, then might they passe more safelie into England, after a luckie beginning of fier and sword, to proceed against their aduersaries in those parties as fortune should lead them. This deuise was allowed of the greatest number, being glad to get beside the water. Whereupon the mariners (vpon commandement giuen) drew with their ships into the mouth of the riuer called Oke, the which in those daies washed on the walles of a towne in Angus called then Celurke, but now Mountros. Here the Danes taking land, put the inhabitants of the countrie thereabouts in great feare; so that with all speed for their safegard they got them into Mountros: but the towne being quickelie assailed of the Danes, was taken, put to the sacke, and after rased, castell and all to the bare ground, not one living creature being left aliue of all such as were found within the same.

From thence the armie of the Danes passed through Angus vnto the riuer of Tait, all the people of the countries by which they marched fleeing afore them. King Kenneth at the same time late at Sterling, where hearing of these greuous newes, he determined forthwith to raise his people, & to go against his enemies. The assemblie of the Scottish armie was appointed to be at the place where the riuer of Erne falleth into the riuer of Tait. Here when they were come together in great numbers at the day appointed, the day next following word was brought to the king, that the Danes hauing passed ouer Tait, were come before the towne of Bertha, and had laid siege to the same. When without further delay, he raised with the whole armie, and marched straight towards his enemies, comming that night vnto Luncart a brier of Tait, where battell fought the hearing that the time, but forthwith

Kenneth as for the Danes at hand to order. When their manhood, tributs and paine space of fine yeares he offered the sum so much worth in that should bring led them therefore ber there was no must they trie it a fled, in the end to mics hands, who found them forth: ted for refuge, if Scots being no words, kept their were appointed be giuen. Halce led the right wintenant of Atholl uerned the batt had taken their teine right afore both the armies holding either Scots desirous Danes would n advanced forw the case require thowing of dar

The Danes were constraind to come for joining they mens arrowes they came to ha was giuen on was cruell on Scots so much the Danes, e which maner b uing that there they rushed for uersaries, tha lving of the S flee backe, the r ground: but the left naked on t have remaine of the battell c to be thought

For as it d the same time busie about his and stiffe in m with a valiant king with the great baliance the wings, and great violence in his hand, a to do the like, rather among than to remain rable thalbor: bmercifull cr of the battell,

The lords gentle submission, with a large promise.

The king went to Bertha.

Rogers punished.

Furious men brought vnto Bertha.

A great number of vagabonds were iudged to die.

The lords haue licence to depart.

The Danes seek for reuenge old losses.

The Danes take the sea to go into Albion.

The Danes arrive at the red head, or red Bzaies in Angus.

The Danes continue into England.

King Kenneth his man in array.

The king exhorteth the Scots vnto valiantnesse.

They could not for to follow him.

They could not for to follow him.

The order of the Scottish battell array.

The Danes to the advantage of a hill mountaine.

The Scots to the battell.

Some thought best to land in Scotland.

The Danes do land at Mountros.

Mountros taken, and all within was slain.

The Danes come to the riuer of Tait.

King Kenneth gathered a great armie.

They laid siege before Bertha.

into Luncart a village not far distant from the river of Eate, famous ever after, by reason of the battell fought then nere unto the same. The Danes hearing that the Scots were come, detracted no time, but forthwith prepared to give battell.

Kenneth as soon as the same was by, beholding the Danes at hand, quicklie brought his armie to order. When requiring them earnestlie to shew their manhood, he promisseth to release them of all tributes and payments due to the kings coffers for the space of five yeares next ensuing: and besides that he offered the summe of ten pounds, or else lands so much worth in value to everie one of his armie, that should bring him the head of a Dane. He willed them therefore to fight manfully, and to remember there was no place to attaine mercie; for either must they trie it out by dint of sword, or else if they fled, in the end to looke for present death at the enemies hands, who would not cease till time they had found them forth, into what place so ever they resorted for refuge, if they chanced to be vanquished. The Scots being not a little encouraged by the kings words, kept their order of battell according as they were appointed, still looking when the onset should be given. Malcolme Dasse prince of Cumberland led the right wing of the Scots; and Duncane lieutenant of Atholl the left: King Kenneth himselfe governed the battell. The enemies on the other part had taken their ground at the foot of a little mountaine right afore against the Scottish campe. Thus both the armies stood readie ranged in the field, beholding either other a good space, till at length the Scots desirous of battell, and doubting least the Danes would not come forth to anie even ground, advanced forward with somewhat more hast than the case required, beginning the battell with shot, and throwing of darts right freshlie.

The Danes being backed with the mountaine, were constrained to leave the same, and with all speed to come forward upon their enemies, that by joining they might avoid the danger of the Scottish mens arrowes and darts: by this meanes therefore they came to hand-strokes, in maner before the signe was given on either part to the battell. The fight was ruel on both sides: and nothing hindered the Scots so much, as going about to cut off the heads of the Danes, ever as they might overcome them. Which maner being noted of the Danes, and perceiving that there was no hope of life but in victorie, they rushed forth with such violence upon their adversaries, that first the right, and then after the left wing of the Scots, was constrained to retire and flee backe, the middle-ward stoutly yet keeping their ground: but the same stood in such danger, being now left naked on the sides, that the victorie must needs have remained with the Danes, had not a renewer of the battell come in time, by the appointment (as is to be thought) of almightie God.

For as it chanced, there was in the next field at the same time an husbandman, with two of his sons busie about his worke, named Haie, a man strong and stiffe in making and shape of bodie, but indued with a valiant courage. This Haie beholding the king with the most part of the nobles, fighting with great valiance in the middle ward, now destitute of the wings, and in great danger to be oppressed by the great violence of his enemies, caught a plow-beame in his hand, and with the same exhorting his sonnes to do the like, hasted towards the battell, there to die rather amongst other in defense of his countrie, than to remaine alive after the discomfiture in miserable thraldome and bondage of the cruell and most unmercifull enemies. There was nere to the place of the battell, a long lane fenced on the sides with ditches and walles made of turfe, through the which the Scots which fled were beaten downe by the enemies on heapes.

Here Haie with his sonnes, supposing they might best staie the flight, placed themselves overthwart the lane, beat them backe whome they met fleeing, and spared neither friend nor fo: but downe they went all such as came within their reach, therewith diverse hardie personages cried unto their fellows to returne backe unto the battell, for there was a new power of Scottishmen come to their succours, by whose aid the victorie might be easilie obtained of their most cruell adversaries the Danes: therefore might they chafe whether they would be slaine of their olde felowes coming to their aid, or to returne againe to fight with the enemies. The Danes being here staied in the lane by the great valiance of the father and the sonnes, thought verely there had bene some great succors of Scots come to the aid of their king, and thereupon ceasing from further pursute, fled backe in great disorder unto the other of their fellows fighting with the middle ward of the Scots.

The Scots also that before was chased, being encouraged herewith, pursued the Danes unto the place of the battell right fiercelie. Whereupon Kenneth perceiving his people to be thus recomforted, and his enemies partlie abashed, called upon his men to remember their duties, and now with their adversaries hearts began (as they might perceive) to faint, he willed them to follow upon them manfully, which if they did, he assured them that the victorie undoubtedly should be theirs. The Scots encouraged with the kings words, laid about them so earnestlie, that in the end the Danes were constrained to forsake the field, and the Scots egerlie pursuing in the chase, made great slaughter of them as they fled. This victorie turned highlie to the praise of the Scottish nobilitie, the which fighting in the middle ward, bare still the byunt of the battell, continuing manfullie therein even to the end. But Haie, who in such wise (as is before mentioned) staied them that fled, causing them to returne againe to the field, deserved immortall fame and commendation: for by his meanes chiefly was the victorie achieved. And therefore on the morrow after, when the spoile of the field and of the enemies campe (which they had left void) should be divided, the chiefest part was bestowed on him and his two sonnes, by consent of all the multitude; the residue being divided amongst the souldiers and men of warre, according to the ancient custome used amongst this nation.

The king having thus vanquished his enemies, as he should enter into Bertha, caused coslie robes to be offered unto Haie and his sonnes, that being richlie clad, they might be the more honoured of the people: but Haie refusing to change his apparell, was contented to go with the king in his old garments whether it pleased him to appoint. So entring with the king into Bertha, he was received with little lesse honor than the king himselfe, all the people running forth to behold him, whome they heard to haue so valiantlie rescued the battell, when the field was in maner lost without hope of all recoverie. At his entring into the towne he bare on his shoulder the plow-beame, more honourable to him than anie sword or battell are might haue bene to anie the most valiant warrior. Thus Haie being honored of all estates, within certeine daies after, at a counsell holden at Seane, it was ordeined, that both he and his posteritie should be accepted amongst the number of the chiefest nobles and piers of the realme, being rewarded (besides monie and other great gifts) with lands and revenues, such as he should chuse sufficient

Haie staied the Scots from running away

The Scots were open to their battell againe.

The Danes fled towards their fellows in great disorder.

Kenneth called upon his men to remember their duties.

The Danes forsake the fields.

The spoile is divided.

Haie refused coslie garments.

The king came to Bertha.

Haie is made one of the nobilitie.

He had reuenues assigned to him.

place, but for at

et a fierced

to begot,

erthwhos

the soile of

ner ones

ose daies)

those so

wild vouch

ere in con

duch lieth

ie and cat

h manie

were to be matter be etter, than

ure of rich

ther there

as attempt

elie to re

The Danes

confut to go into England

King Ken-

eth with his

armie

King Ken-

eth with his

armie

King Ken-

eth with his

armie

King Ken-

eth with his

armie

King Ken-

eth with his

armie

King Ken-

eth with his

armie

sufficient for the maintenance of their estates.

He had
request.

The falcon measured the his lands out.

He had armes given him.

Civil wars
in Scotland.

In other common in Permes by Cruthlin.

Cruthlin
sought for his grandfather.

Two of his servants were
slaine.

They set by-on Cruthlin
also.

Cruthlin
was instigated to revenge

He killed all them that were in the castell.

It is said, that by the counsell of his sonnes, who knew the fruitfulness of the soile, he did aske so much ground in those parts where the river of Tair runs by the towne of Arrore ouer against Fife, as a falcon would flie ouer at one flight. Which request being freely granted of the king, the place was appointed at Inshirre for the falcon to be cast off: the which taking his flight from thence, neuer lighted till the came to a great stone nere a villiage called Koffe, not passing foure miles from Dundee. By which meanes all that countrie which lieth betwixt Inshirre aforesaid, and the said stone (being almost six miles in length, and foure in breadth) fell vnto Haie and his sons. The name of the stone also being called the falcons stone to this daie, doth cause the thing better to be beleued, and well nere all the foz said ground still continueth in the possession of the Haies euen vnto this day. Besides this, to the further honoring of his name, the king gaue him armes three scutchons gules in a field of silver, a plowbrame added thereto, which he used in stead of a battell are, when he fought so valiantlie in defense of his owne countrie. Thus had the Haies their beginning of nobilitie, whose house hath attained vnto great estimation of honor, and hath bene decozated with the office of the constableship of Scotland, by the bounteous beneuolence of kings that succeeded. These things happened in the first yere of king Kenneth.

In the residue of the time that he reigned, though there chanced no great businesse by fozren enemies, yet by civil sedition the state of the realme was wonderfullie disquieted. First a companie of Berns of the westerne Isles inuading Koffe, to the intent to haue fetcht a bottie, were met withall by the waite and ouerthrowne by the inhabitants of that countrie. After this sturre, another followed, farre more dangerous to the whole state of the common-welth, raised by one Cruthlin, one of the chiefest lords of the Permes, who was sonne vnto a certaine ladie named Fenella, the daughter of one Cruthneth, that was gouernor of that part of Angus which lieth betwixt the two riuers, the one called Southesk, and the other Northesk. So it chanced, that on a time Cruthlin came vnto the castell of Delbogin to see his grandfather, the said Cruthneth as then lieng in the same: where vpon light occasion a frate was begun amongst the seruingmen, in the which two of Cruthlins seruants fortunied to be slaine. Which iniurie when Cruthlin declared by waie of complaint vnto his grandfather, he was so slenderlie heard, and answered in such reprochfull wise, as though he himselfe had bin the author of the busines, so that Cruthneths seruants perceiuing how little he was regarded of their master, fell vpon him and beat him, that not without danger of life he brake forth of their hands, and hardlie escaped away.

In his returne homewards, he came to his mother Fenella, where she lay within the castell of Fethricarne, the chiefest fortresse of all the Permes. Where being incensed through his mothers instigation, being a woman of a furious nature, he attempted forthwith to be reuenged of the iniurie receiued: so that assembling a number of his friends and kind folks so secretlie as he might together, with a band of the inhabitants of the Permes, he entereth into Angus, and coming vnto the castell of Delbogin in the night season, was suffered to enter by the keepers of the gate, nothing suspecting anie treason in the world, by reason wherof was Cruthneth suddenly oppressed, the house sacked and rased, not one that was found within the same being left alieue. The spoile also was diuided by Cruthlin amongst them which came with him. The next day likewise he for-raied the countrie all there abouts, returning home with a great bottie.

They of Angus prouoked herewith, rested not long; but assembling themselves together inuaded the countrie of Permes, where making great slaughter on each side, they left the countrie void almost both of men and cattell. Thus did the people of those two countries pursue the warre one against another a certaine time, with daile incursions and waiking of either others countries, in such cruell wise, that it was thought the one of them must needs shortly come to utter destruction, if speedie remedie were not the sooner prouided. The king being informed of this mischief and great trouble, which was fallen out through sedition amongst those his subiects, he made proclamation by an herald, that those of Angus and Permes, whom he understood to be culpable, should appeare within fiftene daies after at Scone, there to make answer afoze appointed iudges, to such things as might be laid to their charge, vpon paine of death to euerie one that made default. When the day of appearance came, there were but few that did appeare.

The most part of them doubting to be punished for their offenses with Cruthlin the capitaine, fled out of Permes, taking with them their wiues, and their children, and all their goods. The king being sore moued herewith, perceiued how readie the Scottish people were by nature vnto rebellion, when they were gentlie used: and againe how they obeyed the magistrates best when they were restrained from their wild outragious doings by due punishment and execution of iustice. He considered therefore that if he did not cause those seditions rebels which had thus disobeyed his commandements to be punished according to the order of the lawes, he should haue the whole realme shortly disquieted with civil warre and open rebellion. Wherevpon with all speed he caused earnest pursuit to be made after Cruthlin, and the residue of the offenders, the which at length being taken in Lochquahar, were brought vnto a castell in Galloway called Dounfinnam, where after iudgement pronounced against them, Cruthlin first, and then other the chiefest stirrers on either side were put to execution. The commons, for that it was thought they followed their superiors against their willes, were pardoned and licenced to depart to their houses.

For this equitie shewed in ministering iustice by the king, he was greatly praised, loued, and bread of all his subiects; so that great quietnesse followed in the state of the common-wealthe, greatlie to the advancement thereof, and so continued till the 22 yere of this Kenneths reigne. At that time the blind loue he bare to his owne issue, caused him to procure a detestable fact, in making away one of his nextest kinsmen. This was Malcolme the sonne of king Duffe, created in the beginning of Kenneths reigne prince of Cumberland, by reason wherof he ought to haue succeeded in rule of the kingdom after Kenneths death. Whereat the same Kenneth greiuing not a little, for that thereby his sonnes should be kept from inhering the crowne, found meanes to poison him. But though the physicians vnderstanding by such euident signes as appeared in his bodie, that he was poisoned indeed, yet such was the opinion which men had of the kings honor and integritie, that no suspicion at all was conceiued that it should be his deed.

The cloked loue also which he had shewed toward him at all times, and so sudden commandement giuen by him vpon the first newes of his death, that his funerals should be celebrated in euerie church and chappell for his soule; and againe, the teares which he shed

The countie
is forsaide.

They of Permes re-quite their injuries.

The king
made a proclamation by herald.

The culprits should appeare
at Scone.

The fawne
men ran.

The king
sore offend-
the reuelt.

The king
did to punish the disobe-
dient rebels.
Cruthlin
then sent me word.

The king
sore offend-
others.

The king
sore offend-
ment by his willes.

The king
sore offend-
ment by
colme.

The king
sore offend-
ment by
of this fact.

The king
sore offend-
ment by
of this fact.

shed for him,
ced to be married by the nothing mis-
of the nobles made) to pass gather some because no thoughts to ambassadors
the sonne of his stepmoth-ring that was decess states of the who doing h according a
might be a twist the ti ons of bread
insue.

The king
heard
the king
sore offend-
ment by
of this fact.

The king
sore offend-
ment by
of this fact.

The king
sore offend-
ment by
of this fact.

The king
sore offend-
ment by
of this fact.

The king
sore offend-
ment by
of this fact.

The king
sore offend-
ment by
of this fact.

The king
sore offend-
ment by
of this fact.

The king
sore offend-
ment by
of this fact.

The king
sore offend-
ment by
of this fact.

The king
sore offend-
ment by
of this fact.

The king
sore offend-
ment by
of this fact.

The king
sore offend-
ment by
of this fact.

The king
sore offend-
ment by
of this fact.

g home The country is foraged.

They of Whence re-
quite their injuries.

another castings

that it shortly ie were informed is fallen The king

cts. her made a prod

culpable,
Scene

8, to such on paine
at Dcone.

...that did

published The fault line, fled men ran aw lues, and

The R. was fore offender

ated the ned from therefore els which

The Dr. indicated to him all speed the disobedient rebels. er Truths Truthline which at

... brought
... where

on either s, for that to depart

justice by and dread
followed

lie to the till the 22
times the

ed him to one of his 数. Kenne risoned

the bottle
of them
as a whole,

the king
ame then is forges

physicians
The R. &.

Such was of this fact 103 and in

ed forward

th, that his church and

s which he shed suspicion

sed for him, in all places where any mention chanced to be made of the losse which the realme had sus-sained by the death of so wortheie a prince, made men nothing mistrustfull of the matter, till at length some of the nobles perceiving the outward sorrow (which he made) to passe the true griefe of the heart, began to gather some suspition, that all was not well: but yet because no certaintie appeared, they kept their thoughts to themselves. About the same time came ambassadors forth of England from king Edward the sonne of Edgar (which after through treason of his stepmother Escolda, was made a martyr) requiring that sith Malcolm the prince of Cumberland was deceased, it might please the king with the states of the realme to chuse some other in his place, who doing his homage unto the king of England, according as it was covenanted by the league, might be a meane to confirme the same league betwixt the two nations for the avoiding of all occasions of breach thereof that otherwise happlie might ensue.

0 Kenneth at the same time held a councill at D Scorne, where hauing heard the request of these ambassadors, in presense of all his nobles, he answered that he was glad to vnderstand that king Edward was so carefull for maintenance of loue and amitie betwixt his subiects and the Scottishmen, according to the articles of the ancient league in times past concluded betwixt them, the ratification whereof for his part he likewise most earnestlie desired, and therefore in rendering most heartie thanks vnto him for his gentle aduertisement, he purposed by the advisse of his nobles, and the other estates of his realme as then there assembled, to elect a new prince of Cumberland, without anie further delaie: and thereupon required the ambassadoz to be present on the morrow, to heare what he was whom the nobles should name to be preferred vnto that dignitie. The ambassadors hereupon departing south of the coun-cell chamber, were conueied to their lodging by di-uerse of the nobilitie that were appointed to keepe them companie.

Then Keneeth with a long oration went about to perswade the peeres, and other the estates of the realme there (as I said) assembled, to alter the custome and ancient order vsed by their elders in choosing of him that should succede in the gouernance of the realme, after the deceasse of him that was in possession. He vsed so manie reasons as was possible for him to deuise in that behalfe, thereby to induce them to his purpose, which was to haue an act established for the crowne to go by succession, onelie to this end, that one of his sonnes might inioy the same immediatlie after his deceasse. He declared also what discommodities, seditions, and great inconueniences had growne, in that the crowne had gone in times past by election: for though it was ordeined at the first that it should so doe, vpon a good intent and great consideration, yet in proccesse of time prooue and experience had shewed, that moze hindrance happened vnto the common-wealth thereby (beside the danger euer insuing incidentlie vnto such issue as the king left behind him) than profit, if the sundrie murders, occasions of ciuill discord, and other wicked practises were throughlie breied and considered, the summe whereof he recited from point to point, and so in the end with great instance brought them, that so pernicious a custome might be abolished and taken away, to the great benefit of the whole state of the realme, speciallie sith in all realmes commonlie the order was, that the sonne should without anie contradiction succede the father in the heritage of the crowne and kinglie estate.

The king had no sooner made an end of his long oration, which he handled after the pithiest sort he could, but that diuerſe of the noble men which were there amongſt other, being made priuite to the matter aforehand, motioned meanes to haue Malcolme the ſon of Kenneth created prince of Cumberland, that he might ſo haue an entrance to the crowne after the deceaſſe of his father. This motion by and by was in manie of their mouthes, which Kenneth perceiuing, he required of the moſt ancient peers whome they would name to be prince of Cumberland, that there might be a means to ratifie and confirme the league betwixt the Scots and Engliſh men, Conſtantine the ſonne of king Cullin, and Grime the nephew of king Duſſe by his brother Hogall: howbeit by the force of the former law they might by good reaſon haue looked to haue had the preferment themſelues.

But yet perceiving it was in vaine to denie that which would be had by violence (although they should neuer so much stand against it) being first demanded of the herald what they thought, they answered (notwithstanding against their minds indeed) that the king might order all things as should stand with his pleasure, appointing whom he thought most meet to be prince of Cumberland, and to abrogate the ancient law of creating the kings, devising new ordinances for the same, as should seeme unto him and those of his counsell most requisite and necessarie. The multitude then following their sentence, cried with loud & undiscreet voices, to haue Malcolme the sonne of king Kenneth created prince of Cumberland. And thus the same Malcolme (though as yet vnder age) was by the voices of the people ordeined prince of Cumberland, in place of the other Malcolme sonne to king Duffe. The daie next following, the ambassadors comming into the counsell chamber, heard what was decreed touching their request, and then being highly rewarded of the kings bountious liberalitie, they returned into England, and Malcolme with them, to be acquainted with king Edward, and to doe his homage for the principalltie of Cumberland, as the custom was.

At the same time also there was a new act devised and made, the old being abrogated (by the appointment of the king) for the creation of the Scottish kings in time to come, made of the nobles rather consenting with silence, than greatly allowing it either in hearts or voices, though some curri-fauncers among them set forward the matter to the best of their powers. The articles of this ordinance were these. The eldest heire male of the deceased king, whether the same were sonne or nephue, of what age soever he should be, yea though he should be in the mothers wombe at the time of the fathers deceasse, should from thence forth succeed in the kingdome of Scotland. The nephue by the sonne should be preferred before the nephue by the daughter, in attaining to the heritage of the crowne. And likewise the brothers sonne should be admitted before the sisters son. The same law should be observed of all such of the Scottish nation, as had anie lands or inheritance comming to them by descent. Where the king by this meanes chanced to be under age, & not able to rule, there should be one of the chiefeest pées of the realme chosen and elected to haue the gouernance of his person and realme, till he came to 14 yées of age. The which foureteenth yée of his age being accomplished, he should haue the administration committed to his owne hands. The heires of all other persons of ech estate and degree should remaine under the wardship of their appointed gouernors, till they came to the age of 21 yées, and not till then to meddle with anie part of their lands and liuings.

D.f.

These

The peeres of the realme did willinglie
grant to his request.

The herald required Cō-stantine his voice first.

Constantine
his laing.

The multitude wel ple= sed, crie Hal=
colme.

D A new act for the succession
of the crowne.

Articles concluded in that parlement.

King Kenneth
ministered
justice trulie.

The good will of the nobilitie he bought with gifts.

The king had a gittie confession.

A voice heard
by the king.

The king
confesseth his sinnis.

The king taketh
great repentance.

The king
went to For-dune in pilgrimage.
He parke with wild beasts at
the castell of Fethircarne.

Fenella was of kin unto Malcolme.

These lawes and ordinances being once published and confirmed, king Kenneth supposed the kingdome to be fullie assured unto him and his posteritie, and thereupon indued himselfe to win the hearts of the people with upright administration of iustice, and the fauour of the nobles he sought to purchase with great gifts which he bestowed amongst them, as well in lands belonging to the crowne, as in other things greatlie to their contentation. Thus might he seeme happie to all men, hauing the loue both of his lords and commons: but yet to himselfe he seemed most unhappie, as he that could not but still liue in continuall feare, least his wicked practise concerning the death of Malcolme Duffe should come to light and knowledge of the world. For so cometh it to passe, that such as are pricked in conscience for anie secret offense committed, haue euer an vnquiet mind. And (as the same goeth) it chanced that a voice was heard as he was in bed in the night time to take his rest, uttering vnto him these or the like words in effect: 20
"Thinke not Kenneth that the wicked slaughter of Malcolme Duffe by thee continued, is kept secret from the knowledge of the eternall God: thou art he that didst conspire the innocents death, enterprising by traitorous meanes to do that to thy neighbour, which thou wouldest haue reuenged by cruell punishment in anie of thy subiects, if it had bene offered to thy selfe. It shall therefore come to passe, that both thou thy selfe, and thy issue, through the iust vengeance of almightie God, shall suffer worthie punishment, to the infamie of thy house and familie for euermore. For euen at this present are there in hand secret practises to dispatch both thee and thy issue out of the waie, that other maie intop this kingdome which thou dost endeavour to assure vnto thine issue.

The king with this voice being stricken into great dread and terror, passed that night without anie sleepe comming in his eyes. Wherefore in the morning he got him vnto bishop Spouean, a man of great holinesse of life, vnto whome he confessed his heinous and most wicked offense, beseeching him of counsell, which waie he might obtaine pardon and forgiveness at Gods hands by worthie penance. Spouean hearing how the king bewailed his offense committed, he willed him to be of good comfort. For as the wrath of almightie God was prouoked by sinne and wicked offenses, so was the same pacified againe by repentance, if so be we continue penitent and willing to amend. King Kenneth being confirmed in hope of forgiveness by these and sundrie other the like comfortable words of the bishop, studied vnfeinably to do worthie penance, leauing nothing vndone which he thought might serue for a witnesse of his penitent hart, thereby to auoid the vengeance which he stood in feare of to be prepared for him, by reason of his heinous and wicked crime.

It chanced hereupon, that within a short time after he had bene at Fordune, a towne in Hernes, to visit the reliks of Valadius which remaine there, he turned a little out of the waie to lodge at the castell of Fethircarne, where as then there was a forrest full of all manner of wild beasts that were to be had in anie part of Albion. Here was he receiued by Fenella ladie of the house, whose son (as ye haue heard) he caused to be put to death, for the commotion made betwixt them of Hernes and Angus. She was also of kin vnto Malcolme Duffe, whome the king had made awaie, and in like manner vnto Constantine and Grime, defrauded of their right to the crowne, by the craftie deuise of the king (as before is partly mentioned.) This woman therefore being of a stout stomach, long time before hauing conceined an immortal grudge towards the king, vpon the occasions before rehearsed (namelie as well for the death of his sonne Cruthlunt, as hauing some inkling also of the impoisoning of Malcolme Duffe, though no full certentie therof was knowne) imagined might and day how to be reuenged.

She understood that the king delighted aboue measure in goodlie buildings, and therefore to the end to compasse his malicious intent, she had caused a tower to be made, joining vnto his owne lodging within the foresaid castell of Fethircarne. The which tower was couered ouer with copper finelie ingrauen with diuerse flowers and images. Where to was it hanging within with rich cloths of arras wrought with gold and silke, verie faire and costlie. Behind the same were there crossebowes set ready bent with sharpe quarrels in them. In the midst of the house there was a goodlie bafen image also, resembling the figure of king Kenneth, holding in the one hand a faire golden apple set full of precious stones, denised with such art and cunning, that so soone as anie man should draw the same vnto him, or remove it neuer so little anie waie forth, the crossebowes would immediatlie discharge their quarrels vpon him with great force and violence.

Fenella therefore being thus prouided aforehand, after meate desired the king to go with him into that inner chamber, into the which being entered, he could not be satisfide of long with the beholding of the goodlie furniture, as well of the hangings as of diuerse other things. At the last hauing viewed the image which stood (as is said) in the midst of the chamber, he demanded what the same did signifie: Fenella answered, how that image did represent his person, and the golden apple set so richlie with smaragds, iacints, sapphires, topases, rubies, turkasses, and such like precious stones, she had prouided as a gift for him, and therefore required him to take the same, beseeching him to accept it in good part, though it were not in value worthie to be offered vnto his princelie honor and high dignitie. And here with the himselfe withdrew aside, as though she would haue taken some thing forth of a chest or coffer, thereby to auoid the danger.

But the king delighted in beholding the gems and orient stones, at length removing the apple, the better to aduise it, incontinentlie the crossebowes discharged their quarrels so directlie vpon him, that striking him through in sundrie places, he fell downe stark dead, and lay flat on the ground. Fenella as soone as she beheld him fall to the ground ready to die, she got forth by a backe doore into the next woods, where she had appointed horses to carie for him, by meanes whereof she escaped out of all danger of them that pursued him, per the death of the king were openlie knowne vnto them. His seruants still waiting for his comming forth in the vpper chamber, at length when they saw he came not at all, first they knocked at the doore soflie, then they rapped hard thereat: lastlie, doubting that which had happened, they brake open doore after doore, till at length they came into the chamber where the king lay cold dead vpon the floore.

The clamor and crye hereupon was raised by his seruants, and Fenella cursed and sought for in euerie place, that had committed so heinous and wicked a deed: but the vngatious woman was conueied so secretlie out of the waie, that no where could she be heard of. Some supposed that she fled first vnto Constantine, by whose helpe she got ouer into Ireland. The ambitious desire which the same Constantine shewed he had to succeed in government of the kingdome after Kenneths deceasse, increased that suspicion greatlie. For immediatlie after it was known that Kenneth was dead, he got his friends together, and went vnto diuerse places requiring the lords to

She was
lousie revenge.

Fenella
malicious intent.

Crossebowes
ready bent,
hidden.

Fenella had the king into the inner chamber.

The king
was slain
with the crosse
bowes.

Fenella
climbed from the wall.

His seruants looked for the king.

The doores broken open,
they find him
dead.

Fenella could not be found.

Fenella got herselfe into Ireland by the helpe of Constantine.

Constantine
aspired vnto
the crowne.

amid him in attendance and beginning, and one by his pri-uogate the same
the world verie

Constantine
by their me-realme, he was there crowned ceasse, in the 23
had begun his
the päre of our piere (as is said
well in Albion,
the sands on the multitude of all such a filthie sau-
faced, great dea-
red of a bloudie that beheld it. It failed, and catte-
not bene more med to be, the p-places. In Albi-
But all these d-draw the Scot-wherevnto in the though there w-
well bishops as the people to rnings: for other
and tokens as great mischiefes suerlie their wotinuing in their one against an-danger of vtt-Malcolme th-

haue heard in berland, hearindinance latelie
some as his fat-
with such fune-
his fathers frie-
as they thought best to worke begun, by real-attempt. The nie that toke
minds of all th-foze they went least whilst M-selfe from dan-
farther into tr-
the common-thereof againe suddenlie to ghimselfe from were prouided that feigned th-
take him, so mmies at hand
their hands, o-
gard of his lif-

The fierce
the best to his wit than to thbled together
ten thousand
Constantine
into Louthia his aduerfari-
huge power

amst him in attaining to the crowne, which by the old ordinance and law of the realme (instituted in the beginning, and obserued till now of late; that Kenneth by his private authoritie had gone about to abrogate the same) ought to descend vnto him, as all the world berie well understood.

Constantine procured friends so on each side, that by their meanes being of high authoritie in the realme, he was brought by them vnto Scone, and there crowned king the 12 day after Kenneths deceasse, in the 25 yeere after that the same Kenneth had begun his reigne ouer the Scottis men, and in the yeere of our saluation a thousand iust, in the which yeere (as is said) sundrie vnkinde fights were scene as well in Albion, as in other places. The sea left vpon the sands on the coasts of Buchquane; an infinite multitude of fishes, the which lying there dead, caused such a filthy saour, that the aire being therewith infected, great death of people ensued. The mane appeared of a bloudie colour, to the great terror of them that beheld it. In the summer next following, come failed, and cattell died to generallie, that if there had not bene more plentie of fish got than was accustomed to be, the people had bene famished in manie places. In Albion and also France it rained stones. But all these dreadfull wonders might not with draw the Scottis men from their wicked vices, wherevnto in those daies they were wholly giuen, though there wanted not diuerse vertuous men, as well bishops as other, that in their sermons exhorted the people to repent and amend their naughty linings: for other wise vndoubtedlie such grislie sights and tokens as chanced in those daies, menaced some great mischief to fall vnto the whole nation. And suerlie their words proued true: for the Scots continuing in their wilfulnesse, being stubborne harted one against another, brought their countrie into danger of utter destruction.

Malcolme the sonne of Kenneth, created (as ye haue heard in his fathers life time) prince of Cumberland, hearing that Constantine (against the ordinance lately made) had usurped the crowne, as sone as his fathers bodie was buried in Colmekill, with such funerall pompe as appertained, he desired his fathers friends to giue him such faithfull counsell as they thought most expedient, which way he were best to walke for the appeasing of the sedition now begun, by reason of Constantines presumptuous attempt. There were some amongst that compaignie that toke it to be best, first to vnderstand the minds of all the peeres and nobles of the realme, before they went about anie exploit against the tyrant; least whilst Malcolme should seeke to deliuer himselfe from danger, he might hapilie bind himselfe further into trouble, than without extreame perill of the common wealth he should be able to get forth thereof againe. Other there were that iudged it best suddenlie to go against Constantine before he made himselfe strong: for if they came vpon him yet he were prouided for their coming, manie of them that feigned themselves to be his friends, would forsake him, so sone as they saw anie power of his enemies at hand. And then should he either fall into their hands, or be driven to flee the realme for safeguard of his life.

The fierce young man following this counsell as the best to his seeming, & trusting more to his owne wit than to the graue aduise of men of skill, assembled together in all hast possible about the number of ten thousand men, with whome making towards Constantine with speedie fornicies, at length he came into Louthian. Constantine being informed of all his aduersaries doings, had gotten together also an huge power, so that passing forth with the same to incounter them, the hate which ran of his great number and puissance, caused Malcolme for verie feare that he should not be able in anie part to match him, to breake vp his armie, and to flee backe into Cumberland: by reason wherof he had bene put to such hinderance and dishonour, as would not easilie haue bene recovered, had not Kenneth the bastard sonne of his father the aboue mentioned Kenneth incamped with a mightie power about Sterling, & defended the passages of the Forth, that Constantine with his armie could not come ouer. Then rose there great famine and penurie of vittels in both hostis, so that Constantine with great indignation was constrained to breake vp his campe, and so to leaue his enterpryse for that season.

Thus was the realme diuided into two sundrie factions, whereupon followed wastings and incursions made into each others possessions, with such crueltie, that the same might be a sufficient instruction what mischief happeneth through ciuill discord. The poore commons and husbandmen were brought to such miserie through the often spoilings and robberies vsed by the men of warre, that they were not able to till their grounds. Finally, there rose one mischief so fast in the necke of an other, that no kind of crueltie was spared, robbing, reauing, and forcible extortion was exercised on all sides without hope of anie redresse or amendment. Whilst the Scottis men were thus at diuision amongst themselves, renting and pulling in peeces their owne miserable native countrie, Edward king of England being oppressed with inuasion of Danes, was glad to buye peace at their hands, for himselfe and his people, with right large summes of monie; but perceiving that his enemies ceased not daillie to spoile and rob his subiects, he purposed to trie what he might doe by making them warre: and to make his part the stronger, he required Malcolme prince of Cumberland to aid him against the Danes, according to the couenant of the ancient league. Malcolme consenting to it, Edwards request, came with a mightie armie of Cumberland men to support him: by reason wherof the Danes doubting to be ouermatched, after certaine light skirmishes, without anie great bloodshed, condescended to haue peace, which was concluded with these conditions: that king Edward should paie vnto the Danes a thousand pounds of gold, for the which they should content themselves with those lands which they had alreadie in possession, and to inuade no further vpon the Englishmen; but contrariwise to be readie to fight in their defense, if anie forreine enemy sought to make anie warres vpon them. In the meane time, whilst Malcolme was thus in England occupied in aid of king Edward against the Danes, king Constantine thought the time to serue verie well for his purpose, to reduce all those regions of Scotland, which toke part with his aduersarie (the foresaid Malcolme) vnder his subiection.

He assembled therefore twentie thousand men, and comming into Louthian, heard how Kenneth the bastard aforesaid (being left by his brother Malcolme to resist Constantines attempts) had got together an huge armie of his brothers friends, and was come vnto Crabmond, where the riuer falleth into the Forth, three miles from Edinburgh, purposing there to abide his enemies, if they minded to assaile him. Constantine hereupon hastened thitherwards, and comming within sight of his enemies, straightwaies ioined battell with them; immediatlie therewith there rose such an outrageous tempest of wind, comming out of the east, & driving the sand in the faces of Constantines men, that they were not able to see about them to make anie defense against

Malcolme thought himselfe too weak

Lacke of vittels caused Constantine to breake vp his campe.

King Edward, or rather Ethelred, purchased peace of the Danes.

Malcolme is ready to helpe king Edward against the Danes.

King Edward made peace with the Danes.

King Constantine renewed warre with Malcolme.

Constantine ioined battell with Kenneth the bastard.

of his good title and right, which he had to the crowne descended vnto him by the old lawes and ancient ordinances of the realme, and therefore he purposed not to leaue the same with life, but to fight for it against Malcolme, and all his partakers, euen vnto death. But if it were so, that Malcolme would content himselfe with the principallitie of Cumberland, and so thereupon breake vp his campe, and depart forth of the lands pertaining vnto the crowne, he would gladly come to a communication with him for peace; but if Malcolme refused thus to doe, he assured him that he would not leaue off to pursue him to the uttermost of his power, as his most cruell and fierce enemy.

Fothadus hauing heard Grimes words, besought him to staie a tyme, till he might go vnto Malcolme, to vnderstand what his full mind was in this behalfe not doubting but to find him conformable vnto anie reasonable motion, for relieuing of the poore afflicted state of the land. Grime granting vnto this request, Fothadus in like sort and habit as he came vnto Grime, went vnto Malcolme, whome he found at Sderling; where comming before his presence with a long oration, he greatlie bewailed the dolorous calamities of the Scottish common-wealth, into the which it was fallen through ciuill sedition onlie, and herewith declared also by great likelihood of substantiall reasons, how infortunat and miserable the end should be of the warres, if the same were pursued to the uttermost. His tale being throughlie heard and well digested, wrought so with Malcolme, that he promised to withdraw into Cumberland without anie further attempt, if Grime would in like case breake by his campe, and agree to haue a truce for thre moneths space, in which meane time they might by certeine commissioners appointed and authorized thereto, talke and common for concluding of a small peace and concord betwixt them.

Grime refused not this offer, and so thereupon licenced his people to depart to their homes, repairing himselfe with certeine of his nobles into Angus vnto the castell of Fozfar, there to take further aduise what was to be done touching the appointed communication of peace. But Fothadus would in no wise rest, till the commissioners were met and assembled together in communication at Scone, where within few daies after (chiefie through his earnest diligence) peace was concluded with these conditions. First, that Grime during his life time should inioy the crowne, and after his decesse the same to remaine to Malcolme & his heirs by lineall descent for euer, according to the ordinance & decree made & established by K. Kenneth. And whosoever should go about either by word or deed to impeach or hinder the said ordinance and decree, should be reputed for a traitor to the common-wealth & realme. Furthermore all the lands lieng betwixt Louthian & Northumberland, and betwixt Clide and Telfermerland, euen from the Almaine seas to the Irish seas, should presentlie remaine & be transported vnto the dominion & gouernment of Malcolme, with the which contenting himselfe, during the naturall life of Grime, he should continue in friendship with the said Grime, & so in no wise stirre or moue anie warre or debate, either against him or anie of his friends: for if he did, and went about to breake anie of the articles of this peace, he should not onelie lose those lands which he now held, but also be deprived of all the right, title, claime, and interest which either he or his posteritie might make or pretend vnto the crowne at anie time hereafter.

When both the princes had bound themselves by solemn othes to perfoyme euerie point and points in these articles comprised, they laid armes aside, and began to take order for reforming of all misdoemeanours, which had happened within the land, by reason of the ciuill contention moued betwixt them and their partakers. Whomebeit, commandement was giuen by either of these princes, that their subjects should be still in a readinesse with armour and weapons (if need required) to defend themselves against all sudden inuasions of their neighbours, whereby it may be gathered, that the one had the other still in some mistrust, what countenance soeuer they shewed outwardlie. Yet notwithstanding, for the space of 8 yeares together, the peace continued without breach, or any notable trouble betwixt them.

But Grime at length of a chaff & liberall prince, through long slouth and increase of riches, became a most couetous tyrant, and so corrupted in maners and conditions, that it passed the bounds of all reason and equitie: insomuch that when he had put vnto death diuerse of his nobles, to the end he might haue their lands and goods as forfeited by attainder, he oppressed the people by continuall exactions also each day more than other. His subjects being thus brought into extreame miserie through his wicked and vniust gouernement, not knowing where to seeke for redresse, saue onelie at the hands of almighty God, the punisher of all sinne, besought him to haue pitie of their afflictions and miseries, and to change the gouernment of the realme into some better state. The lords also hauing great indignation of the trouble fallen to the realme, by the kings misgouernance and auaricious crueltie, appointed a certeine number of gentlemen to go vnto him as ambassadors from them, to require him to put awaie from him such naughtie persons as by euill counsell had peruerterd his mind, & moued him to doe things contrarie to his honor, and the wealth of his realme.

One of these ambassadors (to whome the charge was giuen) had the words in name of them all, who comming before the kings presence, declared to him that they were sent from the residue of the nobles and peres of his realme, to admonish him of things pertaining to the suertie of his estate, and common wealth of his dominions: which was, that whereas through peruersion of euill counsellors he suffered manie enormities to be committed by his ministers and officers against his subjects, to their utter impoverishment and bndowing, the rebuke wherof did rebound vnto his dishonour, if it would please him to remoue out of his presence and seruice all such disloyall persons as sought the hinderance of the common-wealth, he should win thereby the loue of all his liege subjects, which now could not but grudge and repine at this his gouernement, as men by the same brought into such calamitie, that better it were for them in their iudgements to be dead than aliue, if reformation were not the sooner had against such extortions as his seruants and officers did daillie practise, and for the which no doubt he must needs answer, sith the sword was committed vnto him, not to winch couetous persons, nor to oppress innocent and true dealing people, but contrarie to punish and correct guiltie and vniust dealers.

When king Grime had heard what message these ambassadors had brought, he answered to the same with fained words, and willed them vnder the pretext of courtesie to a banquet, in purpose to haue put them all in prison: but they being aduertised thereof got them in all hast to their hostes, and fled forthwith vnto Bertha, where the residue of the nobles at the same time were assembled. Grime hauing thus no regard to the wholesome aduertisement of his nobles, thought that all things would come forward with such felicitie and hap as he wished, not ceassing from raising new painments and exactions still of applied their studies to reforme misdoemeanors.

King Grime his alteration from noble qualities vnto detestable vices.

The common peoples prayer

The lords require Grime to reforme the misdoemeanors of his officers.

The office of the sword.

King Grime purposed to haue slaine the messengers.

The lords of Scotland are ere warre against Grime their king.

what mischief ensued.

Malcolme is required to relieve the Scottish estate.

Malcolme consenteth to make warre against Grime.

Grime assembleth an armie to encounter Malcolme. The camps were the one to the other. Grimes policie.

Malcolmes request.

The battell betwixt Grime and Malcolme. Grimes part discomfited.

The end of king Grime.

his subiects, till at length he was advertised how his nobles had raised open warre against him, at which newes being sore kindled with displeasure, he got together a great number of men, and marched forth towards them that had so rebelled against him. When followed more mischief and trouble than ever had bene scene afore that time in Scotland: for by reason of this civil dissention, castles were rased and overthrowne, towncs burned by, coyne destroyed, fields waisted, and the people slaine in all places, yea as well in churches as elsewhere.

Malcolme prince of Cumberland hearing of such cruell wars as were thus raised in Scotland betwixt the king and the nobles of the realme, to the danger of the utter euerion of the whole common-wealth, returned with all speed forth of England (where he was with an armie as then in aid of king Egeldred against the Danes) into his owne countrie for defence of his subiects, if anie attempt should happilie be made against them in that troublesome season. Howbeit, he was no sooner returned home, but the nobles of Louthian came unto him, beseeching him to take pitie vpon his miserable and forne countrie, & to imploie his whole force to remove away from the people such imminent destruction as daile hastened towards them, which to doe they thought it was partlie euen his dutie, sith God had bestowed vpon him such gifts, both of bodie, mind, and fortune, as most pientiously appeared in him, not onlie for the weale of himselfe, but also of his friends & countrie, & therefore his part was to shew his earnest diligence to deliuer the common-wealth of such tyrannie as was practised by the misgouernement of Grime and his unhappie counsellors. Which being done, he might order all things as should like him best.

Malcolme moued with these and the like persuasions of the Scottish lords, which daile reioyced vnto him, resolved with promise of their support to leue warre against Grime in this so necessarie a quarrell, and so assembling a great puissance together, he did set forth towards his aduersarie. By the way also there came still vnto him great numbers of men from each side to aid him in this enterpryse, offering by solenne othes to become his liegemen and subiects. Grime likewise being advertised of those newes, with all speed got together such people as he might assemble for the time, and comming forthward with the same at the towne of Auchnabart, both the armies pitched downe their tents, the one fast by the other, on the Ascension daie. Here Grime supposing that he might take his enemies at some aduantage, if he came vpon them on the sudden, for that being giuen to deuotion, they would loke for nothing lesse than for battell on that daie, he got forth of his campe in the dawning of that morning, in purpose forthwith to assaile them.

Notwithstanding, Malcolme being advertised thereof, sent vnto Grime, requesting him to desist from battell for reuerence of that blessed feast, but Grime would in no wise assent thereto, but nades would come on without stop or staie; wher vpon both the armies rushing together met right fiercelie, so that in the beginning there was great slaughter made on both sides, but within a while king Grimes side was put to the worse, and in the end cleerlie discomfited. In the chase were manie slaine, but yet no such number as so notable a victorie required. It is said that Grime was taken alive standing at defence, & most fiercelie fighting, who being sore wounded in the head, had both his eies put out, and afterwards continuing so in great miserie and languor certaine daies, at length departed out of this life, in the 9 yere of his reigne, and was buried in Colmekill, after the incarnation 1010 yeres.

After this victorie thus obtained by Malcolme, he called such noble men as were taken prisoners in this battell before him, vsing manie gentle words toward them, declaring that the right of the crowne appertained vnto him, and that the warres which he had made, were not attempted against the common wealth of the Scottish estate, but rather in reliefe thereof, to the end the people might be deliuered of the tyrannie exercised by Grime and his counsellors. When he had thus vttered his mind vnto them, he appointed a publike assembly to be kept at Scone (for the election of a new king) there to be holden within 15 daies after. Whither the Scottish nobilitie comming together at the time & place appointed, and consenting to crowne Malcolme king, he vtterlie refused to receiue the crowne, except the law established by his father Kenneth for the succession thereof were first confirmed and approued, wher vpon the lords bound themselves by solenne othes to performe the same, and neuer to breake and violate it in anie condition. His request herein being granted with generall consent both of the nobles and commons, the crowne was set vpon his head, he being placed in the chaire of marble, to the great reioysing of all the people present.

When the solemnitie of this coronation was ended, he called before him againe all the lords and peeres of his realme; of the which, part had aided him in the last warres, and part had bene assisstant vnto his aduersarie Grime: and there vied the matter in such wise amongst them, that he made them all friends, each one promising to other to forget all former offenses, displeasures, and controuersies past, which he did to avoid all intestine trouble that might grow out of the rotes of such rancor and malice, as in time of the civil discord had sprung vpon among them. Further, for the better administration of iustice in due forme and maner, he bestowed publike offices vpon discret persons, skilfull in the laws and ordinances of the realme. Other offices pertaining to the warres & defense of the realme, he committed to such as were practised & trained in such exercises, so that iustice was ministred on all sides throughout the kingdome, with such equitie and by rightnesse, as had not bene heard of in anie age before him. Whilist the Scottish estate was gouerned in such happie wise, by the prudent policie of king Malcolme; it chanced that Sueno king of Danes landed in England with a mightie naue, in purpose to reuenge the injuries done before vnto his people by the Englishmen.

This Sueno (as appeareth more at large in the historie of Denmarke) first being an earnest persecutor of christian men, and punished by the diuine prouidence for his crueltie in that behalfe, shewed by sundrie overthrowes receiued at the enemies hands, as in being thise taken prisoner, and in the end driven and expelled out of his kingdome, he came into Scotland for reliefe and succour, where through the wholesome instruction of godlie and vertuous men, he renounced his heathenish belasse, and receiued the christian faith, and being baptised, at length was restored home to his kingdome. Shortly after with a mightie armie of Danes, Gothes, Norwegians, and Swedeners, with other northerne people, he arriued (as is said) in England, and chased king Egeldred into Northumberland, who there receiuing aid from the Scots, according to the league which latelie before he had contracted with them, he determined effronces to trie the chance of battell with his enemies. Marching forwards therefore towards them, he came to the riuer of Wofe, nere to the banks whereof, not farre from Dork, he pitched 1010. A.D. Malcolme king of Scotland to the battell against Grime.

A parliament at Scone.

Malcolme refused the crowne but vpon condition.

The opinion of king Kenneth for the succession of the crowne confirmed.

Malcolme.

Malcolme greatly reioyced in the blessing of his realme.

Malcolme sent some officers.

Malcolme king of Denmark landed in England.

Malcolme carried to the christian faith in Scotland.

Malcolme as the Scots wrote Egeldred chased into Northumberland and from the Scots.

Malcolme as the Scots wrote Egeldred chased into Northumberland and from the Scots.

Malcolme.

Malcolme met the king.

The battell against Egeldred & Sueno.

The English army put to flight by the Danes.

Egeldred was repaid by flight.

Malcolme greatly reioyced in the blessing of his realme.

Malcolme sent some officers.

Malcolme king of Denmark landed in England.

Malcolme carried to the christian faith in Scotland.

Malcolme as the Scots wrote Egeldred chased into Northumberland and from the Scots.

Malcolme as the Scots wrote Egeldred chased into Northumberland and from the Scots.

Malcolme.

downe his When pleasures hands, sending them Egeldred cruell battagians, and die bent to fished that into his for a spie. fels ready by dint of rie desirous people in that there ther they neither fit at the first tinning c ter, till at leaving t rie. The great, but men, Eg and passer hands, b ken or la Thus despairing into pored ued of H terwards pormar ter vnto Alured a moze at nercome the whole destroyed the king out anie such as But the determi & falling him in their mi most pu satisfied der what his plea session o onelie t subiectic victors f Su he qual on of th the vict had pur nation wise, as anie ar husband govern resigne holds: Sueno should weapon warre as coin dolme his tents.

Then Sueno not forgetfull of the benefitts and pleasures receiued but latelie at the Scottishmens hands, sent an herald at armes vnto them, commanding them to depart their waies home, and to refuse Egeldreds compaignie; either else to looke for most cruell battell at the hands of the Danes, the Norwegians, and others the people of Germanie, there ready bent to their destruction. Egeldred being aduertised that his aduersaries messenger was thus come into his campe, caused him to be staied and arrested for a spie. And the same day he brought forth his battels readie ranged into the fields, to trie the matter by dint of sword, if Sueno were so minded: who verie desirous to accept the offer, brought forth also his people in perfect order and well arraied to fight, so that there was no staie on either part, but that together they flic most fiercelie, & in such eger wise, that neither side had leasure to bestow their shot, but euen at the first they buckled together at handblowes, continuing certeine houres with great & cruell slaughter, till at length the Englishmen were put to flight, leauing the Danes a verie deere and bloudie victorie. The murther also that day of the Scots was great, but yet nothing to the number of the Englishmen. Egeldred himselfe with a few other, got a bote and passed ouer Duse, so escaping out of the enemies hands, but the rest were for the most part either taken or slaine.

Thus Egeldred being vtterlie banquished and despairing of all recouerie, fled out of England ouer into Normandie, where he was verie friendlie receiued of Richard as then duke of Normandie, and afterwards purchased such fauour there amongst the Normans, that he married the ladie Emme, daughter vnto the said duke, and begot of hir two sonnes, Alured and Edward, as in the English chronicles more at large it dooth appere. Sueno hauing thus overcome his enemies, and now put in possession of the whole realme of England, was in mind to haue destroyed all the English generation, so to establish the kingdome to him and his posteritie for euer, without anie impeachment afterwards to be made by such as should succed of them that were then alieue. But the nobles of England aduertised of Suenos determination, came humble befoze his presence, & falling doune on their knees at his feet, besought him in most pitifull wise to haue compassion on their miserable estate, who in times past being a most puissant nation, both by sea and land, were now satisfied (if he would grant them life) to continue vnder that bondage and seruitude it should stand with his pleasure to prescribe, for they desired neither possession of castles, towncs, or other sovereignties, but onelie to liue with their wiues and children vnder subiection within their owne native cuntry, at the victors will and appointment.

Sueno, albeit he was of nature verie cruell, yet he qualified his displeasure by this humble submission of the English nobilitie; in such sort, that he used the victorie farre more gentlie, than at the first he had purposed, commanding that the whole English nation should remaine in the cuntry, but in such wise, as by no means they should presume to beare anie armoz or weapon, but to applie themselves vnto husbandrie, and other seruile occupations vnder the gouernement of the Danes, vnto whom they should religne and deliuer all their castles, forts, and strong holds: and taking an oth to be true liege men vnto Sueno, as their soueraigne lord and king; they should bring in (so be deliuered vnto his vse) all their weapons and armoz, with other munition for the warres, also all their gold and siluer, as well in plate as coine. If anie of the Englishmen refused thus to do, proclamation was made that he should immediatlie lose his life as a rebell and a disobedient person. These conditions were hard, and hardlie vrged. The Englishmen were brought vnto such an extremitie, that they were faine to accept these conditions of peace, for other meane to auoid present death they knew none. And thus was the dominion of England conquered by the Danes, after the Saxons had reigned in the same 564 yeeres.

Such tyrannie also after this was used by the Danes, that none of the English nation was admitted to anie office or rule within the realme, either spirituall or temporall, but were vtterlie removed from the same, and some of them cast in prison and daillie put in hazard of their liues. Finally, the Englishmen were brought into such miserable thraldome, that euerie houtholder within the realme was constrained to receiue and find at his owne proper costs and charges, one Dane, who should continually glue good watch what was said or done in the house, and to aduertise the king thereof, for doubt of conspiracies or treasons to be contriued and practised against his person and rofall estate. This Dane by the good man of the house and his familie, for honor sake, was called lord Dane, which word was afterwards turned to a name of reproch, as where anie sole person liued loitering, without the vse of some honest exercise to get his liuing withall, the people were and yet are accustomed to call him a lordaine.

Thus farre out of Hector Boetius we haue shewed of Suenos doings in England, the which although it agre not in all points with our English histories, yet sith the historie of Scotland in this place seemeth partlie to hang thereon, we haue thought good to set it downe as we find it in the same Boetius: but aduertising the reader withall, that if our histories be true, this which followeth touching Suenos invading of Scotland, chanced befoze that Egeldred, whome the Scottish writers name Eldred, was duen to flee into Normandie. For when that Sueno lastlie returned into England, and constrained Egeldred so to forsake the land, he liued not long after but departed this life about Candelmas, in the yeere 1014 (as in the English histories ye may read more at large) not hauing time to make anie such iourne into Scotland: so that it may be thought, if he did enterprise anie such exploit there, it was befoze this his last arrivall in England.

But now to proceed according to that which we find in the foresaid Boetius. Sueno hauing spoiled the Englishmen of their liberties (in manner befoze remembred, or rather brought them to become tributaries vnto him, as at the first time of his arrivall herte he did in deed, he thought it necessarie, for the more suertie of his estate in England, to conclude some peace or league with his neighbours the Normans, Britains, & Scots, vnder condition that they should not support anie Englishman against him. But for so much as he could not compasse his intention here, in, he furnished all the castles and fortresses on the sea-coasts, ouer against Normandie, with men, munition, and vittels, to resist all sudden inuasions that might be attempted on that side. And on the other part towards the north, he made all the prouision he could deuise to make moztall wars vpon the Scots: and the moze to annoie his enemies, he sent commandement vnto Olauus his lieutenant in Norway, and to Onetus his deputie in Denmarke, to come with all the power they might leaue into Scotland, to make warres on his enemies there.

Whereupon shortly after those foresaid capitains arrived with an huge armie in the mouth of Speie, and landed in such puissant order, that the inhabitants of Orkney land fled out of their houses, with their

529. H.B.
The miserie of the Englishmen vnder the bondage of the Danes.

The name of lordaine howe came by.

Sueno landed here this last time of his coming forth of Denmarke into England in Iulie, in the yeere 1013, & departed this life in the beginning of Februarie, in the yeere 1014.

Sueno prepared to inuade the Scots.

Olauus, and Onetus.

The Danes land in Scots land.

The crueltie
of the Danes.

The castell of Parne besieged.

Malcolme
sendeth ambassadors to
the Danes.

The Danes
sleae the ambassadors.

The Scots
through feare
are astonied.

Malcolms
words to his nobles.

Loncart.

Albion the sepulture of Danes.

their wiues, children, and goods (such as they could conueie awaie with them) into places where they thought to remaine most out of danger. But the Danes, after their manner, burne and spoile all befoze them, aswell churches and chapels, as other buildings and edifices. Such of the people as could not flee in time, but by chance fell into their hands, were slaine without all mercie. Also all the strengths and holds in the countrie were taken by the Danes, thre castles onelie excepted: that is to say, Elgin, Forres, and Parne, which the Danes named after wards Burg, and for that they trusted (when the same was wonne) the other two would yeld without anie further defense, they first laid siege vnto this castell of Parne, inforcing themselves with all their power to win it: but in the meane time, they were informed how Malcolme the Scottish king was come within fife miles of them with all the forces of his realme to giue them battell.

Incontinentlie hereupon they raised their siege, and hasted forth to meet him, with no lesse courage than if victorie were already present in their hands. Shortly after, there came vnto them heralds also from Malcolme, to vnderstand whie they had thus invaded his realme with open and most cruell warre, hauing no occasion giuen by him or his subiects so to do: who scarselie had done their message, but that they were slaine forthwith by cruell outrage of the Danes. Malcolme being soze moued to vnderstand the law obserued by all nations for the safetie of messengers to be thus violated by the enemies, kept on his iourne with the more fierce courage, till he came to a meadow a little beside Killos, where he incamped for that night. Great noise and clamour was heard throughout the armie, euery man being desirous of battell, to reuenge the injuries done by the Danes against their friends and countrymen: notwithstanding on the morrow, when they saw their enemies in farre greater number, and in better order than euer had bene scene by anie of them before that time, their hart began to wax faint, hauing greater care which waie to saue their owne liues, than to giue the onset vpon their enemies.

Malcolme perceiuing such dread to be entred into the harts of his people, that they were now more like to run awaie than to fight, if he should bring them forth to battell, got him to a little hill, and calling his nobles about him, he declared vnto them how he could not but detest their great cowardise, that were thus astonied at the first sight of their enemies, without further triall of their forces. ¶ At home (said he) ye are most hardie and baltant, where no danger appereth. What rebuke then is it vnto you, to be thus faint harted (now that ye are come where ballancie should be shewed) in degenerating so far from your worthie fathers and noble progenitors, the which at Loncart vnder the conduct of my father Kenneth, obtained so famous a victorie of the selfe same nation, whose furious puissance ye seeme now so much to feare: There hath bene triall made in battell with this enimie in our time, both within the bounds of Scotland, and also of England, to the great honor and renowne of our elders. What discomfures the Danes haue receiued are yet fresh in memorie, so manie of them lesing their liues amongst vs, that Albion may well be reckoned the sepulture of Danes; as some of you can well record by your owne remembrance, and other haue heard by report of their forefathers and ancestors. ¶ We ought then (said he) to be of god courage, rather than to faint now at need, considering ye haue to doe with those enimies, who are but the remnant of the other, which befoze haue bene banquished and ouerthrowne by Scottishmen, both at Loncart, and in diuerse other places; yea and besides that, such as mouing warres now at this present without iust occasion, haue violated the lawes both of God and man, deserring thereby iust vengeance at Gods hands, the punishment of all such traitor offenders. There is great hope therefore of victorie (said he) left vnto all such as fight against these enimies, if we take manlie parts vnto vs, and shew our selues in valiant constancie like to our elders, whereby it shall then appere what outrageous follie remained in the Danes, to invade vs without occasion of injuries preceeding. Therefore if ye haue not more regard to the safetie of your fraile bodies, which must needs at length perish, than to the defense and preseruation of your common countrie, why passe ye not forward, fith there is now no place nor time to take longer abuisse, in the matter, as ye may well vnderstand by the presence of the enimie ready to foine.

The nobles moued with these words of their prince, began boldly to exhort their people to battell. Incontinentlie therupon rose such noise and raging furie through the armie, that without measuring either their owne forces or their enemies, they rush forth vpon them without anie order or god arate. Malcolme beholding the Scots to come thus furiously against them, boldly incountred them with arrayed battels. Whereupon ensued a verie terrible fight, with great manhood shewed on both sides, nothing being let passe that might appertene to worthie captains: the Scots inforcing themselves to defend their countrie and ancient liberties on the one side, and the Danes doing their best endeavour by valiant hardinesse to saue their liues and honors on the other. At length, after huge murder & slaughter made on both parts, the Scots were put to flight, Malcolme was soze wounded, & had his helmet so fast beaten to his head, that it might not well be got off, yet was he conueied out of the field in manner for dead, and kept secret in a wood, till he was somewhat amended, and then got him into places out of danger. The Danes hauing got this victorie, and gathered the spoile of the field, returned to besiege elscones the castell of Parne, with more force and violence than before.

This castell in those daies was inclosed on each side with the sea, hauing one narrow passage as an entrie vnto it, made by craft of man in manner of a bridge. Those that were within it, hauing knowledge of the ouerthrow and losse of the field, rendered the fortreffe, on condition, that leauing all their armor, weapon, and other munitions behind them, they might depart with their liues and other goods saued. Nevertheless the Danes, contrarie to their faith giuen, being once entred the castell, hanged all those which they found within it ouer the walls, in most despitfull manner. Thus was Parne wonne by the Danes, the strongest hold within Murray land, and so garnished with men, munition, and vittels, that it was thought impregnable. When those souldiers which kept Elgin and Forres, hearing what crueltie the Danes had thus befieled out of those castles, and lest them bold without anie person to defend them. The Danes reioissing at this good fortune, trusted to establish themselves sure seates in Murray land, and thereupon sent backe their ships into Forwaie and Denmarke, to fetch from thence their wiues and children. In the meane time they constrained such Scots as they had laid hands on, to reape and inne the corne growing abroad in the fields, vnto their use and commoditie.

Malcolme being aduertised of all these things, doubting least by the arrivall of new aid, his enemies might war more puissant, in the beginning of the next summer he assembled a great multitude of warriors,

Marthlake.

The Scots
and Danes are afraid of another.

The Scots
forced to re-
turne.

The Scots
without open warre (simpli-
ty battell.

The Scots
put to flight.
Malcolme
wounded.

Malcolms
place.

Copy, that is to God, and our noble, and saint Malcolme,
for so he ioued
them together
according to the manner of that time.

The castell of Parne re-
sized by composition.

The Danes breakers of faith and premise.

The Scots
suddenness renew battell.

Elgin and Forres left bold.

Stenness is same.

ore, and vnto the petition o
here they they were uing haue afore the now at being so knowing full pae their en courages buckled
ell mali
In the
say, the turke of mies, w
Scottish
could n
reason froe wi in trau purpos (as wa though
best to with th place, i saint by his his wa tie, and fand o uelene thus o
do the ching t
state:
roz fro
sweet miser pell w
honor dual a
ment,
post o praiere thoug heared
for su
we re
mies.
the fo
the cr
fente
with their
with which
with riozs down thoug rie ch
down
flame ding ther bold Dan
space.

and came in good order and most warlike arraie unto Spurthlake, a towne of Shar, where the first erection of the bishops see of Abirdeen was founded. Here the one armie comming in sight of the other, they were suddenly both amazed. For the Scots having had too much experience of the crueltie thewbed afore time by the Danes, were put in no small feare now at the plaine & open sight of them. The Danes being farre off from the sea side, and upon an unknowne ground, were more afraid of some guilefull practise, than of the open violence and force of their enemies. Yet neverthelesse in the end, by the encouragement of the capitaine on both sides, they buckled together with great fiercenesse and most cruel malicious hatred on each hand.

In the first brunt three valiant capitaine, that is to say, Kenneth of Ala, Crine of Strathern, and Patrick of Dunbar, rushing over fiercelie on their enemies, were slaine, and gave occasion to manie of the Scottishmen to flee, but the place was such, that they could not well make their course anye waie forth, by reason of the narrownesse thereof, fenced on either side with deepe trenches full of water and mud: also in trauers were laid sundrie trees, as it had bene of purpose to impeach the passage, denised in that sort (as was thought) in time of some ciuill warres. Here though Malcolme like a valiant champion, did his best to staie them that fled, yet was he borne backe with the presse, till he came to the middell of this place, where stood a chappell dedicated in the honor of saint Poloke, the which Malcolme beholding, cast by his hands towards heauen, making his praier on his wife. Great God of vertue, rewarder of pietie, and punisher of sinne, we thy people seeking to defend our native countrie granted to vs of thy benediction, as now destitute of all mortall helpe, and thus oppressed with the insurious inuasion of Danes, doe lie vnto thee in this our extreme necessitie, beseeching thee to haue compassion vpon our miserable state: remoue (oh mercifull lord) this dreadfull terror from thy people. And oh thou mother of God, the sweet refuge of mortall people in their distresse and miseries: and thou saint Poloke to whom this chappell was dedicate, helpe vs at this present, and in the honor of you I here make a vow to build a cathedral church for a bishops see, to remaine as a monument, to testifie vnto our posteritie, that by your support our realme hath bene defended.

Scarcely had Malcolme made an end of this praier, when diuers of the nobles with a loud voice, as though they had bene assured that his praier was heard, cried to their companies; Stand good fellows, for suerlie it is the pleasure of almightie God, that we returne and renew the battell against our enemies. Whereupon rose a wonderfull noise amongst the souldiers, each one encouraging other to withstand the enemies, and to fight in most manfull wise in defense of their countrie and ancient liberties, & forthwith as it had bene by miracle they returned vpon their enemies, making great slaughter on each side, without regard to their liues or bloudie wounds, which they boldlie and without feare receiued. Here with Malcolme with an ambushment of stout warriors came vpon Wnetus, who was prancing vp and downe the field without anye helmet on his head, as though the Scots had bene already without recouerie clearely discomfited, and so there was he beaten downe beside his horse, and amongst the footmen slaine out of hand. The residue of the Danes beholding the slaughter of their capitaine, staied from further pursute on the Scots. Whereof ensued great boldnesse to the Scots, and discouragement to the Danes: albeit the battell continued still a long space, the souldiers doing their best on either side, till at length the Danes were put to flight, manie of them being slaine, and but few taken. Malcolme beholding the discomfite of his people, & how his companion in authoritie was slaine, fled into Whurcey land with a small companie about him.

The next day Malcolme considering that a number of his most valiant capitaine he had lost in this battell, diuided the spoile of the field amongst his men, and coasting from further pursute of the Danes at that time, went into Angus, where he remained the residue of the yere with the castell of Forfairs, taking counsell with his nobles touching the publicke affaires of the realme, and how to recouer his countrie of Whurcey land out of the enemies hands. King Surno hearing in the meane time howe intemperate his people had spied this in Scott land at the battell of Spurthlake, in reuenge thereof determined to inuade the Scots with two mightie armies, the one to be rigged in England, and to come forth of the riuer of Thames; and the other to be sent from Denmarke, one Canus a Dane, verie expert in warlike knowledge, being appointed to be gouernor of all the men of warre that should come from both those parties.

The yere next ensuing, both these fleets according to commandement and order giuen, arrived and met together within the mouth of the Forth, nere to Saint Ebbes head. Here Canus going about to land his men, was kept off by the stout resistance of the Scots, there assembled for the same intent. Canus then plucking vp the sailles, directed his course vnto the Ile of Sketh, where riding at anchor for the space of one moneth, and abiding for some prosperous wind, at length when the same came onte about, he passed from thence vnto the Red-bzaies, called in Latine Rubrum promontorium, there landed his whole armie, before the countrie could be gathered to resist him. Canus being once landed, got him to the next hill, and beholding the ruine of the towne of Spontros, which a few yeares before had bene destroyed by the Danes, he reioiced not a little, for that his chance was to come on land in the selfe same place, where the Danes had earst vanquished their enemies, hoping of like lucke in this his enterprise and present expedition.

After this, he took his iourne through Angus, sparing no manner of crueltie that might be deuised: cities, townes, villages, and churches, with all manner of other buildings publicke and priuat were consumed with fire. At his comming to Brechin, for that the castell there in those daies was of such strength, that it might not be hastilie woone, he caused the towne and church being right faire and sumptuouslie built in honor of the Trinitie (to whom it was dedicated) to be spoiled, & so rased to the earth, that one stone was not left standing vpon another. With these and the semblable cruelties, Canus raging both against God and man, was finally advertised that king Malcolme was come to Dundee with all the power of Scotland. Then suddenly he took the next way towards the sea side, comming the next day following vnto a village called Walbyd, where he pitched downe his tents. The same day, king Malcolme making all hast possible to succour his subjects, and preserue the countrie from the cruell outrage of the Danes, came to the towne of Barre two little miles from the place, where his enemies were incamped. In the morning he drew into the field, in purpose to giue them open battell.

But before he arraigned his battels, he called his nobles and capitaine together, desiring them to consider how they should match in fight against people blinded with vile auarice, liuing on the spoile and pilage

The Danes put to flight.

Malcolme fled into Whurcey land.

Surno preparing a new armie to inuade Scotland.

Canus appointed capitaine general, of the Danes.

Saint Ebbes head.

The Scots kept off the Danes from landing.

Canus took his armie land at the Red-bzaies.

Canus marched through Angus. The crueltie of the Danes.

The towne and church of Brechin destroyed.

King Malcolme hastied forward to fight with the Danes.

Malcolme oration.

lage got by thæuerie, and not by ante iust warres: enimies not onelie to the christian faith, but also to all innocent people, whome they sought vniuersally to invade, without hauing occasion so to do, saue onelie vpon an iniurious meaning to liue by spoile of other mens goods, wherein they haue no manner of propriety. He willed them therefore to remember how they were come thus against those enimies in defense of their native countrie, appointed vndoubtedly by God to reuenge the cruell iniuries done by the Danes against his name, and people that professed the same. They ought not then to measure force in number of souldiers, but rather in manhood and valancie of heart. Canus likewise exhorted his people, not vsing manie words, but yet pithie, desiring them to remember how it behoued them either to win immortall fame by victorie, either else to die with miserie in an vncouth land, by the hand of their most fierce and cruell enimies.

Canus exhorteth his Danes.

The nature of valiant hearts and noble stomachs.

A bloudie battell.

Malcolme winneth the field. Canus is slaine.

An obeliske.

The house of Recthes advanced to honor.

Danes slaine at Abirleimon.

Herewith Malcolme imbattelling his people, brought them forth stronglie ranged in good order to encounter the Danes, which likewise approached towards him in good arraie of battell. His heart was filled the more with hope of victorie, for that he had tried sundrie times before the force of the enimies in diuers conflicts and encounters. For such is the nature of noble and valiant stomachs, the more experience they haue in honorable enterprises, the more are they kindled in desire to shew their powers in famous acts and worthie attempts. The armies hereupon on both sides, fiercelie rushing together, began a battell right cruell & terrible, continuing certeine houres with such bloudshed, that the river of Lochte ran with a purple hue downe into the Almaine seas. The fields also where they fought, though they were full of sand (as the nature of the soile giueth) yet were they made moist by the abundance of bloud spilled in the same. Sparie there were so earnestlie bent to be reuenged on the enimie, that after they had their deaths wound, they would run themselves forward vpon their aduersaries weapon, till they might close with him, enforcing their uttermost powers to dispatch him also; so that diuers were seene to fall to the ground togither fast grasping one another, and so immediatlie both of them to die withall: such burning hatred kindled their hearts, that thus were they wholie set on reuenge. At length yet the honor of the field remained with Malcolme.

Canus perceiving the discomfort to light on his side, with a small companie about him thought to haue escaped by flight vnto the next mounteins, but being pursued of his enimies, he was slaine by them per he was got two miles from the place of the battell. The place where he was slaine, is named after him vnto this day, and called Camelfone, where is an obeliske set vp in memorie of the thing, with his picture grauen therein, and likewise of those that slue him. The principall fear of Canus was one Recth, a young gentleman of right hardie courage, whose seruice in the battell was verie notable, in recompense whereof he was rewarded by king Malcolme, with sundrie lands and faire possessions in Louthian. His familie (saith Hector Boetius) hath and doth continue in great honor amongst Scottishmen euen vnto this day, and is decorated with the office of the marshallship of Scotland, to the high renowne and fame thereof, amongst the chiefeest peers of the realme.

An other companie of the Danes fled from this ouerthrow were slaine at Abirleimon, not past foure miles from Brechin, where is set by a great stone or obeliske, grauen with certeine characters or letters, to aduertise them that passe that waters forth, of this slaughter of Danes there made by our worthie elders. The residue of the Danes that escaped with life from the field, hauing certeine Scottishmen to their guides corrupted with monie fled to their ships, declaring to their fellows that mishap had fortuned. King Malcolme after he obtained this famous victorie (as before is said) at Barre, he caused the spoile of the field to be diuided amongst his souldiers, according to the lawes of armes; and then caused the dead bodies of the Danes to be buried in the place where the field had bene fought, and the bodies of the Scottishmen which were found dead were conueied vnto the places of christian buriall, and there buried with funerall obsequies in sundrie churches and churchyards. There are seene manie bones of the Danes in those places where they were buried, there lieng bare aboue ground euen vnto this day, the sands (as it often chanceth) being blown from them. The other Danes, which escaped to their ships, pulled by failles to haue passed into Murrey land vnto Mlauss, but remaining on the seas the space of foure daies togither, tossed to and fro by contrarie winds, at length by a streinable east wind they were driuen vpon the coast of Buchgahan, and through want of conuenable harbrough were in present danger to haue bene cast away. At length, after they had ridden at anchor in the firth there, to their great displeasure a long space, and finding no prosperous winds to depart from the shore, for that their bittels began to faile them, they set fire vnto their best and lustiest souldiers on land, to fetch in some bottie or preie of cattell, therewith to relieue their hunger and famine. They that were thus sent forth, being perforce appointed with armour and weapon, ranged abroad till they had got togither a great number of beasts, with the which draving towards their ships, they were encountred by the way by Parnachus the thane of Buchgahan, whole accompanied with the power of that countrie, whose force when they saw how they were not well able to resist without some aduantage of place, they got them vp into an high crag, where, with tumbling downe stones vpon the Scottishmen as they mounted vp towards them, they caused them some what to faile; but at length through the earnest exhortation of Parnachus, the Scots (as people inflamed with wode desire to be reuenged) mounted the hill in despight of their enimies, though diuers of them were slaine in that assault. Those which wan the height of the crag vpon the Danes, made such a cruell battell with them, that there was not one Dane that escaped their hands.

This conflict was fought nere vnto Gemmer a village or towne in Buchgahan, where, in memorie thereof, lie manie great bones of the Danes to be seene yet euen vnto these daies. It should appeare by the same bones, that men in former time were of more huge growth and stature, than they be at this present. The other Danes which were on ship board, understanding what had happened to their fellows (because they returned not againe to the ships) so sone as the wind came about for their purpose, holled by failles, and toke their course forthright towards Murrey land. In the meane time king Sueno hearing of these ouerthrowes, which his people had in such sort receiued at the Scottishmens hands, as a prince of a right haughtie courage, not lightlie overcome with ante aduerser fortune, made preparation in all speedie wise to be reuenged, appointing his brother Canute, as then hauing the administration of Denmarke; to come from thence with a new flæte and armie against the Scots. It is said, that this Canute, according to order prescribed him by his brother Sueno, landed first in Buchgahan, and

The burning of the spoils.

King Malcolme's better imitation.

Bones of Danes.

The Scottishmen request vnto their king for licence to fight.

The onset is given.

The Scots have the name of victorie, rather than vice, for it is selfe.

Deare conclusion: do for want of power to mainteine it.

The articles of the peace betwixt the Danes and Scottishmen.

The holden in Scotland deposed by the Danes in the Scottish hands, and returned into Denmarke.

Sueno perceiving the time to invade Scotland, Canute by his brother Sueno, appointed Canute to come against the Scots.

Canute by his brother Sueno, appointed Canute to come against the Scots.

Canute by his brother Sueno, appointed Canute to come against the Scots.

Canute by his brother Sueno, ap-

pointed Canute to come against the Scots.

destroyed a galleon, in reuenge for the Danes he before. Malcolme though thou was greatlie with all speedie same toward with often no wise to ie generall bat throw, he sh for defense o enimies. F togither, the parties. The beholding fo friends, wit of the towne each side befo colme, and licence to fig lie, that if h gine battell Malcolme people to ino that he migh their petition member the the onset w on either pa fight a long other out of both sides w than the vic who were so ter, that in t to pursue th with life fled night, whic they lodged uenture as On the r both parties minds were new battell to maintein toke vpon ti cluded with should depa all other the should clea fishmen, d Malcolme, two nation: thers enimie was fought within the same batte built there, nance of p order of the people: for also receiue the solemn colme, Can session of Sueno land, W of the Scot departed w King Mal vnto full forme the destroyed a great part of that countrey by fire and sword, in reuenge of the slaughter of his countrey-men the Danes, which had bene there made lately before.

Malcolme soze kindled in wrath by these iniuries, though through continuance of the wars his power was greatly decayed, yet did he assemble an armie with all speed he could deuise, and marched with the same towards the Danes, in purpose to staie them with often skirmishes and light encounters, but in no wise to teopard with them in anie pitcht field or generall battell, for feare least if he had the ouerthrow, he should not be able to furnish a new power for defense of his countrey, against the rage of the enemies. For the space tweretye of sixe daies together, there was often skirmishing betwixt the parties. The which terme being expired, the Scots beholding so huge murder of their countrey-men and friends, with the spoile of the fields, and destruction of the towne and villages, burning and blasing on each side before their faces, they come to king Malcolme, and desired him that he would grant them licence to fight with their enemies, protesting plainely, that if he would not consent thereto, they would giue battell at their owne choise.

Malcolme perceiving the earnest minds of his people to encounter their enemies in plaine field, and that he might no longer protract the time, he granted their petition, and therewith beseeching them to remember their honors and duties: incontinentlie the onset was giuen with great hatred and malice on either part, so that most egerlie continuing in fight a long time, they enforced themselves to rid each other out of life: so that all the nobles well nere on both sides were slaine, the name of victorie rather than the victorie it selfe remaining with the Scots, who were so fable and faint with long fight & slaughter, that in the end of the battell they were not able to pursue those few of the Danes, which elcasing with life fled faintlie out of the field. And so for that night, which followed the day of this bloudie battell, they lodged here and there in severall places, at aduantage as well as they might.

On the morrow after, when it was understood on both parties, what losse they had sustained, their minds were conuerted rather to peace than to renew battell, because they were not of power longer to mainteine it. Whereupon by mediation of such as tolke vpon them to treat a peace, the same was concluded with these articles. First, that the Danes should depart out of Murrey land, Buchquhan, and all other the boundes of Scotland. That the warres should clearelie cease betwixt the Danes and Scottishmen, during the naturall liues of Sueno and Malcolme, or either of them. That neither of those two nations should aid or in anie wise support the others enemies. That the field where the last battell was fought, should be halloved for christian buriall, within the which the Danes that were slaine in the same battell should be buried, and a church to be built there, and lands appointed forth for the maintenance of priests, to celebrate there according to the order of the christian religion, then vsed by both the people: for the Danes latelie before that season had also receiued the faith. This peace being ratified by the solemne othes of both the kings, Sueno and Malcolme, Canute with his Danes resigning vp the possession of such holds and places as they held in Murrey land, Buchquhan, or else where within anie part of the Scottish dominions, got him to his fleet, and departed with the same home into Denmarke.

King Malcolme hauing thus restored his countrey vnto so full peace, thought nothing so good as to perforce the articles of the agreement accorded betwixt him and the Danes, and therefore caused a church to be builded in the place appointed, dedicating the same in honor of saint Olafus patrone of Denmarke and Norwaie, to signifie vnto such as came after, that sundrie nobles of the Danes laie buried in that church. In memorie hereof, the lands that were giuen to the same church, are called euen yet vnto these daies Crowdan, which signifieth as much as if ye should say, The slaughter of Danes. The church which was first builded there, chancing as often happeneth in those parties, to be ouercast with sands, an other was erected in place not farre off, hauing a more commodious site. Sundrie of the bones of them that were buried in this place, being left bare by reason that the sands were blowne away besides them, Hector Boetius (the writer of the Scottish chronicle) beheld in the yere 1527, which seemed more like vnto giants bones, than to men of common stature (as he ausucheth) whereby it should appeare, that men in old time were of much greater stature and quantitie of bodie, than anie that are to be found in these our daies.

Malcolme being thus deliuered of his enemies the Danes, caused publike praiers generallie to be made throughout the realme, in rendering thanks to almightie God, that it had pleased him to deliuer his people from the troubles of warre. He toke order also, that churches should be repaired, which by the enemies in time of the warres had bene destroyed. And further, he caused the administration of the lawes and wholesome ordinances of the realme to be vsed and put in practise, according to the due forme of the same, which manie yeres before could haue no place, by reason of the warres. He caused an assemble of all the estates of his realme to be called at Wertha castell, in those daies standing not farre from the place where the towne of Perth now standeth. In which conuention were manie things enacted, both for the setting forth of Gods honor, and the weale of the realme, whereby Malcolme wan much praise amongst his subiects, to the eternall memorie of his name.

After this, supposing it most honorable to aduance the blood of such as had serued well in the last warres, or had their fathers or other friends slaine in the same, he called a parlement at Scone, in the which, causing partition to be made of the realme, by diuiding it into baronies, he bestowed it amongst the nobles, according to the qualitie of euerie one his merits, reseruing in maner nothing to the maintenance of the crowne, common enties onelie excepted, with the mountaine wherein the marble chaire stood, and a few other possessions which he purposed to giue vnto churches and chapells. The nobles on the other part, to the end the king might haue sufficient wherewith to mainteine his roiall estate, granted vnto him and his successors for euer the custodie and wardship of their heires, if they chanced to die leauing them vnder the age of 21 yeres: and in the meane time till the same heires came to the said age, they agreed that the king and his successors should inioy the vse and profits of their lands, whether they were men or women, and when they came to the age of 21 yeres, that then they should enter into the possession of their lands, yelding vnto him or his successors one yeres rent in name of a reliefe, and if they chanced not to be married before their fathers deceasse, then also should they marrie at the kings appointment, or else compound with him for the same.

Thus ended the parlement for that season, with great ioy and comfort on each hand, for that the king had shewed such liberall bountyfull towards his barons, and they no lesse mindfull of their duties had declared

A church
builded.

Crowdan.
what it sig-
nifieth.

Bones of Danes.

Publike
praiers.

The repa-
ring of churches.
The restoring of lawes and iustice.

A parlement
at Wertha.

A parlement
at Scone.
Diuisiō of the realme into baronies.

The ward-ship of heires
granted to
the king.

Marriage of wards.

Bones of Danes.

Malcolme
thane of Buchquhan.

Danes slaine
vnto Scone.

Sueno prepared the third time to invade
Scotland.
Canute dis-turbeth vnto Sueno, ap-

declared such beneculent hearts, as appeared in that their free and large gift granted in forme and maner as before is exprest. Neither did Malcolme forget the vow which he made at Purthlake, when he was in danger to haue received the overthow at the hand of the Danes. For according to the same vow, he caused a church to be built in the same place, erecting a bishops see there, and indowed it with the lands & possessions of these three places, Purthlake, Cleometh, and Dunnieth, with all ecclesiasticall iurisdiction and tithes appertaining thereto. The bishops that sat in this see were called the bishops of Purthlake, till the daies of king Dauid the first, who changing the name, caused them to be called the bishops of Abirden, augmenting the see with sundrie faire reuenues to the better maintenance thereof.

The see of Purthlake, otherwise Abirden.

The booke called Regia maiestas.

Malcolme warre and vicious. Courtesies and age arriving together.

Malcolme's cruelty to purchase riches.

The conspiracy of the Scottish nobles against Malcolme.

Malcolme's line at Clamnis.

The murderers drowned.

21. H.B.
1040. H.B.

Strange sights.

Malcolme thus having purchased rest from further troubles of warre, governed the realme a certeine time after in good order of iustice, and caused a booke to be set forth, called Regia maiestas, containing the lawes and ordinances wherby the realme should be governed: and assigning forth in the same what fees also should be giuen vnto the chancelor, secretaire, constable, marshall, chamberlaine, iustice, treasurer, register, comptroller, and other the officers of his house. Such princelie doings and noble vertues were found in this Malcolme for a season, that if the same had continued with him in his latter age, there had neuer reigned anie king in Scotland, that might haue bene thought to haue passed him in two: this same: neuertheless his excellent qualities were stained at length by that reprochfull vice of vile avarice. For as it oftentimes happeneth, courtesies and age laid hold on him both at once. He then began to repent in that he had bene so liberall in giuing away his lands to his barons; & to recouer the same againe, he surmised feigned matter by untrue suggestions against diuerse of the chiefe nobles, putting some to death, & banishing other, that he might by this meanes introy their lands and goods as confiscate to the crowne for their supposed offences.

The nobles hauing great indignation at such cruelty used by the king against them and their linage, and that vpon no iust causes, but onelie vpon forged deuises, they conspired in sundrie meetings secretlie appointed amongst them, to find some meanes to dispatch him out of life. At length he chanced to haue some inbiling thereabout they went, & doubting to fall into their hands, fled for safegard of his life vnto Clamnis, where diuerse of the conspirators were brought into his lodging, by some of his owne household seruants, and there slue him in reuenge of their friends, whome he before had wrongfullie put to death. These murderers with their complices incontinentlie fled with all speed possible to auoid further danger for this their act: but missing their way (for the ground was quite couered as then with snow) they finallie came to the loch of Forfair, which was the same time frozen ouer. They therefore thinking to passe ouer it, when they came into the midst, the ice brake vnder them, so that sinking in, they were finallie drowned. Howbeit their bodies were afterwards draue forth of the loch with drags, and dismembred, and their heads and quarters were sent to diuerse towne of the realme, and there hong vp for a signification of their wicked treason. This was the end of king Malcolme in the 32 yere of his reigne, if ye reckon from the death of Constantine, or 25 after the death of Crine, and after the incarnation of our Sauour 1034 yeres. He was buried in Colmekill with his ancestors.

In this season was scene manie wonders and strange sights in Albion. On Christmas daie there was an earthquake, and a great rift of the earth made therewith in the midst of Strueling towne, out of the which issued such an abundant streame of water, that it bare away the next wood that was adjoining to the ruer of Forth. In the summer the sea rose higher, & flowed further into the land, than euer it had bene scene at anie other time. On Midsummer daie, which is the feast of saint John Baptist, there was such a vehement frost, that the corne and other fruits of the earth were blasted and killed, so that thereupon followed a great dearth in all the countrie.

After Malcolme succeeded his nephew Duncane the sonne of his daughter Beatrice: for Malcolme had two daughters, the one which was this Beatrice, being giuen in marriage vnto one Abbanath Crinen, a man of great nobilitie, and thane of the Isles and west parts of Scotland, bare of that marriage the foresaid Duncane; the other called Doda, was married vnto Sinell the thane of Glamis, by whom she had issue one Makbeth a valiant gentleman, and one that if he had not bene somewhat cruell of nature, might haue bene thought most worthy the gouernement of a realme. On the other part, Duncane was so soft and gentle of nature, that the people wished the inclinations and manners of these two cousins to haue bene so tempered and interchangeable bestowed betwixt them, that where the one had too much of clemencie, and the other of crueltie, the meane vertue betwixt these two extremities might haue reigned by indifferent partition in them both, so should Duncane haue proued a worthy king, and Makbeth an excellent capitaine. The beginning of Duncans reigne was verie quiet and peaceable, without anie notable trouble; but after it was perceived how negligent he was in punishing offenders, manie misruled persons took occasion thereof to trouble the peace and quiet state of the common-wealth, by seditions commotions which first had their beginnings in this wise.

Wanguho the thane of Lochquhaber, of whom the house of the Stewards is descended, the which by order of linage hath now for a long time intored the crowne of Scotland, euen till these our daies, as he gathered the finances due to the king, and further punished some that sharpe such as were notorious offenders, being assailed by a number of rebels inhabiting in that countrie, and spoiled of the monie and all other things, had much ado to get atwale with life, after he had received sundrie grievous wounds amongst them. Yet escaping their hands, after hee was somewhat recovered of his hurts, and was able to ride, he repaired to the court, where making his complaint to the king in most earnest wise, he purchased at length that the offenders were sent for by a sergeant at armes, to appeare to make answer vnto such matters as should be laid to their charge: but they augmenting their mischievous act with a more wicked deed, after they had misused the messenger with sundrie kinds of reproches, they finallie slue him also.

Then doubting not but for such contemptuous demeanour against the kings regall authoritie, they should be invaded with all the power the king could make, Makdowald one of great estimation among them, making first a confederacie with his nearest friends and kinsmen, took vpon him to be chiefe capitaine of all such rebels as would stand against the king, in maintenance of their grievous offences latelie committed against him. Manie slanderous words also, and railing taunts this Makdowald uttered against his prince, calling him a faint-hearted milkesop, more meet to gouerne a sort of idle monks in some cloister, than to haue the rule of such valiant and hardie men of warre as the Scots were. He Duncane.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

Duncane's sonne.

bles also such ments, that in mightie power there came vnto ferer them quarell, and o no small number gladlie please him to about him, ple as were discomfiting Malcolme. his head. He did put him small skill in nobles to a uise for the bels. Here were sundrie to euerie m much againe nesse in pur time to asse ding, if it vnto Ban bels should and that ne to make re

And eu with a ne ber, the such seare. lie atwale uerthea beth, with being oue (within t length wh hold anie surrende first slue least if he executed Makbeth then set eng deat dies, whi cruell na head to sent it a Bertha hong v that the terprise whome to bea Herbp toward bloude the kin full wo againe Isles, t berall some o sented king t law re the oil upon arriu

Justice law reposed.

bled also such subtil persuations and forged allurements, that in a small time he had gotten together a mightie power of men: for out of the westerne Isles there came vnto him a great multitude of people, offering themselves to assist him in that rebellious quarrell, and out of Ireland in hope of the spoile came no small number of Herries and Galloglasses, offering gladlie to serue vnder him, whither it should please him to lead them.

Malcolmdwald thus hauing a mightie puissance about him, incountered with such of the kings people as were sent against him into Lochquhaber, and discomfiting them, by mere force took their capitaine Malcolme, and after the end of the battell smote off his head. This ouerthrow being notified to the king, he put him in wonderfull feare, by reason of his small skill in warlike affaires. Calling therefore his nobles to a counsell, he asked of them their best aduise for the subduing of Malcolmdwald & other the rebels. Here, in sundrie heads (as euer it happeneth) were sundrie opinions, which they vttered according to euery man his skill. At length Hakbeth speaking much against the kings softnes, and ouermuch slacknesse in punishing offenders, whereby they had such time to assemble together, he promised notwithstanding, if the charge were committed vnto him and vnto Banquo, so to order the matter, that the rebels should be shortly vanquished & quite put downe, and that not so much as one of them should be found to make resistance within the countrey.

And euen so it came to passe: for being sent forth with a new power, at his entring into Lochquhaber, the same of his comming put the enimies in such feare, that a great number of them stole secretly awaye from their capitaine Malcolmdwald, who nevertheless enforced thereto, gaue battell vnto Hakbeth, with the residue which remained with him: but being ouercome, and fleeing for refuge into a castell (within the which his wife & children were inclosed) at length when he saw how he could neither defend the hold any longer against his enimies, nor yet vpon surrender be suffered to depart with life saued, he first slue his wife and children, and lastlie himselfe, least if he had yelded simple, he should haue bene executed in most cruell wise for an example to other. Hakbeth entring into the castell by the gates, as then set open, found the carcasse of Malcolmdwald lying dead there amongst the residue of the slaine bodies, which when he beheld, remitting no pece of his cruell nature with that pittifull sight, he caused the head to be cut off, and set vpon a poles end, and so sent it as a present to the king, who as then laie at Bertha. The headlesse trunk he commanded to bee hong by vpon an high paire of gallowes.

Them of the westerne Isles suing for pardon, in that they had aided Malcolmdwald in his traitorous enterprise, he fined at great sums of monie: and those whom he took in Lochquhaber, being come thither to beare armor against the king, he put to execution. Wherevpon the Islandmen conceiued a deadly grudge towards him, calling him a couenant-breaker, a bloudie tyrant, & a cruell murderer of them whome the kings mercie had pardoned. With which reprochfull words Hakbeth being kindled in wrathfull ire against them, had passed ouer with an armie into the Isles, to haue taken reuenge vpon them for their libellous talke, had he not bene otherwise perswaded by some of his friends, and partlie pacified by gifts presented vnto him on the behalfe of the Islandmen, seeking to auoid his displeasure. Thus was iustice and law restored againe to the old accustomed course, by the diligent means of Hakbeth. Immediatlie wherevpon word came that Sueno king of Norway was arrived in Jfife with a puissant armie, to subdue the whole realme of Scotland.

But here to the intent it maie be the better perceived, what this Sueno was, I will somewhat touch from whence he descended. That Sueno, who (as ye haue heard) conquered the realme of England, being also king of Denmarke and Norway, had three sonnes, Harold, Sueno, and Canute; the first he made king of England, the second king of Norway, and the third king of Denmarke. Harold inioined not the same dominion of England past three yeeres after his fathers decease, but was slaine by Etheldred or Ethelred, whom his father Sueno had chased into Normandie. But the same Etheldred kept not long the kingdome in peace, for Canute king of Denmarke, to reuenge his brothers death, landed in England with a mightie host, and beating Etheldred, recovered the kingdome to the vse of the Danes: but yet one Edmund sonne to the foresaid Etheldred, surnamed Ironside, maintained the warre against Canute for a season, till at length by both their consents they agreed to fight a combat singularlie man to man, so to trie the matter betwixt them, who should reigne as king ouer the Englishmen.

In this fight when they had continued a long space, and shewed right notable proofes of their manhood: Edmund (saith Canute) sith it hath pleased almighty God, that thou shouldest thus trie the force of my hand without hurt or wound, I thinke it bee likewise his pleasure, that thou shouldest inioy part of the realme: go to therfore, I receiue thee as partner with me in the kingdome, so that (if thou be contented let vs diuide the kingdome betwixt vs with out any more contention. Edmund gladlie accepted this condition of agreement, supposing it better to haue halfe the kingdome, than to stand to the doubtful triall of losing the whole: for he had receiued a wound at Canutes hands, though Canute vnderstood not so much: againe, he foresaw that occasion hereafter might be offered, whereby he might with out all trouble come to inioy the whole. Wherevpon either of them leapt beside their wearied horses in that fierce & earnest fight, & embracing each other became good friends, in diuiding the realme according to the aboue mentioned motion of Canute. That part of England that lieth ouer against France was assigned vnto Canute; and the other, that is, the north parts vnto Edmund. In the meane time Emma the wife of Etheldred with hir two sonnes (which she had by the same Etheldred) Alured and Edward, fled ouer into Normandie, doubting least this concord betwixt Canute and Edmund should turne smallie to hir aduancement.

But now touching the arrivall of Sueno the Norwegian king in Jfife (as before is exprest) ye shall vnderstand, that the pretense of his comming was to reuenge the slaughter of his vncle Canus, and other of the Danish nation slaine at Barre, Crowdane, and Semmer. The crueltie of this Sueno was such, that he neither spared man, woman, nor child, of what age, condition or degree: sooner they were. Whereof when it was certified, he set all slouthfull and lingering delais apart, and began to assemble an armie in most speedie wise, like a verie valiant capitaine: for oftentimes it happeneth, that a dull coward and slouthfull person, constrained by necessitie, becommeth verie hardie and aduie. Therefore when his whole power was come together, he diuided the same into three battels. The first was led by Hakbeth, the second by Banquo, & the king himselfe gouerned in the maine battell or middle ward, wherein were appointed to attend and wait vpon his person the most part of all the residue of the Scottish nobilitie.

The armie of Scottishmen being thus ordered, came

This agreement was not with our English writers.

Harold that reigned king of England, was not the son of Sueno but of Canute and was not slaine, but died of naturall disease. See more hereof in England. Canute king of Denmarke. Edmund Ironside.

Canutes sonnes to Edmund Ironside.

The diuision of the realme of England betwixt Canute and Edmund Ironside.

Alured & Edward the sons of king Etheldred.

The crueltie of Sueno king of Norway.

Duncane be- threth him- selfe in assembling an armie.

The Scottish armie diuided into three battels.

Sueno battquithly the
Scots.

Suenos commanement
to spare fire
and sword.

Duncane fled to the castell of Bertha.

Sueno belie-ged King
Malcolme.

Fained trea-
tie.

Spiced cups prepared for the Danes.

The Danes
ouercome
with drinke,
fall asleepe.

Malbeth al-saileth the campe of the Danes, being ouercome
with drinke
and asleepe.

The slaughter of Danes, Sueno with ten other escaped.

came into Culros, where incountering with the enemies, after a fore and cruell foughten battell, Sueno remained victorious, and Malcolme with his Scots discomfited. Howbeit the Danes were so broken by this battell, that they were not able to make long chase on their enemies, but kept themselves all night in order of battell, for doubt least the Scots assembling togither againe, might haue set vpon them at some aduantage. On the morrow, when the fields were discouered, and that it was perceiued how no enemies were to be found abroad, they gathered the spoile, which they diuided amongst them, according to the law of armes. Then was it ordeined by commandement of Sueno, that no souldier should hurt either man, woman, or child, except such as were found with weapon in hand ready to make resistance, for he hoped now to conquer the realme without further bloodshed.

But when knowledge was giuen how Duncane was fled to the castell of Bertha, and that Malbeth was gathering a new power to withstand the incursions of the Danes, Sueno raised his tents, & com-ming to the said castell, laid a strong siege round about it. Duncane seeing himselfe thus environed by his enemies, sent a secret message by counsell of Banquo to Malbeth, commanding him to abide at Berthentill, till he heard from him some other newes. In the meane time Duncane fell in fained communication with Sueno, as though he would haue yielded by the castell into his hands, under certaine conditions, and this did he to drine time, and to put his enemies out of all suspicion of anie enterprize ment against them, till all things were brought to passe that might serue for the purpose. At length, when they were fallen at a point for rending by the hold, Duncane offered to send forth of the castell into the campe great provision of vittells to refresh the armie, which offer was gladlie accepted of the Danes, for that they had bene in great penurie of sustenance manie daies before.

The Scots hereupon took the iuice of mekil-woxt berries, and mixed the same in their ale and bread, sending it thus spiced & confectioned, in great abundance unto their enemies. They reioicing that they had got meate and drinke sufficient to satisfie their bellies, fell to eating and drinking after such greedie wise, that it seemed they stroue who might deuoure and swallow by most, till the operation of the berries spread in such sort through all the parts of their bodies, that they were in the end brought into a fast dead sleepe, that in manner it was impossible to awake them. Then forthwith Duncane sent vnto Malbeth, commanding him with all diligence to come and set vpon the enemies, being in easie point to be overcome. Malbeth making no delate, came with his people to the place, where his enemies were lodged, and first killing the watch, afterwards enter-red the campe, and made such slaughter on all sides without anie resistance, that it was a wonderfull matter to behold, for the Danes were so heauie of sleepe, that the most part of them were slaine and neuer stirred: other that were awakened either by the noise of other waies forth, were so amazed and dizzie headed vpon their wakening, that they were not able to make anie defense: so that of the whole number there escaped no more but onelie Sueno himselfe and ten other persons, by whose helpe he got to his ships lying at rode in the mouth of Tait.

The most part of the mariners, when they heard that plentie of meate and drinke the Scots had sent vnto the campe, came from the sea thither to be partakers thereof, and so were slaine amongst their fellowes: by meanes whereof when Sueno perceiued how through lacke of mariners he should not be able to conuie alwaie his familie, he furnished one ship thoughtlie with such as were left, and in the same sailed backe into Forwaie, cursing the time that he set forward on this unfortunate iourneie. The other ships which he left behind him, within three daies after his departure from thence, were tossed to togther by violence of an east wind, that beating and rushing one against another, they sunke there, and lie in the same place euen vnto these daies, to the great danger of other such ships as come on that coast: for being covered with the fload when the tide commeth, at the ebbing againe of the same, some part of them appeere aboue water.

The place where the Danish vessels were thus lost, is yet called Drownelow sands. His ouerthrow re-ceiued in manner afore said by Sueno, was verie displeasing to him and his people, as should appeere, in that it was a custome manie yeeres after, that no knights were made in Forwaie, except they were first swayne to reuenge the slaughter of their coun-triemen and friends thus slaine in Scotland. The Scots hauing wone so notable a victorie, after they had gathered & diuided the spoile of the field, caused solemne processions to be made in all places of the realme, and thanks to be giuen to almighty God, that had sent them so faire a day over their enemies.
But whilest the people were thus at their processions, word was brought that a new fleet of Danes was arrived at Kingorne, sent thither by Canute king of England, in reuenge of his brother Sueno ouerthrow. To resist these enemies, which were alreadie landed, and busie in spoiling the countrie, Malbeth and Banquo were sent with the kings au-thoritie, who hauing with them a conuenient power, incountred the enemies, due part of them, and chased the other to their ships. They that escaped and got once to their ships, obtained of Malbeth for a great summe of gold, that such of their friends as were slaine at this last bickering, might be buried in saint Colmes Inch. In memorie whereof, manie old se-pultures are yet in the said Inch, there to be seene grauen with the armes of the Danes, as the maner of burying noble men still is, and heretofore hath bene used.

A peace was also concluded at the same time betwixt the Danes and Scottishmen, ratified (as some haue written) in this wise: That from thenceforth the Danes should neuer come into Scotland to make anie warres against the Scots by anie maner of meanes. And these were the warres that Dun-cane had with forren enemies, in the seventh yere of his reigne. Shortly after happened a strange and vncouth wonder, which afterward was the cause of much trouble in the realme of Scotland, as ye shall after heare. It fortuned as Malbeth and Banquo iournied towards Forres, where the king then late, they went sporting by the waie togither without other companie, saue onelie themselves, passing through the woods and fields, when suddenly in the middest of a laund, there met them three women in strange and wild apparell, resembling creatures of elder world, whome when they attentiuely beheld, wondering much at the sight, the first of them spake and said; All haile Malbeth, thane of Glamis (for he had latelie entered into that dignitie and office by the death of his father Sinell.) The second of them said; Haile Malbeth thane of Catwder. But the third said; All haile Malbeth that hereafter shall be king
of Scotland.

Then Banquo; What manner of women (saith he) are you, that seeme so little fauourable vnto me, whereas to my fellows here, besides high offices, ye assigne also the kingdome, appointing forth nothing for me at all? Yes (saith the first of them) we pray mife

“ mife great “ shall reigne “ ther shall “ his place, “ reigne at “ shall gouern
“ of continu “ banished “ reputed a “ on by Ma “ quho wor
“ and Ma “ wife, the “ common “ ther the “ goddess “ indued u “ mantical “ as they h “ Catwder “ gainst th “ offices v “ beth.

“ thing to “ wonder at.

“ Banquo the “ father of Ma “ kinge.

“ The thane of “ Catwder con“ demned of “ Malcolme.
“ Malbeth “ made thane of “ Catwder.

“ Malbeth
“ how “ might at“ taine the king“ dome.

“ The daugh“ ter of Sheward “ sister of For“ ward, she “ wife to king “ Duncane.

“ Danes burnt
“ in S. Colmes “ Inch.

“ A peace con“ cluded be“ twixt Sheward
“ and Danes.

“ Malbeth “ which way he “ may take the “ kingdome by “ force.

“ Prophesies “ made men to “ vncouth at“ tempts.

“ women desi“ rous of high “ estate.

“ Malbeth “ death king “ Duncane.

“ Malbeth be-“ lieues the “ crowne.

“ Duncanes “ battell.
“ 1046. H. B.

“ mife great
“ shall reigne “ ther shall “ his place, “ reigne at “ shall gouern
“ of continu “ banished “ reputed a “ on by Ma “ quho wor
“ and Ma “ wife, the “ common “ ther the “ goddess “ indued u “ mantical “ as they h “ Catwder “ gainst th “ offices v “ beth.

10 milie greater benefits vnto the, than vnto him, for he shall reigne in deed, but with an unluckie end: neither shall he leaue anie issue behind him to succeed in his place, where contrarie thou in deed shalt not reigne at all, but of thee those shall be bozne which shall gouerne the Scottis kingdome by long order of continuall descent. Here with the foresaid women banished immediatlie out of their sight. This was reputed at the first but some vaine fantastick illusion by Macbeth and Banquo, in somuch that Ban-quo would call Macbeth in iest, king of Scotland; and Macbeth againe would call him in sport likewise, the father of manie kings. But afterwards the common opinion was, that these women were either the weird sisters, that is (as ye would say) the goddesses of destinie, or else some nymphs or feiries, indued with knowledge of prophesie by their necro-manticall science, because euerie thing came to passe as they had spoken. For shortly after, the thane of Cawder being condemned at Forres of treason against the king committed; his lands, linings, and offices were giuen of the kings liberalitie to Macbeth.

The same night after, at supper, Banquo iested with him and said; How Macbeth thou hast obtened those things which the two former sisters prophesied, there remaineth onelie for thee to purchase that which the third said should come to passe. Whereupon Macbeth reuoluing the thing in his mind, began enen then to deuise how he might attaine to the kingdome: but yet he thought with himselfe that he must tarry a time, which should aduance him thereto (by the diuine prouidence) as it had come to passe in his former preferment. But shortly after it chanced that king Duncane, hauing two sonnes by his wife which was the daughter of Siward earle of Northumberland, he made the elder of them called Malcolme prince of Cumberland, as it were thereby to appoint him his successor in the kingdome, im-mediatlie after his decesse. Macbeth soze troubled herewith, for that he saw by this means his hope soze hindered (where, by the old lawes of the realme, the ordinance was, that if he that should succeed were not of able age to take the charge vpon himselfe, he that was next of blood vnto him should be admitted) he began to take counsell how he might vsurpe the kingdome by force, hauing a iust quarrell so to do (as he took the matter) for that Duncane did what in him lay to defraud him of all manner of title and claime, which he might in time to come, pretend vnto the crowne.

The words of the three weird sisters also (of whom before ye haue heard) greatlie encouraged him here-vnto, but speciallie his wife lay soze vpon him to attempt the thing, as she that was verie ambitious, burning in vnquenchable desire to beare the name of a quene. At length therefore, communicating his purposed intent with his trustie friends, amongst whome Banquo was the chiefest, vpon confidence of their promised aid, he sue the king at Ennernes, or (as some say) at Wotgolfuane, in the first yeare of his reigne. Then hauing a companie about him of such as he had made priuie to his enterprise, he caused himselfe to be proclaimed king, and forthwith went vnto Scone, where (by common consent) he received the inuestiture of the kingdome according to the accustomed manner. The bodie of Duncane was first conueied vnto Elgine, & there buried in king-lie wife; but afterwards it was remoued and conueied vnto Colmekill, and there laid in a sepulture amongst his predecessors, in the yeare after the birth of our Saviour, 1046.

Malcolme Cammore and Donald Bane the sons of king Duncane, for feare of their liues (which they might well know that Macbeth would seeke to bring to end for his more sure confirmation in the estate) fled into Cumberland, where Malcolme remained, till time that saint Edward the sonne of Ethelred recovered the dominion of England from the Danish power, the which Edward receiued Mal-colme by way of most friendlie entertainment: but Donald passed ouer into Ireland, where he was ten-derlie cherished by the king of that land. Macbeth, after the departure thus of Duncanes sonnes, used great liberalitie towards the nobles of the realme, thereby to win their fauour, and when he saw that no man went about to trouble him, he set his whole intention to mainteine iustice, and to punish all en-ormities and abuses, which had chanced through the feeble and slothfull administration of Duncane.

And to bring his purpose the better to passe without anie trouble or great businesse, he deuised a subtil wile to bring all offenders and misdoers vnto iustice, solliciting sundrie of his liege people with high rewards, to challenge and appeale such as most oppressed the commons, to come at a day and place appointed, to fight singular combats within barriers, in triall of their accusations. When these thaeues, barretors, and other oppressors of the innocent people were come to darren battell in this wile (as is said) they were streight waies apprehended by armed men, and trussed vp in halters on gibbets, according as they had iustlie deserued. The residue of misdoers that were left, were punished and tamed in such sort, that manie yeares after all thess and reifings were little heard of, the people intioing the blissefull benefit of good peace and tranquillitie.
Macbeth shewing himselfe thus a most diligent punisher of all iniuries and wrongs attempted by anie disordered persons within his realme, was accounted the sure defense and buckler of innocent people; and hereto he also applied his whole indueor, to cause yong men to exercise themselves in vertuous maners, and men of the church to attend their diuine seruice according to their vocations.

He caused to be claime sundrie thanes, as of Cathnes, Sutherland, Stranauerne, and Ross, because through them and their seditious attempts, much trouble baillie rose in the realme. He appeased the troublesome state of Galloway, and sue one Makgill a tyrant, who had manie yeares before passed nothing of the regall authoritie or power. To be briefe, such were the worthe doings and princelie acts of this Macbeth in the administration of the realme, that if he had attained therevnto by rightfull means,
and continued in byrightnesse of iustice as he began, till the end of his reigne, he might well haue bene numbred amongst the most noble princes that anie there had reigned. He made manie wholesome lawes and statutes for the publike weale of his subiects.

Lawes made by king Makbeth set foorth according to Hector Boetius.

That is within orders of the church, shall not be compelled to answer before a tempozall iudge, but be remitted to his or-dinarie.

The tenth part of all fruits that increase on the ground, shall be giuen to the church, that God may be worshipped with oblations and prayers.

He that continueth obstinatlie in the curse of the church by the space of one yeare, shall be excommunicated.

Liberties of them that haue taken orders.

Cithers to be paid to the church.

Persons accursed.

whole yeare, continuing to be reconciled, shall be reputed enemie to the common-wealth: and if he perseuere both indurand mind the space of two yeares, all his goods shall be forfeited.

The order of knighthood.

He that taketh the order of knighthood, shall take an oth to defend ladies, virgins, widows, orphans, and the communallite. And he that is made king, shall be swozne in semblable maner.

Eldest Vaughn =
terg

The eldest daughter shall inherit hir fathers lands, as well as the eldest sonne should, if the father leaue no sonne behind him. And if anie woman marie with the lord of the soile, she shall lose hir heritage.

The king's gift.

No man shall enjoy anie lands, rents, offices, or other possessions, but onelie by gift and grant of the king.

No offices to go by inheritance

No office shal go by inheritance, but shal still remaine at the kings free disposition, as shal stand with his pleasure to affigne it

Задание

No man shall sit as iudge in anie temporall court without the kings commission authorizing him thereto.

He that is retained or becommeth a sworne man to anie other person saue one lie to the king, shall lose his life for it; and euerie man shall be bound to defend the king against all other creatures.

Railers of the Kings people, or unlawfull

king against all other creatures.
 He that raiseth the kings liege people shall lose life, goods, and lands, and so shall they doo that assemble together by his pro-veynement

waiters upon

He that attendeth anie man to the church, market, or to anie other publicke assemblie, as a retainer, shall suffer death, except he haue living at his hands, on what day he so offendeth.

Keeping of

whome he so attendeth.

A houlfe kept by anie of the commons or husbandmen to anie other vñe than for tillage and laboring of the earth, shall be forfeited to the King by vsure.

Counterfet
foles, with minstrels and souldiers

Counterfeit foolcs, minstrels, iesters and these kind of iuglers, with such like idle persons, that range abroad in the countrie, hauing no speciall licence of the king, shall be compelled to learne some sci ence or craft to get their liuing; if they re fuse so to do, they shall be drawen like hore sog in the plough and harrong.

Possession of

Though the sonne chance to be put in possession of his fathers lands by the kings licence, during the life of his father; yet shall the same lands be forfeited to the king if his father be afterwards convicted of treason committed against the kings person.

Dowrie of

All such women, that are married to a nie lord or baron (though the haue no issue by him) shall yet haue the third part of his lands after his decesse, and the remanent shall go to his heires.

Marriage of lords and

All maner of lordes and great barons shall not contract matrimonie with other vnder paine of death, speciallie if thei landes and rooues lie nere together.

All armour and weapon borne to other effect than in defense of the king & realme in time of wars, shall be confiscated to the kings use, with all other moveable goods of the partie that herein offendeth.

Such as be appointed gouernours, or (as I may call them) capteins, that buy with in those limits, where their charges lie, anye lands or possessions, shall lose both lands, & possessions, and the monie which they haue paid for the same.

And if anie of the said captaynes or gouernours marie their sonnes or daughters vnto anie maner of person that dwelleth within the bounds of their roomes, they shall lose their office: neither shall it be lawfull for anie of their sonnes or coperteners to occupie the same office.

These and the like commendable lawes Haketh caused to be put as then in use, governing the realme for the space of ten yeares in equall iustice. But this was but a counterfet zeale of equitie shewed by him, partly against his naturall inclination to purchase thereby the fauour of the people. Shortly after, he began to shew what he was, in stead of a quicke practising crueltie. For the pricke of conscience (as it chanceth euer in tyrants, and such as a teine to anie estate by vnrightheous means) caused him euer to feare, least he should be seruend of the same cup, as he had ministred to his predecessors. The words also of the three weired sisters, would not out of his mind, which as they promised him the kingdome, so likewise did they promise it at the same time vnto the posteritie of Wanguho. He will therefore the same Wanguho with his sonne named Silence, to come to a supper that he had prepared for them, which was in deed, as he had deuised, present death at the hands of certaine murderers, whom he hired to execute that deed, appointing them meete with the same Wanguho and his sonne without the palace, as they returned to their lodging, and there to slea them, so that he would not haue his house slandered, but that in time to come he might cleare himselfe, if anie thing were laid to his charge.

upon anie suspicion that might arise.
 It chanced yet by the benefit of the darke night that though the father were slaine, the sonne yet the helpe of almighty God reseruing him to better fortune, escaped that danger: and afterwards using some inkeling (by the admonition of his friends which he had in the court) how his life was sought no lesse than his fathers, who was slaine by chance medlie (as by the handling of the mattress which would haue had it to appare) but eu-er upon a preperensed deuise: wherevpon to auoid further perill he fled into Wales. ¶ But here I thinke it shall not much make against my purpose, if (according to the order which I find obserued in the first historie) I shall in few words rehearse the original line of those kings, which haue descended from the fore said Banquo, that they which haue ioined the kingdome by so long continuance of succession, from one to another, and that euen vnto the our daies, may be knownen from whence they their first beginning.

Wherefore (as before is said) fled into Wales, where theophilus offer by his courteous and amiable behaviour, he grew into such favour and estimation with the prince of that countrie, that he might banneth have wished anie greater; at length also he came into such familiar acquaintance with the said princes daughter, that she of courtesie in and suffered him to get hir with child; which being once understood, hir father the prince conceived such hateful displeasure towards him, that he finally due him, & held his daughter in most vile estate of servitude, for that she had consented to be on this wife deflowered by a stranger. At the last yet, she was delivered of a sonne named Walter, who within few yeares proued a man of greater courage and valiance, than arie other had commonlie bene found, although he had no better bringing vp than (by his grandfathers appointment) among the baser sort of people. Howbeit he shewed euer euen from his infancie, that there reigned in him a certaine stoutnesse of stomach, readie to attempt high enterprises.

It chanced that falling out with one of his companions, after manie talunting words which passed betwixt them, the other to his reproch objected that he was a bastard, and begotten in unlawful bed; where-with being sore kindled, in his raging furie he ran vpon him and slue him out of hand. Then was he glad to flee out of Wales, and comming into Scotland to seek some friendship there, he happened into the company of such Englishmen, as were come thither with quene Margaret, and behaued himselfe so soberlie in all his demeanours, that within a while he was highly esteemed amongst them. Not long after by such means attaining to the degree of high reputation, he was sent with a great powder of men into the westerne Isles, into Galloway, & other parts of the realme, to deliuer the same from the tyrannie and inuious oppression there exercised by diuers misgouerned persons; which enterprise according to his commission he atchieued, with such prudent policie and manhood, that immediatlie vpon his returne to the court, he was made lord steward of Scotland, with assignement to receive the kings rents and duties out of the parts of the realme.

This Walter Steward had a sonne named Alan Steward, who went after with Goodricke of Bulleigne duke of Roaine, & Robert duke of Normandie sonne to king William the bastard that conquered Englnd, into the holie land, at what time they with other westerne princes made the great iourneie thither, in the yeare 1099. Alan had issue Alexander Steward, that founded the abbrie of Pasleie of saint Benedicts order. Walter Steward, whose valiance was well notified at the battell of Largis, as hereafter shall be shewed, was the sonne of the said Alexander. The same Walter had issue two sons, the one named Alexander, fought right ballantlie in defense of his father at the foresaid battell; and the other named Robert Steward got the lands of Terbowtoun, and married the heire of Crukeistoun, from whom descended the earles of Leuenor and Dervlie. Moreover, the aboue mentioned Alexander Steward that founded Pasleie, had diuerse mo sonnes, as John and James, with sundrie other. Howbeit they tooke new surnames by the name of those lands, vnto the which they succeeded. The afore reckoned John Steward, after the death of his brother James, married the heire of Bonkill a virgine of great beautie, and had by hir Walter Steward that inherited the lands of Bonkill, Kankreth, Kothelsaie, Bute, and Stewatoun, after that his father the foresaid John was slaine at Falkirke.

He married Margaret Bruce daughter to king Robert Bruce, by whome he had issue king Robert the second of that name. This Robert the second tooke to wife one Isabell Spire, a damsell of right excellent beautie, she was daughter to sir Adam Spire knight, and brought forth issue, thre sonnes and thre daughters. The eldest sonne hight John Steward otherwife named Robert, who succeeded im-mediatlie after his fathers deceasse in gouernance of the crowne. The second called Robert was made earle of Fife and Menteith, also he was created duke of Albanie, and ruled the realme of Scotland vnder the name of gouernour, for the space of fifteene yeares. The third sonne named Alexander was earle of Buchquhane and lord of Baudenot. The eldest daughter was married to James that was the sonne and heire of William earle of Douglas. The second daughter was married to John Dunbar, brother to George of Dunbar earle of March, and was made to the aduancement of his further fame earle of Murray. He begot on hir one onelie daughter, that was married to the Dowglas, and so Douglas came to the earle dome of Murray. The third daughter was married vnto John Lioun, that was after made lord of Glammis.

Moreover, the foresaid Robert that was the first of the Stewards which wore the crowne in Scotland, married Eufame daughter to the earle of Ross, and got on hir two sonnes, Walter earle of Atholl, and David earle of Stratherne. This Walter solicited Robert duke of Albanie, to sea David Steward duke of Rothsaie. And after that James the first was returned home forth of England, he did what he could to moue him to sea all the lineage of the said duke still being in hope after the dispatch of his kinsmen to come to the crowne himselfe, which hope moued him to procure his nephue Robert Steward, and Robert Graham his daughters son, to sea king James the first also, for the which crime the same Walter was after conuicted and destroyed with all his sonnes. His brother David earle of Buchquhane died without issue, and so the lands of both these brethren returned againe to the crowne, without anie memorie of their blood. Of Robert Steward duke of Albanie, came duke Murdoch, who married the earle of Leuonor daughter, and got on hir thre sonnes, Walter, Alexander, and James.

Duke Murdoch himselfe with his two first sonnes were slaine at Striueling by king James the first, & the third brother James in reuenge thereof burnt Dunbertane, and was after chased into Ireland, where he deceased without issue. Robert the third of that name married Annabill Drommond, daughter to sir John Drommond of Strobhall knight, and got on hir David and James. The first died in Falkland, and the other attained the crowne, and was called James the first, and married the ladie Jane daughter to John Beauford erle of Summerset in England. He had by hir two sonnes borne at one birth, Alexander and James. The first died young, the second attained the crowne, named James the second. James the first had also six daughters, of the which the eldest was giuen in mariage to the Dolphin of France, the second to the duke of Britaine, the third to the lord of Feir, the fourth to the lord of Dalkeith, the fifth to the earle of Huntley, and the sixth had no succession. James the second married Margaret daughter to the duke of Gelderland, and begot on hir thre sonnes, and two daughters.

The first succeeded him in the kingdome, and was called James the third: the second named Alexander was duke of Albanie, and married first the earle of Dhenies daughter, and got on hir Alexander, that was afterward bishop of Murray, and then parting with hir went into France, where he married the countesse of Bullogne, and begot on hir John Steward duke of Albanie, that was gouernor of Scotland manie yeeres in the minority of James the first. The third sonne, John Steward was earle of Mar, whose chance was to be slaine in the Cannongat in a bathat. The first daughter of James the second, was married to the lord Boid, who begot on

Duke of Albanie.
Alexander Steward, sonne to king Robert the second.

John Dunbar.

Eufame.

Walter and David sonnes to king Robert.
Robert duke of Albanie.
James the first.

Graham.

Duke Murdoch

King Robert the third.

David and James, sons to king Robert the third

John Beauford earle of Summeriet.

James the first and his issue.

The duke of Gelders daughter.

James and Alexander.

Duke of Albanie the gouernor of Scotland.
The lord Boid.

The lord
Hammilton.

Lord Creich-
ton.
James the third and his issue.

James the fourth.

Malbeths
brood.

His crueltie caused thogh
fear.

The castell of Dunslane
hailed.

Malbethe
thane of Fife.

hir a sonne that was slaine by the lord Spungumrie, and a daughter that was married to the earle of Castels. After the death of the lord Boid, the husband of this first daughter of James the second, she was effionies married to the lord Hammilton, and by that means was the house of the Hammiltions honored with the kings blood. The other sister was married to the lord Creichten, of whom came small succession worthe to be mentioned. James the third married Margaret daughter to the king of Denmarke. Of the which marriage was borne James the fourth, Alexander that was bishop of saint Andrews & duke of Albanie, and John Stewart earle of Mar, but these two died without issue.

James the fourth married Margaret daughter to king Henrie the seventh of England, and begot on hir James the fifth, who marrieng first the ladie Pagdalen daughter to Francis the French king, had no issue by hir, for that she died in the yere next after hir comming into Scotland, and then shortly after the said James the fifth married the ladie Marie de Lorein, duchesse of Loule, a widow, and by hir had he issue Marie quene of Scotland, that toke to husband Henrie Stewart lord Dornlie, by whome she had issue Charles James, now king of Scotland. But to returne unto Malbeth, in continuing the historie, and to begin where I left, ye shall understand that after the contrived slaughter of Banquo, nothing prospered with the foresaid Malbeth: for in manner euerie man began to doubt his owne life, and durst bneath appeare in the kings presence; and euen as there were manie that stood in feare of him, so likewise stood he in feare of manie, in such sort that he began to make those awaie by one surmized cauillation or other, whome he thought most able to worke him anie displeasure.

At length he found such sweetnesse by putting his nobles thus to death, that his earnest thirst after blood in this behalfe might in no wise be satisfied: for ye must consider he wan double profit (as hee thought) hereby: for first they were rid out of the way whome he feared, and then againe his coffers were enriched by their goods which were forfeited to his use, whereby he might better mainteine a garrd of armed men about him to defend his person from iniurie of them whom he had in anie suspicion. Further, to the end he might the more cruelle oppresse his subiects with all tyrantlike wrongs, he builded a strong castell on the top of an hie hill called Dunslane, situate in Colvrie, ten miles from Perth, on such a proud height, that standing there aloft, a man might behold well nere all the countries of Angus, Fife, Stremmond, and Ermedale, as it were lieng underneath him. This castell then being founded on the top of that high hill, put the realme to great charges before it was finished, for all the stufte necessarie to the building, could not be brought vp without much toile and businesse. But Malbeth being once determined to haue the worke go forward, caused the thanes of each shire within the realme, to come and helpe towards that building, each man his course about.

At the last, when the turne fell vnto Malbethe thane of Fife to build his part, he sent workemen with all needfull provision, and commanded them to shew such diligence in euerie behalfe, that no occasion might be giuen for the king to find fault with him, in that he came not himselfe as other had done, which he refused to do, for doubt least the king bearing him (as he partly understood) no great good will, would late violent hands vpon him, as he had done vpon diuerse other. Shortly after, Malbeth comming to behold how the worke went forward, and because he found not Malbethe there, he was soze offended, and said; I perceiue this man will neuer obeie my commandements, till he be ridden with a snaffle: but I shall prouide well inough for him. Neither could he afterwards abide to looke vpon the said Malbethe, either for that he thought his puissance ouer great; either else for that he had learned of certaine wizzards, in whose words he put great confidence (for that the prophesie had happened so right, which the thre faries or weire sisters had declared vnto him) how that he ought to take heed of Malbethe, who in time to come should seeke to destroy him.

And fuerlie herevpon had he put Malbethe to death, but that a certeine witch, whome hee had in great trust, had told that he should neuer be slaine with man borne of anie woman, nor vanquished till the wood of Wernane came to the castell of Dunslane. By this prophesie Malbethe put all feare out of his heart, supposing he might do what he would, without anie feare to be punished for the same, for by the one prophesie he beleued it was impossible for anie man to vanquish him, and by the other impossible to slea him. This vaine hope caused him to do manie outragious things, to the greuous oppression of his subiects. At length Malbethe, to auoid perill of life, purposed with himselfe to passe into England, to procure Malcolme Cammore to claime the crowne of Scotland. But this was not so secretlie denised by Malbethe, but that Malbeth had knowledge giuen him thereof: for kings (as is said) haue sharpe sight like vnto Lynx, and long ears like vnto Vidua. For Malbeth had in euerie nole mans house, one lie fellow or other in fee with him, to reueale all that was said or done within the same, by which sight he oppressed the most part of the nobles of his realme.

Immediatlie then, being aduertised whereabout Malbethe went, he came hastily with a great power into Fife, and forthwith besieged the castell where Malbethe dwelled, trusting to haue found him therein. They that kept the house, without anie resistance opened the gates, and suffered him to enter, mistrusting none euill. But neuertheless Malbeth most cruelle caused the wife and children of Malbethe, with all other whom he found in that castell, to be slaine. Also he confiscated the goods of Malbethe, proclaimed him traitor, and confined him out of all the parts of his realme; but Malbethe was already escaped out of danger, and gotten into England vnto Malcolme Cammore, to trie what purchase hee might make by means of his support, to reuenge the slaughter so cruelle executed on his wife, his children, and other friends. At his comming vnto Malcolme, he declared into what great miserie the estate of Scotland was brought, by the detestable cruelties exercised by the tyrant Malbeth, hauing committed manie horrible slaughters and murders, both as well of the nobles as commons, for the which he was hated right mortallie of all his liege people, desiring nothing more than to be deliuered of that intollerable and most heauie yoke of thraldome, which they sustained at such a castifes hands.

Malcolme hearing Malbethes words, which he vttered in verie lamentable sort, for more compassion and verie ruth that pearced his sorrowfull hart, bewailing the miserable state of his countrie, he fetched a deepe sigh; which Malbethe perceiuing, began to fall most earnestlie in hand with him, to enterprise the deliuering of the Scottish people out of the hands of so cruell and bloudie a tyrant, as Malbeth by too manie plaine experiments did shew himselfe to be: which was an easie matter for him to bring to passe, considering not onelie the god title he had, but also the earnest desire of the people to haue some or-

Malcolme
Cammore his answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Lynx
and Vidua.

Table of a fox.

Malbethe crueltie
against Malbethe.

Malbethe
capitula England
to Comm.

Malbethe
words Malcolme.

Malbethe
words Malcolme.

Malbethe
words Malcolme.

Malbethe
words Malcolme.

Malbethe
words Malcolme.

Malbethe
words Malcolme.

Malbethe
words
Malcolme.

castion mini-
those notabl-
the outragio-
nance. Tho-the oppressioner as Mal-
he were com-spake, or elhe thought ton dissembl-
followeth.

I am t-
my countri-
so great affe-
of certeine i-nothing ma-
and voluptuteine of all i-king of Sco-
and matron-
cie should bblondie ty-
Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

Malbethe
answer.

caſion miniſtred, whereby they might be reuenged of thoſe notable iniuries, which they daillie ſuſtained by the outrageous crueltie of Makhbeths miſgouernance. Though Malcolme was verie ſorrowfull for the oppreſſion of his countie-men the Scots, in manner as Makhduſſe had declared; yet doubting whether he were come as one that ment unſeinedlie as he ſpake, or elſe as ſent from Makhbeth to betraie him, he thought to haue ſome further triall, and thereby on diſſembling his mind at the firſt, he answered as followeth.

I am trulie verie ſorie for the miſerie chanced to my countie of Scotland, but though I haue neuer ſo great affection to relieue the ſame, yet by reaſon of certeine incurable vices, which reigne in me, I am nothing meet thereto. Firſt, ſuch immoderate luſt and voluptuous ſenſualitie (the abhominable ſountain of all vices) followeth me, that if I were made king of Scots, I ſhould ſeeke to deſloure your maids and matrones, in ſuch wiſe that mine intemperance ſhould be moze impoſſible vnto you, than the bloudie tyrannie of Makhbeth now is. Wherevnto Makhduſſe answered: This ſuerlie is a verie euill fault, for manie noble princes and kings haue loſt both liues and kingdomes for the ſame; neuertheleſſe there are women enow in Scotland, and therefore follow my counſell. Make thy ſelfe king, and I ſhall conueie the matter ſo wiſelie, that thou ſhalt be ſo ſatiſfied at thy pleaſure in ſuch ſecret wiſe, that no man ſhall be aware thereof.

Then ſaid Malcolme, I am alſo the moſt auariti-ous creature on the earth, ſo that if I were king, I ſhould ſeeke ſo manie waies to get lands and goods, that I would ſea the moſt part of all the nobles of Scotland by ſurmized accusations, to the end I might inioy their lands, goods, and poſſeſſions; and therefore to ſhew you what miſchiefe may inſue on you through mine unſatiable couetouſnes, I will rehearſe vnto you a fable. There was a ſor hauiug a ſore place on him ouerſet with a ſwarme of flies, that continually ſucked out his bloud: and when one that came by and ſaw this manner, demanded whether ſhe would haue the flies bzauen beſide him, he answered no: for if theſe flies that are already full, and by reaſon thereof ſucke not verie egerlie, ſhould be chafed alwaie, other that are emptie and fellie an hungred, ſhould light in their places, and ſucke out the reſidue of my bloud farre moze to my greauance than theſe, which now being ſatiſfied doe not much annoy me. Therefore ſaith Malcolme, ſuffer me to remaine where I am, leaſt if I attaine to the regiment of your realme, mine unquenchable auarice may proue ſuch; that ye would thinke the diſpleaſures which now grieue you, ſhould ſeeme eaſie in reſpect of the unmeaſurable outrage, which might inſue through my comming amongſt you.

Makhduſſe to this made answer, how it was a far worſe fault than the other: for auarice is the root of all miſchiefe, and for that crime the moſt part of our kings haue bene ſlaine and brought to their ſinall end. Yet notwithstanding follow my counſell, and take vpon thee the crowne. There is gold and riches enow in Scotland to ſatiſſie thy greedie deſire. Then ſaid Malcolme againe, I am furthermore inclined to diſſimulation, telling of leaſings, and all other kinds of deceit, ſo that I naturallie reioiſe in nothing ſo much, as to betraie & deceiue ſuch as put anie truſt or confidence in my words. When ſith there is nothing that moze becommeth a prince than conſtancie, veritie, truth, and iuſtice, with the other laudable fellowſhip of thoſe faire and noble vertues which are comprehended onelie in ſootherneſſe, and that lieng vtterlie ouerthroweth the ſame; you ſee how vnable I am to gouerne anie prouince or region: and therefore ſith you haue remedies to cloke and hide all the reſt of my other vices, I praie you find ſhift to cloke this vice amongſt the reſidue.

Then ſaid Makhduſſe: This yet is the worſt of all, and there I leaue thee, and therefore ſaie; Why ye unhappy and miſerable Scottiſhmen, which are thus ſcourged with ſo manie and ſundrie calamities, each one aboute other! We haue one curſed and wicked tyrant that now reigneth ouer you, without anie right or title, oppreſſing you with his moſt bloudie crueltie. This other that hath the right to the crowne, is ſo replet with the inconstant behauiour and manifeſt vices of Engliſhmen, that he is nothing worthe to inioy it: for by his owne confeſſion he is not onelie auaritiſious, and giuen to unſatiable luſt, but ſo falſe a traitor withall, that no truſt is to be had vnto anie word he ſpeaketh. Adieu Scotland, for now I account my ſelfe a baniſhed man for ever, without comfort or conſolation: and with thoſe words the blackiſh teares trickled downe his cheekes verie abundantly.

At the laſt, when he was readie to depart, Malcolme toke him by the ſleeue, and ſaid: We of god comfort Makhduſſe, for I haue none of theſe vices before remembred, but haue teſted with thee in this manner, onelie to proue thy mind: for diuerſe times heretofore hath Makhbeth ſought by this manner of meanes to bring me into his hands, but the moze now I haue ſhewed my ſelfe to condeſcend to thy motion and request, the moze diligence ſhall I be in accompliſhing the ſame. Incontinentlie herevpon they embraced each other, and promiſing to be faithfull the one to the other, they ſell in conſultation how they might beſt prouide for all their buſineſſe, to bring the ſame to good effect. Some after, Makhduſſe repairing to the borders of Scotland, addreſſed his letters with ſecret diſpatch vnto the nobles of the realme, declaring how Malcolme was confederat with him, to come haſtilie into Scotland to claime the crowne, and therefore he required them, ſith he was right inheritor thereto, to aſſiſt him with their powers to recouer the ſame out of the hands of the wrongfull ſurper.

In the meane time, Malcolme purchaſed ſuch fauor at king Edwards hands, that old Siward earle of Northumberland was appointed with ten thouſand men to go with him into Scotland, to ſupport him in this enterpriſe, for recouerie of his right. After theſe newes were ſpread abroad in Scotland, the nobles drew into two ſeueral factions, the one taking part with Makhbeth, and the other with Malcolme. Wherevpon inſued oftentimes ſundrie bickerings, & diuerſe light ſkirmiſhes: for thoſe that were of Malcolmes ſide, would not leaſard to ioine with their enemies in a pigbt field, till his comming out of England to their ſupport. But after that Makhbeth perceiued his enemies power to increaſe, by ſuch aid as came to them forth of England with his aduerſarie Malcolme, he recoiled backe into Fife, there purpoſing to abide in campe fortified, at the caſtell of Dunſinane, and to fight with his enemies, if they ment to purſue him; howbeit ſome of his friends aduiſed him, that it ſhould be beſt for him, either to make ſome agreement with Malcolme, or elſe to flee with all ſpeed into the Fles, and to take his treaſure with him, to the end he might wage ſundrie great prizes of the realme to take his part, & reſtaine ſtrangers, in whome he might better truſt than in his owne ſubiects, which ſtale daillie from him: but he had ſuch confidence in his prophecies, that he beleued he ſhould neuer be vanquiſhed, till Birnane wood were brought to Dunſinane; nor yet to be ſlaine with anie man, that ſhould be or was borne of anie woman.

Malcolme

Branches of trees.

Malcolme letteth his men
in order of bat-
tell.
Malcolme fleeth, & is pursued of Mal-duffe.

Malcolme is
slaine.

1057. 10. M.
1061. H. B.
8. H. B.

Malcolme

A parlement
at Forfar.

Thanes changed into earles.

Surnames.

Malcolme following basilie after Malbeth, came the night before the battell vnto Birnane wood, and when his armie had rested a while there to refresh them, he commanded euerie man to get a bough of some tree or other of that wood in his hand, as big as he might beare, and to march forth therewith in such wise, that on the next morrow they might come close lie and without sight in this manner within view of his enemies. On the morrow when Malbeth beheld them comming in this sort, he first marvelled that the matter ment, but in the end remembered himselfe that the prophesie which he had heard long before that time, of the comming of Birnane wood to Dunstan castle, was likeli to be now fulfilled. Heurther-thelesse, he brought his men in order of battell, and exhorted them to do valiantlie, howbeit his enemies had scarcelie cast from them their boughs, when Malbeth perceiuing their numbers, betooke him streit to flight, whom Malduffe pursued with great hatred euen till he came vnto Lunfannaine, where Malbeth perceiuing that Malduffe was hard at his backe, leapt beside his horse, saying: Thou traitor, what meaneth it that thou shouldest thus in vaine follow me that am not appointed to be slaine by anie creature that is borne of a woman, come on thee, for, and receive thy reward which thou hast deserued for thy paines, and therewithall he lifted by his sword thinking to haue slaine him.
But Malduffe quicklie auoiding from his horse, per he came at him, answered (with his naked sword in his hand) saying: It is true Malbeth, and now shall thine insatiable crueltie haue an end, for I am euen he that thy wizards haue told thee of, who was neuer borne of my mother, but ripped out of her wombe: therewithall he slept vnto him, and slue him in the place. Then cutting his head from his shoulders, he set it vpon a pole, and brought it vnto Malcolme. This was the end of Malbeth, after he had reigned 17 yeeres ouer the Scottishmen. In the beginning of his reigne he accomplished manie woorthie acts, verie profitable to the common-wealth (as ye haue heard) but afterward by illusion of the diuell, he defamed the same with most terrible crueltie. He was slaine in the yeere of the incarnation, 1057, and in the 16 yeere of king Edwards reigne ouer the Englishmen.
Malcolme Canmore thus recovering the relme, in the 16 yeere of the same Edwards reigne, he was crowned at Scone the 25 day of Aprill, in the yeere of our Lord 1057. Immediatlie after his coronation he called a parlement at Forfar, in the which he rewarded them with lands and liuings that had assisted him against Malbeth, aduancing them to fees and offices as he saw cause, & commanded that speciallie those that bare the surname of anie offices or lands, should haue and inioy the same. He created manie earles, lords, barons, and knights. Manie of them that before were thanes, were at this time made earles, as Fife, Wentesh, Atholl, Leuenor, Murray, Cathnes, Koss, and Angus. These were the first earles that haue bene heard of amongst the Scottishmen (as their histories do make mention.) Manie new surnames were taken by at this time amongst them, as Cauder, Lokart, Gordon, Selton, Lauder, Malwane, Meldrum, Schaw, Leithmouth, Libertoun, Strachguben, Cargill, Kattrep, Dundas, Cockbourne, Pirton, Penzeis, Abercummie, Lillie, with manie other that had possessions given them, which gaue names to the owners for the time. Others got their surnames by offices, as Steward, Durward, and Banerman. Also the proper names of manie valiant captiues were turned into generall surnames, as Bennedie, Graham, Hate, with diuerse other too long here to rehearse. So that it came to passe then, as it hath done manie times since, that new surnames haue woone the old out of vse.

In the foresaid parlement thus holden at Forfar, in the beginning of his reigne, there were manie hole some ordinances established, both appertaining to ciuill administration, and also to the ecclesiasticall iurisdiction. In reward also of Malduffes seruice, who (as ye haue heard) chieslie aided him to the attaining of the crowne, he honozed him and his posteritie with three sorts of priuileges. First, that the earle of Fife, for the time being, at the coronation of a king, should by his office set the crowne on the kings head. The second was, that when the king should give battell to his enemies, the same earle should lead the vauitgard of his host. The third, that the linage of Malduffe should inioy regall authoritie and power within all their lands and comes, as to appoint officers and iudges for the hearing and determining of all matters and controuersies (treason onelie excepted) and that if anie of their men or tenants were called to answer in anie court out of their circuit, they might appeale to their owne iudges to be appointed, as before is expessed.

Johannes Maior writeth in his chronicles, that the third priuilege, which Malcolme granted vnto this Malduffe and his posteritie, was this, that for euerie gentleman, that anie of them should hap to kill by chance medlie, and not vpon pretended malice, for the summe of 24 marks he should redeeme his punishment due for the same: & for the casuall slaughter of a meaner person he should be fined at twelue marks. So that murderers were wont to say, that if they were able to paie that summe to the kinroc, they ought to be released of further punishment, by Malduffes priuilege. But this third priuilege, together with the other two former grants, the said Maior fore reprehendeth, and not without cause, as may appere, considering the naturall inclination of that people vnto murder, which by this meanes nourishing secret hatred and malice in their hearts, might vnder the cloke of casuall falling out, slea whom they liked.

It was ordeined also at this parlement, that barons which had liberties within themselves, should make gibbets, whereon men that deserued death should suffer execution: and also draw-wels, wherein women that were condemned should be drowned, according to the order of the ciuill lawes vied in Scotland. Moreover, all the lawes that Malbeth had ordeined, were abrogated at this parlement. Thus whilest Malcolme was busied in setting orders amongst his subjects, tidings came that one Lugtake surnamed the sole, being either the sonne, or (as some write) the cosen of the late mentioned Malbeth, was conueied with a great number of such as had taken part with the said Malbeth vnto Scone, and there by their support receiued the crowne, as lawfull inheritor thereto. To appeale this businesse, was Malduffe earle of Fife sent with full commission in the kings name, who incounting with Lugtake at a village called Ellen in Bogdale, slue him, and discomfited his whole power, ordering the matter with them in such wise, that afterwards there was no more trouble attempted in that behalfe.

After this, the realme continued in peace certeine yeeres, till it chanced a great number of theues and robbers assembling themselves together at Cocbourne pethes, did much hurt, by robbing and spoiling the people in the countries of Pers and Louthian: howbeit, at length one Patrike Dunbar of Dunbar, by commandement of the king, fought with them, slue their capteine, with six hundred of his companie, robbers of the countrie.

Patrike
Dunbar earle
of March.

The head of a thief or felon
given in arms

A conspiracie.

The manlike
garage of St.
Malcolme.

the more her-
in England

the more her-
in England

Malbeth and Malduffe.

Malbeth's
lawes abrogat-
ed.

Malbeth.

Malbeth
crowned at Scone.

Malbeth
slaine.

Malbeth
Dunbar.

Malbeth
Dunbar.

Malbeth
Dunbar.

company, and took fourescore prisoners, the which he caused to be hanged. And thus hauing deliuered the countie of those peblers, with losse of fortie of his owne men, he returned to the king, with the head of the capteine of that rout: so that for his manhod herein shewed, he was made by the king earle of March, and for the maintenance of his estate, had the lands of Cockbourne Bethes giuen to him and his heires for euer, vpon this condition, that in times conuining, the earles of March should purge Spers and Louthian of all theues and robbers. In memorie whereof, he was commanded to beate in his armes a fellows head sprinkled with blood.

Shortlie after he got knowledge, how there were certeine gentlemen that had conspired to slea him, & therefore taking occasion to go on hunting, where this act should haue bene executed, he calleth the chiefe anthoz of the conspiracie apart into a certeine ballie, which was closed on euerie side with thicke woods, and there brake the matter vnto him, in reposing him verie charpelle, for that he had so traitorously conspired his death, whose preservation he ought chiefe to haue wished, considering the manifold benefites he had receiued at his hands. And here-with leaping from his horse, drew his sword, commanding the other likewise to draw his, that now hauing conuenient time and place thereto, they might trie the matter betwixt them, who should be thought most worthy of life, by open force of knightlie prowesse. The conspirator hearing these words, as a man altogether astonished, fell downe vpon his knees at the kings feet, beseeching his grace of mercie for his wicked purpose and heinous offense: who seeing him thus penitent, had him arise, and said; I am content here vpon to forgive thee, so that thou be not of countsell hereafter in anie such traitorous practise.

Whilist things passed thus in Scotland, great and marvellous chanches came to passe within the realme of England. For after the death of king Edward, surnamed the Confessor, Harold the sonne of earle Godwine took on him the kingdome. But William bastard duke of Normandie, pretending title to the crowne of England, at length inuaded the land, and sleaing Harold in field, made a full conquest of the realme, and was crowned king at London by Eldred archbishop of Yorke. Here ye haue to understand, that king Edward in his life time had sent for his nephew Edward, the sonne of his brother Edmund Ironside, to come home forth of Hungarie, whither (after his fathers deceasse) he and his brother Godwine had bene sent aboate, as in the historie of England it appeareth more at large. This Edward had married the daughter of the emperor Henric, named Agatha, sister to the quene of Hungarie, and not the king of Hungaries daughter, although the Scottish writers doe so affirme. By hir he had issue a sonne named Edgar, and two daughters, the one named Margaret, and the other Christen.

King Edward ment that his nephew the said Edward should haue succeeded him, and (as some write) he would in his life time haue resigned the crowne vnto him. But he (a thing worthy of admiration) bitterlie refused it, and would not once meddle therewith during his uncles life time; & (as it chanced) he died, whilist his uncle king Edward was yet liuing. His sonne Edgar therefore, to whom it seemed that the crowne was due, when he saw the realme conquered by the Normans, despairing to recouer it out of their hands, got a ship, and determined with his mother and sisters to passe ouer into Germanie to his friends and kinsfolke there: but by contrarie winds he was driuen to shoure in the Forth, at a place called vnto this day the quenes ferrie. Malcolme being at the same time at Dunfermeling, when he heard of the arriual of this ship, and understood that they were that were aboard in hir, he resorted thither with an honorable companie about him, to visit them for honours sake, vpon fauour he bare towards them, for that they were descended of that noble prince king Edward, in whose aforesaid time he had found so much gentleness and friendship.

Finallie, when he understood their estate, he brought them home with him to his palace, shewing them all the loue and friendship he could deuise; and in the end considering the excellent beutie, wisdom, and noble qualities of the ladie Margaret, sister to the same Edgar, he required of Agatha his mother to haue hir in marriage, wherevnto Agatha gladly condescended. Shortlie after, with an assemble of all the nobles of Scotland, this marriage was made and solemnized after the octaues of Easter, in the yeare 1067, with all the ioy & triumph that might be deuised. King William conqueror of England, being informed hercof, feared least this alliance betwixt Malcolme and Edgar might breed some trouble and disquietnesse to his estate, with the same Edgar had manie friends through all the parties of England. To prevent therefore the occasions of intestine troubles, he confined all the lineage of the foresaid Edgar, by reason whereof, a great number of Englishmen came into Scotland vnto king Malcolme, and manie of them obtaining livings at his hands, remained there continually during their liues, leauing to their posteritie their names & possessions. Amongst whom were these, Lindseie, Claus, Ramsie, Louell, Colchris, Prestoun, Sandlands, Wiffart, Sowlis, Wardlaw, Martwell, with diuerse other.

There came diuerse also out of Hungarie with quene Margaret, who likewise left their names to their families, which yet remaine euen vnto this day, as Creichtoun, Fotheringham, Giffart, Meluill, Worthwike, and others. Also there haue come at sundrie seasons out of France diuers surnames into Scotland, as Fraiser, Sinclare, Boswell, Pootray, Pountgummerte, Campbell, Bois, Betoun, or Betuin, Taillefer, and Bothwell, besides sundrie other which were but superfluous to rehearse at this time. & But to the order of the historie, it is recorded by writers, that these (which at this time came out of England vnto Edgar) brought great quantitie of gold and siluer with them; also manie reliques of saints, and (amongst other) that blacke crosse which king David gaue vnto the abbey of Holie rood house in Louthian, which he founded at his owne charges. Shortlie after the proscription of these Englishmen, William the conqueror sent an herald at armes vnto king Malcolme, demanding to haue Edgar deliuered into his hands, and threatening that if he refused to deliuer him, he would surely fetch him, and that smallie for Malcolms commodity.

But Malcolme, though he understood that he should be sure of wars at King Williams hands for his deniall, yet he declared plainelie to the herald, that his maisters request was unreasonable, & therefore he minded not in anie wise to gratifie him therein. King William receiuing this answer from king Malcolme, proclaimed open warre against Scotland. In the meane time all Northumberland took part with King Malcolme, for that he was their earles sisters sonne. Wherevpon King William sent a valiant capteine, a Norman borne named Roger, to inuade Northumberland. Which Roger gathering a power of men, came hastily into that countie, howbeit he abode a short time there in honor, for by the Scots & Northumberland men his armie was discomfited, and he himselfe traitorously slaine by his owne souldiers.

But

Malcolme
Conqueroz
sister to Edgar
king.

1067.H.B.

Englishmen
sleed into Scot
land.

Surnames of Englishmen
in Scotland.

Surnames
of Hungarians.

Surnames of Frenchmen.

The blacke
crosse.

William con-
queroz threat-
ning king
Malcolme.

Malcolms
answere.

Open warre proclaimed by William con-
queroz.
Northumber-
land taketh part with King
Malcolme.
Roger a Norman capteine
or rather earle Roger (as I take it.)
sleed in Eng-
land.

The earle of Glocester.

Gospatrike faith Simon Duncel.

Odo bishop of Baieur and earle of Kent.

Malcolme
enterpris against his enemies.

Robert the sonne of william conquere-
rour.
Berocastell
vpon Tine fortified.

A peace concluded betwixt William Conquerour, and Mal-colme Cam-
more.

The roicrosse.
waltheof.

Sward earle
of Northumberland.

Rebellion in Galloway.

Walter the sonne of Fle-ance.

Malglawe.

Walter created high steward of Scotland.

A new rebellion in Murrepland.

But king William nothing discouraged with this overthrow: sent one Richard earle of Glocester (whome amongst all the Englishmen he had most in trust) with a mightie armie into Cumberlond, against whome were sent the earles of March and Penetith, who defended the countrie right manlie from the inuasion of the said earle, so that he was not able to take anie aduantage of them. King William aduertised herof, wared wonderfull wroth, that no more good was done against his enemies, whereupon he sent a new power thither with all speed, vnder the leading of his brother Odo, who was both bishop of Baieur, and earle of Kent. By this last armie, the countrie of Northumberland was soze spoiled, and a great number both of Scots and Northumberlandmen discomfited and slaine. But as Odo was preparing to returne, there came Malcolme, with all the power he might make, and giuing an onset vpon his enemies, slue a great number of them, and recouered all the bottie which Odo men had got in the countrie, and so right tofull of that victorie, returned into Scotland. King William yet nothing abashed for these mishaps, sent his sonne called Robert, with a far greater power than at anie time he had sent before, into Northumberland, who remaining a long season in campe nere to the riuer of Tine, attempted no notable enterprise, sauing that he repaired and newlie fortified the towne of Berocastell, which standeth vpon the same riuer of Tine, and then at length a peace was concluded betwixt the two kings vnder these conditions, that king Malcolme should inioy that part of Northumberland which lieth betwixt the Tweed, Cumberlond, and Stainmore, and to do homage to the King of England for the same. In the midst of Stainmore there shall be a crosse set vp, with the king of Englands image on the one side, and the king of Scotlands on the other, to signifie that the one is march to England, and the other to Scotland. This crosse was called the roicrosse, that is, the crosse of the kings. Moreover, it was concluded that Waltheof or Woldosius (as the Scottish writers name him) the sonne of Sward earle of Northumberland should marie king Williams niece, bozne of his daughter, and to be free from all payments and exactions due to the king by anie manner of prerogative or means, for the space of twentie yeares next ensuing.

In the necke of this peace thus concluded betwixt the kings, happened new trouble in Scotland, by reason of intestine rebellion: for the people of Galloway, and the Irland men, rose in great numbers, and spoiled the borders of their neighbors, not sparing from slaughter in all parts, where they were anie thing resisted. Against these rebels was sent by king Malcolme, Walter the sonne of Fleance (of whome there is mention made before) with a convenient armie, who at his coming into Galloway, first gaue the people of that countrie an overthrow, and slue their chiefe capteine Malglawe. Then afterwards fighting with them of the Isles, he subdued them in such wise, that all things were pacified euen at commandement. For which high prowes and diligence in this pece of seruice shewed, he was created by Malcolme high steward of the realme, so that afterwards both he and his posteritie euer since haue bozne that surname, euen vnto these our daies.

After the quieting of this businesse, there sprang a new tumult more dangerous than the former, for the Murrepland men, procuring them of Ross and Cathnes, with diuers other to ioine with them in confederacie, did not onelie slea the kings seruants, and those that were appointed vnder him to see in vice ministered, but through support of one Malcolme, whome they chose to be their capteine, they also wasted and destroyed the kings possessions, with more crueltie than euer had bene heard of before. Wherefore to punish these traitorous attempts, Malcolme was sent with an armie into Mar. But the traitors doubting least they should not be able to withstand his puissance, thought nothing more available than to stop him with monie: but in the meane time came the king himselfe in good season into Monimusk, where he was aduertised, that in maner all the north parts of Scotland with the Isles, were confederat with the Murrepland men against him. The king astonished something at these newes, boined to glue the baronnie of Monimusk (which he vnderstood to be lands pertaining to the crowne) vnto the church of saint Andrew in Fife, if it might please God to send him victorie over his enemies.

At length comming vnto the water of Speie, he beheld his enemies on the further side, in greater number, and in better furniture for armor than he thought had bene possible to haue found in all Scotland: he perceiued also that his standard-bearer began to shrink, and not to shew the like cheerefull countenance as he ought to haue done. Wherefore he pulled the banner from him, and gaue it to sir Alexander Carron, who with this his new office obtained sundrie faire lands and possessions, to him and to his betres for euer: but his surname was afterwards changed, and called Skrimgeour; of the which is descended a noble house, continuing yet in great honor in the same surname and office. When the king was once passed the water, and the armies on both sides readie to haue ioined, through mediation of bishops and other vertuous men, the matter was taken vp, and peace made on these conditions: That the commons that took part with the rebels, should returne home out of hand, and the gentlemen to submit themselves to the kings pleasure, their liues and lands saued. Howbeit manie of them were kept in perpetuall prison during their liues, and all their goods confiscated to the kings vse.

All ciuill trouble and commotion being thus quieted, king Malcolme (speciallie by the good admonishment and exhortation of his wise quene Margaret, a woman of great zeale vnto the religion of that time) gaue himselfe in maner altogether vnto much deuotion, and workes of mercie; as in doing of almes deeds, by prouiding for the poore, and such like godlie exercises: so that in true vertue he was thought to excell all other princes of his time. To be brieue, herein there seemed to be in maner a certaine strife betwixt him, and that vertuous quene his wife, which of them should be most seruent in the loue of God, so that manie people by the imitation of them were brought vnto a better life. Agatha and hir daughter Christine also, by the example of these two holie liuers, renounced the pompe of the court, and got them to a priuat and solitarie life, wherein they gaue themselves wholie to diuine contemplation. Furthermore, Malcolme by the setting on of the quene his wife, ceased not to let his indeuor wholie to the aduancement of the christian religion, and to restore things that were decayed by the negligence of his predecessors. Wherefore whereas before his time, there were but foure bishops sees in Scotland, as saint Andrews, Glasco, Galloway, and Murthlake, and two of them, that is to say, saint Andrews and Murthlake remaining onelie in god reparation (the other being decayed) he restored the other two to their former beauties, and furthermore erected two other of new, as Murrepland and Cathnes, placing men of singular vertue and purenesse of life in the same.

Not and siperious there brought into Scot-
land.

The lamentation of the Scottish nobility for the intemperate succeding begun to grow in vse in their countrie.

The ancient sperence of her amongst
the Scots.

Robert earle of strength and hugeness of boile.

Standard bearer.

Sir Alexander Carron.

A peace concluded.

The submision of gentlemen.

King Mal-
colme things exhortation
his wife, by which himselfe
to deuotion.

A godlie

Agatha and Christine renounce the world.

Bishops re-restored and newlie created by king
Malcolme.

But

It to ot entred
mong the
and manie such a mu-
countrie
land to in-uerse of t
and decay intemper uouslie t
sized so fa-ting and diet used toprouid dresse we duced bni
not to eat
superfluo
and land,
satiures,
their grie Throu
of their b
grew mo offspring a more in ment of o
tie armie vnto fier without o all human Malcolme
infatigab
of his re
proue and where the not unde
after they thereof, t streine th ted abuse
to the re planted th not to be our time.
man was suffices,
were gon
yet did no thes at a infatigab
or whatso quench th dizing; so sought to thie of m most: wh
die woul
wards th
folke: fo
parts of t ting, no; s destroye t
In the Scotland
21 piers 1087. Al
old church
ded to a n
which fea thi writer
the abbete
made bish

It is said, that such outrageous riot entered at this time, and began to grow in use among the Scottishmen, together with the language and manners of the English nation (by reason that such a multitude of the same, fleeing out of their countrie, were daily received as then into Scotland to inhabit there, as before is shewed) that disorder of the nobles perceiving that discommoditie and decay to the whole realme would insue of this intemperance, came to the king, lamenting grievously the case, for that this venemous infection spread so fast over the whole realme, to the perverting and utter removing of the ancient sobrietie of diet used in the same. Wherefore they besought him to provide some remedie in time, before hope of redresse were past, that the people might be againe reduced unto their former frugalitie, who hitherto used not to eat but once in the day, and then desiring no superfluous meates and drinks to be sought by sea and land, nor curiouslie dressed or served forth with sauces, but onelie feeding to satisfie nature, and not their greedie appetites.

Although this their sober fare, with the exercising of their bodies herewith in continuall travell, they grew more strong and greater of bodie, than their offspring are found to be in these daies: for they were more in resemblance like unto giants than unto men of our time, with great and huge bodies, mightie armes and limbs, pressing upon their enemies like unto fierre lions, bearing downe all before them, without dread of any danger, for that they exceeded all humane strength and power. Hereupon king Malcolme took great paines to have redressed this infective poison, and vnterlie to have expelled it forth of his realme. Nowbeit the nature of man is so prone and readie to embrace all kinds of vice, that where the Scottish people before had no knowledge nor understanding of fine fare or riotous surfeit; yet after they had once tasted the sweet poisoned-bait thereof, there was now no meane to be found to restrain their licentious desires. And yet those corrupted abuses and riotous superfluities (which came into the realme of Scotland with the Englishmen) planted therein by the daies of king Malcolme, are not to be compared in exercise with things used in our time. For in those daies, as yet the nature of man was not so overcome with the abuse of superfluities, as it is now adates; for then though they were gone from the ancient sparenesse of diet, they yet did not eat past twice a day, and had but two dishes at a meale: but now the greedie taste of mens insatiable lust is such, that no kind of flesh, fish, fruit, or whatsoever may be gotten, is unneeth able to quench their gluttonous appetit: a ravenous gormandizing; so that neither land, sea, nor aire, is left unsought to satisfie the same, as though they were too little of most high commendation that may devour most: wherein they may be justlie compared to greedie wolues and coywants. But to bewaile that in words which cannot be amended in deeds, is but a folke: for the infection is so entered into the inner parts of the intrails, that neither with purging, cutting, nor fasting, it may be holpen. Sooner shall you destroye the whole nation, than remove this vice.

In the meane time whilst things passed thus in Scotland, king William the Conqueror died in the 21 yeere of his reigne, and after the incarnation 1087. About which time king Malcolme caused the old church of Dunfermling to be plucked downe and builded by a new, beginning even at the first floze. In which season, one Egellwin or William (as the Scottish writers say) was bishop of that see, and prior of the abbey was one Turgot, who afterward was made bishop of saint Andrews, and wrote the lives of quene Margaret and Malcolme his husband in the Scottish tong. Afterward he decessed in saint Andrews, but his bodie was brought unto Dunfermling, and there buried, because he was first prior thereof. King Malcolme by perswasion of this Turgot, builded also a church in Dunfermling, dedicated to the Trinitie, ordering from thenceforth that the common sepulture of the kings should be there, in like maner as it had bene afore time in the Ile of Iona at the abbey of Colmekill.

Amongst other vertuous ordinances also, which were devised and made by king Malcolme (through exhortation of his wife quene Margaret) mentioned by Turgot in the booke which he wrote of their lives, this is not to be forgotten, that he abrogated that wicked law, established by king Ewin the third, appointing halfe a marke of silver to be paid to the lord of the soile, in redemption of the womans chastitie, which is used to be paid yet unto this day, and is called the marchets of woman: where otherwise by tenor of king Ewins law, the lord had the use of their bodies all the first night after their marriage. King William surnamed the Red, the second sonne of king William the Conqueror, and successor to him in the kingdome of England, not well contented nor pleased in his mind, that the Scots should inuoy a great portion of the north parts of England, ancientlie belonging to his crowne as parcell thereof, he raised a great armie, and before any denouncing of warre by him made, invaded Northumberland, and took the castell of Anwik, putting all such to the sword as were found in the same.

King Malcolme, to withstand such exploits attempted by his enemy, leuied a great host of his subjects, and comming with the same into Northumberland, besieged the said castell of Anwik. And now when the keepers of the hold were at point to have made surrender, a certaine English knight conceiuing in his mind an hardie and dangerous enterprise, mounted on a swift horse without armor or weapon, sauing a speare in his hand, upon the point whereof he bare the keyes of the castell, and so issued forth at the gates, riding directlie towards the Scottish campe. They that warded, mistrusting no harme, brought him with great noise and clamour unto the kings tent. Who hearing the noise, came forth of his pavilion to understand what the matter ment. The Englishman herewith couched his staffe, as though it had bene to the end that the king might receiue the keyes which he had brought. And whilst all mens eyes were earnest in beholding the keyes, the Englishman ran the king through the left eye, and suddenlie dashing his spurs to his horse, escaped to the next wood out of all danger. The point of the speare entered so farre into the kings head, that immediatlie falling downe amongst his men, hee perished by the ghost. This was the end of king Malcolme in the midst of his armie.

It is said, that king William changed the name of this aduenturous knight, & called him Perceus, for that he strooke king Malcolme so right in the eye, and in recompense of his seruice gaue him certaine lands in Northumberland: of whome those Percees are descended, which in our daies haue ioined the honorable title of earles of Northumberland. The Scots after the slaughter of their king, brake by their campe, and buried his bodie within the abbey of Tynmouth in England. But his sonne Alexander caused it afterward to be taken vp, and buried in Dunfermling before the altar of the Trinitie. At the same time was Scotland wounded with another mishap. For Edward the prince of Scotland, eldest sonne to king Malcolme, died of a hurt

The church of Dunfermling

The sepulture of the Scottish kings.

King Ewins law abrogated or rather altered.

William Rufus.

The castell of Anwik won by the Englishmen.

The castell of Anwik besieged by the Scots.

An hardie enterprise.

Malcolme is slain.

The name of the Percees had no such beginning, for they came forth of Normandie at the conquest. Earles of Northumberland. Malcolme buried at Tynmouth.

Edward prince of Scotland died.

King and his nobles were brought into Scotland.

The lamentation of the Scottish nobles for the intemperance of their diet.

The excellent benefit of frugalitie.

How farre they grew in strength and might.

His nature was to die.

He was a godlike king.

How he was a godlike king.

How he was a godlike king.

But

Queene Margaret died.

1097. H. B.

The flood of Droghda H.B.
Strange
wonders.
A huge tide.

Godwins
lands.

Thunder.

Trees and corne burnt.

Marianus.

Veremond.

The sons of
R. Malcolm
Cannmore.

Donald Bane

Donald Bane
fled into the Fles.
Donald Bane
returneth into
Scotland.
His covenant
for the gift of the Fles to the king of Norwaie.

The respect that the people had to receive Donald Bane
for their king.

R. Malcolms
sons sent for into England
by Edgar their uncle.

hurt which he receiued in a skirmish not farre from Anwik, and was buried in Dunfermling, the first of the blond roiall that had his bones laid in that place. Queene Margaret being aduertised of the death both of hir husband and sonne, as then lieng in Edinburgh castell, hir disease increas'd through griefe therof so vehementlie, that within thre daies after she departed out of this life, vnto an other more iofull and blessed. King Malcolme was slaine in the yere of our redemption 1092, on the 13 day of Nouember, and in the 36 yere of his reigne.

In the same yere, manie vncouth things came to passe, and were seene in Albion. By the high spring-tides which chanced in the Almaine seas, manie towne, castles, and woods were drowned, as well in Scotland as in England. After the ceasing of which tempest, the lands that sometime were earle Godwins (of whome ye haue heard before) lieng not farre from the towne of Sandwich, by violent force and drift of the sea, were made a sand-bed, and euer since haue bene called Godwins sands. The people haue thought that this vengeance came to that pece of ground being possessed by his posteritie, for the wicked slaughter of Alured, which he tratorously contriued. Whereouer sundrie castles and townes in Surrey land, were ouerthrowne by the sea tides. Such deadfull thunder happened also at the same time, that men and beasts were slaine in the fields, and houses ouerturned euen from their foundations. In Lothian, Fife, and Angus, trees and corne were burned by fire, kindled no man knew how, nor from whence.

In the daies of this Malcolme Canmore, liued that famous historiographer Marianus a Scottishman borne, but professed a monke in the monasterie of Fulda in Germanie. Also Veremond a Spanishe priest, but dwelling in Scotland, storied about the same time, and wrote the Scottish historie, whome Hector Boetius so much followeth. Malcolme had by his wife queene Margaret (otherwise called for hir holinesse of life saint Margaret) six sonnes, Edward (as is said) was slaine: Ethelred, which died in his tender age, and was buried in Dunfermling: and Edmund which renounced the world, and liued an holie life in England: the other three were named Edgar, Alexander, and David. There be that write how Edmund was taken, and put to death by his uncle Donald Bane, when he invaded the kingdom, and usurped the crowne, after the decesse of his brother king Malcolme, and so then was Edgar next inheritor to the crowne.

This Donald Bane, who (as before is mentioned) fled into the Fles to eschue the tyrannicall malice of Hakbeth, after he once heard that his brother king Malcolme was dead, returned into Scotland by support of the king of Norwaie, vnto whom he covenanted to giue the dominion of all the Fles, if by his means & furtherance he might obtaine the crowne of Scotland. Whereupon landing with an armie in the realme, he found small resistance, and so with little adoe received the crowne. For manie of the people abhorring the riotous maners and superfluous gouerning brought in among them by the Englishmen, were willing inough to receiue this Donald for their king, trusting (because he had bene brought up in the Fles with the old customes and maners of their ancient nation, without tast of the English likerous delicats) they should by his seuerer order in gouernement recouer againe the former temperance of their old progenitors.

As soone as Edgar Etheling brother to Queene Margaret was aduertised that Donald Bane had thus usurped the crowne of Scotland, he sent secretly for his three nephues, Edgar, Alexander, and Da-uid, with two sisters which they had, to come vnto him into England, where he had not kept them anie long while, but that a knight whose name was Edgar, accused him of treason, alledging how he nourished his sisters sonnes and daughters within the realme, in hope to make them inheritors to the crowne: but the malice of this false surmise remained not unpunished, for one of Edgars friends, taking in hand to barraine battell with Edgar, in defense of Edgars innocencie, due him within lists. After that Donald had receiued the crowne at the abbey of Scone, he perceiued that some of the nobles grudged at his preferment, shewing by some tokens that they had more affection vnto king Malcolmes children, than vnto him: and therefore he cast out a word amongst his familiars, that per it were long the nobles should repent their of their doing, if they applied not them selues the more to his opinion.

Which words being marked, and depelie imprinted in some of their hearts, turned after wards to his great displeasure. For shortly after came Duncane the bastard sonne of king Malcolme out of England into Scotland, supported with an armie of men appointed by king William the Red, to place him in the kingdom, and to expell Donald out of the same by force of armes, if he attempted anie resistance. Now when Donald approached with his puissance, in purpose to haue giuen battell, the most part of his people did forsake him, and flew vnto Duncane's side, so that Donald thus abandoned of them that should haue aided him, was constrained for his refuge to flee againe into the westerne Fles: and so Duncane then comming vnto Scone, receiued the crowne of Scotland. But for that he had bene trained the most part of his life in the warres both in England and France, he had small skill in ciuill gouernement, iudging that thing onelie to stand with iustice, which was decided with speare and shield. By reason whereof Scotland was shortly filled with new troubles and seditious diuisions.

Donald Bane being aduertised of all those things, that thereby happened in Scotland, solicited Hakpender erle of Bernes to take his part, and by some meanes to dea R. Duncane, which enterprise Hakpender taking in hand, at length (in Lenteth) accomplished the same in the night season, when he had espied such advantage and opportunitie of time, that not so much as one man was found to pursue him. But to say the truth, Duncane was so farre out of the peoples fauor, that more reioised than were soyle for his death. After he was thus dispatched, his uncle Donald was restored againe to the kingdom, chieflie by support of the forenamed Hakpender, after his nephue the foresaid Duncane had reigned one yere and an halfe, where Donald himselfe had reigned (before he was expelled by his said nephue) the space of six moneths, and now after he had recouered the kingdom, he continued in the regiment thereof three yeres, not without great trouble and intestine commotions: for the most part of the lords maligning his aduancement, sought occasions daily to depose him.

In the meane time the Zlandmen made some stirre, neither did the warres with England cease, (though without anie great exploit or enterprise worthy of remembrance) sauing a few light skirmishes betwixt the parties, as occasion serued. At length came Magnus king of Norwaie with a great fleet, and sailing about the westerne Fles, garnished all the strengths within them in most defensible wise, with men, munition, and vittels, usurping the dominion as soueraigne lord of the same Fles: and at the same time ordeined those lawes and constitutions,

king
was sent for.

king
was
sent for.

king
was
sent for.

king
was
sent for.

king
was
sent for.

king
was
sent for.

king
was
sent for.

king
was
sent for.

king
was
sent for.

king
was
sent for.

king
was
sent for.

king
was
sent for.

king
was
sent for.

king
was
sent for.

stitutions which are used there amongst the inhabitants even unto these daies. The Scottis men having great indignation, that the Isles being ancientlie parcell of the crowne, should be thus alienated from the same, sent orators unto Edgar (who was, as ye have heard, the fourth sonne of king Malcolm) desiring him most instantlie to come into Scotland, to recover his fathers heritage and crowne of Scotland out of the usurpers hands.

Edgar taking deliberate advise touching this request, first sent ambassadours unto Donald, promising that if he would be contented to restore unto him the crowne, being due to him by lawfull succession, he would gladlie reward him with great lordships and revenues in Louthian: but Donald was so farre from minding to do him reason in this behalfe, that causing them which brought this message to be put in prison, he finallye sue them. Then Edgar by counsell of his uncle Edgar Etheling, purchasing an aid of men at the hands of king William Rufus, set forwards toward Scotland. At his coming to Durham, he was admonished by a vision in his sleepe, that if he took with him the banner of saint Cuthbert, he should have victorie. On the morrow after, he came into the abbey church, where first hearing divine service, when the same was ended, he displayed the foresaid banner, and caused it to be borne before him in that iournie. Nevertheless king Donald met him with a mightie armie, and after long fight, was chased into the Isles, where he was taken and brought unto Edgar. Some say that when the battels were readie to have joined, his men beholding the banner of saint Cuthbert sped against them, immediatlie forsooke him, so that he being destitute of succour, fled, in purpose to have saved himselfe in some one of the westerne Isles: but being apprehended by the inhabitants, was brought (as is said) unto Edgar, by whom he was (howsoever the hap of his taking chanced) cast immediatlie into prison, wherein he shortly after died. The victorie thus achieved, Edgar went unto Edinburgh, and from thence unto Dunfermeling to visit the sepulchres of his mother and brethren.

Afterwards comming to the abbey of Scone, and assembling the lords of the realme, he received the crowne, and shortly after was anointed by the archbishop of saint Andrews named Godlike, in the yere of our redemption 1101. For his mother queene Margaret purchased a little before his death of Urbane the pope, that from henceforth all the kings of Scotland should be anointed. This priviledge was confirmed afterwards by pope John the second of that name. The first king that was anointed according to that grant, was this Edgar, in the yere aforesaid. About two yers before this Edgar recovered thus the crowne of Scotland, was that generall passage made into the holie land under Godfrie of Bullongne, and other christi-an princes.

Amongst them, as one of the chiefe, Robert duke of Normandie went, and should have bene created king of Jerusalem, had he not at the same time heard how his brother William Rufus the king of England was slaine by chance, through glansing of an arrow shot at a deer in the new forest; and then hoping to succeed him in the kingdom of England, he preferred that honor to the other, wherein he saw to be more travell than gain. But at his coming home, he found that his yongest brother Henrie surnamed Beauclerke, was placed in the kingdom of England, and so was duke Robert his hope frustrate of both the kingdomes, and that worthilie (as most men thought) for that he refused so necessary a dignitie, wherein he might have served the common cause of the christian common-wealth. Unto Henrie Beauclerke in the second yere of his reigne king Edgar married one of his sisters called Paula. The other named Marie he coupled with Eustace earle of Bullongne: in which marriage was borne a daughter that was the onelie heire of the same Eustace in the countie of Bullongne, the which when she came to womans state, was married unto Stephan earle of March in England, and of Poiteigne in France, nephew to Henrie Beauclerke by his sister. The king of England Henrie, had issue by queene Paula, two sonnes and two daughters, William and Richard, Eustace and Paula.

But now to returne to king Edgar, to the some token of thanks towards saint Cuthbert for his aid shewed, as was thought, in the battell against his uncle Donald, he gave unto the monks of Durham the lands of Coldingham: and to the bishop of Durham called Canolf; he gave the towne of Berwick. But for that the same bishop wrought afterwards treason against him, he lost that gift, and the king resumed that towne into his hands againe. I do not find that Edgar had any warres any waie forth during all the time of his reigne, a prince rather reuerenced than dread amongst his subjects for his singular equitie and upright dealing. He departed out of this life at Dundee, in the 9 yere of his reigne, and after the birth of our Saviour 1107.

After the decesse of this Edgar, succeeded his brother Alexander the fierce, so called for his rigorous valiancie in pursuing of theues and robbers. In the beginning of his reigne, the inhabitants of Murray land and Ross, beholding him to be most an end in the church at his prayers, and divine service, after the maner of his parents, supposed he would prove no great quickie sufficient in punishing offenders, and thereupon most presumptuously they began to rob and reave on each side, not sparing to kill and slea all such as came in their hands, without respect to age or sex; insomuch that the yong infants smiling upon the murtherers, being about to execute their detestable crueltie, passed by the sword as well as the resistors: such rooted malice remained in their beaslly hearts, which upon renewing their old grudges they now accordinglie shewed. King Alexander therefore advertised hereof, came into those parts with a competent armie, and apprehending the chiefe authors and capteins, strooke off their heads. As he returned backe through Bernes, there came a woman unto him weeping in most lamentable sort, who fell upon his knees at his feet, beseeching him to pittie his case, having lost both his husband and sonne, by the tyrannous crueltie of the master of Bernes, who for that they had called him before a iudge in an action of debt, had slaine and murdered as well the one as the other. The king moved with this detestable kind of iniurie, lighted from his horse, and would not mount up againe, till he had scene the author of that heinous trespass hanged upon a gibbet. After his comming into Galloway, he took in hand to finish and make up the castell of Waledgar, the foundation whereof his brother Edgar had begun, that it might be an aid to chastise a sort of theues and robbers which haunted the woods thereabout, to the great disquietnes of all the countie. He gave also to the maintenance of that house certeine lands, which the earle of Galloway had given him at the font stone, when he became his godfather.

Whilste he was thus busie about the furtherance of that worke, diuerse of those theues that were accustomed to live by robberies in those parts, perceiving that this castell, which the king was about to build, should turne unto their destruction, they conspired his death, and winning by rewards and promises the king.

Paula kind Edgars sister.

Eustace earle
of Bullongne.

The lands of Coldingham.
Canolf bishop of Durham.

Edgar rather reuerenced
than dread.
1107. 10. Ma.
1109. H.B.

Alexander.

Theues of Murray land
and Ross.

The crueltie
of theues.

Execution.

The earle of Bernes son.

A righteous
iusticier.
The castell of Waledgar.

Treason of conspirators to have slaine
the king.

mises the helpe of the kings chamberlaine to the accomplishing of their traitorous and most diuelliſh practises, they entered one night through a priuite in to his lodging, in purpoſe to haue ſlaine him as he ſlept in his bedchamber: but he by Gods providence hauing knowledge of their comming, ſtarted out of his bed, and caught a ſword which hang nere at hand, wherewith he ſue firſt his chamberlaine that had brought them in, and then diſpatched fir of the other traitors (which were already entered his chamber) with ſingular force and manhood: the other fearing leaſt with the noiſe, his ſeruants that lodged within the houſe ſhould haue bene raiſed, and ſo haue haſted to aſſaile them on the backs, fled in all haſte poſſible. Neuertheleſſe, ſuch purſuite was made after them, that manie of them were apprehended, & vpon their examination, being brought before the king, they declared plainlie how they were encouraged to worke that treason which they had gone about, by ſundrie great barons and gentlemen of the countrie. Finally, the matter was ſo handled with them, that they diſcloſed the names of thoſe that had thus procured them to the treason. Wherevpon the king gathering an armie, he marched ſouth to purſue them, but before he came vnto the water of Spaie, the conſpirators had gotten together their power, & were lodged on the further ſide of the ſame water, to ſtop him from paſſing ouer.

The king ſeeing them thus aſſembled to impeach his paſſage, ſent his banner-man ſir Alexander Carron with a choſen part of his armie to paſſe the water, and to fight with his enemies, where, by the hardie onſet of the ſaid ſir Alexander, they were quicklie put to flight, and manie of them that were taken in the chaſe ſuffered death, according as they had well deſerued. The realme after this execution done on theſe offenders, continued manie yeeres after in good tranquillitie. This Alexander Carron alſo ſo that he was ſaine in the kings fight that day to fight moſt manfullie, in ſlaing diuerſe of the rebels with a crooked ſword which he had in his hand (of which ſort manie were ſled in thoſe daies) he was highlie rewarded at the kings hands, & euer after named ſhrimgeour, that is to ſay, An hardie fighter. He had alſo his armes increaſed with a rampant lion holding a crooked ſword, as is to be ſene in the armes of his poſteritie vnto this day. Other there be that ſay he got the ſurname of ſhrimgeour, becauſe he ſue an Engliſhman in a ſingular combat. The principall of this ſurname in our time held the conſtableſhip of Dundee, bearing in his armes a crooked ſword in faſhion of an hoke.

After that king Alexander had appeaſed the intestine commotions thus within his realme, he ſet in hand to repare the abbeie of Scone, wherein he placed regular canons, dedicating the church in the honoꝝ of the Trinitie, and ſaint Michaell. Not long after this alſo, he chanced to come into ſaint Colmes Inch, where he was conſtrained to abide three daies together through violent rage of weather and tempeſts: and becauſe he found ſome reliefe of meate & drinke, by meanes of an heremit that dwelt within the ſame Inch, and kept a chappell there dedicated to ſaint Colme, he made of that chappell an abbeie of regular canons, in the honoꝝ of ſaint Colme, endowing it with ſundrie lands and rents for the maintenance of the abbat and conuent of that houſe. He alſo gaue to the church of ſaint Andzeles, the lands called the Boarrinke, ſo named, for that a great boze was ſlaine vpon the ſaid ground, that had done much hurt in the countrie thereabout. The tuſks of this boze doe hang in chaines vpon the ſtalles of the quier in ſaint Andzeles church afore the high altar, and are 16 inches in length, & foure inches in thickeneſſe. Moreover, the abbeie of Dunfirmling was ſiſtified by king Alexander, and endowed with kindrie lands and poſſeſſions.

Whileſt king Alexander was thus occupied in building and repairing of religious houſes, his brother David liued in England with his ſiſter queene Maude, & through fauour which the king his husband bare towards him, he obtained in marriage one Maude, daughter vnto Mordolus, or rather Maltſe of earle of Huntington and Northumberland, begot of his wiſe the ladie Iubith that was neece vnto king William the Conqueror. And for that the ſaid Mordolus or Maltſe had no other iſſue to inherit his lands, David in right of his wiſe Maude inioined the ſame, and was made earle of Huntington and Northumberland, and had iſſue by his wiſe a ſon named Henrie, by whome the lands of Huntington, and ſome part of Northumberland were annexed vnto the crowne of Scotland, as after ſhall appeere. Maude the daughter of king Henrie Beauchelre, was married vnto Henrie the emperor, the fourth of that name. William, Richard, and Cuſeme, the reſidue of the iſſue which the ſame Henrie Beauchelre had by his wiſe (ſurnamed for his ſingular bounty, ouerſeſſe, the good queene Maude) in comming ſouth of France to repaſſe into England, perished in the ſea by a tempeſt, to the great dolour of the king their father, and to all other his ſubiects of eche ſtate and degree. Their mother the ſaid Maude was before that time departed out of this life. It was not long after, but that Alexander deceaſed alſo, and was buried in Dunfirmling beſides his fathers ſepulture, in the 17 yeere of his reigne complet, and from the incarnation of Chriſt 1125 yeeres.

In the daies of this king Alexander, the kindred of the Cummings had their beginning, by one John Cumming, a man of great prowelle and valiance, obtaining of the king in reſpect therof, certaine ſmall poſſions of lands in Scotland. The houſe of theſe Cummings roſe in proceſſe of time thus from a ſmall beginning to high honoꝝ and puiſſance, by reaſon of the great poſſeſſions & ample reuenues which they afterwarde attained. At length (as often happeneth) the importable height of this lineage was the onelie cauſe of the decaie and ſmall ruine thereof, as in the ſequelle of this hiſtoꝝie ye map at full perceiue. Alſo in the daies of king Alexander, the order of knights of the Rhodes had their beginning, and likewiſe the order of White monks, the author whereof was one Rodobert. About the ſame time liued that holie man Richard de ſancto Victore, a ſcotiſhman borne, but dwelled for the moze part of his time at Paris in France, where he died, & was buried wiſh in the cloiſter of the abbeie of ſaint Victor, being a brother of the ſame houſe.

It now to proceed with the hiſtoꝝie. After the deceaſe of Alexander the ſierce and firſt of that name, his brother David came vnto Scone, and there received the crowne, as lawfull heire to his brother, for that he left no heire behind him. This David, according to the example of his noble parents, ſet his whole care about the due miniſtring of iuſtice, to the honoꝝ of almighty God, and the weale of his realme. He had no trouble by warres with anie ſoꝝtaine enemies, ſo long as king Henrie Beauchelre liued. Therefore hauing opportunitie of ſuch a quiet time, he rode about all the parts of his realme, and vied to ſit in hearing of iudgement himſelfe, ſpeciallie concerning poze mens cauſes and matters: but the controuerſies of the lords and barons he referred to the hearing of other iudges. If he underſtood that anie man were indamaged by anie wrongfull iudgement, he recompensed the party wronged, according to the value of his loſſe and hinder-

The kings manhood.

The water of Spaie.

Sir Alexander Carron. The rebels are vanquiſhed.

Skrimgeour.

The abbeie of Scone.

Saint Colmes Inch.

The abbeie of ſaint Colmes Inch builded.

Lands named the Boarrinke. Poze tuſks.

The abbeie of Dunfirmling.

David brother to king Alexander.

Mordolus earle of Huntington and Northumberland.

The lands of Huntington and Northumberland annexed to the crowne of Scotland.

The death of king Alexander.

1124. H. The beginning of the Cummings.

Knights of the Rhodes. White monks.

Richard de ſancto Victore.

David. David is crowned king of Scotland.

The church of Dunfirmling, and the conuent of ſaint James.

The care of king David for the poze.

A rightous king.

hinder and nounced.

Thus things to and ban mongst men, pe ning & d that was He built of them warres t men, and The name rod houſe Holmecu in loils. alſo two at north caſtell, t ther of w rikes wi and Dab lands, an pozeome laſe vnto ons, ang thought e

He wa ſleepe, tha der to liue men into hand to l was adm croſſe. ( that verie time) as h the chaſe

Manie p ſurable li towards uenues of the noble pti ends; fo want of t procure t their land eractions uerthme bene com deſperat Otherth naughtie mon-wea the time t the crowne

Whereſ king Dan that he le poze. Fo wiſeth in tity of p those abbe to nouriſ thurches i roialtie: i

(as they a will prelat life, but an realms. W

the hiſtoꝝie and had by thumberla hinderance, with the gods of the iudge that pronounced the iudgement.

Thus in the first years of his reigne he did manie things to the aduancement of the common-wealth, and banished such banketting cheare as was vied amongst his people after the example of the Englishmen, perceiuing the same to breed a great weakening & decaye of the ancient stoutnesse of stomack, that was wont to remaine in the Scottish nation. He builded to the number of fiftene abbeies, part of them in the beginning of his reigne before the warres were begun which he had with the Englishmen, and part after the same warres were ended. The names of those abbeies are as followeth: Holie rood house, Kelso, Jedburgh, Melrose, Newbottell, Holmcultrane, Dunstanane, Cambuskenneth, Kinlois, Dunfirmling, Holme in Cumberland; also two nunries, the one at Carleill, and the other at north Berwikke: with two abbeies beside Newbottell, the one of saint Benedicts order, and the other of white monkes. He erected also foure bishoprickes within his realme, Kesse, Brechin, Dunkeld, and Dablane, indowling them with rich rents, faire lands, and sundrie right commodious possessions. Moreover he translated the bishops see of Perth into Aberdeen, for sundrie aduised considerations, augmenting it with certeine reuenues, as he thought expedient.

He was admonished (as the report goeth) in his sleepe, that he should build an abbeie for a religious order to liue in together. Whereupon he sent for workemen into France and Flanders, and set them in hand to build this abbeie of canons regular, as he was admonished; dedicating it in the honor of a crosse (whereunto he bare speciall deuotion) for that verie strangellie it slipped into his hands (on a time) as he was pursuing and following of a hart in the chase. But inough of these monkish deuises. Manie prudent men blame greatlie the vniuersall liberalitie of king Dauid, the which he vied towards the church, in diminishing so hugelie the reuenues of the crowne, being the cause that manie noble princes his successors haue come to their final ends, for that they haue bene constrained through want of treasure to mainteine their roiall estates, to procure the fall of sundrie great houses; to possesse their lands and liuings; also to raise payments and exactions of the common people, to the vtter impoverishment of the realme. And sometime they haue bene constrained to invade England by warres, as desperat men, not caring what came of their liues. Wherethilles they haue bene inforced to stampe naughtye monie, to the great preiudice of the common-wealth. All which mischiefes haue followed since the time that the church hath bene thus enriched, and the crowne impouertished.

Therefore king James the first, when he came to king Dauid his sepulture at Dunfirmling, he said, that he was a fore saint for the crowne, meaning that he left the church ouer-rich, and the crowne to poore. For he took from the crowne (as Iohn Maior writeth in his chronicles) 60 thousand pounds Scottish of percellie reuenues, wherewith he indowed those abbeies. But if k. Dauid had considered how to nourish true religion, he had rather indowed churches with such riches, nor built them with such roialtie: for the superfluous possessions of the church (as they are now vied) are not onelie occasion to enuill prelats to liue in most insolent pompe & corrupt life, but an assured net to draw gold and siluer out of realms. But now to retorne where I left, touching the historie, ye shall note that (as I said before) Dauid had by his wife Maude inheritor of part of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Huntington, a sonne named Henrie, who married the earle of Marrens daughter, a ladie of high parentage, as descended of most noble blond both French and English. On whom he begat three sonnes, Malcolm, William, and Dauid; also three daughters, Adhama, Margaret, and Maude. But now in the meane time, whilst the estate of the common-wealth in Scotland stood in high felicitie, vnder the prosperous gouernement of king Dauid, there happened to him an heauie losse. For the quene his wife the foresaid Maude deceased in hir flourishing age, a woman of passing beautie and chastitie, which two points (as is thought) commend a woman aboue all the rest. King Dauid therefore took such griefe for hir death, that he would neuer after giue his mind to marie anie other, but passed the residue of his life without companie of all women. She was buried in Scone, in the yeare of our Lord God 1132.

Whilst these things came thus to passe in Scotland, Henrie Beauchelke king of England, caused all the nobles of his realme to take their othes, that after his deceasse they should receiue his daughter Maude the emperesse for their soueraigne ladie and quene. She was as then returned into England; for hir husband the emperour was latelie before deceased. King Dauid also took his oth, and therefore when king Stephan (who vsurped the crowne of England after king Henriess deceasse against the said emperesse) sent vnto king Dauid to come and do his homage for the earledomes of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Huntington (according as by his tenure he was bound to do) with intimation that if he refused, king Stephan would invade him with open warre; king Dauid answered, that he had giuen his faith once aforehand for those lands vnto the emperesse Maude, which he minded not to breake for the threatening wordes of anie new inuasions. King Stephan moued with this answer, sent a power of men to the borders of Northumberland, (which as then was vnder the dominion of the Scots) to make a rode vpon the inhabitants of that countrie. They that had the charge of this enterprise, entering into the lands of their enemies, put all to fire and sword that came in their way. The Scots kindled with that displeasure, rode into England, and did the like displeasures and hurts there. For the yeare after, the earles of March, Penteth, and Angus entred into England with a great armie, against whome came the earle of Gloucester, and giuing them battell at Northalerton, lost the field, and was taken prisoner himselte, with diuers other nobles of England. King Stephan therefore, constrained to redeme the captiues, gaue not onelie a great summe of monie for them; but also made resignation of all such title, claime, or interest, as either he or anie of his successors might make or pretend to the countiees of Northumberland and Cumberland. Notobest his nobles were no sooner returned home, but that repenting him of that resignation, he gathered his puissance againe, and entering into Northumberland, fought with the Scots that came forth to resist him, and obtaining the victorie, took a great part of the countrie into his possession.

King Dauid, to redresse these iniuries, gathered a mightie armie, with deliberat mind, either to expell the Englishmen out of all the bounds of his dominions, or else to die in the feld. But shortly after, Thurstane archbishop of Yorke came vnto Roxburgh, called in those daies Marken, to treat for peace, where a truce was concluded for three moneths, with condition, that the Englishmen should deliuer vp the dominion of Northumberland vnto the lord Henrie king Dauid his sonnes. But for so much

D. li.

Earle of Warren.

The issue of Henrie.

Quene Maude deceased.

1132.

Maude the emperesse.

k. Stephan.

Homage is required.

The English men invade Northumberland.

The Scots make rodes into England

The earle of Gloucester Robert was against king Stephan, but there might be some other happie. vnto whome king Stephan had giuen that title.

A resignation.

k. Stephan repenteth.

Roxburgh in old time Marken. A truce.

King David
inuaeth Northumber-
land.
King Stephan passeth vnto Roxburgh.

much as this covenant was not performed on king Stephens side, king David inuaeth that part of the countrie which the Englishmen held, making great slaughter of all them that he found there about to resist him. King Stephan moued herewith leuied his people, and came in puissant araine vnto Roxburgh; but for that he had secret knowledge that some of the nobles in his armie sought his destruction, he was constrained to returne without atching of anie worthie enterpryse.

The yeare next ensuing, a peace was talked upon, the archbishops of Cantuarburie and York appointed commissioners in the treatie thereof on the behalfe of king Stephan, and the bishops of Glasgowe, Aberdeen, and saint Andrews on the part of king David. But Maude queene of England, the daughter of Eustace earle of Bullongne, and nece to king David by his sister Marie, was the chiefe dower in this matter, to bring them to agreement. The one of the kings, that is to say Stephan, laie at Duresme with his nobles; and the other, that is to say David, lay at Newcastle, during all the time of this treatie, which at length sorted to the conclusion of a peace, on these conditions: that the countie of Northumberland and Huntington should remaine in the gouernement of Henric prince of Scotland, as heire to the same by right of his mother; but Cumberland should be reputed as the inheritance and right of his father king David. And for these lands and seignories the forenamed prince Henric & his successors, princes of Scotland, should doe homage vnto king Stephan and his successors kings of England, for the time being.

A peace.

Covenants of agreement.

Homage.

K. Stephan
returneth.
Carleill was separated by William I.
king of England, about the yeare
of our Lord, 1092.

The death of Henric prince
of Scotland.
1152.

Prince Hen-
ric his issue.

The lawes of nature.

The peace thus ratified betwixt the two kings and their subjects, K. Stephan returned into Kent, and king David repaired into Cumberland, where he fortified the towne of Carleill with new walles and ditches. Thus passed the first three yeares of king Stephens reigne. In the fourth yeare came Maude the emperesse into England to claime the crowne thereof (as in the English historie more plainelie may appeare.) But whilest England was soe tormentted with warres by contrarie factions of the nobles for the quarels of these two persons, no small sorow hapned to Scotland for the death of Henric the prince of that land, and onelie sonne vnto king David, who died at Bello, and was buried in the abbete church there, in the yeare of our redemption, 1152. His death was greatlie bemoaned aswell of his father the king, as of all other the estates and degrees of the realme, for such singular vertue and noble conditions as appeared in him. But yet, for that he left issue behind him three sonnes and three daughters (as before is mentioned) the realme was not thought vnprovident of heires.

The king also being mortified from the world, toke the death of his sonne verie patientlie, considering that all men are subiect vnto death by the lawe of nature, and are sure no longer to remaine here, than their day appointed by the eternall determination of him that giueth and taketh away life & breath when it pleaseth him, as by daily experience is most manifest. Therefore that king David weied the losse of his sonne in such balance, it may appeare by an oration which he made to his nobles, at what time (after his sonnes deceasse) they came to comfort him. For he perceiuing them to be right heauie and sorowfull for the losse which he and they had sustained by the death of so towardlie a prince, that was to haue succeeded him, if God had lent him life thereto; in the end of a roiall feast, the which he made vnto those nobles that came thus to visit him, he began in this wise.

Exhortation.

How great your fidelitie and care is, which you beare towards me, although oftentimes heretofore I haue proued it, yet this present day I haue receiued most ample fruit thereof: for now doe I plainelie see, that you lament no lesse for the losse of my late deceased sonne, than if you had buried some one of your owne sonnes, and are therefore come to your great trauell and paine to comfort me, whome you esteeme to be soe afflicted for the ouer-timelie death of my said most obedient sonne. But to let passe for this time due yielding of thanks to you for the same, till occasion and leasure may better serue thereto; this now may suffice, that I acknowledge my selfe to be so much beholden to you, that whatsoeuer thing I haue in the world, the same is readie to doe you pleasure. But concerning the cause of your coming hither, in shewing your courtesies therein, you shall vnderstand, that my parents, whom I trust to be in heauen, and (as saints) inioy the fruits of their vertuous trauels here taken on earth, did so instruct me from my tender youth, that I should worship with all reuerence the most wise creator and prudent gouernor of all things; and to thinke that nothing was done by him in vaine, but that the same is provided and ordeined to some good vse by his high and vnsearchable counsell. And therefore whilest day and night I haue and doe resolue and call to remembrance the precepts and instructions of my parents, whatsoeuer hath chanced either touching aduersitie or prosperitie, god hap or bad, the same hath seemed to me (at the first) receiuing all things with equall and thankfull mind, and interpreting them to the best, farre more light than they commonlie seeme to others; and lesse they did disquiet me: so as with vse I haue learned at length, not onelie patientlie to beare all aduersities that may happen, but also to receiue the same as things pleasant and euen to be desired. And verelie my hap hath bene to be greatlie exercised in this behalfe, for I haue first sene my father, more deere to me than anie earthlie treasure; and no lesse profitable than greatlie desired of all the people: and yet neither the loue of the people, nor of his kinsmen and friends might warrant him from this fatall necessitie of death. I haue known my mother right famous in the world for hir singular vertue to passe hence in like maner. My brethren that were so louing, and againe so greatlie beloued of me; also my wife whome I esteemed above all other creatures, are they not gone the same way, and compelled to beare deaths hard ordinance? So be relie standeth the case, that no man might yet at anie time avoid the violence of his force when he cometh, for we all alike owe this life vnto him, as a due debt that must needs be paid. But this is to be receiued with a thankfull mind, in that the bountifull beneuolence of our God hath granted that we shall be all immortall, if we our selues through vice, & as it were spotted with filthie diseases of the mind, doe not fall into the danger of eternall death. Wherefore of right (me thinke) I haue cause to reioice, that God by his singular fauour hath granted to me such a sonne, which in all mens iudgements was worthy to be beloued whilest he was here amongst vs, and to be wished for now, after he is departed from hence. But ought we to take it heauilie, that he to whome he belonged, and who had lent him vnto vs, should call for him againe, and take him that was his owne? For what iniurie is it, if (when I see occasion) I shall aske that againe, which you haue possessed through my benefit as lent to you for a time? Neither doe I trust to want him long, if God shall be so mercifull vnto me, as I wish him to be: for I hope shortly to be called hence by commandement of that most high king, and to be caried vp to rest among that fellowship of beauenlie spirits, where I shall

This parents
goble instruction,

Losse of
friends.
His father,

His mother,

His brethren,

His wife.

Death cannot be dispensed
with.

Why we ought to take
the death of our children and friends patientlie.

Malcolme the sonne of Hen-ric procla-
med prince of Scotland.

Earle of Northumberland.

Henric the emperesse his sonne recei-
ued the order of knighthood.

The exhortation of king David to his nobles.

King David
departeth out of this life.

1152.

" Shall find my father and mother, my brethren, wife, and sonne in far better estate than here I kinde them. Therefore that I may repeate it once againe, I reioice (I say) to haue obtained in my sonne, by the grace of the supernall God, that I am assured by faith, he is already in that place to the which all we do earnestlie wish that we may attaine; and do in-deuour by all means, that when the time commeth in which our soules are to be loosed forth of these frailie bodies of ours, as out of prisons, they may be found worthe of that companie, in which our confidence is that he now most blissefullie is remaining.
Except anie man may thinke that we are so enuious, that therefore we do lament, because as yet we sticke fast overwhelmed and drowned in such illthie miers, and cumbered in such thornie thickets and bulshes, out of the which he (being now deliuered of all cares) hath escaped. But let vs rather by following the footsteps of him and other vertuous persons that are gone afore vs, labor both day and night, that at length (through heauenlie fauour) we may come to the place where we do reckon that by diuine pouer he is already arrived.

After that the king had made an end of his oration, and thanks given to God for his bountifull magnificence, they rose from the table, and departed to their lodgings, they all greatlie maruelling at the kings high prudence and goodlie wisdom.
Then was Malcolme, the eldest sonne of the before-mentioned prince Henrie, proclaimed in his place prince of Scotland, and conueied through the most parts of the realme by Duncane earle of Fife, and other of the nobles appointed to attend vpon and to receiue the oths of all the barons for their allegiance in his name. William the second sonne of prince Henrie was conueied into Northumberland by the foresaid nobles, and there proclaimed and created earle of that countrie. Then went king Da-uid himselfe vnto Carleill, where he met with Henrie the sonne of the emperesse, who receiued the order of knighthood there at his hands. This was a little before that the same Henrie came to an agreement with king Stephan, whereby he was admitted to the possession of halfe the realme of England, and promised by oth of assurance (as the Scotch writers say) that he should neuer go about to take the countries of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Hurington from the crowne of Scotland.

Shortlie after was king David taken with a soze disease and maladie, which continued with him to the end of his life. And so when he perceived himselfe to wax faint and feeble, he required to be borne in to the church, where he receiued the sacrament of the Lords bodie and bloud, with most solemn reue-rence: and then being brought againe to his chamber, he called together his nobles, and commending to them his yong nephues, the sons of his son the forenamed prince Henrie, he kissed ech one of them after an other, most instantlie desiring them in the honor of almightie God, to seeke the preferuation of common quiet, to the aduancement of the publike weale. This done, he departed out of this life in the 29 yeare of his reigne, or rather in the 30 yeare, if he reigned 29 and two moneths, as Iohn Maior saith. His bodie was buried in Dunfermeling, after the incarnation of Christ our Saviour 1153 yeares.

How farre this prince king David excelled in noble vertues and sober conuersation of life, I haue thought it better to passe ouer with silence, than to go about in few words to comprehend that, wherein if I should spend much time, I were not able in anie wise wortheilie to performe. For where in such cases few things are slenderlie shewed, the residue may seeme to be omitted through fault of the writer.

But yet this is not to be forgotten, that where his singular pitifull regard, which he had toward the re-liefe of the poore, passed all other his notable vertues, he purged his court also in such wise of all vicious rule and misordered customes, that his whole familie was giuen onlie to the exercise of vertue. No riotous banquet, nor surfeiting there was: fled amongst them, no lasciuious word heard come forth of any mans mouth, nor yet any wanton signes shewed to prouoke sensuall lust or carnall concupiscence. All the words, works, and whole demeanour of his seruants tended to some conclusion: nothing moued to stire strife or sedition, but all things ordered in such friendlie and peaceable sort, that the chaîne of brotherly loue seemed to haue linked them all in one mind and will. Such a rule was their master king David vnto them and all other, to direct and frame a perfect and goodlie life after.

King David being dead & buried (as is before said) Malcolme nephew to him by his son Henrie succeeded in the estate. He was but 13 yeeres of age, when he began his reigne; but yet his modellie and pertuous conditions were such, that all men conceiued a good hope that he would proue a right noble and wortheie prince. He was nourished and brought vp in such vertue, euen from his infancie, that delisting in chaff conuersation and cleannesse of bodie and mind, he liued single all the daies of his life, and without marriage: therefore he was surnamed Malcolme the maid. About the time of his en-tring into the possession of the crowne, there was a great dearth through all the bounds of Scotland. And sone after followed a soze death both amongst men and beasts, though it was not perceived that the disease whereof they died was anie thing contagious.

Whereof did one Somerleide the thane of Argile take occasion to attempt an higher enterprisse than stood with the basenesse of his linage and estate: for considering that the one halfe of the realme was consumed by mortallitie, and the other halfe nere hand famished through lacke of food, he thought it an easie matter for him, now whilst the king was vnder yeeres of ripe discretion, to vsurpe the gouernance of the realme into his owne hands, and so assembling together an huge companie of such as in hope of preie lightlie consented to his opinion, he came forwards, to make as it were a full conquest, stealing and spoiling all such in his way as went about to resist him. But his presumptuous enterprisse was shortlie repressed: for Gilcrist earle of Angus lieutenant of the kings armie, raised to resist Somerleids attempts, incountred with him in battell, & slue 2000 of his men. Somerleide hauing receiued this ouerthrow, and escaping from the field, fled into Ireland, and so saued his life.

Henrie the second of that name king of England, hearing that Malcolme had thus subdued his domesticall enemies, feared least he being unboldened therewith, should now attempt somewhat against the Englishmen; and therefore by counsell of his nobles, he sent an herald vnto king Malcolme, commanding him to come vp to London, there to do his homage vnto him, for the lands of Cumberland, Northumberland, and Huntington, in maner and forme as his grandfather king David had before done vnto his predecessor Henrie the first, with certificat, that if he failed, he would take from him all the said lands. King Malcolme obeyed this commandement of king Henrie: but yet vnder condition (as the Scotch writers affirme) that it should in no maner wise preiudice the franchises and liberties of the Scotch kingdome. At the same time king Henrie had warres against Helwes the first, king of France,

His singular
pittie toward the poore.

King Dauids
court.

King Dauids
seruants.

King Dauids
example, a rule
of goodlie life.

Malcolme

The education of king Ma-
colme.

A dearth.

A death not contagious.

Somerleide
thane of Argile goeth about to make himselfe king.

Somerleids
crucitie.

Gilcrist sent with an armie
against So-
merleide.

Malcolme
summoned to do homage.

Malcolme
goeth with king Henrie
into France.

France, and so passing ouer into that realme, constrained king Malcolme to go with him in that fornie against his will, notwithstanding that he had a safe conduct fraile to come and go. In this volage king Henrie did much hurt to the Frenchmen, and at length besieged the cite of Tholouse.

In all which enterprises he had Malcolme present with him, to the end that Malcolme might incurre such hatred and displeasure of the Frenchmen, that therby the bond betwixt them and the Scots might finallie be dissolved. But in the end king Henrie hauing lost diuers of his noble men by sicknesse, returned into England, and then licenced king Mal-colme to returne home into Scotland; who at his comming home, sent the bishop of Purrey, and one of his secretaries vnto the see of Rome, as ambassadors vnto the pope, which as then hight Eugenius the third of that name, to recognise the obedience which he ought to the Romane see. Shortly after also, there was a parlement holden at Scone, where king Malcolme was soze rebuked by his lords, in that he had bozne through his owne follie, armed against the Frenchmen their old confederate friends and ancient allies: but king Malcolme excused the matter with humble words, saying he came vn-warlike into king Henries hands, and therefore might not chole but accomplish his will and pleasure at that time; so that he supposed verelie the French king would take no great displeasure with his doings, when he once vnderstood the truth of the matter.

King Henrie hauing perfect vnderstanding of this grudge betwixt the Scottish lords and their king, thought to renew the same with moze displeasure, and thereupon sent for king Malcolme to come vnto York, to a parlement which he held there, where at his comming he was burdened with a right grie-uous complaint furnished against him by king Henrie, for that he should reueale vnto the Frenchmen all the secrets of the English armie, when he was with him in France, at the aboue remembred iour-nie, alledging the same to be sufficient matter, for the which he ought to forfeit all the lands which he held of the crowne of England, as Cumberland, Northumberland, and Huntington. And though king Malcolme by manie substantiall reasons declared those allegations to be vnture and vniuallie forged, yet by king Henries earnest inforcing of the matter, sentence was giuen against him, by the generall consent of all the estates there in that parlement assembled. And mozeouer, to bring king Mal-colme in further displeasure with the nobles, king Henrie gaue notice vnto them, before king Mal-colme returned backe into his countrie, how he had of his owne accord renounced all his claime, right, title, and interest, which he had to the foresaid lands, supposing by this means to make king Malcolme farre moze odious to all his lieges and subiects, than euer he was before.

Malcolme therefore, vpon his returne into his countrie, not vnderstanding anie thing of that sub-till contriued policie and slanderous report, was besieged within the castell of Bertha by the thane of Cunedale, and diuerse others. But after it was knowne how euill king Malcolme had bene used, and most vnturallie slandered, they desired pardon of their offense, as induced thereto by vnture reports, which once being granted, they brake vp their siege, and euer after continued in faithfull allegiance like true and most obedient subiects. But king Mal-colme soze moued for that he was thus iniuriouslie handled by king Henrie, first desiring restitution to be made of all such things as had bene wrongfullie taken from him, and so detained by the Englishmen, proclaimed open warres against them. At length, after sundrie harmes done, as well on the one part as the other, they come to a communication in a certaine appointed place, not far from Carleill, where (to be briefe) it was finallie concluded, that Mal-colme should receiue againe Cumberland and Huntington: but for Northumberland, he should make a plaine release thereof vnto king Henrie, and to his successors for euer.

For the which agreement he ran so farre into the hatred of his people, that he might neuer after find means to win their fauor againe; but doubting least if they should stirre anie rebellion against him, they might become an easie preie vnto the Englishmen, they remained quiet for a time. Whobeyt hostlie after, there arose another peece of trouble, though lesse in outward apperance, by reason of the small power remaining in the author, yet dangerous inough, considering it was with in the realme it selfe. One Angus as then the thane of Galloway, perceiving he might not by secret practise atchieue his purposed intent (whatsoeuer the same was) determined by open force to assaile that luckie success fortune would send him; hoping that those which through feare late as yet still, would assist him in all his attempts, so soone as they saw anie commotion raised by him to occasion them thereto. Whereupon he assembled together a great companie: but before he could worke anie notable feat, to make anie account of, Gilchrist earle of Angus (whose faithfull ballancie was before manifestlie approued in the suppression of Somersleids rebellion) discomfited his power, in three sundrie bickerings, & chased Angus himselfe into Whit-terne, where is a place of sanctuarie privileged for the safegard of all offenders that flie thereto for succor in the honor of saint Martin.

Malcolme then, for that he durst not breake the franchises of that place, set a band of men of warre round about it, to watch that he should by no means escape awate; so that at length wearied as it had bene with long siege, he yielded himselfe to the king, who taking his sonne to pledge for his good abearing in time to come, licenced him to go whither it should please him: but the most part of his lands and liuings were confiscat to the kings vse. Whereupon when he saw he might not mainteine his estate as he had done before, he became a canon in Holie rood house, and there ended his life (as it is reported.) It was not long after the pacifying of this trouble, but that a new rebellion was raised: for the Purrey land men, by the prouocation of their capteine called Gildo, wasted with fire and sword the countries of Ross, Moragwall, Moragdale, Mar, Caroch, Buchquhane, and the Bernes, in moze cruell sort than anie forreine & most barbarous nation would haue done, insomuch that when the king sent diuers of his seruants vnto them to vnderstand the cause of their rebellious doings, they slue those messengers, contrarie to the law of nations.

To punish such inturious attempts, the aboue named Gilchrist was sent with an armie into Purrey land: but the rebels nothing discouraged with the knowledge of his approued prowesse, met him in the field, and put him to flight. Whereupon the king himselfe, supposing that his presence was needfull to in-courage his people after this overthrow, came with a farre greater power than he had sent forth before, with displayed banner, ouer the river of Speite, nere to the mouth whereof he fought with the enemies, and in the end (after soze and long fight continued with great slaughter and bloodshed) he gaue them the o-uerthrow, and in reuenge of their cruelties sheld in time of this their rebellion, and to giue example to all other his subiects that should go about to attempt
the Tholouse besieged.

King Henries
meaning.

Ambassadors
sent to Rome.

Parlement
at Scone.
Malcolme
reprimed by his nobles.
Malcolmes
excuse.

Malcolme
goeth to York

Fond dealing and not likelie
to be true.

Sentence gi-uen against Malcolme at York.

Malcolme
is besieged.

Open warres proclaimed
against the Englishmen.

A conclusion of agreement

Malcolme
hates of his people.

Fear of outward crueltie causeth quiet-
nesse at home.

Angus the thane of Galloway raised a commotion
vpon what occasion he made not any mention.

Angus discomfited by Gilchrist.

Whiterne a place of sanctu-
arie.

Angus besieged in Whit-terne.

Angus yielded himselfe
to the king.

Angus became a canon.

A rebellion raised by the Purrey
land men.

Gildo capte-ine of the rebels.

The crueltie
of the rebels.

Gilchrist discomfited by
the Purrey
land men.

Angus not fought for them
sakes.

Comment about the man.

Malcolme
ought not to be relied on.

The Purreys are a worthie
house.

the like any la-
person that gi-thus ding t
the re-
romer
habits

In gile, &
land,
colme
and co
and n allaie
return Scotl
moze shed in all his after t
king,
colme
ing no gouer
two f sparg
pong earle

of all
sembl archb piffie
chang
péred
him b lie nee
take a céd b he mi
derin
trimo or tha ordin pleasu
lectab
bedfel
cedf
ing a
an he anger rits b
dious

of all
sembl
archb piffie
chang
péred
him b lie nee
take a céd b
he mi
derin
trimo
or tha
ordin pleasu
lectab
bedfel
cedf
ing a
an he anger
rits b
dious

of all
sembl
archb piffie
chang
péred
him b lie nee
take a céd b
he mi
derin
trimo
or tha
ordin pleasu
lectab
bedfel
cedf
ing a
an he anger
rits b
dious

of all
sembl
archb piffie
chang
péred
him b lie nee
take a céd b
he mi
derin
trimo
or tha
ordin pleasu
lectab
bedfel
cedf
ing a
an he anger
rits b
dious

of all
sembl
archb piffie
chang
péred
him b lie nee
take a céd b
he mi
derin
trimo
or tha
ordin pleasu
lectab
bedfel
cedf
ing a
an he anger
rits b
dious

of all
sembl
archb piffie
chang
péred
him b lie nee
take a céd b
he mi
derin
trimo
or tha
ordin pleasu
lectab
bedfel
cedf
ing a
an he anger
rits b
dious

of all
sembl
archb piffie
chang
péred
him b lie nee
take a céd b
he mi
derin
trimo
or tha
ordin pleasu
lectab
bedfel
cedf
ing a
an he anger
rits b
dious

of all
sembl
archb piffie
chang
péred
him b lie nee
take a céd b
he mi
derin
trimo
or tha
ordin pleasu
lectab
bedfel
cedf
ing a
an he anger
rits b
dious

of all
sembl
archb piffie
chang
péred
him b lie nee
take a céd b
he mi
derin
trimo
or tha
ordin pleasu
lectab
bedfel
cedf
ing a
an he anger
rits b
dious

of all
sembl
archb piffie
chang
péred
him b lie nee
take a céd b
he mi
derin
trimo
or tha
ordin pleasu
lectab
bedfel
cedf
ing a
an he anger
rits b
dious

of all
sembl
archb piffie
chang
péred
him b lie nee
take a céd b
he mi
derin
trimo
or tha
ordin pleasu
lectab
bedfel
cedf
ing a
an he anger
rits b
dious

of all
sembl
archb piffie
chang
péred
him b lie nee
take a céd b
he mi
derin
trimo
or tha
ordin pleasu
lectab
bedfel
cedf
ing a
an he anger
rits b
dious

the like, he commanded that none of those of Murray land should be saved (women, children, and aged persons onelie excepted) but that all the residue of that generation should passe by the edge of the sword. Thus the Murray land men being destroyed according to his commandement thorough all parts of the realme, he appointed other people to inhabit their comes, that the countrie should not lie wast without habitation.

In this meane time, Somerleith the thane of Argyle, who (as ye haue heard) was fled ouer into Ireland, upon trust of the hatred into the which Malcolm was run, with the most part of all his nobles and commons, though this slaughter of his people, and namelie of them of Murray land, he thought to assaie fortunes chance once againe, and so thereupon returned with certeine kernes and naked men into Scotland. But this last enterprise of his came to a more vnluckie end than the first, for being vanquished in battell at Kenfrow, he lost the most part of all his men, and was taken prisoner himselfe, and after hanged on a gibbet, by commandement of the king, according to that he had iustlie merited. Malcolm hauing thus subdued his aduersaries, and being now in rest and quiet, he set his mind wholie to gouerne his realme in vpright iustice, and hauing two sisters mariable, he coupled the elder named Margaret with Conon duke of Britaine, and the younger called Adhama he married with Florens earle of Holland.

After this, there was a counsell holden at Scone of all the Scottish nobilitie, where then they were assembled together in the counsell-chamber, Arnold archbishop of saint Andrewes stood vp, and by a vertie piffie oration, toke vpon him to aduise the king to change his purpose touching his vowe, which (as appeared) he had made to liue chaste. He declared vnto him by manie weightie reasons, that it was not onlie necessarie for him and his realme, that he should take a wife (by whome he might raise vp seed to succeed him in the possession of the crowne) but also that he might not choise a more perfect state of life (considering the office wherein he was placed) than matrimonie, being instituted, not by this law-maker or that, but by God himselfe, who in no one of all his ordinances might erre or be deceiued. Againe for pleasure, he affirmed how nothing could be more delectable to him, than to haue a worthy ladie to his bedfellow, with whome he might conferre all the conceits of his hart, both of grieve and gladnesse, the being a comfort vnto him as well in weale as in woo, an helpe both in sicknesse & health, redie to assuage anger, and to aduance mirth, also to refresh the spirits being wearied or in anie wise faint through studious trauell and care of mind.

Then shewed he that an aid children were vnto their parents, namelie to kings, how in peace they might gouerne vnder them, to the great commoditie of the common-weale, and in warre supplie their comes as lieutenants in defense of their countries, to the no small terror of the enemies. Wherefore sith men are not bozne onelie for their owne weale, but also for the profit of their friends, and commoditie of their countrie; it could not be chosen, but that he ought to perswade with himselfe to alter his purposed intention, concerning the obseruance of chastitie, and to take a wife to the great ioy and comfort of his subjects, sith it was commendable both before God and man, and so necessarie withall and profitable, as nothing might be more. But these and manie other most weightie reasons could nothing moue his constant mind, hauing euen from his tender yeres affianced his virginittie vnto Christ, trusting that God would so prouide, that the realme should not be destitute of conuenient heires, when the time came that it should please his diuine maiestie to take him hence to his mercie from amongst his subjects. Thus brake vp that counsell without anie effect of the purpose for the which it was called.

Shortlie after it chanced that king Malcolm fell sicke, continuing so a long time, by reason whereof he sought meanes to conclude a peace with Henrie king of England; which being brought to passe, he set workemen in hand to laie the foundation of saint Kewles abbete, which afterwards bare the name of saint Andrewes. When he had finished this house, being a goodlie pcece of worke, and vertie collic, as may appere at this day by the view thereof, he assigned forth certeine rents for the sustentation of the canons, whome he placed there of the order of saint Augustine, not so largelie as serued for the maintenance of superfluous chere, but yet sufficient for their necessarie finding: by reason whereof, the canons of that abbete liued in those daies in most feruent deuotion, hauing no prouocations at all to inordinate lusts and sensuall pleasures; but onelie giuen to diuine contemplation, without respect to auarice, or enlarging the possessions and reuenues of their house. He founded also the abbete of Couper of the Cisterciens order, and indowed it with manie faire lands and wealthie possessions. Finalle, being vered with long infirmittie, he departed out of this life at Jedburgh the 12 yere of his reigne. A certeine comet or blasing starre appeared 14 daies together before his death, with long beames vertie terrible to behold. His bodie was buried at Dunfermling, after the incarnation 1185 yeres.

In the daies of this Malcolm, Roger archbishop of Dore, constituted the popes legat, could not be suffered to enter into Scotland, because he was a man highlie defamed for his couetous practising to enrich himselfe by vnlawfull meanes.

After Malcolm succeded his brother William, surnamed for his singular iustice, the Lion. Shortlie after his coronation, he sent ambassadozs vnto Henrie king of England, requering him, that according to iustice, he would restore vnto him the earledome of Northumberland, sith it appertained by good and lawfull interest vnto his inheritance. King Henrie answered the messengers, that if king William would come vnto London, and there do his homage for Cumberland and Huntingtoun, he should be assured to haue all things so ordered, as he reasonable could with or demand. Hereupon king William went into England, and so came to London, and after he had done his homage for Cumberland and Huntingtoun, he required the restitution of Northumberland. But king Henrie made answer as then, that forsomuch as the same was annexed to the crowne, he might not without the assent of all the estates of his realme make restitution thereof. Notwithstanding, in the next parlement, he promised to cause the matter to be proponed: and if it came to passe that his demand were found to stand with reason, he would do therein according to conscience, when time expedient should serue thereto.

About the same season, king Henrie passed ouer into Normandie with an armie, and caused king William, with manie other nobles of Scotland, to go with him in that iourne. For king William would not disobey his commandement at that present, in hope to attaine in quiet and peaceable manner his sute touching the restitution of Northumberland (as the Scottish writers do affirm) but in the end, after he had continued a long time with king Henrie, and perceiued no comfort to recover his lands, he got licence with much adoe to returne home: and so coming backe into England, passed through the realme with A peace concluded with England. The Abbete of saint Andrewes builded.

Superfluous rents of abbetes, prouocations to inordinate lusts.

The abbete of Couper founded. The death of king Malcolm. A comet.

1185. Roger archbishop of Dore the popes legat.

William surnamed the Lion. Ambassadozs sent to the king of England.

King William is required to do homage.

King William request for the restitution of Northumberland. The answer of king Henrie.

King Henrie sailth into Normandie. King William with manie nobles of Scotland went with king Henrie ouer into France.

King William
scale of justice.

Scotland
more indama-
ged by domesticall theues
than by fo-
reigne enemies.

Ambassadors
sent to king Henrie.

See more
thereof in England.

A portion of Northumber-
land restored
to the Scots.
King William
received a piece of Northumberland
with his right tailed to the residue.
King Henrie
repenting him selfe of that which he had delivered to
the Scots
seeketh new occasions of warre
with England.

King William
inuaeth
Cumberland.

with his nobles into Scotland, where he applied his whole indour to vnderstand the state of the common-wealth of his subiects, and speciallie he took order in most diligent wise, to punish cruelties done by theues and robbers, which vndoubtedlie was one of the most profitable acts that he could deuise to accomplish at that present, considering the state of his realme, as it then stood. For if the damages & skathes committed by theues and robbers were equalie pondered with the hurts and hinderances which daily grow by open warre against anie foren nation, it may well appeere, that more harme ariseth, & more heinous cruelties are exercised against the poore and miserable commons and innocent people, by such as liue by rapine & spoiling at home, than by anie outward enemies, be they neuer so fierce and strong in the field. And therefore the prudent consideration of this prince was no lesse to be commended, in that he sought to repress the licentious outrage of such arrand theues and priuie murderers, than if he had slaine manie thousands of foren enemies.

When he had once cleared the realme of those misgouerned persons, he sent emissaries his ambassadors to king Henrie, requiring (as before) to haue Northumberland restored vnto him, with notice giuen, that if he might not haue it with fauour, he would as saie to recouer it by force. King Henrie perceiving that he must either satisfie king Williams request, either else haue open warres with the Scots, by aduise of his nobles, restored to king William so much of Northumberland as his grandfather King Malcolm had in possession. King William accepted the offer, but so, as he protested that he received not that part in full recompense of the whole which was due vnto him (so saie the Scottish writers) but so as his entier right might alwaies be saued as well to the residue as to that which was then restored. Within few yeres after, king Henrie feeling that hinderance it was for him to forbear the commodities of those lands, which were thus deliuered vnto the Scottish kings vse, repented him of that bargain: and therefore to find some occasion to recouer the same again, he procured his subiects that dwelled vpon the borders, to make forreies into the lands pertaining to the Scots, so to prouoke them to battell.

Complaint of these iniuries being brought vnto the warden of the Scottish borders, by such Scots as had lost such goods as were taken awaie by the Englishmen, he sent to demand restitution; but for so much as he could haue no towardlie answer, he got together a great number of men, the which entering into the English ground, did much hurt on each side where they came. At the same time was king Henrie in France, and therefore the Englishmen thought it sufficient to defend themselves as well as they might without attempting anie notable enterpryse in reuenge of the displeasures done by the Scots. Haruest was also at hand, and thereupon they ceased on either part from further inuasions, till the winter season, which passed also without anie exploit achieved, worthie to be remembred; sauing certeine small rodes made by the Scots into the English borders, as they saw occasion to serue thereto.

But in the summer next following, king William raised a mightie armie, and came with the same into Cumberland, the right wing of the which armie was led by Glisciff, whose approved valancie often shewed in the time of king Malcolm, had advanced him to marie with the kings sister. The left wing was assigned vnto the conduct of one Rowland the kings cosen, who was also lieutenant of the horsemen. The middle ward or battell the king himselfe led. The Englishmen, to the intent they might haue time and leasure to assemble their power, sent vnto king William, offering vnto him, not onlie large summes of monie, if he would retorne backe with his armie without further inuasion, but also redress of all manner of iniuries and wrongs, if anie such on their behalfe were to be proued. But king William for answer hereunto declared, that he had not begun the warre for anie desire he had to monie; neither had he first giuen the occasion, as one that was euer willing to liue vpon his owne: so that if they could be contented to restore Northumberland being his rightfull heritage, he was not so desirous of blood, but that he would gladlie cease from all further attempts.

The Englishmen hauing receiued this answer, to the end they might protract the time in sending still to and fro, till they might espie some occasion to worke such seates as they had imagined, addressed forth other ambassadors vnto king William, with diuerse faire offers and golden promises. In the meane time, to take the Scottishmen at some advantage, they conueie their whole power in the night season nere vnto the place where the same Scottishmen laie in campe, & diuiding themselves into two parts, the one was appointed to abide in the fields, till the sunne were vp, and then to shew themselves to the enemies, to traine them forth to battell: the other companie was laid close in a ballie not farre off, to take the advantage as they saw their time. In the morning about the rising of the sunne, those that were appointed to procure the skirmish, approached so nere to the enemies campe, till they came euen with in sight of them. The Scots amazed with the strangenesse of the thing, for that they had not heard before of anie assemblie of the Englishmen, at the first were somewhat afraid: but anon encouraging one another, they boldlie issued forth vpon their enemies, who of purpose (at the first) made but weake resistance, and at length fled amaine, to the intent to cause the Scottishmen to breake their arrate of battell in pursuing them, which they did so egerlie, that they left their king but slenderlie garded with a small companie about him. Then the ambushment lieng in the ballie, brake forth vpon him, according to the order before appointed, and in the meane time, the other that fled cast themselves about, and manlie abode their enemies, so earnestlie laing it to their charge, that in fine they droue them backe, and constrained them to flee in good earnest, which they themselves had but onlie counterfeited to do before.

King William perceiving his people thus distressed, and himselfe inclosed on each side amongst his enemies, after he had assaied to breake forth on some side from amongst them, when he saw his indour could by no meanes preuaile, and that the enemies made onlie at him, he yielded himselfe. There was not much blood spilled on either side at this beheading, for the one part in the beginning of the fraie (as ye haue heard) fleeing of set purpose to the place where their ambush late, escaped without much hurt; and the other, scared by the breaking forth of the ambush, abode the hunt but a small while, returning immediatlie towards the king; and then perceiving they could do no good, they made the best shift they could each man for himselfe, to escape the enemies hands. The king being thus taken of his enemies, was conueied to king Henrie ouer into Normandy, where he was as then remaining. The yere that king William was thus taken, was after the birth of our Saviour Christ 1174, and the ninth of king Williams reigne.

Other writers report the maner of his taking, not altogether agreeable with that which we haue here about remembred, who declare how King William, after he had wasted all Cumberland, came into Northumber-

The offers of the Englishmen.

The answer of king William.

The Englishmen taken by policie aduantage with the Scots.

The Englishmen returne purpose.

The king but slenderly garded.

The Scots constrained to flee.

King William yielded himselfe prisoner.

King William conueied into Normandy.

1174.

Discord of Supters.

William Parvus.

Captains of the Englishmen.

W. Parvus.

Glisciff and Rowland re- sit the Englishmen.

Northumberland under the Englishmen.

David earle of Huntington.

The king of Scots doth battle to the king of England for Scotland. Rog. Houed. March. West.

Northumberland, not ceasing till he came to Anwike, where he staid for a time to haue had battell: but in the meane while the Englishmen laie close together without noise or appearance, in such wise that no Scottishman could haue vnderstanding where they were. At length king William wearied with long tarieng thus at Anwike, and seeing no enemies to appeere, determined to worke some exploit yet before his returne, and thereupon sent forth the most part of all his armie abroad into the countrie, to for-reie the same, keeping no great companie about him, till the returne of the other thus sent forth.
 Whereupon incontinentlie a great ambushment of Englishmen came vpon him with counterfeited Scottish ensignes, and were not once suspected for Englishmen, till the king was compassed in by them on ech side, and so finally taken and led awaie per anie Scottishman with thereof, saue a few which were left (as is said) with him for the time. In deed Wilhelmus Paruus, a canon sometime in the abbey of Wyldington in Northshire, in that his booke which he writtes of the Norman kings of England, affirmes how there were not manie more than about three score horsemen with king William, while he was thus taken; and that the Englishmen were not past foure hundred horsemen, which took vpon them that enterprise; whose capteins (as he reciteth) were these: Robert de Stuteuill, Ranulfe de Glanvill, Bernard de Ballioll, and diuerse other.

The same author writeth, that after the taking of the king, there rose a mutinie amongst the Scots: for whereas the Irish Scots bare a naturall grudge against the English Scots, yet whilest the king was present amongst them, they durst not utter their malicious intentions: but now that he was thus taken from them, so manie of the English Scots as fell into the hands of the Irish, paid dearelie for the bargain, being cruelly murdered and slaine: so that the residue were constrained to get them out of the waie into castles and towers, where they might be receiued. But now it is to be considered, that because there was no great slaughter made at the taking of king William, the warres notwithstanding continued betwixt England and Scotland: for the two before specified chieftains Gilcriff and Rowland stoutlie withstood the Englishmen, and beat them backe as they enterprised to enter into Cumberland. At length a peace was taken, during the time that king William remained in captiuitie; vnder these conditions, that Northumberland should continue vnder the dominion of the Englishmen, and Cumberland (with the earldome of Huntington) to remaine (as before) vnder the gouernance of the Scottishmen.

Immediatlie vpon the taking of king William thus at Anwike, his brother David earle of Huntington, thorough licence of king Henrie came into Scotland, to haue the gouernement of the realme, till the king his brother might be redeemed. So soone therefore as he had once established the realme in good quiet and iustice, he sent Richard the bishop of Saint Andrews, with diuerse other noble men, ouer into Normandie, to take order there with H. Henrie for the ranome of the king his brother, which was agreed in this manner. First, it was accorded, that king William should become and acknowledge himselfe to be the king of Englands liege man, against all men for the realme of Scotland and his other lands; and for the same should do fealtie to the said king of England, as to his liege soueraine lord, in like sort as other his liege people were accustomed to do. And further, he should also do fealtie vnto the lord Henrie, the king of Englands sonne, (sauing alwaies the faith which he owgth the king his father.) And in like manner it was couenanted and agreed, that all the prelates of Scotland, and their successors, should recognise their wonted subiection to the church of England, and do fealtie to the king of England, so manie of them as he should appoint.

 And likewise the earle and barons of Scotland, and their heires for their part, should do their homage and fealties vnto the said king of England, and to the lord Henrie his sonne, so manie as therevnto should be required.

Moreover, the king of Scots should paie for his redemption one hundred thousand pounds sterling, the one halfe to be paid in hand: and for sure-pament of the other halfe, the earldomes of Cumberland, Huntington, and Northumberland should be deliuered vnto king Henrie in pledge or mortgage, till the time that the same summe was paid. And for the more suretie of these couenants, and that the Scots should moue no warre against the Englishmen, foure of the strongest castles within Scotland, that is to saie, Berwike, Edinburgh, Forburgh, & Strueling, were deliuered into the Englishmens hands. These things being thus ordered the eight day of December 1175, the king resorted home, there followed a new stirre in Scotland, for Gilbert of Galloway, a right cruell and most mischievous person, purposing to conquer the crowne by force, made great slaughter of all them that withstood his desire. And because his brother reproued his doings, he put out his eyes, and cut off his hands. Against this Gilbert was Gilcriff sent with an armie by the king. There was fought a soie battell betwixt them, for the most part of those that followed Gilberts commandement, were desperat fellows, such commonlie as for murder and other heinous crimes by them committed were in danger of the lawes, and therefore vpon hope of pardon desired a change; but yet in the end, Gilcriff with multitude wan the field of them, and slue more in the chase than in the battell. Gilbert himselfe escaped and got ouer into the Ile of Man, and fled from thence into Ireland. Wilhelmus Paruus reporteth this matter somewhat otherwise, as thus: In the armie of king William (saith he) when he was taken nere vnto Anwike, were two brethren, Gilbert and Wared, that were lords of Galloway, hauing there with them a great retinue of their countrymen. These were the sonnes of Fergusius, sometime lord of that prouince; after whose decesse the king of Scots that is superiour lord thereof, diuided the countrie betwixt these two brethren. But Gilbert the eldest brother found himselfe much grieved to haue anie part of those lands (which were his fathers) giuen from him; yet doubting punishment at the kings hands, he durst not attempt anie thing against his brother, till it fortuned the king to be taken. And then deli-uered of the feare which had staid his mischievous purpose, he taketh his brother at vnwares, and cruellie murdered him, after no common maner; but rather martyred him in heastlie wise, so to satisfie the instinct of his diuelli nature. And immediatlie after inuading the vpper countries, he exerciseth great slaughter of men on each hand. But his brother had a sonne called Rowland, which prouing a valiant yong gentleman, boldlie resisted his vncles rage, with the assistance and aid of his fathers friends. And thus was Scotland brought into trouble (as Wilhelmus Paruus recordeth) till by the fore-said Gilcriff the murderer was expelled, as before is expressed. In the yeare following came Hugo cardinal of saint Angelo as legat from the pope into England, with authoritie to reforme the English churches, in such cases as were thought requisite; and after he had made an end there, to do the like in Scotland.

The prelates
of Scotland
do fealtie to the king of England.
The earles
and lords do homage vnto
him.

King William
ransomed.

Foure castles
deliuered to
the English-
men in pledge.

1175.
Gilbert of Galloway re-
belleth.

Gilbert of Galloway
vanquished by Gilcriff.

Wilhelmus Paruus.

Hugh cardinal of saint Angelo the popes legat.

make large backe with the redde
sue such on William
had not become; nee that was that if they land being desirous of om all fur-

The offer of the English-
men.

The answer
of king William.

answer, to nding still on occasion to addressed
iam, with
s. In the me aduan-
the night
the Scottish
s into two
n the fields,
hemselfes
fell: the oe not farre
it time. In those that approched so even with the strangeard before at the first aging one
enemies,
eake res-
e intent to ate of bat-terlie, that ed with a ambushment according
eane time,
and manlie
it to their
, and con-
they them-
efore.

The English
men take by policy so banquish the Scots.

Wilhelmus Paruus.

Captains of the English-
men.

W. Paruus.

The English
men retire of purpose.

The king
but weakling
garden.

Gilcriff and Rowland resist the Englishmen.

Northumber-
land under the Englishmen.

The Scots
constrained to fle.

King William
yieldeth him-
selfe prisoner.

King William
conueied into Normandie.

1174.

Discord of Englishers.

The king of Scots doth fealtie to the king of England for Scot-
land.
Roy. Houed.
Mans. West.

his taking,
h he haue
B. Will-
came into Northumber-

The bishops
of Scotland
summoned to a conuocation
at Northampton.

Gilbert a learned man defended the liberties of Scotland.

Gilbert bishop of Cathnes.

Wonders.

Hail.

The sun
darkened.

Thunder.

The foundation of the abbey of Ar-broth, or Abbrothochoke.

1178.

The abbey of Dunfermline
founded.

Ambassadors
to the pope.

A rose of gold.

Gilcriff murdered his wife upon suspicion and
adulterie.
The kings indignation against Gil-criff.

Gilcriff proclaimed traitor.

Wredus the brother of Gilcriff.

Scotland. When he had therefore finished with England, he cited all the bishops of Scotland to appeare before him at a day prefixed at Northampton. They came according to his appointment, and being assembled there in conference, he went about in most earnest wise to persuade them to receiue the archbishop of York for their metropolitan. But one Gilbert a young man, holobest singularly well learned, and for his holiness of life much commended (as Hector Boetius writeth) being sent of purpose by king William unto this conuocation, to foresee that nothing were concluded in the same, prejudiciall to the ancient liberties and franchises of the realme of Scotland, did argue so stiffly to the contrarie, that the cardinall left off the pursute of such manner of matter, and brake vp that councell without determination of anie thing to the purpose in that behalfe.

This Gilbert that thus defended the cause and liberties of the Scottish clergie, was afterwards made bishop of Cathnes, and finally after his departure out of this transitory life, registred for his supposed perfect holiness of life among the number of saints. The chiefest cause that moued the Scottish clergie to withdraue their obedience from the primasie of York, was the dissention and continuall enmitie betwixt the two nations for superiortitie in temporall causes. The same yeare that this councell was holden at Northampton, sundrie un-beseemly wonders were seene in Albion. On Midsummer day being the feast day of the natiuitie of saint John the Baptist, there fell such a storme of hail, that it killed manie sheepe and small cattell: people that were out of houses, and from vnder couert anie where abroad, were beaten to the earth with violence of that storme. The sunne in September about nonetide was darkened for the space of two houres together, without anie eclipse or cause naturall by interposition of clouds. In Northshire was such terrible thunder with strange lightening, that manie abbeies and churches were consumed with the fire.

About this season, the abbey of Arbroth was built in most magnificent wise, and indowed with lands and revenues in such ample sort, that few houses within the bounds of Albion might compare therewith. The church was dedicated in the yeare of Grace 1178, by king William, in honor of Thomas Becket archbishop of Canturburie, with whome (as is said) he had great familiaritie in time of his young yeares. At the same time the abbey of Haddington was founded by Adhama the mother of king William, and shortly after she had built it, she died. Not long after, king William sent as ambassadors John bishop of saint Andrews, and Reginald abbat of Ar-broth unto pope Alexander the third, to present vnto him his obeisance, according as he thought stood with his duetie. The pope seeming to reioice thereat, sent shortly after vnto the king a rose of gold, filled with balme, and certeine new priuileges concerning the libertie of the church of Scotland. At the same time Gilcriff, hauing his wife in suspicion of adulterie, droue hir out of doores, and afterwards strangled hir in a village called Paris, not far a mile from Dundee. The king (for that she was his sister) took such indignation therewith, that he seized vpon all his lands and goods, purposing to haue put him to death if he might haue got him into his hands: but when he saw he could not be found, he proclaimed him traitor, and rased his castell (wherein he had dwelled) quite to the ground, in such wise that vnneth remaineth anie token at this day where it stood. This Gilcriff had a brother that hight Wredus, who before this mischance had got the lands of Dgillie: of whome the house of the Dgillies take their beginning, that after came to great autoritie in the court, though at this time (through Gil-criffs offense) his whole familie was nere hand destroied. About this time also, the queene, king William his wife, deceased. A daughter which he had by hir, named Adhama, he gaue in marriage vnto the earle of Laon: but he himselfe after the deceasse of this his first wife married Emengard, daughter to Richard vicount of Beaumont that was sonne to a daughter of king William the Conquerour. By this marriage and alliance, the peace was newlie confirmed betwixt England and Scotland, in such wise, that neither part might receiue anie rebels to the other, by means whereof Gilcriff, that before was fled into England, was constrained to returne into Scotland, disguised in poyr weed, with two of his sonnes, and there passed forth his life a long time in great miserie amongst the woods and in out places, unknowne to anie man that he was, by reason of his poyr and simple habit. Somewhat before the aboue remembred marriage, Henrie king of England at the motion of Hugh bishop of Durham rendered vnto the castell of Edenburgh into R. William his hands.

About this time the Souldane named Saladine prospered hugely against the christians in the holie land, making such cruell slaughter of them, that to heare thereof, all christian hearts were moued to pitifull commiseration and dolorous teares: in so much that Henrie king of England vowed to go thither with an armie to relieue the common necessities of the christian publike locale, and had gone in deed, if he had not bene hindered by the confrarie of his sonne, whome latelie before he had caused to be crowned king, that went about to vsurpe the sole administration to himselfe now in his fathers life time. About the same time William went with an armie into Koffe, against Pakulzen and Pakbein, two capitains of the westerne Isles, which fled vpon occasion to passe ouer into Koffe, Cathnes and Murrey land, spoiling and waisting those countries; when they heard of anie power comming against them, they would straight returne to their ships, and repasse againe into the Isles. But at this time, the king had sent forth a naute to burne all those islands, wherein the robbers had passed ouer and had left at anchor, by reason whereof when they were inclosed in on euerie side by the king, and taken prisoners, they after had suffered death on the wheele, according to the maner of the ciuill law.

The king in his returne from his iourne, came by the abbey of Abbrothochoke, to view the tower of that house, how it went forwarde, commanding them that were ouersers and maisters of the works to spare for no costs, but to bring it vp to perfection, and that with most magnificence. After his departure from thence, he took the way toward Bertha, and by aduenture espied where Gilcriff was deli-uing vp turfes, together with his two sonnes. And though he knew not what they were, yet he mused to see two such goodly young men, as by resemblance they appeared to be, to be thus occupied in such tolling and base labour. Incontinentlie herewith Gil-criff with his bald head came afore him, and falling downe on his knees at the kings feet, said: If there be anie mercie in thee (most ruthfull prince) for them that are brought through their offenses into extreme miserie, hauing suffered condigne punishment for the same; I beseech thee for the loue that Christ had to all sinfull people, not sparing to shed his most precious blood for their redemption, to haue some pittie & compassion on me, & these my poyr & miserable sons, which with me haue suffered much griefe and penur-rie, not hauing deserued the same by anie crime by the m

The house of the Dgillies

The earle of Laon.

Emengard, 1186.

The peace confirmed with Eng-
land.

The misredic state of Gilcriff.

The castell of Edenburgh
retoyed.

Saladine the Souldane.

King Henrie
purpose to go into the holie land against the Saracens
hindered by rebellion of his sonne.

Pakulzen
and Pakbein captains
of pirates.

Gilcriffs gift
vnto the house of Abbrothochoke.

Death on the wheele.

Abbrothochoke
is builded.

Laws devised by king William against pirates.

Gilcriff deli-
uing clothes.

Gilcriff asked pardon of the king in his known habit.

them committed.

At the last, when king William had inquired of him what he was, and how it chanced he fell into such kind of miserie, the teares came so fast trickling from his eyes, that of a long time he was not able to declare his owne name. At length being come to himselfe, he said: I am Gilcrist (noble prince) the most sorrowfull creature on earth, which (alas) put my hands in thy blood, and was therefore banished of all my lands, and banished with these my two sonnes out of thy realme, whereupon we remained in England for a while, till through proclamation made against outlawes, I was constrained to come hither againe with my said sonnes, where we have lived by roots all the summer season, and now in the winter are glad to get our living with travaill of hand thus in digging and deluing of clods. Therfore if anie ruth or pittie have place in thy heart, or that thine indignation be qualified, have mercie on our sorrowfull estate, and remit the offense, whereby thou maiest not onelie purchase great honor and fame by example of pittie, being highlie renowned for that vertue amongst all nations, but also win great merit afore God, for shewing thy selfe the follower of Christ, the giver of all mercie, grace, and peace.

The king moved by these words, and remembring the good service which Gilcrist had imploied so oftentimes afore in defense of the realme; and againe pitying his case, to consider from what degree of honor he was fallen into the deepest bottome of extreme miserie, he took him wholie to his fauour, and not onelie forgave him his former offenses, but also restored unto him, and to his sonnes, all such lands as sometimes appertained unto them, except so much as the king had already given unto the abbie of Abirbrothoke. Gilcrist euer after persevered in due obedience to his prince. And for so much as his eldest sonne deceased before him without heires, that his younger sonne, by reason of some impediment which he had, was vnmet for marriage, he gaue the most part of his lands after his owne deceasse unto the said house of Abirbrothoke. His younger sonne also, no lesse well affectionated towards the same house, gaue the residue of his lands thereunto. The father and both his sonnes are buried before the altar of S. Batharine within the church of this abbie, as the superscription of their tomes sheweth.

Though king William was earnestlie occupied in the aduancing forward of the building of Abirbrothoke, yet did he not forget his dutie in the administration of his lawes; but diligentlie caused iustice to be executed, to the punishing of the wicked, and the rewarding of them that well deserved. He made also sundrie new lawes for the restraining of thieues and oppressors of the people, so rigorous, that they might be in feare to heare him named. Furthermore, where as the church of Scotland was subiect to the church of Rome, he obtained of pope Clement the third of that name, letters of exemption for his clergie, whereby the church of Scotland (within the which were contained the bishops sees of saint Andrews, Glasco, Dunkeld, Dunblane, Wigborne, Aberdeen, Murray, Ross, and Cathness) was declared exempt from all other forrein iurisdiccions, except onelie from that of the see of Rome, so as it might not be lawfull from thenceforth for any that was not of the realme of Scotland, to pronounce sentence of interdiction or excommunication, or otherwise to deale in iudgement of ecclesiasticall causes, except such one as the apostolicall see of Rome should specially appoint, and send thither with legantine power. The date of the said bull or letters of exemption thus obtained was at the popes palace of Laterane, the third Ides of March, and first parte of the said pope Clements government. Shortly after, to wit in the year 1198, died Henrie king of England, after whom succeeded his second sonne Richard: for Henrie his eldest sonne deceased before his father.

King Richard, after his coronation, prepared him selfe to passe with an armie into the holie land, and therefore made peace with all his neighbors, that no trouble should follow to his realme by reason of his absence: and hereupon to keepe the Scots in friendship, rather by beneuolence than by feare, he restored into their hands the castles of Roxburgh, Berwick, and Sterling: and moreover that part of Northumberland which his father had taken from king William when he took him prisoner. He also deliuered the earledomes of Huntington and Cumberland; but vnder condition, that all the castles and holds within them, should be in the keeping of his captains and souldiours, such as he should appoint. He released to king William also the residue of such summes of monie as were due for the foure castles laid to gage, ten thousand pounds onelie excepted, which he receiued in hand at that present towards the charges of his iourne. When king William had thus receiued his lands and castles by surrender, he made his brother David earle of Huntington, who thereupon doing his homage vnto king Richard, according to the old ordinance devised by king Malcolm the first, went with him also in that voyage with five hundred Scottishmen, or rather five thousand (as the translator of Hector Boetius saith) if no fault be in the printer.

As the christian armie late at siege before the citie of Acres, other wise called Acon, it chanced that one Oliuer a Scottishman borne, was within the towne retained in seruice among the Saracens; for being convict of felonie in his native countrie he was banished out of the same, and fled to the Saracens, remaining so long amongst them, that he had learned their tongue verie perfectlie, so that as then few knew what countreman he was. It fortuned that this Oliuer had one of the gates in keeping, on that side the towne where was but a single wall, without trenches, or anie other fortification. He happened by some good aduventure to espie amongst the watch of those that were of the retinue of David earle of Huntington, one of his owne kinsmen named John Durward, with whom of long time before he had bene most familiarlie acquainted; and incontinently he called to the same Durward, desiring vnder assurance to talke with him. After certaine communication, for that this Oliuer had not as yet bitterlie in his heart renounced the christian faith, he appointed with Durward to giue entrie at acerteine houre vnto earle David, and to all the christian armie, vpon condition that earle David would see him restored againe vnto his land and heritage in Scotland. The houre set, earle David came with a great power of men to the gate before reherced, where he was suffered to enter according to appointment, and incontinently with great noise and clamour brake into the midst of the citie.

In the morning betimes, king Richard perceiuing the citie thus wonne, entered the same, and shortly after wane a tower, which the Saracens for a while manfullie defended. Thus was the citie of Acres wonne from the Saracens, chieflie by means of the Scottishmen. But now touching their returne from this voyage (for sith in other places more large mention is made of such exploits as were atchiued therein, I passe ouer to make anie longer discourse thereof in this place) ye shall vnderstand, that in that terrible tempest, in the which king Richards nauie was dispersed in his coming homewards (as in the

The death of Henrie king of England.

R. Richard?

The castles of Roxburgh, Berwick, and Sterling restored to king William.

Earle of Huntington. Scots with king Richard in the holie land.

The siege of Acres. Oliuer a Scottishman.

John Durward.

Earle David entered the citie Acon.

the house of the Douglas
The castle of Lam.
Emengard.
1186.
The peace confirmed with England.
The miserieable state of Gilcrist.
The castle of Edinburgh restored.
Saladine the Souldane.
King Henrie purpose to go into the holie land against the Saracens hindered by rebellion of his sonne.
Ababuyen and Ababern captiues of pirates.
Death on the wharfe.
Abirbrothoke is builded.
Gilcrist deliuing clods.
Gilcrist aske pardon of the king in his knowne habit.

the house of the Douglas
The castle of Lam.
Emengard.
1186.
The peace confirmed with England.
The miserieable state of Gilcrist.
The castle of Edinburgh restored.
Saladine the Souldane.
King Henrie purpose to go into the holie land against the Saracens hindered by rebellion of his sonne.
Ababuyen and Ababern captiues of pirates.
Death on the wharfe.
Abirbrothoke is builded.
Gilcrist deliuing clods.
Gilcrist aske pardon of the king in his knowne habit.

10

20

30

40

50

60

Earle David
taken prisoner
he is redeemed.

He went to Scotland.

Arrived at Dundee.

The name of Dundee.

Procession
was holden.

A church
built.

Privileges granted to the towns of Dundee.

The abbey of Lundor.

Woods without hurt.

R. Richards
returne into England.

The gift of
king William to king Richard.

A brute reled that the king
was dead.

the historie of Eng'and is moze at large exprest) the ship also that earle David was in, chanced to be thowne on land on the coasts of Aegypt, where being taken prisoner, and led into Alexandria, at length he was redeemed by certeine merchants of Venice, and first conueied vnto Constantinople, and after vnto Venice, where he was bought out & redeemed by the English merchants, and in the end suffered to depart home. At his comming into Flanders, he hired a vessell at Sluis, thertwith to returne into Scotland; but being losed a little off from the shore, such a vehement tempest suddenly arose, that droue him, not without great danger of life, nere to the coasts of Fozwaie and Shetland.

Here in the midst of this extreame leoparchie (as hath bene reported) after he had made a vow to build a church in the honoz of the virgin Marie, if he might escape that danger of seas, he arrived at length in Taie water beside Dundee, not far from saint Nicholas chappell, without either rudder or tackle. The place where he arrived before that time hight Aledum, but he as then changed the name, and called it Dundee, which signifieth as though ye should say, The gift of God. When his brother the king heard that he was returned, supposing long time before, that he had bene dead, he came speedilie vnto Dundee to welcome him home, shewing him selfe most glad of his returne, inso much that he caused publike processions to be celebrate through the realme, to giue God thanks that had thus restored his brother home into his countrie. Earle David, according as he had vowed, builded a church in the field commonlie called the wheat field, and dedicating it in honoz of the virgin Marie, made it a parish church. At a parlement also holden after this at Dundee, licence was granted vnto him to build an abbey in what place it shuld please him within Scotland, and to indow it with lands and rents as he should thinke good. There were also manie privileges granted the same time vnto Dundee, which indure to this day.

Earle David not refusing the grant and beneuolence of the king his brother, builded an abbey called Lundor, for monks of the order of saint Benet. One thing there is much to be wondered at, as a strange singularitie. For whereas that house standeth in a vallie, inclosed on each side with wood and water, by reason whereof there is great abundance of adders; yet doth no man catch hurt by anie of them, inso much that ye shall see yong children play and run vp and downe amongst a great number of them, without anie skath or hurt following vnto them thereof. In this meane while, Richard king of England (who also in his returne out of the holie land was taken prisoner by the emperor of Almanie) was deliuered for a great summe of monie, and so returned into his countrie. King William hearing of king Richards returne into England, to congratulate the same, toke his brother earle David with him, and came vnto London, where, in token of ioy, that he had vnto him conceived for his safe comming home, after all troubles and dangers which he had passed, he gaue vnto him two thousand markes sterling, for that he knew at what great charges he had bene, aswell for furnishing of his baggage, as also for redeeming of his libertie.

By these friendlie points of humanitie shewed, there followed great amitie and loue betwixt these two kings. But king William fell sicke in England, and as it often happeneth, such as were vniquiet persons, desirous to be deliuered of all feare of lawes, were straight way put in an vntrue beliefe, that he was dead: and causing it to be bouted abroad, began to exercise all kind of misdeemeanors by innading the poore and simple people, with spoilings and slaughters in all parts. But after it was certeinlie knowne, that the king was not onelie alive, but also recovered of his infirmite, and comming homeward, those raskals and wicked rebels withouthinder the conduct of one Herald the thane of Cathnes, and erle of Orkenie, vnto the bittermost bounds of Scotland. Howbeit the king pursued them in such diligent and earnest maner, that he apprehended the most part of them in Cathnes, and commanded iustice to be done on them, in such wise, that mercie was not yet wanting: for such as were thought to be after a sort gilllesse, were pardoned, and the other punished, euerie one according to the measure of his offenses.

But the principall leader of them, that is to say, the forenamed Herald, for that time escaped into the westerne Isles, but shortly after, returning to Cathnes, he was taken and brought to the king, who caused his eies first to be put out, then gelded, and lastlie to be hanged on a paire of gallows. Also all those of his linage that were men, were likewise gelded, that no succession should follow of so wicked a seed. In the yere next ensuing was more dearely felt in Scotland, than euer was heard of before: for a measure of barlie, in Scottish called a boll, was sold for five crownes; and yet in the yere next following, accounting from the natiuitie of our Sauioz 1199, was moze plentiful abundance than euer had bene scene afore. The same yere king Williams wife Ermengard was deliuered of a yong sonne named Alexander. The same yere also died Richard king of England, & his brother John succeeded in his place. About thre yeres after this, was the foresaid Alexander the kings sonne created prince of Scotland. And the same yere came a legat from the pope sent to R. William, presenting vnto him a sword, with a sheath & hilts of gold set full of rich pretious stones. He presented vnto him also a hat or bonet, made in manner of a diadem of purple hue, in token (as it should meane) that he was defender of the church. Manie indulgences and priuileges were granted at the same time by the pope, for the libertie of the church of Scotland. It was ordeined also the same time, that saturdaye should be kept as holidaye from none forward, and great punishment appointed for them that transgressed this ordinance, in doing anie bodilie worke from saturdaye at none, vntill mondaye in the morning.

After this, king William returned againe into England to do his homage vnto king John, for the lands of Cumberland, Huntington, and Possum, berland. Immediatlie whereupon king John willed him to passe with him into France, to make warres against the Frenchmen. And because he refused so to do, king John made claime to all the foresaid lands as forfeited to the crowne of England, and caused a great bootie of goods to be fetched out of the same: so that open warres had immediatlie followed, if the English lords had not compelled R. John to make restitution of all the goods so taken; because they thought it not expedient in anie wise to haue wars with the Scots at the same time, being already in trouble with the Frenchmen. In the winter following, the frost was so behement, & continued so long, that till mid March, no plough might be put into the ground. Ale was frozen in such wise within houses, and cellars, that it was sold by weight. Such a great snow fell also therewith, that beasts died in manie places in great numbers. Moreover, from the Twelfth tide till Februarye, there was euerie day verie terrible earthquakes.

After the end of winter, king John having made an end of his warres with France, began to build a castell

Herald then
of Cathnes successor of rebels.

Judice was delivered of mercies.

He then
of Cathnes
taken.
Seuerer punishment.

Great want

1199

Alexander
prince of Scotland.

A legat
from the pope

A hat.

Defender of the church.

Saturdaye
was kept holidaye.

King William
did homage king John
England.

John healed
R. William.

Archbishop
by king William.

Tradition
of the
of the

towne of the power
of the

Earthquake

King in
of the

acasse upon p
the S sent h
him to nie oc ceined
he alle
king 3
the sa
offere forwar ders, h
to rece
howbe matte
ther si repair
these c ters to then n pled in
of kin
if the c for th
am th
which raced,
red, an sure p
two k
were king
king of ton, an signe ander.
to the
know holder
the sam
Pozke
gular
great with d
was c corrup
was d he had could n trouble incure crosse
By rea
done b God, t notifie
A
indow rod ho faire p by him
one ne ficient tation
of Ber
but the
and in that th
were b drowne themse wife, a

acastell in Northumberland ouer against Berwikke, upon purpose to haue some quarell to fall out with the Scots: King William being aduertised thereof, sent his ambassadores vnto king John, requiring him to desist from such attempts, and not to seke any occasion of new trouble: but forsomuch as he received no towardlie answer againe from him, John, he assembled a power, & comming to the castell which king John had caused to be builded, he ouerthrew the same, and rased it to the earth. King John so offended herewith, raised a mightie armie, and came towards Scotland, but at his comming to the borders, he found his aduersarie king William ready to receiue him by battell, if he had come forward; howbeit through mediation of prudent men, the matter was taken vp betwixt them, so that on either side the armies were dissolved, & both the kings repairing to Porke, established a peace there, with these conditions, that Margaret and Isabell daughters to king William, after the tearme of 9 yeres then next ensuing were once expired, should be coupled in marriage with Henrie and Richard the sons of king John, vpon this paction and covenant, that if the one died, the other should succeed to the crowne. For the which it was covenanted, that king William should giue a right large dower. Also the castell which king John had builded, and king William rased, it was agreed that it should remaine so defaced, and neuer after againe to be repaired. For the sure performance of these articles thus betwixt the two kings concluded, nine noble men of Scotland were appointed to be deliuered as hostages vnto king John. In that assemblee there at Porke, king William also surrendered into the hands of king John, the lands of Cumberland, Huntington, and Northumberland; to the intent he should assigne those lands againe vnto his sonne prince Alexander, and he to doe homage for the same, according to the maner and custome in that case prouided, for a knowledge and recognition that those lands were holden of the kings of England, as superior lordes of the same. During the abode of these two kings at Porke, there was brought vnto them a child of singular beautie, sonne and heire to a gentleman of great possessions in those parties, being soe bered with diuerse and sundrie diseases; for one of his eyes was consumed & lost through an issue which it had of corrupt and filthie humors, the one of his hands was dried vp; the one of his feet was so taken, that he had no vse thereof; and his tong likewise that he could not speake. The physicians that saw him thus troubled with such contrarie infirmities, iudged him incurable. Hewerthelesse, king William making a crowle on him, refozed him immediatlie to health. By reason thereof, manie beleued that this was done by miracle, through the power of almightie God, that the vertue of so godlie a prince might be notified to the world.

After his returne from Porke into Scotland, he indowed the churches of Melbottell, Melros, Polirhod house, Dunfirmling, and Aberdeen, with manie faire possessions, as the letters patents made therof by him beare manifest testimonie. He also erected one new bishops see called Argile, giuing thereto sufficient lands towards the maintenance and sustentation thereof. After this, comming vnto the towne of Bertha, he had not remained there manie daies, but there chanced such a flood, by reason of the rising and inundation of the two riuers, Tait & Almond, that through violence of the streame the towne wals were borne downe, and much people in the towne drowned, yer they could make any thist to saue themselves, inso much that though the king with his wife, and the most part of his familie escaped out of that great danger and leoparchie, his yongest sonne yet named John, with his nurse and twelue other women perished, and twentie other of his seruants beside. There was heard such clamor, noise, & lamentable cries, with bitter rolings and dreadfull thylkings, as is used in time when any towne is suddenly taken and surprized by the enemies: for as the comon prouerbe witnesseth; Fier & water haue no mercie; and yet of these two, water is moze terrible and dangerous: for there is no force or wit of man able to resist the violence of inundations, where they suddenlye breake in.

King William, after that the towne of Bertha was thus destroyed and ouerslowed with water; began the foundation of an other towne, which was after called Perth, by a man of that name that ougtht the ground where the same towne was builded. Furthermore, to aduance the dignitie and augmentation of this towne, the king granted sundrie benefittall priuileges and freedoms thereto, that it might the sooner rise in riches and wealth. The first foundation thereof was laid after the incarnation of our Saviour 1210 yeres, but the name was changed afterwards, and called saint Johns towne, which name it beareth even vnto this day. About the same time there rose efflones new trouble in Cathnes, for one Gothzed the sonne of Makulzen (of whose rebellion ye haue heard before) spoiled with often incursions and rode the countrie of Rosse, and other bounds thereabouts. His companie increased daillie moze and moze, by repaire of such number of rebels as came vnto him out of Lochquhaber, & the westerne Isles. King William, to repress these attempts, sent forth the carles of Fife and Atholl, with the thane of Buchquhane, hauing six thousand in their companie; the which incountring with the enemies in set battell, gaue them the ouerthrow, and taking Gothzed their chiefe captaine prisoner, brought him vnto the king, who caused both him and diuerse other which were likewise taken prisoners, to lose their heads. Gothzed himselfe was soe wounded, before he was taken; so that if his takers had not made the more speed in the conueieng of him to the king, he had died of his hurts before execution had thus bene done on him accordinglie as was appointed.

About this time arose the dissention and variance betwixt John king of England, and pope Innocent the third, for that the English cleargie refused to aid the said John with such summes of monie as he demanded of them. Shortlie after, William king of Scotland, woone with long age, departed out of this world at Striueling, in the 74 yere of his age, and in the 49 yere of his reigne, and after the incarnation of Christ 1214 yeres. He was buried in Aberbrothoke, before the high altar within the quier. The yere afore his death, two comets or blasing starres appeared in the moneth of March, verie terrible to behold; the one did shine before the rising of the sunne, and the other before the going downe thereof. The yere next following, there was a colt in Northumberland that calued a verie monstrous calfe; for the head and necke resembled a verie calfe in ded, but the residue of the bodie was like vnto a colt. In the winter after, there were seene also two mones in the firmament, the one being seuered from the other, and in shape naturallie horned, as ye see the moone in hir increasing or wanting. King William in his life time founded the abbeye of Balmernoch, but his wife queene Ermengard indowed it with lands and possessions after his deceasse. In the 46 yere of this king Williams reigne, two monks of the Trinitie order were sent into Scotland by pope Innocent, to whome king William gaue his palace roiall in Aberdeen, to conuert the same into an abbeye for them

John & kings son drowned.

The towne of Perth builded

Freedom granted to the towne of Perth

Saint Johns towne. Gothzed made a rebellion in Cathnes.

His companie increaseth.

The carles of Fife and Atholl sent against him. The rebels ouerthrowne. Gothzed taken and beheaded.

The dissention betweene the pope and king John. The cause.

The death of king William.

1214.

Two blasing starres.

A monstrous calfe.

Two mones.

The abbeye of Balmernoch founded.

to inhabit: and was in mind to haue giuen them manie other bountifull gifts, if he had liued anie longer time.

Alexander.

Alexander the second is crowned at Scone. A time of mourning.

A parlement at Edinburgh

Confirmation of officers.

The office of the constable.

The lands of Forfair given to the old queene. A princelie appointment.

Dissention betwixt king John and his nobles.

King Alexander passeth to London.

The league betwixt France and Scotland renewed.

The best appointed officers affirme that Lewes went not ouer into France, till after the death of king John. Lewes and king Alexander accursed. A counsell at Rome.

After the deceasse of king William, his sonne Alexander the second of that name succeeded, and was crowned at Scone with all due solemnitie, which being finished, he went vnto Ayrborthoke, where he remained 14 daies, in attending the funerall obsequies of his father, and commanded that no publike plaies nor great feasts should be vsed or kept in all that yeere; to the intent the death of his father might be lamented throughe the whole realme. The king himselfe, and all his seruants also, were clothed in mourning weed, during the space of one whole yeere. The first parlement which he called, was holden at Edinburgh, in the which he confirmed all the acts and ordinaunces deuised by his father: and further appointed that all such as had bozne offices vnder him, should still introy the same. Namelie he commanded that William Wood bishop of Dunblaine should still continue lord chancellor, and Alane of Galloway high constable, which is an office of most honor & reputation next to the king, as he that hath power of life and death, if anie man draw bloud of an other by violence within two miles of the court.

When this parlement was ended, because the old queene his mother determined to remaine, during the residue of hir life, in the place where that holie woman queene Margaret sometime led hir life, he gaue vnto hir towards the maintenance of hir estate, the castles & townes of Forfair, with the lands and possessions to the same belonging. He also appointed certeine sage and most graue personages, to be chosen forth as iudges, which should be resident in euerie citie and god towne of his realme, for the hearing and due determining of all quarrels and matters in controuersie betwixt partie and partie. In this meane time great dissention rose betwixt John king of England, and his barons, by reason whereof great warres ensued, as in the English historie doth appere. The barons made sute both to the French king, & to the king of Scots for aid, so that at length Lewes the French kings sonne came ouer to support them, whereof wher king Alexander was aduertised, he likewise came with an armie through England vnto London, causing his souldiers by the waie to abstaine from doing anie kind of damage to the people. By his comming things were partlie quieted for a time, and shortly after that he had communed with Lewes touching sundrie affaires pertaining to both the realmes, they passed the seas with ten vessels ouer into France, leauing their powers behind them to assist the English lords.

The French king aduertised thereof, came downe to Bulhonne, where finding his son and king Alexander, he renewed the ancient bond of amitie betwixt France and Scotland, with the same Alexander, according to the coucnants of the old league, with this addition; that neither prince should receiue the enimies of the others realme, nor to marrie with anie stranger, the one not making the other priuie thereto. These things being ratified, king Alexander and Lewes returned into England: shortly whereupon, king John died, more through anguish of mind and melancholie, than by force of anie other naturall disease. His son Henrie, the third of that name, succeeded him. And in the meane time had the pope accursed both Lewes, and king Alexander, with all those that fauoured their cause against king John, which curse was pronounced in a generall counsell, which was holden at Rome by pope Innocent, there being present foure hundred and twelue bishops, and eight hundred abbats. King Alexander after the deceasse of king John, returning homewards with his armie, thought he might haue passed quietlie without anie annoyance by the waie, through meanes whereof he lost a certeine number of his men, being suddenly inuaded by such Englishmen, as watched their time to take the Scots at some aduantage, in strating abroad out of order: with which iniurie king Alexander was so moued, that he spoiled and harried all the countries by the which he passed, till he was entered within the confines of his owne dominion.

Shortly after, Cardinall Gualo came into England furnished with the popes authoritie, to denounce the excommunication aboute remembered, against Lewes and Alexander, with all their sanctozs, whereupon he accursed not onelie the foresaid persons, but also interdicted all the places where they came, in so much that in the end Lewes was constrained to buy an absolution with no small summes of monie, of that auaricious cardinall Gualo: and after vpon agreement also made with king Henrie, he returned into France. Not long after came king Henrie with an armie into Scotland, to be indamaging the countrie: but so sone as he was aduertised that king Alexander had assembled all the power of his realme to giue him battell, he retired with all speed into England. The king of England had in his armie at the same time 1200 men of armes, verie perfectlie appointed and furnished with armor and weapon as was requisit, and the king of Scots but onelie five hundred. But of footmen there were in the Scottis armie 60000 able personages well appointed, with ares, speares, and bowes, readie to die and liue with their prince, constantlie beleuing, that to lose this present life here in his defense, was an assured waie to be saued in an other world.

After that king Henrie was gone backe into England, king Alexander followed after him into Northumberland, where he ouerthrew & beat downe manie castles and strengths, which the Englishmen held. Then marching through the countrie vnto Carlisle, he wan that citie, and garnished it with his people. After this, laing siege vnto Forham castell, when he had continued at the same a certeine time, and perceiued how he lost but his trauell, he left it, and returned home with great honor and triumph for his other atchieued enterprises in that iournie. King Henrie being once aduertised that king Alexander had broken by his campe, incontinentlie got his people togither, and coming to Berwik, wan both the towne and castell. After entring into Scotland, he burned and spoiled the countrie along by the sea coasts, till he came as farre as Haddington, putting all such to the sword as were found in the waie; women, priests, and children onelie excepted. He assaied to haue wone the castell of Dunbar, but missing his purpose there, he returned into England.

In the meane time, the auaritious prelat Gualo, vpon trust to purchase some large portcion of monie in Scotland, put the same vnder proccesse of interdicting, & namelie he accursed king Alexander most terrible, for that he had inuaded England, and (as he alleged) spoiled churches as well as prophane places. These curses so inflamed the hearts of the Scottis men with hatred against the Englishmen, that the same was not like to haue ended without the utter destruction and ruine of both their realmes. Neuerthelesse at length, by the diligent trauell of the bishops of Forke and Salisburie, which came vnto king Alexander to treate an agreement, a final peace was concluded, vnder these conditions. First it was agreed, that king Alexander should render the citie of Carlisle into the Englishmens hands, and king Henrie the towne of Berwik vnto the Scots. The whole dominion of Cumberland to remaine vnto king Alexander, with the one halfe Cardinall Gualo.

Lewes returned into France. King Henrie inuadeth Scotland.

Ex codice t. quo S. Albanus, scriptum Mat. Paris. 3 take it.

The marriage of Cardinall Gualo.

King Alexander in Northumberland.

Cardinall Gualo comes to a somme of monie.

The Scottis bishops absolved.

David earle of Huntingdon deceased.

1219.

An interview betwixt the kings of England and Scotland.

Springes concluded.

Scotland subdued.

A legat sent from pope Innocent for a collection.

Bishops of Forke and Salisburie.

A peace concluded.

The conditions.

Another legat.

halfe of Northumberland, to the Kierosse. And further, that king Alexander should be absolved of the censures of the church, which Gualo the cardinall had denounced against him.

Thus the two kings being accorded, the two foresaid bishops comming into Berwick, absolved king Alexander, and delivered his realme of interdiction, by such authoritie as they had procured of the cardinall Gualo. But yet the same cardinall, not minding to depart with emptie hands, summoned all the prelates of Scotland to appeare before him at Antwerp, there to receive their full absolution, to the intent by such means to trouble them, till they had disbursed to his use some large portion of monie. Sundrie of them which loved quietnesse more than contention, satisfied his mind; but others refused utterly so to do, taking great indignation that spirituall causes were thus dispatched for monie, and ecclesiasticall preferments bought and sold, no other wise than secular possessions and prophane dignities. Incontinentlie thereupon Gualo cited them to Rome, supposing that rather than to take upon them so long a iourne, they would have compounded with him at his pleasure. Notwithstanding they being nothing in doubt thereof, went unto Rome, and at their comming thither, made unto the pope their complaint in most gréuous manner, of the insufferable injuries attempted in England and Scotland, by his most covetous legat the foresaid Gualo: by reason of which complaint, and of sundrie such letters & informations as daile came out of England and Scotland, from other bishops & abbats, containing right gréuous accusations, concerning the insatiable avarice of Gualo, the pope reuked him home to Rome, to make answer in his presence unto such matters as were laid to his charge.

At his returne thither, for so much as he was not able to discharge himselfe of such manifest crimes wherewith he was burdened, the pope condemned him in a great summe of monie, to be paid as a fine for his trespasses and transgressions. And those Scottish bishops, which were come for their absolution, were absolved by the pope, and suffered to depart in peace. In this meane time, David earle of Huntingdon, brother to William late king of Scots, (of whome ye have heard before how he went in the iourne made by the christian princes into the holic land) deceased, and was buried within an abbey in England. Henrie king of England, after he came to yeares of perfect discretion, shewed himselfe to be more desirous of peace than of warres. Whereupon at Berke there was a meeting appointed betwixt him and king Alexander, where mutuall alliance was accorded betwixt them on this wise. Jane the sister of king Henrie was promised to be given in marriage to king Alexander, and two sisters of king Alexanders were despoised unto two great princes of the English nobilitie. These marriages were thus concluded in the yeare of our Lord, 1220.

In the yeare next following, came a legat unto Scotland from pope Honorius, with bulls to gather a summe of monie towards the furnishing forth of an armie against the Turks or rather Saracens. This legat was a cardinall, and named Egidius, who having purchased no small quantitie of coine both of the cleargie and laitie of Scotland, spent the same in riot and outrageous insolencie, making his cruise at his returne to Rome, how it was taken from him by certaine Brigants and robbers. Whilke in short tyme after, was an other legat with semblable commission sent into Scotland from the foresaid pope. But king Alexander, being advertised of his coming, called a counsell, in the which one of the bishops (as should serve) took great indignation, to see how covetousnesse reigned in most shamefull wise amongst the Romish legats, and spake in manner as followeth.

Albeit sundrie considerations there are which might stay me from deterring such things as be most prejudiciall to the common wealth, yet (most noble prince) when I consider thine humanitie, faith, and constancie, given to nothing more than to the defence and weale of thy true liege people, I cannot but (for the zeale I beare to common libertie) declare the truth. For sith all manner of tyrannie is intollerable, yea even that which is exercised by kings or princes descended by lineall succession to their rightfull heritage: much more is that tyrannie to be detested, which is exercised by men of vile and base linage. Therefore, if the sundrie and manifest wrongs done to us these manie yeares passed, had come by the popes the miselnes, the same might somewhat more sufferable have bene borne: but sith naughtie & vile persons, of base birth and obscure linage, promoted to benefices and ecclesiasticall dignities onelie for their wicked and horrible vices, have not onelie interdicted our realme, with our lawfull commission; but have also consumed in maintenance of their wanton and insolent vices, that monie which they gathered in our countrie by the popes authoritie, under colour of raising an armie to go against the Turks and Infidels, I am of this opinion that their cursed avarice ought to have no further place amongst faithful people, speciallie amongst us, whose simplicitie and humblenesse they have in contempt. In the yeares passed, ye complained of the injuries done by Gualo, when he had put your realme under the censure of interdicting, and the most part of your prelates under the curse; because they would not answer him with monie according to his covetous demands, wherewith he might mainteine his outrageous lusts. Which Gualo also (as should appeare) by most certeine coniesures, was of such a diuelish nature, that though he were sent to treat a concord betwixt the Englishmen and Scots; yet to satissie his avaritious desire, he manifested such occasion of warre betwixt them, that both the realmes (had not the matter bene the way taken up) were at a point to have entered so far into malicious hatred the one against the other, that it was not like that any peace should have taken place, till the one or both had bene utterlie destroyed. But since these heinous and terrible deeds are manifest enough; to what end should I here remember them, sith the same cannot be done without your great griefe and displeasure? Moreover, after we were delivered of this Gualo, shortly after cometh another, one shewing himselfe to come forth of the same shop; for in conversation of life he was to be indged no whit better, but rather worse: for after that he had got up amongst us of this realme large summes of monie, under pretense of redeeming the christian prisoners out of the Saracens hands, and waging of new armies against them; he wasted the same monie in riotous lust and insolencie, feining, when it was gone, that it was bereft him by Brigants. Therefore sith we have had experience, and are already sufficientlie taught by the doings of the two fore-remembered legats, to our heemie griefs and no small damages; we may be indubitablely reported to have and verie soles in deed, if we now admit the thirde. For it is not to be thought, that this new legat shall use the matter in any better sort, than his fellows have done before him. And verelie, if any man should demand of me, what I thinke ought to be done in this matter, I do for my part protest, that neither this legat, nor any other in times to come, the with- King Alexander means n, being der returneth into his countrie. watched tage, in rie king and harri- l he was inion. to Eng- nounce against 3, where- sons, but ne, info, ed to buy onie, of r upon a returned rie with the coun- king Alexander's realme ped into armie at perfectlie eapon as nelie fine e Scottish ted, with line with o lose this ured waie

The cleargie of Scotland summoned by cardinall Gualo to come to Antwerp.

Ex codice an- tiquo S. Albanii, scriptum by Mat. Paris (I take it.)

The Scottish king cited to Rome.

The com- plaint of the Scottish cleargie to the pope.

The avarice of cardinall Gualo.

Cardinall Gualo con- demned in a summe of mo- nie.

The Scottish bishops absolved.

David earle of Huntingdon deceased.

1219.

David earle of Huntingdon deceased.

Marriages concluded.

A legat sent from pope Honorius by commission.

Legat sent from pope Honorius by commission.

Legat sent from pope Honorius by commission.

Legat sent from pope Honorius by commission.

In nation of a bishop.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

tyrannie in- tollerable.

come, ought to be receiued within this realme, considering how the same hath bene wasted & robbed by their continuall exactions. If there be anie amongst you that hath more monie than he knoweth which way well to spend, he may (in the name of God) bestow it vpon the poore, rather than to the vse of such vicious legats, as order it in such sort, that all men haue cause to thinke that soener commeth into their hands, is but cast away and clearelye lost.

Legats cannot be received.

These words of this bishop (whatsoeuer he was) were liked so well of all the counsell, that the legat could not be receiued into the realme. After the breaking vp of this counsell, the marriage was consummat betwixt king Alexander and Ione, sister to Henrie king of England; also betwixt Hubert de Burgh high iustice of England, and Margaret sister to king Alexander, by reason of which mariages, the peace was confirmed with the Englishmen, and as it had bene sealed by for a more full and certaine assurance. Shortly after followed ciuill warres in Scotland, by the motion of one Gilespie Rosse, who hauing liued most licentiouslie in riotous outrage, at length arreared open warre against the king, and first sleaung diuerse such of his companions as had kept him companie aforesaid in his lewd misdemeanors, for that they refused now to sticke to him in this rebellious enterprize, he went with the residue that offered to take his part vnto the towne of Cnuernes, which he toke and burned, with diuerse other places being of the kings possessions, till at length John Cumin earle of Buchquhane coming against him with an armie deliuered to him by the king, pursued the said Gilespie in such earnest wise, that finally he toke him with two of his sons, and striking off all their three heads, sent the same to the king as a witness how he had sped.

Peace confirmed with the Englishmen. Gilespie Rosse a rebel.

Cnuernes burned by Gilespie Rosse. John Cumin earle of Buchquhane. Gilespie Rosse beheaded.

New trouble.

Adam bishop of Cathnes slaine by the people of that countrie.

Streight execution.

The stonie hill.

The earle of Cathnes lost his lands.

King Alexander commended of the pope.

The privileges of Aberdeen.

The archdeacon of Dunferm.

This businesse being thus quieted, an other ensued after this maner: The men of Cathnes soze offended with their bishop named Adam, for that vpon refusal to pay their tithes he had accursed them, fell vpon him within his owne house, and first scourging him with rods, at length set fire vpon him and burnt him within his owne kitchen. Which act being reported to the king, as then sojourning at Edinburgh, he hasted forth with all speed to punish the offenders, not ceasing till he had taken foure hundred of them, all the which number he caused to be hanged; and for that he would haue no succession to come of such a wicked seed, he appointed all their sons to lose their stonies. The place where they were so gelded, is called euen to this day the stonie hill. The earle of Cathnes, for that he neither succoured the bishop in time of need, nor yet sought to punish the offenders that did this cruell deed, was deprived of his earldome, and the lands belonging to the same. The pope highly commended king Alexander for this punishment taken of them, that had so cruellie murdered their bishop.

After this, king Alexander coming vnto Aberdeen, gaue manie large gifts and priuileges thereunto, although the same before this time inioined sundry notable commodities and endowments giuen and confirmed by other kings his predecessors. The lands which were granted by sundrie popes concerning the liberties of the churches in Scotland, were confirmed by the king to the custodie of one Gilbert archdeacon of Dunferm, who succeeded next after the deceased Adam in the see of Cathnes. In the third year after, as king Alexander with his mother Ermentrude were sitting at their banquet on the twelfth day of Christmas, another also called Adam, the earle of Cathnes, hauing good opportunity thereto, presented himselfe before the king, and besought him of grace and pardon for his passed offense. King

Alexander taking ruth & pittie of him, restored him (vpon his fine to be paid in maner as was agreed betwixt them) vnto all his former honors, lands and possessions. Neuertheless the offense that was pardoned by man, was afterward punished by the iust judgement (as some thought) of almighty God: for he was slaine as he lay in bed one night by his own meniall seruants, whome he had roughlie intreated, as the same went. The house also wherein he was thus slaine, was likewise set on fire and burnt ouer him, that no man should haue suspicion of his slaughter, but that it might seeme as though it had come by some sudden aduenture.

About this time, or somewhat before, there came into Scotland (sent by saint Dominicke) certeine blacke friers, of which order the same Dominicke was the first author. These men that were first sent by him, liued according to his institution, more perfectlie than such as followed: for as it often happeneth, althings commonlie from a good beginning fall into worse estate, so that the successors of those men declined from all good religion, into most insolent abuses and misorders, and so continuing in vicious liuing the space of three hundred yeares, at length were perfectlie reformed into a better rule, by a frier named John Adamson, that proceeded doctor in the profession of diuinitie in the vniuersitie of Aberdeen, at the same time that Hector Boetius the Scottish chronographer proceeded there in the same facultie. On the same maner, about the selfe same time, were sent into Scotland, as well as into all other parts of the christian world, friers minors, of saint Francis his order. Manie of them also after his deceasse fell to dissolute liuing, keeping no such strict rules, as both he prescribed, and also obserued.

But now to returne to the residue of the historie. The Scottish people inioied peace a long time after the appeasing of the trouble in Cathnes, till time that Alane lord of Galloway and constable of Scotland departed out of this life; and for that he had diuided his lands before his death amongst his three daughters, his bastard sonne gathered an armie of 10000 men, in hope to attaine the possession of Galloway by force of armes; but at length, after he had wrought much scath in the countrie by his violent inuasion, he was slaine with five thousand of those that toke his part, by the earle of March, and Walter Stewart of Dunwald, which was sent against him with a power. The eldest daughter of the aboue mentioned Alane of Galloway, was giuen in marriage vnto Roger Quincie earle of Winchester, who after his father in lawes deceasse, was made constable of Scotland, which office continued in the hands of his succession, till king Robert the second his daies; in whose time this Roger of Quincies posteritie was disinherited and extinguished, for certeine offenses committed against the kings maiestie, and then afterwards the office of the constable was giuen to the Haies of Arroll. The second daughter of the foresaid Alane was married vnto John Balliol; & the third to the earle of Albemarle. Thus was the lordship of Galloway diuided into three, by reason whereof the inhabitants of that countrie, taking displeasure therewith, cleaued vnto the aboue mentioned bastard, till he was vanquished and slaine, as before ye haue heard. This trouble being appeased thus within the realme, & Alexander was aduertised of great diuision rising betwixt king Henrie of England and his nobles, and therefore to helpe towards an agreement betwixt them, he went to London with his wife queene Iane, and Iabell his sister. Although his earnest diligence, all the debates and quarels were removed, and the parties thoroughlie accorded. Which being done, he married

The earle of Cathnes is pardoned and restored to his lands.

The earle of Cathnes is murdered by his seruants.

The first coming of blacke friers into Scotland.

John Adamson.

The first coming of friers minors.

The death of Alane lord of Galloway.

His bastard sonne raised a commotion.

The earle of March.

Roger Quincie earle of Winchester constable of Scotland.

The diuision of the lands of Galloway.

Embassadors sent to France.

Scottishmen that went with Alexander king of France into Egypt.

Iabell the sister of king Alexander married to the earle of Norfolk. Iane queene of Scotland beheaded.

King Alexander married the daughter of the lord of Conche. John Cumin earle of Buchquhane departed this life.

Patrick earle of Arroll murdered.

John Balliol suspected.

A commotion of the clergy at saint Johns towne.

Homerleids slaine of the rebels.

Homerleids humble submission.

A castle begun to be builded by king Henrie against Berwick. March Paris disagreeeth from the Scottish, touching the occasion of this warre, as in the English chronicles ye may read.

Embassadors sent to France.

Scottishmen that went with Alexander king of France into Egypt.

married Mabel his sister into the earle of Northfolke, and in the meane time his wife quene Jane deceassed, without leauing anie issue behind hir, which chance caused the king hir husband to returne with great griefe and lamentation into Scotland. In the yeare next following, which was after the incarnation 1239, king Alexander (because he had no succession begot of his bodie) married at Rockburgh the daughter of Ingelram lord of Coucie, a virgine of excellent beautie named Marie, on whome he got a sonne named Alexander, which succeeded after his deceasse in the gouernement of the realme.
 About the same time, John Cumyn earle of Angus, being sent in ambassage to Lewes the French king, died by the way. Also at Haddington was holden a roiall toynament, where knights and esquires aduanced themselues by valiant prowesse to win honor: neuerthelesse the end of all that pleasure and pastime ended in sorow. For Patrike Cumyn earle of Atholl was slaine within his lodging in the night, and the house set on fire and burned ouer him, to the intent no suspicion should rise, but that it happened by some euill misfortune, and negligence of fire. But yet was John Bissart, with Walter Bissart his uncle thewoldie suspected for the matter, inasmuch that though no euident profe could be had against him, yet were they banished the realme, and lost all their goods by confiscation to the kings vse. After these things were thus passed, a conuocation was called of the cleargie at saint Johns towne. In the which were diuerse prouinciall ordinaunces and statutes, made by consent of the king and nobles of the realme, which were obserued in the church of Scotland vnto these late daies. About the same time also, one Somerleith thane of Argile, the sonne of that Somerleith of whome ye haue heard before, following his fathers steps, rebelled against the king, soe indamaging by codes & forages the parts bordering vpon the confines of his countrie of Argile, till at length the earle of March brought him to the bzinke of such extreme necessitie, that he was faine to yeld himselfe, with a cord about his necke in token of submission; and being so brought before the king, obtained pardon of his heinous offense.
 In the same season, Henrie king of England, prouoked by the setting on of such seditious persons remaining in his court, as trusted by wars to aduance their priuat gaine (during which time law and iustice haue no place) began to build a castell iust against Berwik, in the same place where the other was begun afore by king Richard, which (as before is shewed) was rased and throwen downe by king William, by the articles of agreement with covenant that it should neuer be builded by againe.
 This attempt of the Englishmen had ministred sufficient occasion of warre, if the nobles of England (considering that the building vp of this castell was contrarie to their bond and promised faith) had not staid the worke, and so therevpon that beginning of new trouble betwixt the English and Sco-tish nations for that present ceased.
 In the yeare following came ambassadors forth of France into Scotland, declaring that Is. Lewes was readie to passe forward on that iournie, which he had taken in hand to make into Iewrie, and therefore desired aid of king Alexander, to support him in those warres against Gods enemies. With these ambassadors were sent ouer into France, certaine chosen bands of men of warre vnder the leading of Patrike earle of March, David Lindseie of Glen-nesse, and Walter Steward of Dundonald, three captains of great wisdom, and perfect experience in feats of chivalrie. The most part of all those Scottishmen, that thus went forth in that iournie, perished in Egypt either on the sword or by sick-nesse, so that few or none of them returned home againe. From henceforth, king Alexander liued not long: but falling into a sore and grieuous sicknesse within a certeine tle called Carnere, not far distant from the coast of Argile, deceassed in the same tle shortly after, in the 51 yeare of his age, the 35 of his reigne, and of our redemption 1249, his bodie (according as he had commanded in his life time) was buried in Helrosse.
 After that Alexander the second was thus dead and buried, his sonne Alexander the third of that name, not passing nine yeeres of age, was proclaimed king. There was no small adu on the daie of his coronation amongst the nobles, for that by reason of the obseruation of starres, it was iudged to be an infortunate daie for him to receiue the dia-dem. And againe some held opinion, how he ought to be made knight first, before he were crowned; so that thus they were at strife together, in such earnest maner, that it was doubted, least this contention would haue bred some great inconuenience, had not the earle of Arke prevented the same, in causing vpon a sudden the crowne to be set vpon the kings head, being placed in the marble chaire, according to the custome, without regard to the striculous allegations of them that spake to the contrarie.
 When the solemnitie was ended, there came before him an Hillandman (for so they call such as inhabit the mounteine countries of Scotland) who in a kind of meter of the Irish language, saluted him as king, thus: Bennach de re Albin Alexander, mak Alar, mak William, mak Henrie, mak David, and so forth (reciting in maner of a genealogie or pedegre, all the kings in order of whome he was descended, till he came vp to Cathelus the first beginner of the Scotish name & nation.) The words in English are as followeth: Haile king of Albine, Alexander the sonne of David, the sonne of Alex, the sonne of William, the sonne of Henrie, the sonne of Da-uid, and so forth as before. This Hilland Scot was highlie rewarded by the king for his labour, according as was thought requisite.
 In the second yeere of his reigne, king Alexander (or rather such as had the gouernement of the realme vnder him) assembled together all the prelates and barons of the realme at Dunfermling, and there ordeined to take vp the bones of his grandmother quene Margaret, which being done, he caused them to be put into a shrine of siluer, the 21 day of Iulie, and minding to place the same there it resteth at this present, as it was borne forth toward that place, when the bearers came against the fepulchre of hir husband king Malcolme, they were not able to remoue the reliques anie further, till by the counsell (as is said) of an aged man that was then & there present, they toke vp the bones of the same Malcolme also, and bare them forth with hirs to the place aforesaid, where they after rested in great veneration of the people. Such as were appointed gouernours (during the minority of king Alexander) doubting least the tender yeeres of their souereigne might embolden the enemies of the relme to attempt some inuasion, sent ambassadors vnto Henrie king of England, requiring that the peace might be ratified anew with him and his people, and further to make a motion of marriage to be had betwixt king Alexander and a daughter of king Henries.
 Shortly after, vpon this motion, both the kings met at Porke with a great number of lords, as well spirituall as temporall of both the realmes, where king Alexander (according to the promise before that time made) married the ladie Margaret daughter to the forenamed king Henrie, on saint Stephens day in Iulie.

1250.

Complaint made of the Cumins.The Cumins
put to the hozne.The king taken by the Cumins.The great power of the Cumins.
Thirtie and two knights of one surname.
The height of great families
the cause of their fall.The earle of Henteith is poisoned.The king set at libertie.John Russell an Englishman.The feast of Corpus Christi instituted.
The first com-
ming of the Carmelite friars.A part of the holie crosse
found.

in Christmasse, with all solemnite and ioyfull mirth that might be deuised. The charges wherof were bozne partly by king Henrie, & partly by the archbishop, who in feasting those princes spent right liberallie. At length, king Alexander after he had solaced himselfe in the companie of his father in law king Henrie a certeine time, returned into Scotland with his new married wife. During the minority of B. Alexander, the realme of Scotland was gouerned in great prosperitie by the nobles: but after his comming to ripe age, he was informed of certeine extorsions done by some of the pères of his realme against the poore people, and thereupon determined to see redresse therein. Amongst other there were accused of such transgression, the carles of Henteith, Atholl, and Buchquhane, with the lord of Strabogie, which were of one surname, that is to saie, of the Cumins. These being summoned to appeare before the iustices, with one Hugh Aberneth, and other of their complices, vpon their contempt so to do, were proclaimed traitors, and as the Scottish men tearme it, put to the hozne.

The foresaid lords moued with this displeasure, purposed to reuenge the same, and assembling their powers in secret wise, took the king at Kinrossie, and brought him vnto Striuelling, where they kept him as captiue in ward a long time after. Although which aduenture much harme ensued, by reason of misruled persons, that wrought manie oppressions against the people, in hope to escape the due punishment for their mischievous acts provided, with the king who should haue same iustice ministered, was holden in captiuitie by his presumptuous aduersaries. But of this matter ye maie see more in the English chronicles, about the 39 yere of Henrie the third. The house of the Cumins was in those daies of great power within the realme, both in multitude of offspring, riches, lands, possessions, and mainrent. There were at the same time to the number of 32 knights of that surname within the realme, all men of faire possessions and reuenues. But as it often happeneth, that men of great possessions and dominion are had in suspicion with the prince, whereby the same is for the more part the cause of their ruine and fall, speciallie when they presume too farre vpon their high power: so it chanced here. For within a short time after that the king was thus taken (as before is shewed) the chiefe author of the whole conspiracie, that is to saie, the lord Walter earle of Henteith, who was highest in authoritie among all those Cumins, was poisoned (as was thought) by his owne wife, through which mischance the residue of the Cumins were so exanimated, that obtaining their pardon, for all offenses passed of the king, they did set him againe at libertie.

This woman did thus make a swaie hir husband the erle of Henteith through instigation of an Englishman called John Russell, as by coniectures it was suspected; namelie, for that refusing to marrie with anie of the Scottish nobilitie, she took the said Russell to husband, though in estate to be compared with hers, he was iudged a match farre vnnmeet, and thereupon constrained to lie with him into England, he died there in great miserie. About this time pope Urban the fourth of that name instituted the feast of Corpus Christi, to be celebrated each yere on the thursday after Trinitie sundaie. The Carmelite friars came at this time into Scotland, and erected a chapell of our ladie without the walles of saint Johns towne, which the bishop of Donkeld appointed them, therein to celebrate their seruice. It was also said, that in this season a monke of Melrose was admonished in a dreame, where he should find a part of the holie crosse, not far from Deplis in Louthian, inclosed in a case ingrauen with the title of S. Nicholas. And not farre from the same was likewise found a stone chest, right cunninglie wrought and ingrauen, wherein were found certeine bones wrapped in silke, but whose bones the same were it was not knowne. As sone as the case was opened, within the which the crosse was included, manie miracles were wrought (as it was then belieued) king Alexander for deuotion heresof, builded an abbey in honor of the holie crosse, in the same place where that peece of the crosse was so found. In this abbey after, wards there were monks inhabiting of the order of the Trinitie.

Not long after, the two kings of England and Scotland met together at Marke castell, accompanied with a great number of the nobles and gentlemen of both their realmes, for the redresse of certeine misorders committed betwixt the borderers. Such reformation also was here deuised, and recompense made on either side, that both the realmes continued afterwards in more perfect tranquillitie for a certeine space, than euer was sene in anie kings daies before that time. In this season was the church of Glasco finished in that perfection as it stands to be sene at this day, right sumptuously builded, for the most part at the charges of William bishop of that see, who liued not long after the finishing of the said worke. In the yere following, which was the yere after the birth of our Saviour 1263, there fell a great dearth through both the realmes of England and Scotland, by reason of the wet harvest preceding, so that the corne and graine was quite marred and corrupted before it could be got beside the ground.

Acho king of Norwaye, being informed how the Scots were thus oppressed with famine and other miseries, by report of them that made the same more than it was in deed, supposed to find time and occasion fit for his purpose, to subdue them whole to his dominion. Whereupon, preparing an armie and a fleet of ships conuenient for such an enterprisse, he landed with the same in the westerne Isles, on Lammas day otherwise called Petri ad Vincula. Those Isles continued vnder subiection of the Norwegians and Danes, from king Edgars time vnto the daies of this Acho. From thence the said Acho with a mightie power of his Danes and Norwegians came ouer into Aran and Bute, which are two Isles, and onelie at that time amongst all the residue were vnder the dominion of Scots. But Acho hauing quicklie subdued them at his pleasure, in hope of more prosperous successe, transported his whole armie ouer into Albion, and landed with the same on the next coasts, where after he had besieged the castell of Airc a certeine time, hee took the same, and began to waste and spoile all the countrie thereabouts.

King Alexander being soze afflicted with these newes, for that he was young, and not able (as it was doubted) to resist the force of his enemies, imboldered vpon such frequent victories as they had achieved, thought best to prolong the time by colour of some treatie for a peace, that wate to diminish the enemies force, by long sojourn in campe without trial of anie battell. Whereupon were ambassadors sent vnto Acho, of the which one amongst them appointed thereto, being well languaged and wise, at their first comming before him spake in this manner.

Where is not that our king & nobles of the realme (by an ancient custome obserued euen from the beginning) doe vse first to seeke redresse of all iniuries received; before they offer to be reuenged with the sword; ye should not now behold orators sent vnto you to talke of concord, but a mightie armie in ordi-

In nobles built.An intermediate.The cause of their misdeeds.

1262.

A great war.

Acho king of Norwaye.The westerne Isles vnder subiection of
the Danes & Norwegians.Acho landed in Albion.The castell of Airc besieged and wonne.King Alexander purpose to inflict his enemies byre.Ambassadors sent to Acho.The oration of one of the ambassadors.The cause of Acho's com-

nance of battell comming towards you to giue the onset. We are of that opinion, that we neuer get so much gaine by victorie of the enimies, no though they haue robbed and spoiled our confines, but that we account it much better to haue peace, if we may haue restitution of wrongs done to vs, by some manner of honest meanes. For what greater follie may be, than to seeke for that by fier and sword, which may be purchased with faire and quiet wordes: Neuerthelesse, when our iust desires and reasonable motions are refused of the enimies, when we find them not willing to haue peace (for the obtaining whereof all warres ought to be taken in hand) but rather that their onelie seeking is to haue warres, not respecting the quarrell: we are ready to rise whole together in reuenge of such contempts with all possible speed and violence against our aduersaries. We are sent therefore from our king and soueraigne, to inquire what occasion you haue thus to invade his realme and subiects, in violating that peace and league, which hath bene obserued and kept betwixt vs and your nation, the space of this hundred yeres, and not onelie to take from him his two fles of Bute and Aran, but also to invade the maine land of his dominions, with such crueltie, as neither consideration of age or person seemeth to be had; but that women, children, and feeble old persons haue passed by the sword, as well as those that haue stood at resistance with weapon in hand against you. What heinous offense haue the Scottishmen at anie time committed either against you or anie other (whose reuengers ye may seeme to be) that they should deserue to haue such cru-eltie shewed against them? What furious ire hath moued you to burne the churches of God and his saints, with the murder of his people that flee into the same for safegard of their liues? But if you dread not God that governeth all things (by his diuine pro-uidence) which here in this world we see; if ye dread not the saints nor vengeance to come on you by the punishment of the righteous God: ye ought yet to dread the two most puissant kings of Albion, alied together in bond of amitie and marriage, which shall come against you with such puissance, that ye shall not be able to resist the same. Therefore sith ye may depart with honoz, we on the behalfe of him from whome we are sent, do admonish you, that better it is for you to redresse such iniuries as ye haue already done, and therewith to repaire home, than to aduenture to be brought vnto such desperate ends, that when ye shall be constrained to seeke for mercie, the same in no wise will be granted vnto you. These wordes were spoken by the ambassadoys, vpon purpose to put some terroz into the hart of this hardie king Acho.
 Neuertheles he was abashed so little therewith, that he answered them in this manner. Your beliefe is (I perceiue) ye ambassadoys, to abash vs with your fierce and awfull wordes, supposing vs so weake harted, that we should leaue off our enterprize through your menacing threats: but ye are farre deceived suerlie if your imagination be such. And where ye exaggerate our iniuries done to you in taking from you certayne fles, we perceiue you are not met nor indifferent persons to be chosen for iudges in that cause, neither do we mind to learne of you, what we ought to esteeme right or wrong in such behalfe. If ye desire further to know and vnderstand the cause why we haue invaded Aran and Bute, we saie and asfirme, that not onelie those two fles pertaine to vs and our people by good title and ancient right of inhe-rittance, but also all the other fles of Scotland, as we are able by firme euidences sufficiently to proue.
 And therefore are we now come to take presentlie so much in value out of Scotland, as ye haue taken in issues and profits out of those fles in times past from vs. Shew then to your king, that we feare neither his menacing wordes, nor yet anie other violence that he can shew against vs. notwithstanding, if he be more desirous of peace than of battell, and lusteth to auoid the spoiling and burning of his townes, and slaughter of his people; or if he desired not to see the bitter extermination of his realme afore his eyes, command him to send vnto vs forthwith ten thousand marks sterling for the fruits of our lands taken by and receiued by him and his elders in times past, and further that he make a cleare resignation of all claime or title that he may seeme to pretend vnto the said fles, in such sort that the same may passe vnder our dominion in perpetuall without anie contradiction.

When king Alexander had heard that the answer of his enimie was, he was therewith soe moued, & perceiuing no waie to eschue the battell, but that he should be constrained to trie fortunes chance, he assembled together an armie of fortie thousand men, that though he were not able to match his enimies in prouesse, he might yet passe them in number. He diuided his host into three battels. In the right wing was Alexander Steward, a very valiant knight, nephue to that Alexander which indowed the abbeie of Dabie. He had with him all the men that came south of Argile, Leuenor, Atholl, and Galloway. In the left wing was Datrike Dunbar, hauing with him the men of Louthian, Fife, Pers, Berwike, and Stri-ueling shire. In the middle ward was the king himselfe, with all the remnant people of the other parts of Scotland, to succour the wings when danger appeered. These battels were ordered in such arraie, that euerie band had a capteine assigned to them of their owne language, to exhort them to manhod, thereby to win praisse and honoz.

At his entring into the confines of Conningham, where he came first within sight of his enimies, he called his people together, and exhorted them to do their dutifull indouors like harbe and valiant men, against those enimies that invaded their countrie without anie iust cause or title of warre, and to put their trust in almighty God, desiring him to grant victorie vnto that part, which had most right and iustesse cause of battell. He further shewed how neces-sarie it was for them to behaue themselves valiant-lie, and how much it stood them in hand to fight with manlie courages, in defense of their wiues, children, libertie, and lands, hauing no hope of suertie of life but in the valiant vsing of their able hands, so that their whole safegard rested in this point, either to vanquish their enimies with manhod, or else to liue in seruile bondage as their slaues and miserable thralls, and to suffer their wiues and daughters to be abused at their lust and pleasure. He willed them therefore to consider, that not onelie he, but all Scotland should see them fight that day, noting both their manhod & cowardise. But sith their cause was iust, and moued onlie in defense of their native countrie and ancient libertie, he trusted they would shew the more hardinesse and courage, namelie against them that sought onelie bloud and spoile. These words with the like wordes king Alexander uttered with bold spirit, to incourage his people. And on the other part king Acho likewise thought it expedient to vse some exhortation vnto his armie, that they should not be afraid of the great number and huge multitude of
 the Scots.

The chiefest point to incourage them to do valantlie, he supposed was the hope of spoile, and therefore he put them in remembrance, how by victorie not onelie all such riches as the Scots had brought thither with them (which could not be small) but also ming into Scotland.

His demand.

King Alexander assemblieth
 his power.

The ordering of the Scottish host.
 Alexander Steward leader of the right wing.
 Datrike
 Dunbar capteine of the left wing.
 The king in the middle
 ward.

King Alexander exhorteth
 his people to do valiantlie.

Hope of suer-
 tie in what point it rested.

The necessitie
 of the cause.

Sakers of bloud & spoile.

Achos exhortation to his people.

Hope of spoile incourageeth
 men of warre.

High enterprises atchiued with extreme perill.

all the whole substance and treasure of the realme to be at their commandement, yea and the realme it selfe, if they minded to inioy it: so that this was the day which they had so much desired, wherein sufficient opportunitie was offered to shew what reward should follow to ech man for his good and valiant service. But for that high enterprizes and famous exploits might never be atchiued without extreme jeopardy, it behoued them to attaine to these so great commodities by persing thorough, and ouerthrowing by dint of sword the arraied battells of their enemies, which how easie a matter it should be for them to bring to passe, such as well considered the circumstances, might some coniecture. For thorough dearth and famine which so long hath reigned amongst the Scottish people, their bodies and forces (saith he) are so wonderfullie infebled, that they appere to represent rather shadowes than full personages of men able to make resistance.

Againe, in consideration how necessarie it was for euerie man to fight without fainting, sith they were inuironed on ech part without meane to escape, he desired them, that if it so fell out, that they should chance to be overcome (which as he trusted should not come to passe) that in such misadventure they would yet sell their liues deere, and not to die vnreueged. Thus hauing opened vnto them what prosperous hap followed by victorie, and what danger by the ouerthrow, he thought to haue sufficientlie instructed them to put all feare aside, and to doe what lay in their vttermost forces to vanquish the enemies. The kings on either side, hauing thus exhorted their people to doe their indeuours, they arraie their battells. Acho disposed all his best souldiers and whole force of his armie in the middle ward, for that he had knowledge how the Scottish king was placed in the middle battell of his people: therefore he supposed, that if he might ouerthrow and vanquish that part where the king stood, he should easilie then put the residue to flight. His wings (because he had not number sufficient to furnish them fullie) were arraied more weakelie in slender and thin ranks: but yet at the first encounter there was a terrible fight betwixt them, especiallie where the two kings fought: for they pressed still with great violence on that part where they saw any danger, not ceasing to exhort & encourage their men to stand to the bargain with manlie stomachs, so that on either side these two kings played the parts of verie valiant capitaines.

Acho with a band of verie hardie souldiers assailed sundrie times to perse and disorder the battell where king Alexander fought: notwithstanding he had so great number of people there with him, that he stuffed even the ranks with fresh men where he saw it needfull. Also betwixt the wings, there was no lesse cracktie shewed on either side in the beginning of the battell, till at length the Norwegians, perceiving themselves overpressed with multitude, and compassed in on euerie side, did somewhat begin to shrink, and first those in the left wing, constrained to breake their order, fell to running aboate. Alexander Steward therefore, that had the leading of the right wing of the Scots, hauing pursued the enemies a certaine space, and slaine Achos nephue, a man of high reputation and authoritie amongst the Norwegians, caused the retreat to be sounded, and gathering his men againe into arate, brought them against the enemies of the middle ward, where was hard hold betwixt the two kings, the battell continuing with great slaughter on both parts, and vncertaine a long while to whether part the victorie would incline: but the Norwegians being now assailed on the backs by a new power of their enemies, at length they began to flee amaine.

The ordering
of the battells.

The battells
soine.

The baliance
of the kings.

The great number of Scottishmen.

The left wing
of the Norwegians are put to flight.

Achos nephue is slaine.

The maine battell of the Norwegians
fleth.

In the meane time, the left wing of the Scots, whereof one Patrike had the leading, was in great danger, by reason the capteine himselte was sore wounded, and thereby all the companies in the same wing sore discomfited: but after they once beheld how the middle ward of their enemies was put to flight, they recovered new courages, and with great force caused their aduersaries, with whom they were matched, to giue backe also: and so were the Danes and Norwegians chased by the Scots, with verie cruell slaughter through all Cunningham, not ceasing from the pursute of the enemies, till night made an end of that daies worke. King Acho with a few other escaped out of danger, and comming to the castell of Aire, which (as ye haue heard) he had twome before, he was there informed of an other losse which he had sustained: for his fleet containing the number of an hundred and fiftie ships, were so beaten with an outrageous tempest, that there were not past foure of all that number saued, the residue being drownded and broken against the rocks and cliffes. The mariners also, being constrained to come on land for safe-10 20 30 40 50 60

gard of their liues, were slaine by the people of the countrie, so that few of them or none at all escaped. Acho being thus abashed with these two infortunate mishances, aswell for the losse and discomfiture of his armie by land, as for the perishing of his nauie on the seas, got him vnto those foure ships that were saued, and sailed with them about the coast, till he arrived in Dykneie. In this battell, which was fought at Largs on the third day of August, in the yere 1263, there were slaine of Danes and Norwegians 24 thousand, and of Scots about five thousand. Thus saith Hector Boetius. But Fourdon saith not to agree altogether herewith, who writing of this inuasion made by the Norwegians into Scotland, saith, that they were but twentie thousand men of warre in all, imbarcked in foure score ships, which comming to the new castell of Aran, besieged as well the said castell of Aran, as the castell of Bute, and toke them both, spoiling also the churches along the sea coast, and after arriving at Largs in Cunningham, on the feast of the natiuite of our ladie, lost the most part of their vessels, which were drownded together with thousands of men in the same. The residue that got to land, incountering with the Scots led by Alexander Steward of Dononald, were discomfited, put to flight, chased & drownded in the sea, into the which they were driuen. Amongst other that were slaine, a nephue of king Acho was one, a yong gentleman of great baliance, and sore lamented of his vnckle. Acho had much ado to escape himselte, he was so egerlie pursued of his enemies.

Thus haue I thought good to shew the diuersitie of writers in this behalfe, that it may appere how things are sometimes amplified by Boetius, to aduance the glorie of his countriemen, further perhaps than by the simple veritie of those that did write before him, may in some points be well auerred. But now to proceed. King Acho at his coming into Dykneie, sent into Norwaie and Denmarke for a new armie, prouiding ships & all other things necessarie, to haue made a new inuasion into Scotland against the next spring: but for that he himselte departed out of this life in the beginning of the yere next following, all that purueiance and great preparation was dashed, and came to none effect. The same day that Acho deceased, that is to saie, the 21 day of Januarie, Alexander prince of Scotland, the eldest son of king Alexander, whom he begot on his firste queene Margaret, the sister of Henric king of England, was borne, to the great reioicing of the people. For the people conceiued double ioy & glorie

The left wing
of the Scots
in danger.

The Danes
and Norwegians chased
by the Scots

The losse of Achos ships
by tempest.

The losse of the mariners

Acho fleth to Dykneie.

1263.

John Fourdon

Embassadors
sent from Magnus R. of Norwaie to king Alexander.

In time of the trouble betweene the sons of Malcolm Cannmore and their vnckle Donald Bane
Magnus R.
of Norwaie
the son of D-laine subdued
these Isles.
Richard South
well.

Cuthbert king
of Ham.
Reginald.
1228.

Blane, or D-laine.

1230.

Hubac.
while Sodorenies.
Blanus and Gorpedus.
Pore.
Hubac slaine.

Blanus and Gorpedus di-
uide the king-
dome of the Pore betwixt themselves.

1237.

Blanus
Gorpedus
Hubac.

1247.

Hubac
Gorpedus Blanus.

1247.

Hubac
Gorpedus Blanus.

1247.

Hubac
Gorpedus Blanus.

1247.

Hubac
Gorpedus Blanus.

1247.

ne to hereof, because that both a new prince was borne, and that cruellie dead which sought the destruction of the whole realme. After the deceasse of king Aho, his sonne Magnus succeeded him, a verie faithfull prince, and one that had the feare of God before his eyes.

In the second yere of his reigne, he sent his ambassadors (of whom the chiefe was the chancellor of Norwaie) vnto king Alexander, whome they found at saint Johns towne, and there signified vnto him, that king Magnus their maister would willingly giue ouer all his title, right, and claime vnto Aran and Bute, so that the residue of the Isles might remaine in quiet possession of him and his successors in time comming. Herevnto was answer made by king Alexander, that the Isles by right of old inheritances pertained vnto him and his progenitors kings of Scotland, and therefore he might not make anie agreement with the Danes or Norwegians, till he had recovered the full possession of the same Isles. The ambassadors being dispatched and sent awaie with this answer, incontinentlie Alexander Steward of Passie, and John Cummin were sent with an armie ouer into Aran, which Ile they then recovered (though not without blood) into the hands of the Danes and Norwegians, who had kept the same in possession now for the space of 167 yeres passed, but not without some alteration and trouble, as may appere by the annales of Richard Southwell, a writer (as should seme) well instructed in matters as well touching Scotland, and the north parts, as also concerning the state of the out Isles. And therefore that the same may the better appere to the readers, I haue thought it not impertinent to set downe what I haue read in the same Southwell, touching the kings, or rather viceroies of Aran, and those Isles which for a season (as should seme in deed) were subduted by the kings of Norwaie, though it may also appere, that sometime there was a certaine succession in them, as from the father to the sonne, & from the brother to the brother, &c: in manner as if it had bene by waie of inheritance.

In the daies of king John therefore (as saith the foresaid Southwell) one Godfred reigned as king in Aran. And in the yere 1228, one Reginald being king of those Isles, was murdered by wicked persons, & then his brother Olave reigned in his place. In the yere 1230, the king of Norwaie appointed one Husbar, the sonne of Olmund (surnamed Hareon) to gouerne the said Isles called Sodorshles, that is to say, the Ile of Aran, & the other Isles there abouts the coasts of Scotland; the which Husbar, together with two other captains Olave and Godred, surnamed Don, came by sea, and arrived at Bute, where they wan the castell: but Husbar was slaine with a stone that was throwne downe vpon him. And then after this, the foresaid Olave and Godred came vnto the Ile of Aran, where they diuided the kingdome of the Isles betwixt them, so as Olave had Aran allotted to him for his part, and Godred the other Isles. But after that Godred was also slaine, Olave gouerned both in Aran, and in all the other Isles (those excepted which the sonnes of Somersleld held in possession.) In the yere 1237, in the moneth of Maye, Olave king of Aran, the sonne of Godred, & brother to Reginald, departed this life, after whose deceasse his sonne Harold succeeded him, and reigned 12 yeres, being but 14 yeres of age when he began his reigne.

In the yere 1247, Haco king of Norwaie sent for Harold king of Aran to come vnto his coronation, who comming thither, was honorablie receiued, and obtained king Hacos daughter in marriage: but as he returned from thence, in the yere 1249, together with his wife, they perished in the seas by a tempest on the coasts of Ireland. Then succeeded his brother Reginald, who reigned but 27 daies, for he was slaine the first of June the same yere, by the seruants of a knight called Puarus. Then Harold the sonne of Godred gouerned Aran one yere, being remoued by the king of Norwaie: & after him Magnus the sonne of Olave began his reigne ouer Aran & the other Isles, by consent of the Hanskemen themselves. But in the yere 1254, one Puarus was ordeined king, or rather viceroie of those Isles, & gouerned the same, till the foresaid Magnus king of Norwaie resigned his title to all the said Isles vnto king Alexander (as ye haue heard) who placed his lieutenants there, of whom the first was called Godred mac Hares, the second Alane. And after him Maurice Harfaire succeeded, and then followed one that was the kings chaplaine.

For the time of the resignation made, I followe Hector Boetius, by reason of some contrarietie which appeareth in Southwell in the account of the yeres assigned to the reignes of those Island kings, if you confer the same with the time of the foresaid resignation. But now to the matter. The lieutenant appointed to haue the rule of those Isles, now that they were thus come into the hands of the Scots, was bound by his office to be readie with thirteene ships, and five hundred mariners to come to the aid of the Scots, at all times when he should thereto be required. After this, were the earles of Atholl, Carrike, and March, Alexander Steward, with the thanes of Argyle, and Lennox, sent with a puissant armie vnto the other of the westerne Isles, the which those that were greatest, they brought with much ado vnder the obseisance of the crowne of Scotland, the residue submitted themselves.

Magnus king of Norwaie informed hereof, sent thither his chancellor in ambassage vnto king Alexander, to trie if he might by treatie recover againe those Isles: and if he might not bring that to passe, yet to compend with him for a puerelle tribute. The first motion of the chancellor would in no wise be heard, therefore surceasing to spend anie longer time about it, they fell in communication touching the second, which took effect at length in this wise. King Magnus by his letters vnder his great seale, renounced and gaue ouer his right or claime that he had or might haue, both for him and his successors to all the Isles of Scotland. And king Alexander for this resignation was agreed to paie the said king of Norwaie, foure thousand marks sterling, together with a pension or tribute of an hundred marks by yere. And for the more confirmation of loue and amitie betwixt the two kings and their people, Margaret the daughter of king Alexander, being not past one yeres of age, was promised in marriage vnto Hanigo, the sonne of king Magnus, the same marriage to be consummat when she came to yeres mariable. Further, in place where the greatest slaughter of Danes and Norwegians had bene made, it was couenanted that an hospitall should be erected & founded there, for the sustentation of pore folks.

About this season, there were great warres in England betwixt king Henrie and his barons, of whom the chiefe was Simon Mountfort earle of Leicester, and diuerse other. King Henrie being not well able to withstand his aduersaries attempts, requested King Alexander to send him some aid of Scots to subdue the rebels of his realme, that had arreared warres against him. Herevnto shortly after, was Alexander Comin, with five thousand chosen men, sent by king Alexander into England, who right balliantlie bare themselves in that war which 1249.

Reginald.
He began to reigne the first of June.
Puarus.
Harold.

Magnus.

1254.

Puarus.

Lieutenant or baillie of the Ile of Aran
vnder the
Scots.

The westerne
Isles recovered
out of the hands of the Norwegians

The chancellor of Norwaie
sent to King
Alexander.

The release of Magnus
king of Norwaie
to the Scottish Isles.

A puerelle
pension.

Margaret
Alexander's daughter.

Warre in England.

King Henrie
required aide
of the Scots.

Alexander
Comin sent into England.

Scots,
a great as for e fame beheld
put to h great y were Danes
h verie
not ceas
it made a few
the cal
one be which he nber of
with an ff foure notoned
e mari for safe
e of the scaped.
infortun ilcommi
g of his ips that oast, till ich was ff, in the Norwe
ie thow
don se, toristing
ns into housand
e ships, besieged astell of churches argis in e of our ich were n in the ing with Wondo
& drew Amon
ng Aho
acie, and do to el his enl

The left wing
of the Scots
in danger.
The Danes
and Norwe
gians chased
by the Scots

The loss of
Acho ships
by tempest.

The loss of the mariners

The loss of Acho ships
by tempest.

The loss of the mariners

Acho ships
by tempest.

Acho ships
by tempest.

Acho ships
by tempest.

Acho ships
by tempest.

Acho ships
by tempest.

Acho ships
by tempest.

Acho ships
by tempest.

Acho ships
by tempest.

Acho ships
by tempest.

Acho ships
by tempest.

Acho ships
by tempest.

Acho ships
by tempest.

Robin Hood
and little John his companion.

A legat from pope Clement

The legats
demand.

The answer
of king Alexander to the legats message.

The more precepts the more offendours.

King Alexanders wife-
dome praised by king Hen-
rie.

A thousand marks sent to the pope.

Scottish captains sent into Affrike.

1270.
Thomas
earle of Car-
rike.

Martha
daughter to
the earle of Carrike.

Robert
Bruce.

Robert
Bruce married to Martha daughter to
the earle of
Carrike.

king Henrie held against his barons, thereof in the English chronicle ye may read more at large. In these daies (as the translator of Hector Boetius hath written) that notable and most famous outlaw Robin Hood lived, with his fellow little John, of whome are many fables and merie tests deuised and song amongst the vulgar people. But John Maior writeth that they lived (as he doth gesse) in the daies of king Richard the first king of England, 1198.

In the yeare next and immediatlie following, after that Henrie king of England had subdued his domestical enemies, there came a legat from pope Clement the fourth, requiring him to haue a collection of monie in Scotland towards the charges of leuieng an armie against the Saracens. But this legat was not receiued into the realme, but commanded to shew his message vpon the borders. He demanded therfore of euerie parish-church in Scotland foure marks sterling, and of euerie abbey foure score marks. And to the end he might the sooner purchase sauour to the furtherance of his purpose, he deuised by the way certeine statutes and ordinances right profitable to be vsed in the realme of Scotland, as he iudged. But king Alexander for answer hereunto alledged, that the Scots minded not to receiue anie statutes or decrees, other than such as were ordeined by the pope, or some generall counsell: for by a generall rule; The more precepts, the more offendours are alwaies found. And as touching the request made for the collection of so great summes of monie, it was not thought necessarie, that so much coine should go forth of the realme: neuertheless if it were thought expedient, he would be contented to send forth at his owne proper costs and charges, a number of armed men to go with the christian armie against the Turks: but for monie otherwise forth, the realme would not depart with anie, least it should be wastfullie spent, or taken by the way of theues, as it had bene aforesaid.

Henrie king of England praised much the wisdom of king Alexander for this his answer, as he declared shortly after by his sonne prince Edward, who came to visit his sister the queene, and his brother in law king Alexander at Roxburgh, where they met him; for ye must vnderstand that king Henrie had also learned by experience to be wise in that behalfe, as well as others. King Alexander yet after this sent vnto the pope a thousand marks in silver: and vnto Helmes the French king, that required his aid in that iourne which he made into Affrike against the Saracens there, a thousand souldiers, vnder the leading of the earles of Carrike & Atholl, John Stewart brother of Alexander Stewart, Alexander Cummin, Robert Beth, George Durward, John Quince, & William Gordon. All these going ouer with him. Helmes into Affrike, died there, either vpon the enemies sword, or by the intemperat heat of that countrie (whereto they had not bene accustomed) in the yeare after the incarnation 1270. The earle of Carrike, whose name was Thomas, perishing thus amongst the residue in Affrike, left no inheritor behind him to inioy his lands, sauing a daughter named Martha, being then about fifteene yeares of age. This yong ladie, chancing to ride on hunting in the woods for pastime and solace, as she vse is, fortunely by aduenture to meet with a noble yong man one Robert Bruce the sonne and heire to Robert Bruce the lord of Anandale in Scotland, and Cleueland in England, begot of Isabel the second daughter of Dauid earle of Huntingdon. The ladie immediatlie became so enamored of this yong gentleman, that she led him with her home vnto Carrike, where (without making hir friends priue to the matter) she married him in all hast, least any man should be about to hinder hir determined purpose. Of this marriage was borne that Robert Bruce which afterwards (through want of heires of the linage of king Alexander) attained the crowne of Scotland. As soone as Alexander was aduertised hereof, he took such indignation that he should bestow hir selfe so lightlie vpon one whom he neuer saw before, that he seized hir cassell of Turneburgh into his hands, with all hir other lands and possessions, as it were by escheat, for that she had married without his consent. Notwithstanding, within short while after he took pitie on hir case, and for an easie composition of monie which she paid for hir marriage, restored to hir againe all hir lands and liuings, suffering hir to inioy hir husband without anie more trouble or vexation. In the third yeare after, the said ladie was deliuered of the afore-remembered Robert Bruce that was after king of Scotland. And the same yeare, which was the yeare after the birth of our Sauour 1274, Dauid the second son of king Alexander deceased; and the third yeare after, the brethren of Edward king of England came into Scotland to visit the queene their sister, & their brother in law the k. & after did attend them in their iourne to London, whither they went to be present at the coronation of the foresaid Edward, as then returned forth of Affrike after the deceasse of his father king Henrie, to take vpon him the gouernement of the kingdome descended vnto him by right of inheritance. He was crowned the same yeare on the day of the assumption of our ladie in August, with great solemnitie and triumph.

At the same time there was a Norman in king Edwards court, of such passing strength of bodie, that he ouerthrew all men with whom he wrestled, till at length one Ferquhard a Scottishman borne, of the countrie of Rolles, descended of noble parentage, vanquished him to his great praise & advancement in hono: for king Alexander in guerdon of so worthie a deed there done in the presence of so honorable an assemblie, gaue vnto him the earldome of Rolles for euermore. Of this Ferquhard succeeded five earles all of his surname, but the first earle was named William Rolles, otherwile Leslie, in whose sonne the seventh earle failed the dignitie of that house for fault of succession. At the same time prince Alexander king Alexanders sonne did homage vnto king Edward for the earldome of Huntingdon, as the Scottish writers do testifie. Shortly after that king Alexander was returned forth of England at that time into Scotland, his wife queene Margaret deceased, and was buried in Dunfermling. She bare by him two sonnes, Alexander and Dauid, and one daughter named Margaret, the which (according to the assurance before made) was married about thre yeares after hir mothers deceasse, vnto Hainigo, or rather Aquine king of Portugal, and deceased in the second yeare after the solemnization of the marriage, leaving behind hir a daughter named also Margaret.

But before this hap fell so out, euen immediatlie after the death of queene Margaret the mother, hir yonger sonne Dauid deceased: by reason wherof, king Alexander being carefull of his succession, procured a marriage for his elder sonne prince Alexander, with the earle of Flanders his daughter, the which being brought into Scotland, was married vnto the said prince in Jedburgh, on the sunday after the feast of saint Martine in winter, in the yeare of our Lord 1279. The feast of this marriage was holden with great triumph and solemnitie continuallie for the space of fifteene daies together. & This yeare a number of the Scottish nobilitie, which had attended the ladie Margaret into Portugal, were lost

King Alexander
der displeased
with the king
said daughter.

Robert
Bruce that was after
king of Scotland is borne 1274

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

King Alexander
der with his
wife the
queene came
to London.

The death of Alexander
king of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of
Scotland.

lost by shipwacke, as they would haue returned backe againe to Scotland after the consummation of hir marriage there with king Harigo or Aquine. Whilie after, by the force of deaths dreadfull dint, two greivous losses chanced vnto king Alexander, the one following in the necke of another. For first his eldest sonne prince Alexander, being not past twentie yeares of age, departed out of this world, without leaving anie issue behind him; and not long after, his daughter Margaret queene of Forwaite deceased also, leaving behind hir one onelie daughter (as befoze is mentioned) being as yet but an infant.

In the same yere was a generall counsell holden at Lions, the pope and a great multitude of the prelates of christendome being there assembled. To this counsell were summoned to appeare all the provincials, wardens, and ministers of the begging friers. And for that there were so manie sundrie orders of the same, each man desiring of his owne braine some new alteration; all those orders were reduced into the foure orders, which after by the church of Rome were approued and allowed. A generall commandement was also giuen, that no man should go about to begin anie new forme of such vaine superstitious orders, which appoint themselves to eschue labor, to the end they may liue in pleasure, lust & idleness, vpon the trauell of other mens browes. In this mean time, after that the christian armie was returned home out of Affrike, by reason of a truce concluded with the Soldan, the same Soldan (that truce notwithstanding) ceased not to make great slaughters and inuasions vpon those christian men that remained behind. The christian princes soze moued herewith, made their appells for a new expedition into the holie land. The Scots gaue the tenth parte of all their lands, or rather (as some booke say) the tenth part of all tithes belonging to churches, to the furtherance of this iornie: notwithstanding through such enuie and contentions as rose amongst the said princes, that iornie brake, to the great damage and preiudice of the christian faith.

King Alexander hauing lost his wife and children in manner as is befoze exprested, not onelie he himselfe, but also all Scotland was in great penuriance and sorow, each man by a certaine foreboding and misgiuing in mind, doubting the mishap that might thereof insue. But yet did king Alexander, by the aduise of his nobles, in hope of new issue, marie the daughter of the earle of Champagne in France, named Yolant. The marriage was celebrated at Jedburgh with great feasting and triumph: but that ioy and blisshesse indured not long after. For the same yere on the 18 day of Aprill, as he was galloping vpon a fierce horse at Kingorne, forcing him in his race somewhat rashlie, he was throlone ouer the west cliffe towards the sea by a wonderfull misfortune, so rubelie, that he brake his necke, and so therewith instantlie died in the 42 yere of his reigne. He was buried at Dunfermling, in the yere after the incarnation 1290. It is said, that the daie before the kings death, the earle of March a little before night, demanded of one Thomas Leirmont, otherwise named Thomas the rimer, or (as the translator of Hector Boetius saith) Thomas Crilston (who in those daies was reputed for a noble prophet) or (as we may call him) a soothsayer, what weather they should haue on the morrow: to whome the said Thomas answered, that on the morrow [before none] should blow the worst wind and tempest that euer was heard of in Scotland at anie time befoze.

On the morrow when the skis appeared cleare and bright, without cloud or anie other signe of foule weather, and that it dreyne nere vnto the midst of the daie, and no wind heard from anie side, but all calme and quiet, the earle of March sent for the forenamed Thomas, and told him that he had mistaken his marks, in prophesying of anie such notable tempest as he had spoken of the night befoze, considering it proued so lithe a daie, without appearance of anie tempest to insue. This Thomas said little thereto, sauing that he said it was not yet past none. And incontinentlie herevpon came a post to the castell gate of Dunbar, where this earle of March as then laie, bringing word of the kings sudden death, as befoze is recited. Then said the prophet: That is the scathfull wind and dreadfull tempest, which shall blow such calamitie and trouble to the whole state of the whole realme of Scotland. This Thomas was a man in great admiration of the people, shewing sundrie things, as they afterward chanced: howbeit they were euer hid and inuolued vnder the veile of darke and obscure speeches.

Manie strange wonders and unkeith sights were seene in the daies of this Alexander the thirde. In the 17 yere of his reigne, there was such an infinit number of wormes through all the parties of Albion, that not onelie the leanes and fruits of trees, but also flowers & herbs in gardens were eaten by and consumed with them. And in the same yere, the waters of Forth and Tay rose with such high tides in flowing ouer the banks, that manie towne and villages were drowned, to the great destruction both of men and beastes. In the 20 yere of his reigne, there was a comet or blasing starre seene of a marvellous quantitie, shining euerie day toward the south, euen about none daies. On the Epiphanie day next after, rose so great winds, with stormes of such immeasurable great hailestones, that manie towne were throlone downe by violence thereof. In the meane time, rose through the vehement rage of winds, a sudden fire, in manie bounds within the realme of Scotland, that did much hurt to buildings and edifices, burning by steeples with such force of fire, that the belles were in diuerse places melted, as though it had bene in a furnace. Amongest other, those of the abbeye of Abirbrothoke were most pretious, which were as then consumed together with the steple wherein they hung. The towne of Aberdeen and Perth were burned the same time: also part of Lainrike, with the temple, and all the towne and villages in Clow, a part of Angus: and likewise manie towne and other buildings in Louthian, and in diuers other parts of the realme, so long here to rehearse.

In the 21 yere of his reigne, was the first coming of the pestilence into Scotland, with great mortalitie of the people, where it had not bene heard that euer this sickness had come within that realme before that time. In the solemnization of the second marriage of king Alexander, as the bridegroom (according to the manner) led the bride in a danse, a great number of lords and ladies following them in the same danse, there appeared to their sight as it were closing vp the hindermost of the danlers, a creature resembling death, all naked of fleshy & lire, with bare bones right dreadfull to behold. Through which spectacle, the king and the residue of all the companie were so affonied, and put in such fright & feare, that they had quicklie made an end of their danse for that time. In the daies of this Alexander the thirde, liued sundrie great clearkes. Amongst other, Michaell Scot was reputed for an excellent physician, and for his singular practise & knowledge in that profession was no lesse esteemed and had in high fauour with Edward king of England, than with king Alexander, during his life time.

✱ This

ned purt Robert heires of e crowne
s aduert-
he should
the neuer rneberic nd posses-
d married
thin thout
an easie hir mari-
livings, anie more after, the membred
Scotland.
e after the second son yeare af-
land came er, & their m in their
be present
, as then
e of his fa-goucne
n by right
me yere
n August, un in king
of bodie
wrestled,
an bozne,
ble paren-
aduance-rdon of so of so hono-ledome of succeded
earle was
, in whose tie of that me prince
age vnto ngton, as after that England at Margaret
ling. She David, and (according ried about into Har-
and deca-
tion of the named also mediatlie
other, hir
n thereof,
ession, pro-
e Alexanghter, the married v-
nday after the yere of ie contin-
er. & This which had ate, were lost

King Alexander displeas-
with the for-said Marthe

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

Robert
Bruce that was after
king of Scotland is borne 1274.

King Alexander with his wife came
to London.

The foure orders of friers.

The commandment giuen vnto the friars.

The soldan contrarie to the truce in-uaded the christians.

The Scots
contribution to the holie
land.

The earle dome of Ross giuen to William Ross
alias Leslie.

The death of Margaret
queene of Scotland.

The marriage of Margaret
king Alexanders daughter.

The death of David sonne to king Alexander.
The marriage of Alexander prince of Scotland.

1279.

H.B.

1290.

1285. H.B.

1286. Io. Ma.

Thomas of Erilton or the rimer.

A prophetic
of tempest.

Unkeith
sights and wonders.

High tides.

A blasing starre.

Great winds.

Fire caused through wind.

Bells melted

The first coming of the pestilence into Scotland.

A strange sight in dan-sing.

Learned men.

Michaell
Scot a physician.

Francis Thins
addition, to this marke.)

The lawes of Alexander the third.

This Alexander made manie healthfull and good lawes, whereof most by the negligence of men, and longnesse of time are worne away; so that things so profitablie by him deuised, seme rather by report to haue bene ordeined, than that they are by cōsome practised. He diuided the kingdome into foure parts, throug which he made his progresse almost euerie yere, remaining about thre moneths in euerie place, there to sit in iudgement, and to heare the complaints of the poze, at what time the meanest person might haue free acceſſe vnto him. As often as he went into anie prouince to giue sentence of law, he commanded the gouernor of that place to receiue him with a chosen companie; and when he departed thence, to bring him to the borders of his iurisdiction, where he was honorablie receiued of the next gouernors. The which traueilling about his realme he vsed, to the end that he might know all his nobilitie, and that he might also be knowne of all others. During which tyme of his progresse, no great traine or multitude of courtiers did follow him; because he would not charge his people in receiuing of them; and for that cause also abated and restrained the troope of horsemen which followed the nobilitie, and brought them into a certeine & meane number, because he supposed that the multitude of horses (whereof in warre there was no vse) were needlesse deuourers of meat. Further, he forbade his people to trauell by sea for gaine or merchandize, when he considered that through the unskillfulness of sailing, the rashnesse that men vsed in committing themselves to the seas, and the rapine of pirats, manie men were lost, and their goods spoiled: whereby the merchants were driuen to extream povertie. Which precept when it had continued almost a whole yere, and by manie mens speeches was reprehended as dangerous and hurtfull to the weale publike, at the length there arrived such plentie of strange merchandize in Scotland, that the abundance and cheapenesse thereof did exceed the memorie of anie former age. But yet to take order with and for the benefit of the merchants, he forbade his people to buie anie thing brought in by strangers, but such as were merchants of his land, and that all the other people should buie of them such things as they needed.)

Scotland
without a k.
and gouernor.

Mischiefes
insuing for lacke of a
king.

Six gouernors chosen to haue the rule
of Scotland.

King Alexander the third, being in such miserable wise deceased, as before is specified, the realme remained in great discomfort, by reason he had neither left anie issue behind him to succede in the gouernment thereof, neither taken order in his life time by testament, or otherwise, for anie other to supplie the rōme of a gouernor, so that hereof insued such infinite misorders, by the presumption of wicked and ungracious persons, the which vpon hope to escape unpunished (because iustice was like to want due process) ceased not to attempt manie vnlawfull acts, to the gricuous oppression of the people: which misruled demeanors and disordered enterprises of those outrageous persons, when such as had anie zeale to the wealth of their countrie vnderstood daillie to multiplie and increase, they thought it appertained to their duties to prouide some remedie in due time, and therefore called a counsell together, wherein after sundrie consultations had, and manie matters debated touching the rule of the realme, it was finally agreed, that six gouernors should be elected and chosen, of the which thre should haue the administration and rule of the north parts, and these were William Fraser bishop of saint Andrews, Duncane earle of Fife, & John Cumine earle of Buchquane. The other thre were appointed to the gouernance of the south countreies, that is to say, Robert bishop of Glasgow, sir John Cumine (a man of high estimation for his wisdom and experience as well in matters concerning peace as warre) and James high steward of Scotland.

But in the meane time Edward king of England, surnamed Longshanks, cast in his mind, how he might make some conquest of Scotland, now the same was thus destitute of an head to gouerne it. And for that he well vnderstood that the daughter of Forwaie (of whom before ye haue heard) was right inheritor to the crowne of Scotland, though she were but verie young in yeres, & not able for marriage: yet to compass his purpose that waies forth, he sent his ambassadoys vnto the lords of Scotland, requiring to haue hir to wife, and the realme with all, as due vnto hir by good title and right of inheritance. The lords, after long deliberation herein had, consented to his desire, vnder these conditions, that the realme should remaine in all freedoms and liberties, without anie kind of seruite subiection, in the same maner and state as it was vsed in the daies of king Alexander last deceased, and other his noble progenitors: and if it chanced, that no issue came of this marriage to succede them, then shuld the crowne returne by remainder ouer to the next heirs of king Alexander, without anie claime or pretext of title to be made by king Edward, or anie of his successors in time to come.

Immediatlie herewith, two noble knights, sir John Scot of Albatore, and sir James Menis, were sent into Forwaie to fetch the bride ouer into Scotland: but before their coming thither, she was deceased, & so they returned backe into Scotland againe without effect of their errand. And thus by means of hir death, all amitie betwixt Englishmen and Scots ceased. Then began to insue great trouble and businesse in Scotland, by reason of the contention which sprang betwixt the kinsmen of king Alexander, for the title and claime which they severallie made and pretended to the crowne. Where were thre chiefe that seemed by nearnesse of blood to haue most right, and therefore made most earnest sute in their claime: John Balioll, Robert Bruce, and John Hastings. This Robert Bruce was sonne to the son of that Robert Bruce, which married Isabel the yongest daughter to David earle of Huntingdon, on whom he got a son named also Robert, that married the inheritor of Carrike, as we haue shewed before, whose sonne this Robert Bruce was, that now claimed the crowne. John Balioll came of Margaret, eldest daughter to the foresaid David earle of Huntingdon: for Alane lord of Galloway, which married the said Margaret, begot on hir two daughters, of the which the eldest named Deruogill, was giuen in marriage vnto sir John Balioll, father vnto this John Balioll, that thus made claime to the crowne: alledging that forsomuch that he was come of the eldest daughter of earle David, the brother of king William, he ought by reason to be reputed as next heire to the same king William, with none other person alius approached so nere vnto him in blood.

* Here I thinke it convenient before any more be spoken of this historie, to interlace somewhat (besides that which is alreadie spoken, being here in part repeated) of the descent of this Deruogill, the daughter of Alane lord of Galloway, beginning the same somewhat higher, in this sort. In the reigne of William k. of Scots, which began in the yere of Christ 1160, as saith Lesleus, lib. 6. pag. 226, Fergusius gouernor of Galloway left two sons, Gilbert, and Ethred, who after the death of their father, fell at variance for the lands of Galloway, to be diuided betwixt them in equall portions. This ball coming to the eares of king William, he was desirous to quench

How can we
be true, for Edward
had a wife at that time: but verie the Scottish
terse themselves
were come to much lice in things they wrote the de of k. Edward

The daughter of Forwaie
deceased.

The contention betwixt
the kinsmen
of k. Alexander
for the crowne.
See more of this matter in
the English
histories.

The ancedo-t of Robert Bruce.

The time of the Balioll
with his title
to the crowne.

Of this matter though not whille is mentioned in before, e.
pag. 275.
The crueltie
done brother
another.

Gilpatrick
after spoile
Scotland.

Gilpatrick
after spoile
Scotland.

Gilpatrick
after spoile
Scotland.

Fr. Thin.

Buchanan.

Wil. Parus
nameth him
Edward.

quench those flames of unkindnesse betwene the said brethren, and for thit cause with indifferencie (as he supposed) he ment to pacifie and satisfie each part, by diuiding the inheritance equallie betwene them. But Gilbert highlie taking this partition in gradge (because he was eldest, & that the whole inheritance belonged to him) did with like hatred pursue both the king and his brother, the one as enuious against him, and the other as an onequall iudgc, in giuing his right from him. Wherefore when king William was taken prisoner of the Englishmen, this Gilbert being of bold spirit (and now by the kings mishap out of all danger, being deliuered from the feare of anie law) began to utter his conceiued hatred till this time couertlie concealed. For vpon the sudden, he toke his brother prisoner, put out his eyes, cut out his tonge, and not contented with a simple death (to be giuen vnto him at one instant) did most miserable a long time together put him to paine, by dismembryng the seuerall parts of his bodie, before he should die. After which wretched fact against his owne brother, he ioined himselfe to the English nation, and taking prizes on the borders, he did unnaturalie and traitorouslie (as it were an utter enemye to his countrie) rage against his owne citizens, with all kind of murder and slaughter of battell. In which he did such harme, and so great oppression, as if he had not bene resisted by his nephew Rowland (gatheringe a strong power to him of such common people as remained stedfast in dutifull obedience to the imprisoned king) he had utterlie spoiled all the countreies adioining to England, or else would wholie haue brought them into his subiection. For this Rowland a lustie yong gentleman, bold of spirit, indued with noble strength of mind and bodie, did not onelie beat downe the force of his vncke, but did manie times (and that sometimes most happilie) fight with the English, when they spoiled his native soile, or that he made anie inuasion into their borders.

At length when king William was deliuered of restraint, and returned into Scotland, this Gilbert (notwithstanding all his former euils) by the mediation of his friends, found fauour in the king, and was pardoned of all his offenses, but yet so as he promised to make recompense of all such damages as he had committed; for the sure performance whereof, he found sufficient pledges to the king. But Gilbert shortly after departing this life, they which had serued vnder him, giuen by continuall vse vnto theft and blood, did yield themselues to the fauourable protection of the king of England, either for inconstancie of mind, or feare of punishment, being touched with remorse of conscience for the euill which they had before committed. These men thus shadowed vnder the wings of England, did againe take armes against their countrie, vnder the conduct of Gilpatricke, Henrie Kennedie, and Samuell, who before had bene authoys and executors to Gilbert, of all such euils as were by him performed. Against whom was Rowland sent with an armie, who in a set battell slue the capteine, and a multitude of both kinds of the common people. They which escaped the confusid, did flic to the refuge of one Gilcombe, capteine of such persons as liued vpon spoile and pilfering, who by continuance of followers, & increase of people, were now growne to some number, & did wander ouer all Louthian, robbing & spoiling in euerie place where they set foot: and not so content, did from thence passe into Galloway, where this Gilcombe toke in hand the defense of Gilberts cause (now vnterlie forsaken of all men) vnder colour whereof, he not onelie challenged the inheritance belonging to Gilbert, but also behaued himselfe as chiefe lord of all Galloway. At length incounteringe with this

Rowland in the kalends of October (the third moneth after the companie of this Gilbert was before dispersed) this Gilcombe was valiantlie slaine, with the greatest number of his followers, by the said Rowland, on whose part there was verie few slaine.

The king of England highlie offended therewith (because the yere before they had swozine themselues to serue faithfullie vnder him against their owne blood) came in haste with a maine armie to Carleill to seeke reuenge thereof. Which when William king of Scots vnderstood, he laboured by all the meanes he could, to appease the king of Englands displeasure, and to reconcile this Rowland vnto him. In the end the king of Scots wrought so with the English, that Rowland was admitted to come to Carleill to the presence of the king of England; the which Rowland did accordingly. At what time before the king of England, refelling the slanderous accusations of his aduersaries (and further declaring that he had done nothing either rashlie, or vniustlie against his and the common wealths enemye) he was honorablie by the English king suffered to depart from Carleill. These things thus done, & king William returned into Scotland, he called to remembrance the continuall constancie and good seruice, which Carleill the father of Rowland had manie times done to him and to the realme; therewithall not forgetting the woorthie exploits which this Rowland had of late performed for the common wealth: for which considerations he woorthilie recompensed the said Rowland, in bestowing on him the whole countreie of Galloway. And further (although he did not merit the same by reason of his fathers euils) yet the king mildlie considering, that the sonne was not to beare the offense of the father (but hoping by this vnderferued liberalitie, to bind him faithfullie to serue him) did giue the lands of Carrike vnto the sonne of the said Gilbert. All which William Parvus reporteth to haue happened in the yere of Christ 1183.

Rowland being thus made lord of Galloway, married the sister of William Fitzwill constable of Scotland, who dieng without issue, obtained the same office by inheritance in right of his wife, from whom he did issue Alane lord of Galloway, and constable of Scotland, by inheritance from his mother, a valiant gentleman, and such a person as for his notable seruice (imploied in Ireland on the behalfe of John king of England) was rewarded by the said king with honorable and rich reuenues: for which by the permission of William king of Scotland, he possessed himselfe the liege man of John king of England, and sware fealtie vnto him. This Alane (as is before said) married Margarete the elder daughter of David earle of Huntington, of whom he raised thre daughters, whereof the eldest being Dornagill, was married to Balioll, the second to Bruce: in right of which Dornagill, the sonne of this Balioll challenged the crowne of Scotland, as descended from the elder sister. On the other side Robert Bruce, albeit he was descended of the yongest daughter to earle David, yet was he come of the first issue male, for his father was first borne, and therefore if king William had deceased without issue, the crowne had descended to him: for which consideration he mainteined that he ought now to be preferred. Hastings also for his part, because he was come of the yongest daughter of king David, married to his father Henrie Hastings, wanted not allegations to propound, why he ought to be admitted. Beside these, there were other also, that made claime to the crowne of Scotland, and had matter sufficient to mainteine their sute. This controuersie being brought before the gouernours, was at sundrie times argued with much contention, Rowland restored to the fauour of the king of England.

Rowland made lord of Galloway.

Carrike giuen to the sonne of Gilbert.

Rowland constable of Scotland.

Alane lord of Galloway, & constable of Scotland.

The title of Robert Bruce.

Hastings.

S. J.

ell in mat,
mes high
of Eng, mind, how now the
ouerue it,
utter of
was right
ough the
for mari
ics forth,
Scotland,
ine with of inher
rein had,
ors, that and liber n, in the
the daies
his noble
e came of e crowne
s of king of title to successors

ights, fir
Memis,
uer into her, she to Scot
And thus English
ue great on of the smen of ch they se
. There
of blood earnest ert Bruce,
as sonne
ried Fla
of Hun Robert,
ue haue
use was,
came of David
alloway, hir two
eruogill,
all, father
me to the
he was the bro
to be re
am, sith vnto him

any more that (be e in part e daugh
the same
of Wil
of Christ
ergusius ert, and ell at va ided be omming sious to quench

How can the
be true, folow
Edward
had a wife at that time: be berle the Scottish wy
ters shew themselues uercome
ro much ma lice in most things whic they write in the defamat
of R. Edward

The daughter of Mary de deceased.

The conten tion betwix
the kinsmen
of R. Alexander
for the crown.
See more of this matter in
the English
histories.

The ancestoys of Robert
Bruce.

The line of the Balioll
with his title
to the crowne.

Gilpatricke
was spoile Scotland.

Gilcombe was lord of Galloway.

Gilbert him was lord of Galloway.

Fr. This.

Buchanan.

Wil. Parvus
nameth him
third.

The doubt of
the gouernours

tention, not without the assistance of the nobles favouring the parties, as occasion of friendship or kindred moued them, namelie Balioll and Bruce had no small number that leaned vnto their parts; by reason whereof, the gouernours were in doubt to proceed to anie definite sentence in the matter, least if they declared one of them king, another would attempt to usurpe the crowne by force.

Fr. Thin.
Buchanan.

Hereupon they iudged it best to referre the decision of all this whole matter to some mightie king, which was of puissance able to constrain the parties repugnant to obey his sentence. Herevnto was none thought so meet as Edward king of England, and therefore they chose him. [Whose faith and loue towards them, they did not anie whit mistrust, because Alexander the last king of Scots had found the father of this Edward, both a louing father in law to himselfe, and byright tutor to his realme. Wherevnto also they ioined this cause of hope in king Edward, for that the said Edward had of late before tried the fauor of the Scots towards him, by a singular testimonie, in that they so easilie consented to ioine the heire of Scotland with the son of the said Edward.] Whereupon king Edward toke this charge vpon him, as competent iudge, & promised by a certain day to come vnto Berwik, willing that their counsell might be assembled there against that time. At his coming thither, at the day assigned, and hauing heard what could be said on each part, and thoroughlie considering at length their allegations, he perceived the same doubtfull, and required a longer time to discuss the truth by good aduise of counsell: and therefore required to haue twelue Scottishmen, the best learned and most skilfull lawiers of all the realme to be associat with twelue Englishmen, which he promised to chose forth of the most perfect and wisest clerks that might be found within all his dominions, to the intent that by their ripe and aduised debating of the matter, the truth might appere, according to the which he minded to giue sentence, without fauor either of one part or other. [Before which he toke a solemne oth of the ambassadoers of Scotland, and such nobles as were there to stand to his definitive sentence, further thereupon requiring a writing to be made, sealed with the seales of the same nobles.] After when all such matters and proses as were proposed by the parties, alledged by them for furtherance of their titles were put in writing, as matter of record, he returned backe againe into England.

The title
doubtfull.

Fr. Thin.
Buchanan.
The nobles
swore to stand to the order of king
Edward.

This report
of the Scottish
writers smel-
eth altogether of malice con-ceiued against him, for that he scourged
them so sore
for their vntuths.

Respect of persons in deciding controuersies is not to be considered.

¶ Here the Scottish writers report, that king Edward vsed himselfe nothing byrightlie in this matter, but accordinglie (as it often happeneth) had the eyes of his conscience blinded, vpon hope to gaine somewhat by this credit thus to him committed. But how vniuillie he is slandered in this behalfe, I leaue to the indifferent readers to consider, by conferring that which the Scots doe write thereof, with that which is to be found in our English historie. But to proceed as we find it in the Scottish writers. King Edward to be satisfiied in knowledge of the truth, sent into France for men learned and of great experience in the lawes, that he might haue their opinions in the demands of the parties for their doubtfull rights. But (saith Hector Boetius) he first commanded them in no wise to agree vpon anie resolute point, but rather to varie in opinions, that when the pleé should seeme doubtfull by reason of their contrarieie in deciding thereof, he might the better vnder that colour, giue iudgement with which partie he thought most expedient to serue his purpose.

Whiche it the most part of the lawiers iudged with Robert Bruce, both for the worthines of his person, and also for that he was come of the first issue male. But some there were that gaue sentence with John Balioll, for that he was descended of the eldest sister. King Edward supposing this to be the time most conuenient for his purposed intention to conquer the realme of Scotland, returned to Berwik, where he had appointed the 24 learned men before specified, to be present, that final sentence might be giuen, according as he had before promised. When he was come thus vnto Berwik, and the foresaid 24 learned lawiers assembled as assistants with him, and the parties appering before him in a chamber provided for the purpose, he caused the doores to be herelie kept, and the entries stronglie warded, that no man might come in or out, but by his appointment and licence. His purpose was to make him king, that would be sworne to hold the crowne of Scotland of him, as superior lord thereof. And because he knew that Robert Bruce was a man of singular manhood and wisdom, he thought best to assaie him first, and if he found him not conformable to his purpose, then he intended to trie what the Balioll would do.

When Robert Bruce had thoroughlie heard king Edwards motion, he answered that he loued the libertie of his countrie, more than his priuate preferment, and therefore minded not to deliuer his countrie (which euen to that day had bene free) into the bondage and seruitude of the Englishmen. King Edward perceiuing his stoutnesse of stomach, brake off with him, and fell in talke with the Balioll, who had such blind desire to attaine the crowne, that he passed not whether he intioied the same in libertie or seruitude, so he might haue it. Hereupon when this Balioll had giuen his faith by assured oth vnto king Edward, that he would do homage vnto him for the realme of Scotland, and acknowledge to hold the same of him as superior lord, king Edward gaue sentence with him, to haue most right to the crowne and realme of Scotland, now thus in controuersie.

It is said, that the earle of Gloucester, a man of great prudence and authoritie in England (seeing the Balioll thus made king, and Robert Bruce without reason put backe) spake in this sort to king Edward: Oh king, remember what is done by thee this day, sparing to giue righteous sentence in this matter; for though the same be now couered and hid, it shall be reuealed, when the great iudge that searcheth consciences, and the secrets of euerie mans mind, shall cause thee to answer for it at the dreadfull day of that vniuersall iudgement: thou hast now giuen sentence on a king, but then shall iudgement be giuen on thee. Shortly after, John Balioll went in great arrate vnto Scone, where he was crowned king of Scotland on saint Andrewes day, in the yere from the incarnation 1292. In the yere next ensuing, on saint Stephens day in Christmasse, he came to Newcastle vpon Tyne, and there did homage vnto king Edward for the realme of Scotland, contrarie to the mind and consent of all his nobles, for that by this meanes, he seemed to submit his realme (which had remained in freedom vnto those daies) into the seruitude of the Englishmen: but small felicitie succeeded thereof. And here it appeareth by Buchanan, that the nobilitie of Scotland, which held with Balioll, did also their homage: for being farre from home, they durst not contend against the power of two kings. Whereof some taking it greivouslie in their hart, dissembled with the present time, and couered their anger vnder the cincts of a faire countenance, which yet in the end burst out, notwithstanding this painted shew. For the declaration and profe thereof, there was shortly after occasion offered to Hakdusse, by the death of the earle of Jfife, being (in the time when there was no king) made one of the six gouernours of the realme: for this earle was not anelie killed by these of Abirneithie

R. Edward
commeth to Berwik.

The purpose of king Edward, as the Scots do
vnto this report.

The answer
of Robert Bruce.

The Balioll
promiseth to do homage to king Edward.

The saying of the earle of Gloucester
to king Edward, but like to be true.

Fr. Thin.

John Balioll
crowned king
of Scotland.

1292.
John Balioll
doth homage
to king Edward.

So say the Scottish writers,
but how true, reth more hard
in England.

Fr. Thin.
Buchanan li.

The league
warred betweene France and Scot-
land.

John Balioll
warred betweene France and Scot-
land.

John Balioll
warred betweene France and Scot-
land.

(which familie did then greaſtie flouriſh in riches and aropriate within Scotland) but the brother alſo of the ſaid earle was called into late by the Abirneſſe ans, for whom the king in aſſembly of the ſtates did give ſentence againſt the other. This ſentence after the laſt thereof the contention grew was to abide god, ſuppoſing therein the king to be more truſt a-gainſt him than his cauſe, and that the king was not ſo ſevere a revenger of his brothers death, as he hoped that he would be, forſake the Balliol, and appeared to the king of England, before whom he committed his ſute againſt Balliol. The deciding thereof was appointed to be holden at London, where was an aſſembly of parliament of the nobilitie, after the Engliſh manner, amongſt whom this Balliol had his place alſo.

The parliament begun and Balliol there ſummened or cited, would have anſwered by his proceſs; as attorney: but this (not being allowed) Balliol was compelled to riſe out of his ſeat, and to defend his cauſe himſelfe in an inferior place. Which contumelie when he ſaw not at any time redreſſe, ſecretly he ſet himſelfe in ſea, with ſix ſhips, and ſought to ſeeke the revenge thereof. But when he was ſeene, then could not deliver himſelfe of ſuch diſgrace; he returned home with a mind of deablie anger, returning mountains of choler therein, who ſill bending himſelfe on every ſide to ſatiffie his anger, ſtuck on this point: how he might reconcile the hearts of his ſubjects: and offend the ſtate of the Engliſh.
Which Balliol with this meditation was ſeeking his hot ſtomach, a ſit means was now offered to perſuade his deſire, by reaſon of the wars betwixt groven betwixt England and France, as after ſhall appeare. For upon this occaſion of wars, king Edward of England commanded this Balliol by tenure of his land, & tenure of his homage, to come with all the power he could prepare to aid him in his warres againſt the king of France.)

King John Balliol incontinently hereto became repentant, in that he had endangered himſelfe ſtes by doing his homage; and thereupon ſent his ambassadors to king Edward, as then ſjourning at London, to renounce his aid touching the ſame homage, alledging that ſo ſoon as it was done without the aſſent of the three eſtates of Scotland, it was of no ſtrength in it ſelfe, and not meete to be obſerved being done by force; ſo which cauſe he would renounce his frienſhip and alliance, alſo for many other injuries done unto him and his; as for that he would ſeeke to reſtore his countrie to his former libertie. Which meſſage when none of the better ſort durſt take in hand to execute, a certaine monke (or as other have the abbat of Alherburye) carried theſe letters into England, upon the next thereof, king Edward anſwered the ambassadors (whom he treated with innumerable contumelies) that ſince he perceived (ſaith he) your king will not come unto us, we intend ſpeedie to come unto him, whereunto the ambassadors departed. Foras (ſaith Buchanan) could ſcarcelie returne home in ſafetie: being at his returne into Scotland rather had in contempt of his own people than anie not reſpect-ed ſo ſuch an ambassage.

After this, king Edward the better to accompliſh his purpoſe againſt the Scots, ſent means to conclude a peace with the king of France, and ſo the warre continueth of the ſame peace: the French kings daughter was given in marriage unto king Edward his ſonne. Wherefore (as ſaith the Engliſh chronicle) he purpoſed (when he had ſent his will unto againſt the Scots) to have ſent him ſpeedie as before, notwithſtanding that he had ſent him to ſtand by his contract. After this he procured the frienſhip of Robert Bruce, and upon promiſe (as it is to be thought) to make him king, the ſame Robert delivered unto king Edward his honors all ſuch caſtles as he held in Scotland. John Balliol the Scottiſh king, underſtanding that king Edward minded to make a compariſon upon him, ſent William biſhop of Saint Andrews, and Spalden biſhop of Dunblod, with ſir John Selkirk, and ſir Frogram Unſtraide into France, to renew the ancient league betwixt him and Philip the fourth, as then king of France; which accordingly was done:

and ſo the more cooperation thereof, the choiſt daughter of Charles earle of Vallois and Arion, brother to king Philip, was promiſed in mariage unto Edward Balliol, the ſonne of king John, which Edward ſhould enjoy lands of peaceable rents & revenues to the ſumme of ſixtye hundred pounds ſterling, in places not of the demerſons belonging to the crown, as Balliſſelle, Dampiere, Harcourt, and Barre, which his father held in France with Lanarch, Hildon, Spalden, Cuninghame, and the caſtell of Dunbar, with the appertinances in Scotland: and hereto was annexed a promiſe, that if thoſe feigneries and places exceeded the value of ſixtye hundred pounds of peaceable revenues, then ſhould the ſurplusage remaine to the ſon of Scotland: but if the ſame amounted not to that ſumme, then ſhould the ſaid king make them good, and ſupplie the ſame with other rents in Scotland, or otherwiſe, as ſhould be thought meet. And further, the ſaid ſumme of ſixtye hundred pounds in yearly rent was assigned as it were the dower of the ſaid lady, to enjoy to her ſelfe during her life after her husbands deceaſe, if her hap were to ſurvive him.

In conſideration whereof, king Philip contrayned to content and pay unto king John in name of the marriage meate, the ſumme of 40000 crownes, or (as other ſay) 25000 pounds of ſterling. The charter containing the articles, covenants, and agreements of this marriage and league above mentioned, beareth date at Paris, the 23 day of October, in the yeare of our Lord 1295. And the letters pocuratorie made by king John to the ſaid biſhop of ſaint Andrews, & the other his aſſociats, bear date at Strirling, the third day of Julie the ſame yeare. Shortly hereupon, king John was adverti-ſed that king Edward purpoſed to come and beſiege Berwick; therefore by adviſe of his nobles he ſent the moſt part of all the lordes and gentlemen of ſtreit and Lothian unto Berwick, to defend the towne againſt the enemy, if he came to beſiege it.
The Engliſhmen came not ſoone with a mightie power by land, but alſo with a great navie by ſea to wards the ſaid towne of Berwick. Of which coming the Scots being advertiſed, came ſpeedie to gainſt thoſe that approached by ſea, ſlaue 14 of their ſhips, and chaſed ſtoute the reſidue.

King Edward rather promiſed than feared with this malcontent, came with a farre greater power ſince than before, to ſiege the ſiege: but when he perceived his purpoſe to be ſo ſpeedie effect as he hoped it ſhould have bene, he ſent ſpeedie to take this towne by ſome ſlightfull policie. Whereupon he ſent ſome of his ſouldiers ſtealing a barrell of ſhot ſubſtances about on their backs, after the manner of the Engliſhmen. There were alſo ſent before unto the towne, certaine Scots that knew the king of England, which gave knowledge to the captain of the towne that they were king John

Ex chron. A-1 London, as J
take it.

Heſtor Eoc-cun.
Abendon.

1295.

The gentleman of ſtreit, and Lothian
ſent to Berwick to beſiege it againſt the Engliſh
men.

Engliſh ſhips taken at Berwick.

Barre & Berwick.

The policie of
king Edward to ſiege Berwick.

deſtiffer.
time moſt
conquer
the, where ſpecified,
given, ac-
n he was 24 leat,
him, and ber proui-
be fierlie
it no man ent and li-
ing, that cotland of e he knew r manhood
n firſt, and poſe, then
co.
heard king ied the liate prefer-
his coun-
into the
en. King
ach, make lioll, who e, that he libertie of when this unto king
him for the o hold the ward gave he crowne
rouerſie.
a man of and (ſeing Bruce with king Edp theſe this n this mat-
and hid, i t ſearcheth
ans mind, adfull day
now given
ment be gi-oll went in s crowne ay, in the yeare next maſſe, he ere did hoe of Scot-
all his noubmit his unto thoſe ymen: but ere it appe-Scotland,
Fr. Thin.
Buchanan. li. 8.
(which

Edwards
commiſſion to Berwick.

The purpoſe
of king Edward, as the Scots do
untruſtly report.

The Balliol
promiſed to do homage to
king Edward.

John Balliol
crowned king
of Scotland.

John Balliol
crowned king
of Scotland.

John Balliol
crowned king
of Scotland.

John Balliol
crowned king
of Scotland.

John Balliol
crowned king
of Scotland.

The Scots
decided and intrapped.

The crueltie
of the Englishmen.

Berwike is swone.

The 29 of March being good friday, 1295. H.B.

The abundant of blood
spilled.
Streames
augmented
with blood.

The Scots
discomfited at Dunbar.

The castell of Dunbar rendered to king
Edward.

Robert Bruce
occasion of the otherness of Scots at Dunbar.

Robert Bruce
submitted
himself to Edward.

The answer
of king Edward to Robert Bruce.

The castles of Denburgh and Strirling
swone.

King John
princen into

John was comming with his armie to their succors. The Scots that were within the towne, helping it had bene most true; set open the gates, and came forth against their king (as they supposed) to haue receiued him with all ioy and gladnesse.

But when they came nere vnto the Englishmen, they perceiued both by their language and habit what they were: but this was not before the Englishmen were hard at the gates, so that when the Scottishmen would haue fled backe to haue got into the towne againe, the Englishmen pursued them so fast at the heelles, that they entered the gates with them, and so toke the towne with great slaughter, as well of the souldiers and men of warre, as also of women, children, and aged persons, without all ruth or compassion, so that they left not one creature aliue of the Scottish blood within all that towne. Thus was Berwike swone the 30 day of March, in the yere 1296. Such abundance of blood was spilled thro-rough all parts of the towne (as the Scottish chronicles testifie) that where at the falling tide the water was not able to driue about the mills, some of the same mills yet were now at a low water set on gate, by reason the streames were so hugelie augmented with blood. There were slaine about seven thousand persons that day, with the greatest part of all the nobles and gentlemen of life and Louthian.

King John hearing of this slaughter of his people at Berwike, in great desire to be auenged, gathered his power, and sent the same forth against king Edward, with whome they met not farre from Dunbar, and there incountring with him in battell, the Sco-tish host was discomfited, the most part of the Scots being either slaine or taken. The earles of March and Menteth, with 70 knights, fled to the castell of Dunbar, but they were besieged so streialie by the English power, inuironing the castell on eche side, that in the end they were constrained for lacke of vittells to yeld themselves to king Edward, on condition to haue their liues saued, which covenant was not obserued; as the Scottish writers affirme: for king Edward hauing got them into his hands, caused them forthwith to be put to death. It was reported that Robert Bruce vpon secret conference had with king Edward before this battell at Dunbar, sollicited all his friends in the Scottish armie, to flee vpon the first iourning, which the residue perceiuing, were so discomfited, that incontinentlie they threw a waie both armes and weapon, and so were vanquished without resistance.

Truth it is, that after this victorie, Robert Bruce submitted himselfe vnto king Edward, requiring him to performe his promise touching the right which he had to the crowne of Scotland: howbeit he recei-ued no answer to his liking touching that request: for king Edward had no lesse desire to inuade the kingdome of Scotland, than Robert Bruce, as the Scottish writers affirme. Therefore to cast off Robert Bruce concerning his demand, he answered thus, as is said: Belieue thou that we haue nothing else to do but to conquer realmes, and to deliuer them ouer againe vnto thee. Robert Bruce hereby perceiuing the hidden meaning of king Edward, returned right sorrowfull vnto his land in England, hauing great indignation in his mind, that he had obeyed king Edward, yet not considered with himselfe that he must suffer for the time, till occasion serued to reuenge the injuries receiued, which he thought he would auoid. King Edward after he had thus swone the castell of Dunbar, got himselfe into the castles of Denburgh and Strirling, and there he had a conference with king John, and so came to his refuge the castell of Strirling, where he

John Cummin lord of Strabogie came to king Edward, and was sworne his liege man.

Shortlie after, by a politike practise of the same John Cummin, king John with his sonne Edward came to Mounros, where perceiuing himselfe vi-tuelie to be fallen into the hands of king Edward, through feare of death which he doubted by reason of the menacing words of king Edward, he suffered himselfe to be spoiled of all his kinglie habiliments, and with a white wand in his hand (as the maner is) presented himselfe before king Edward, resigning there vnto him all his right and title which he had to the crowne of Scotland, utterlie renouncing the same both for him and his heires for ever. Hereof was a charter made in most sufficient wise, confirmed with the hand and seale of king John, and other the nobles of Scotland substantiallie as might be deuised, bearing date the fourth yere of his reigne. After this, king Edward assembled all the lords and barons of Scotland at Berwike, where he caused them to be sworne his liege men, and to do homage vnto him as to their soueraine lord and supreme gouernor. Which William Douglas (a man of noble birth and famous for his deeds) refused to do, and for his obstinacie was cast into prison, where after a few yeres he ended his life. And for the more suertie of their allegiance, he constrained them to surrender into his hands all the strengths & holds of the realme, both as well those that stood on the sea coasts, as also such other as were situat in the inner parts of the countrie.

These things done, and order taken in each behalfe as was thought requisite for the quiet keeping of the countrie, he sent king John and his sonne Edward Balliol vnto London, where they were kept in strong ward; till at length he suffered the said king John to returne into Scotland: but leauing still his sonne in pledge behind him, least he should attempt anie new rebellion after his departure; which after was deliuered at the request of the pope. King John vpon his returne into Scotland, perceiuing that he was in the hatred both of his lords and commons, he withdrew againe of his owne accord into England, forsaking wholie the administration of the Scottish dominion, and final-lie went ouer into Normandie to his ancient inheritance and lands there, where at length falling blind, and wasting away by long age, he departed out of this world in the castell Galliard, leaving those lands which he possessed on that side the sea, by to his sonne Edward Balliol, who being released out of captiuitie, was come ouer to his father before his deceasse.

In the meane time, king Edward hauing well in remembrance the warres which he had intended to make against France, had he not bin staid through the businesse of Scotland, purposed now to pursue the same with all diligence; & therefore garnishing all the strengths & forces in Scotland to withstand the Scots, if they attempted anie rebellion against him in his absence, he appointed Hugh Cressingham regent there, whilst he should be occupied in France, which Cressingham before was treasurer.
Then hauing provided a great number of ships, he passed ouer into France, trusting that the Scots would not stir, till they had of late suffered so ma-nye overthrowes and sore losses, and after an other the last wars; but tyrannie is of such a nature, that being kind of oppression it may any long time be easily defended. For those people that are oppressed by any tyrannical feruitude, will not take to heart to deliuer themselves from the yoke of that tyrant till they haue some better opportunity of time and occasion serued. Therefore the lords of Scotland

the castell of Foslaire.

John Cummin
king of Scotland resigneth
all his right
to king Ed-
ward.

A charter.

Homage of the barons of Scotland to king Edward.

Fr. Thin.

The habits of Scotland de-liuered into king Edward
his hands.

John Balliol
all kept as prisoner in England.

He returneth
into Scot-
land.

He renounceth the administration of Scotland.

He returneth
into France,
and deceaseth
in castell Gal-
liard.

King Edward his purpose to inuade France.

Hugh Cressingham
regent of Scot-
land.

King Edward before
by the Scottish
re. of tyran-
nie.

The Scottish
lords assemble at Strabogie.

Edward go-uernour elected in Scot-
land.

John Cummin

William Walpole beginneth
to wayle.

Mr Andrew Wallace
might father of William Wallace.

Bibbles of Scotland in Englishmens
hands.

Castles won by William Wallace.

Dunbar won by William Wallace.

king Edward the first of the castle of Fozfair.

the same
Edward
himselfe
Edward,
reason of he suffered
instruments, maner is resigning
he had to nancing the
r. Hereof life, confir-
and other
as might are of his led all the e, where he and to doe ne lord and to Wallace (a eds) refus-
into prison,
e. And for
e. And for strengths & at stood on tuat in the

John Balliol
king of Scot-
land resign-
all his rights
to king Ed-
ward.

A charter.
homage of barons of Scotland to king Edward

Fr. Thin.
The hold-
Scotland
delivered into king Edward
his hands.

John Balliol
king of Scot-
land resign-
all his rights
to king Ed-
ward.

John Balliol
king of Scot-
land resign-
all his rights
to king Ed-
ward.

John Balliol
king of Scot-
land resign-
all his rights
to king Ed-
ward.

John Balliol
king of Scot-
land resign-
all his rights
to king Ed-
ward.

John Balliol
king of Scot-
land resign-
all his rights
to king Ed-
ward.

John Balliol
king of Scot-
land resign-
all his rights
to king Ed-
ward.

John Balliol
king of Scot-
land resign-
all his rights
to king Ed-
ward.

John Balliol
king of Scot-
land resign-
all his rights
to king Ed-
ward.

John Balliol
king of Scot-
land resign-
all his rights
to king Ed-
ward.

John Balliol
king of Scot-
land resign-
all his rights
to king Ed-
ward.

John Balliol
king of Scot-
land resign-
all his rights
to king Ed-
ward.

John Balliol
king of Scot-
land resign-
all his rights
to king Ed-
ward.

John Balliol
king of Scot-
land resign-
all his rights
to king Ed-
ward.

John Balliol
king of Scot-
land resign-
all his rights
to king Ed-
ward.

John Balliol
king of Scot-
land resign-
all his rights
to king Ed-
ward.

John Balliol
king of Scot-
land resign-
all his rights
to king Ed-
ward.

having knowledge that king Edward was passed over the seas, they got them all together straightwaies, and assembled in counsell at Striueling, where by generall agreement, twelve noble men were chosen to be gouernors of Scotland, euerie one in their limits appointed, that they might the better prouide to resist the enimie. Amongest these gouernors, John Cumin earle of Buchquhan was principall, a man of great wisdom and singular knowledge in all affaires, as well of peace as of war.
This earle of Buchquhan raised a mightie armie, and with the same entered into Forthumberland, where he wasted with fier and sword all that coun-trie. After this, he laid siege to Carleill, but he wan nothing there, the towne was so well defended. In that season also, the fame of William Wallace began to spring, a young gentleman of so huge stature and notable strength of bodie, with such skill and knowledge in warlike enterprises, and hereto of such hardinesse of stomack in attempting all maner of dangerous exploits, that his match was not ante-where lightlie to be found. He was sonne to one sir Andrew Wallace of Craigie, knight, and from his youth bare enen an inward hatred against the English nation. Sundrie notable feats also he wrought against the Englishmen in defense of the Scots, and was of such incredible force at his com-ming to perfect age, that of himselfe alone, without all helpe, he would not feare to set vpon three or four Englishmen at once, and vanquish them.

When the fame therefore of his worthie acts was notified throughout the realme, manie were put in good hope, that by his means the realme should be delivered from the seruitude of the Englishmen within short time after. And hereupon a great number of the Scottish nation as well of the nobilitie as other, were readie to assist him in all his enterprises.
By reason whereof he might not easilie be intraped nor taken of the Englishmen, that went about to haue got him into their hands. At length, when occasion serued to vse the helpe of such a notable chief-teine, he was chosen by generall consent of the Scotishmen as gouernour vnder John Balliol, to deli-uer his countrie from bondage of the English nation. At the same time manie abbeies & spirituall be-nefices in Scotland were in Englishmens hands.
Pouerthelesse, this William Wallace by commission had of William Frazer bishop of saint Andrews, auoided and put them forth of all parts of Scotland, leaving neither temporall nor spirituall person of their blood within that realme. For shortlie after, by publike authoritie, he received the armie that John Cumin earle of Buchquhan had led before, and constrained those Scots that fauored king Edward, to obey his commandements, in renouncing all such faith and promise as they had giuen or made vnto him.

This done, he passed forth with great puissance against the Englishmen, that held sundrie castles within Scotland, and with great hardinesse & manhod he wan the castles of Fozfair, Dundee, Brechen and Bountros, slaying all such souldiers as he found within them. Wallace now full of this his prosperous successe, and hearing that certeine of the chiefest captaine and officers of those Englishmen that kept the castell of Dunfer, were gone forth to consult with other Englishmen of the forts next to them adjoining, came suddenly to the said castell, & took it, not leaving a man aliue of all those whome he found as then within it. Then after he had furnished that hold with his owne soldiers in most defensible wise, he went to Aberdeen. The towne he found in maner void of all the inhabitants, but the castell was so stronglie garnished with men and munition, that considering it might not be wone without great murder, he raised from thence, and returned into Angus. King Edward as then being in France, hearing of these exploits atchiued by this Wallace his aduersarie, sent diuerse noble captaine vnto his lieutenant Hugh Cressingham, with an armie into Scotland to redresse the matter.

Wallace in the meane time had laid siege vnto the castell of Couper, but now being aduertised of the coming of this armie against him, he raised his siege, & went to Striueling to defend the bridge there, that Hugh Cressingham with his armie should not passe the same, according as the report went his intent was to doe. Here encountering with the enimies, the third Ides of September, he obtained a verie worthie victorie, for he slue not onlie the fore-said Cressingham with a great part of his armie being passed the riuer, but also forced the residue to flee, in such sort, that a great number of them were drowned, and few escaped awaie with life. Thus hauing gotten the vpper hand of his enimies here at Stri-ueling, he returned againe to the siege of Couper, which shortlie after vpon his returne thither, was rendred vnto him by those that were within in garrison. There were manie of the Scottish nobilitie the same time, that sent vnto him, offering to leaue the king of Englands part, and to aid him with monie and vittels, if he would onlie receiue them into fa-uour, wherevnto he granted. By which means, sundrie other castles were yelded vnto him, the which after he had garnished with men, munition, and vit-tels (according as was thought requisite) he brake vp his campe, and went with sundrie of his most faith-full friends vnto the castell of Striueling.

Afterwards perceiving that through fearfullie of coyne, great deatch arose on each side within the realme of Scotland, he deuised which way he might best relieue the peoples necessitie and lacke in that behalf, and hereupon he determined to passe with a mightie armie into England, and to sojourne there the most part of the winter, in sustaining the whole number of his men of warre on such prouision as they might find within the bounds of their enimies countrie. He commanded therefore that all the Scots, appointed to go with him in that iournee, should be readie at a certeine day and place perfired.
But diuers of the northerne Scots (as they of Aber-den and other) for that they disobeyed his commandements set forth by letters and proclamations, were hanged as rebels and traitors to their coun-trie. By whose example, other being put in feare, his commandements were the better obeyed, so that hauing got together an huge host of men, he entered with the same into Forthumberland, wasting and spoiling the countrie euen vnto Newcastle. Thus putting the enimies in great feare and terror of his awfull name, he brought his armie backe againe into Scotland, loden with spoile and glorie of their prosperous atchiued iournee. They entered into England (as Io. Maior writeth) about the feast of All saints, and remained there till Candlemas after, liuing still vpon the spoile of the Englishmens goods.

Edward king of England, being informed of the great slaughter of his people, and what damage the Scots had done in Forthumberland, returned in great displeasure out of France into England, and sent his ambassadors vnto Wallace, fore menacing him, for that he had invaded his realme in such cruell wise in his absence, which he durst (as he sent him word) full little haue done, if he had bene at home himselfe. Wallace herevnto answered, that he had taken the advantage for the atchiuing of his interprise, touching the inuasion of England, in like sort as king Edward had done for the conquest of Scotland,

Hugh Cressingham sent into Scotland

Hugh Cressingham slaine at Striueling
and his armie discomfited by William Wallace.

The castell of Couper ren-
dred to Wallace.

Deatch in Scotland.
The policie of Wallace to relieve the peoples lacke
in time of deatch.

Disobedience
punished.

Wallace inuaded Forth-
umberland.

Fr. Thin.

Edwards
message vnto Wallace.

The answer of Wallace to Edwards
message as
the Scots
dowrite.

S.iii.

land, at such time as he was chosen by the nobles of the realme as indifferent iudge in decision of the right and lawfull title of the parties that stroue and were at contention for the crowne. And further, to the end it might appeare vnto king Edward, that he inuaded England in defense of his owne native countrie, and that he was fullie bent to imploie his whole induer to deliuer the same from all maner of subiection to any forreine power, and to reuenge the injuries done to them by the Englishmen in times past; he willed the English ambassadoers to declare from him vnto king Edward, that he purposed to hold his Casser in England (if God afforded him life) and that in despite of king Edward, and all such as would beare armoz against him.

Wallase entered England with an armie of 30000 men.

And vndoubtedlie according to his promise he kept his day: for assembling together an armie of 30000 men, he entred into England at the time before appointed, where king Edward was ready with an armie vpon Stanesmore, double in number to the Scots, to giue them battell: but when the time came that both parties were ready to haue ioined, the Englishmen withdrew, hauing no lust (as should seme) to fight with the Scots at that time) who perceiving them to giue backe, incontinentlie would haue rushed forth of their rankes to haue pursued in chase after them: but Wallase (doubting lest the Englishmen had ment some policie, and saing (as writeth Io. Ma. lib. 4. cap. 14.) that it was honor enough for him that he had inforced so mightie a prince in his owne countrie to forsake the field) caused the Scots to keepe together in order of battell, and so preferring them from the deceitfull malice of their enemies, brought them backe into Scotland with liues and honours saved, besides the infinit spoiles and booties which they got in this fornie.

But as in the beginning all men were glad to support Wallase in all exploits and enterprises which he toke in hand, so afterward when his fame began to wax great, to the derogation of other mens renownes, such as were farre his superiours in birth and linage, that fauor which mantle bare him at the first, was now turned into enuie, hauing no small indignation, that a man of so base parentage should so surmount them in all honor and dignitie. Those that enuied him most, were of the Cumins blood, and Robert Bruce. King Edward being aduertised of this enuious grudge, and new sedition amongst the nobles of Scotland, had secret conference by his agents with the chieftest amongst those that thus enuied the high glozie of Wallase, and vpon trust of such practise as was concluded by reason of the same conference, he came with a mightie armie into Scotland, and at Falkirke met with this Wallase, who mistrusting no guile, had raised a power to resist him: but now being come in sight of the Englishmen, there rose a right odious contention betwixt the head capteins, who should haue the leading of the vanguard, which is reputed a most high honor amongst the Scottishmen. And among other, John Stewart, and John Cumins, thought scoone, that Wallase a man of so low beginning, should be preferred before them in that honour: but on the other part, Wallase considering that the charge of the whole was giuen vnto him by agreement and consent of the three estates, thought it no reason that he should giue place to anie of them, though vnto his face, as saith John Maior, the lord Stewart had before vpbraid him with his pride, comparing him to an otter, which from his originall had begged a feather of euery bird, and being now enriched with abundance of feathers, did aduance himselfe aboue all other birds.

In the meane time came the Englishmen vpon them right fiercelie, before the Scottish chieftains (hauing their breasts filled with more malice one against another, than with desire to defend their countrie against their enemies) could bring their men into anie perfect arais. Herewith at the coming to the point of ioining, the Cumins with their retinues fled out of the field, and left the residue of the Scots in all the danger. Robert Bruce seruing that day among the Englishmen, fetched a compasse about an hill, and came on the backs of the Scots, so that they were in maner compassed in, and beaten downe on each side: yet Wallase left nothing vndone that might pertaine to the dutie of a valiant capteine. But at length, all his induers notwithstanding, the Scots (ouerlet with multitude of enemies, as the Scottish writers affirme) were slaine in such huge numbers, that he was constrained to draw out of the field, which such small remnants as were left alive. The Englishmen pursued fiercelie after him, namely one valiant capteine named Frere Brian Jaie, a templer, whom Wallase perceiving to be within his danger, stepped forth vnto him, and stue him there in sight (as it is said) of all the English armie. Which valiant act of Wallase caused the Englishmen somewhat to staie, for doubt of further perill by their vnwise pursue likelie to befall them. In this unfortunate battell, were slaine on the Scottish side, John Stewart of Bute, with his Wyandans (for so they name them that are taken vp to serue in the warres forth of the Stewards lands) Spakdulle earle of Fife, with sir John Graham, whose death was much lamented by Wallase, as one whom he highly esteemed for his great experience in warlike knowledge. Many other noble and valiant men died in this conflict, whose names would be too long to rehearse. This battell was stricken on Marie Magdalens daie, in the yere of our Lord 1298, and therefore the Englishmen haue holden it euer since an happie day for to fight against the Scots.

* When William Wallase was passed the river Carran, where he might defend himselfe, and gather his dispersed people, Bruce desired to speake vnto him, which Wallase did not denie. Wherevpon each of them drawing alone by themselves without any arbiters to the bankes of the river, in such place as it was narrowest, and they might without anie compaite best heare one another; Bruce began to say as followeth. I do much muse, thou most valiant of all men, what came into thy mind to be caried away by the vncertaine fauor of the common people, and to stand against the mightiest king of our age, supported with the greatest forces of the Scots: and daile to offer thy selfe to euery danger, and that for no reward assured to thee for all thy labors. For if thou shouldst ouercome king Edward, the Scots will neuer aduance thee to the kingdom, and if thou be overcome, there resteth no refuge for thee, but onelie the mercie of thine enemie. And dost thou not see the Cumins, and me, and the most of the nobilitie, to follow the English faction? Neither dost thou consider the malice of the princes conceiued against thee? Loke vnto thy selfe, and thou hast but a few of the nobles thy partakers, and a small number of the commons (which are more vncertaine than the wind) to follow thee, whose fortune is now almost ouerthrowne. All these words John Maior supposed that Robert Bruce did speake, to serch the mind of Wallase, whether he ment to aspire to the crowne or no: being in deed rather contented that Wallase had left the field, than otherwise to reduce him to the part of king Edward.

To whom Wallase answered in this sort. The end of all my trauell was not to attaine the kings

The Cumins fled.

The Scots discomfited at Falkirke.

Frere Brian Jaie slaine by the hands of William Wallase.

Nobles of Scotland slaine at the battell of Falkirke.

Marie Magdalens day prosperous to the Englishmen to fight against the Scots.

Fr. Thin. John Maior lib. 4. cap. 14. Buchan. lib. 8. Lessus epil. Ross. li. 6. p. 3. Conference betwixt Wallase & Bruce.

come; for my birth and fortune neither doo or could deserue it, and my mind did neuer desire it: but the negligent slouth of the (to whom the right of that diademe doth apperteyne, and who doth greedilie hunt thereafter) made my citizens (perceiuing themselves destitute of faithfull gouernours) to follow me, and caused me (when I saw them in that miserie, rather butcherlie tozme, than in honest seruitude to be oppressed) to seeke for libertie. Which suerlie I had obtained for them and you, if the nobilitie had not so euillie strived against me, restrained themselves for comming into the field, and had but sent their hinds (which till their land south to the battell, at which time I had scarce 10000 men, & those of common sort. Trulie if the princes had not bene impediment thereto, I could haue brought forth to fight a hundred thousand bold and cherefull souldiers. But now in truth I perceiue the hatred of the nobles against me this day. Wherefore if thou pretend to possesse the kingdome, I giue thee faithfull warning, especiallie to beware of the Cumins: who if they had more regarded the glorie of their countrie, than of secret malice to others, would not so wickedlie haue forsaken the field, what hate soeuer they had conceiued against me. If they haue giuen their faith to the king of England, they are not bound to keepe it: in a wicked promise no oth is to be performed. I am now wearie of my life, and rather desire to die, than to liue in this sort, to see the miserie of my beloued countrie. Wherefore embrace you this thraldome (which is so much esteemed of you) to whom althie seruitude with ease seemeth more pleasant, than honest libertie with danger: for I had rather chuse willing death with freedom (in which I meane to spend my blood) than to do as you haue done, because the loue of my countrie shall not depart from my hart, before the life of my bodie depart from his office. Which being said, Bruce burst forth in teares, considering the nobilitie of the mind of Wallace, although perhaps he nothing mistook the misfortune of the man, as doubting the end of all his pretense to be, to attaine to the crowne. This being thus done, they both depart to their companies. By which conference (saith Leslee bishop of Ross) this good was wrought to Scotland (to recompense the ouerthrow of Falkirke) that Wallace partlie by the bitterness of his words, and partlie for the loue of his countrie, did now draw Bruce from the English, to take part with the Scots.)

But notwithstanding all these valiant speeches of Wallace, when he considered the infortunat discomfiture by him so treacherouslie receiued, he came to Perth, and there uttering by complaint the inuoluntarie enuie of the nobles against him, he renounced and discharged himselfe of all the authoritie which had bene committed to his hands, touching the gouernance of the realme, and went into France, as saith Leslee. But Iohannes Maior saith, that he neuer came there, although he will not flatlie denie it. The same time, Philip king of France, the fourth of that name, and surnamed le Beau, hauing great ruth in his hart for the miserable calamities thus chanced to his ancient confederat friends the Scots, and that chiefie for the quarrell of France, sent his ambassadours vnto Edward king of England, who had latelie before married his daughter, requiring that there might be some peace or abstinence of warre granted. At his request therefore a truce was taken betwixt the Scots and Englishmen, to indure from the feast of All Saints, till the feast of Pentecost next following.

The Scots in the meane time soze oppressed by reason of long warres, sent ambassadours to pope Boniface, in presenting a verie gracious complaint vnto him, for the great affliction done to them by king Edward, who was fullie bent by inuoluntarie meanes (as they alledged) to conquer their realme, and therefore they belought him to constrain king Edward by vertue of his prerogative, which he pretended to haue ouer the realme of England, to stand to his order in deciding the right concerning the liberties of Scotland, which might no other waies be determined, but by intollerable damage falling to the people through blind desire and conetous ambition of the nobles, contending for the crowne. The pope (as is said) after he had by god and deliberat aduise heard the matter, gaue sentence with the Scots, that they had iust cause of warres in defense of the liberties of their countrie, against k. Edward and his fautors. But for this matter, loke in the English chronicles, where it shall well appere, that the pope by these letters of king Edward, was fullie satisfied of his superiortie ouer Scotland.

The Scots somewhat recomforted herewith, shortly hereupon chose John Cummin to their gouernor, in purpose to trie with the Englishmen for their liberties. Whereof king Edward being aduertised, sent forth with an armie into Scotland, which passed through the countrie to saint Johns towne, with great damage of those that were adiudged rebels to king Edwards empire. All the countrie in manner vnto Forthie, at this season was subiect to the Englishmen, sauing such few of the inhabitants, as liued within the woods, hauing more regard to the ancient liberties of their countrie, than to aie desire of preserving their goods or liues. John Cummin therefore, desirous to redresse this heauie miserie and lamentable case of his countrie, admitted Simon Fraser fellow with him in the administration of the warres against the Englishmen, and therewith gathering an armie of eight thousand hardie men of warre, settesth in hand to reuenge the inuoluntarie wrongs of the enimies, chasing out of the realme all such officers with their seruants, as king Edward had placed in aie comes within the bounds of Scotland; and such as resisted, he pursued in most cruell wise, not sparing to put them vnto the sword in all places, where he might find them.

King Edward soze kindled in displeasure with these attempts of such desperat persons, raised an armie of thirtie thousand men, and sent the same into Scotland, vnder the leading of a verie stout and valiant capteine, named Radulph or Rafe Confrate. This Radulph at his comming into Scotland, toke small regard to the ordering of his field, but diuided his armie into three parts, euerie part containing ten thousand men, and appointed them to passe south to forate the countrie, and to meet altogether at Rosslyn, in such sort and time as he prescribed. John Cummin and Simon Fraser being aduertised hereof, gathered their powers together, to the number of seven or eight thousand men, and determined to trie the chance of battell with one part of the English armie first, trusting that if they happened to haue the upper hand of one of the three parts, the other two would be the more easie to deale with. The Scottish capteins resolued thus vpon that point, exhorted their people to remember how they were to fight in defense of their wiues, their children, their gods, and liberties of their countrie, against such as sought to bring them into thraldome and vile seruitude.

With which words the Scots were so imboldered, that minding either to die or to win the victorie, they gaue the onset so fiercelie on their enimies, that the first battell of the Englishmen was quicklie ouerthrowen and vanquished. But scarcelie had they gathered the spoile, when an other part of the Englishmen came vpon them with more fiercenesse than the other

The opinion of the pope.

John Cummin the younger elected gouernor of Scotland. An armie of Englishmen sent into Scotland.

King Edwards officers chased out of Scotland.

Scotland againe invaded

Radulph Confrate. I remember not that aie of the English nobilitie bare this surname in those daies, wherefore I thinke it was the lord John Stgraue. John Cummin and Simon Fraser.

The first battell of the Englishmen ouerthrowen.

The second
battell overcome.

other before: neuertheless, the Scots encouraged with their fresh towne victorie, got themselves spoiled into arraie, & receiued their enemies with such incredible manhood, that they had quickly got the upper hand of these also. But scarce had they made an end with this second battell, when the third part was at hand readie to charge them, being now soze infir- 10 bled, that thorough wearinesse and wounds receiued in the two former encounters, besides the want of such of their numbers as were slaine: yet by exhortation of their capitaines, and the balliant presence of the officers of bands beside, they rushed forth on their enemies with such earnest forwardnesse to receive them, that after a verie sharpe bickering, they put the whole number of them to flight. Few of the Englishmen had escaped the Scottishmens hands, had they not bene so wearied with continuall fight, that they were not able to follow anie great waie in the chase.

The third
battell of the Englishmen
vanquished at Roslin.

1302.
The matter is amplified
by the Scots
to the victors
most.

The great preparation of king Edward
to invade the Scots.

The Scots
withdrew to their holds.
The English
armie paceth through Scotland from the south parts to the north.

As Edward
sendeth vnto Wallase.

Wallase refuseth
the offers
of R. Edward

The castell of Sterling rendered.

This Althred
the Scottish
bookes name
Dilkes.

The castell of Arquhard taken by force.

This victorie fell to the Scots in manner as is be- 20 fore rehearsed, vpon saint Matthewes day, in the yere after the birth of our Saviour 1302. The glorie of this victorie was great, considering that thirtie thousand Englishmen well furnished, & though-ly appointed for warre, should be thus in one day vanquished with an handfull of Scottishmen. For as their histories make mention, they passed not eight thousand at the most: and therefore all men supposed that it came to passe by the singular fauour and grace of almightie God. But yet the Scots did not long intoy the benefits of so notable a victorie. For king Edward hearing of this discomfiture of his people at Roslin, gathered a mightie armie of Englishmen, Gascoigns, Irishmen, and such Scots as toke his part, and hauing all his furniture and puruei- 30 ance readie both by sea and land, he set forward with the same to invade the Scots on ech side. The Scots perceiuing they were not of puissance able to resist his inuasion, withdrew to their strengths: by means whereof the English armie passed through all Scotland, euen from the south parts to the north, & found few or none to make resistance, except Wallase, and such as followed his opinion, which were fled to the mounteins and woods, to eschue the malice of the Englishmen.

It is said, that king Edward required by a mes- senger sent vnto this Wallase, that if he would come in and be sworne his liege man and true subiect, he should haue at his hands great lordships and posses- sions within England, to mainteine his port as 50 was requisit to a man of vertie honorable estate. But Wallase refused these offers, saieing that he preferred libertie with small revenues in Scotland, before anie possession of lands in England, were the same neuer so great; considering he might not intoy them, but vnder the yoke of bondage. The casting of Sterling at the same time was in the keeping of one sir William Althred knight, who would not render it to king Edward by anie summons or other meanes, till after thre moneths siege he 60 was constrained to giue it ouer vnder these conditions; That all persons being within the castell, should depart by safe conduct with bagge and baggage at their pleasure. Neuertheless king Edward caused the said sir William Althred to be conueied to London, where he remained as prisoner manie yeres after.

Sundrie other castels were taken by force the same time by king Edward, and all such as resisted, being found within anie of them, slaine without mercie or ranome. Amongest other, the castell of Arquhard in Marrey land was taken by force, and not one left alieue that was found in the same (one gentlewoman onelie excepted) who being great with child, was in that respect preferred. She was the wife of Alexander Boyis, lord of that house, though by reason she was got into poore apparell, the Englishmen toke hir but for some other woman of meaner estate. She therefore with hir life saued, being suffered to depart, got hir ouer into Ireland, where the was deliuered of a son; that was named at the font-stone Alexander, who when Scotland was recovered out of the Englishmens hands, came to king Robert le Buse, requiring him to be restored vnto his fathers heritage, being as then in the occupation of other possessors. King Robert doubtfull what to do hereint, for he thought it neither conuenient that a prince should take lands or possessions from noble men, which had bene giuen to them in reward of their manhood, thewed in defense of the realme; neither iudged he it reason to keepe him from his rightfull inheritance that had lost his father, his friends, and all his whole substance in the like cause and quarrell by iniurie of the common enemies.

Wherefore to qualifie the matter, he denised this meane: he gaue vnto this Alexander Boyis certeine other lands in Spar, nothing lesse in value (considering the largenesse and fertillitie) than the other of Arquhard were: and willed him to content himselfe with those, in recompense of such as belonged to his father: to the intent that all parties might be satisfi- ed, and no man should seme to haue wrong in being deprived of his rightfull possessions. This Alexander Boyis had afterwards his name changed, and was called Forbesse, for that he slue a beare in those parties, by great and singular manhood. And so the sur- name of the Forbesses had beginning, as descended from him. Scotland being subdued by the mightie puissance of king Edward, he went about to abolish all the old statutes and ancient constitutions of the realme, trusting by that meanes, that Scots living together with Englishmen, vnder one vniforme manner of lawes, they should finallye sort themselves to be of one mind and opinion, as well touching the su- 40 preme gouernement of their publike weale, as also in all other things, touching the friendlie societie of life.

He burnt all the chronicles of the Scottish nation, with all manner of bookes, as well those contain- ing diuine seruice, as anie other treatises of profane matters, to the end that the memorie of the Scots should perish: and thereto appointed grie- uous punishments for them that should disobey his commandements hereint, in keeping anie of the said bookes vndeaced. And he ordeined also, that the Scots should occupie church bookes after the vse of Sarum, and none other. Whereouer he compelled all such Scottishmen as were of anie singular know- ledge in learning or literature, to be resident in Ox- ford, doubting least the Scottish nobilitie increasing in politike prudence by their instructions, should seeke to throw off the yoke of bondage. Thus king Edward going about (as the Scottish writers doe re- port) to extinguishe the name of Scots, together with their rule and empire, passed through the most part of all the bounds of Scotland. And vpon verie hate which he had to the Scottish antiquities, at his com- ming to Camelon, he commanded the round temple standing ouer against the same, to be thrown downe, which was builded (as before is shewed) in the hono- 60 of Claudius the emperoz, and the goddesse Victoria. But for that his commandement was not immedi- atly put in execution, he changed his purpose, and appointed onelie that the monuments of Claudius, with the superscription of his name, should be taken auaie; and in place thereof, the armes of king Arthur, with his name to be set vp; commanding the place to be called Arthurs hois (as ye would say) Ar- thurs

The marble
chaine is con-ued into England, and placed in West minster.
The nobilitie
of Scotland
sworne to R.
Edward.

Wallase effurch to re-
grate with the Englishmen.

Domare of Romer de Es-
linter governor of Scotland vnder
king Edward

Conference between Camin and Buse.

The beginning of the name of the Forbesses.

Indutures
agreement between Ca-
min & Buse, touching the conspiracie.

Chronicles
and other bookes burnt

John Cam-
min doubt.

Scottishmen
learned, commanded to be resident in Oxford.

Camin discussion the con-
spiracie.

The temple of Claudius
was at Colchester, and not in Scotland, whither Hector Boetius
of other deca-
thered.

Robert Bp
of Exeter
was in
the year 1302

he be richly
writing.

thurs court.

For marble sculpture consisted into England, and sculpture in Scotland
sculpture in England.

While effect to acquire with the Englishmen.

Domare or domare de Ma-rence governor of Scotland under king Edward

Conference between Cummin and Buse.

The beginning of the name of the Fozbelle.

Simulacra
agreement between Cum-min and Buse, concerning the dispute.

Chronicles
and other
bookes burne

John Cummin
and Buse.

Cummin's declaration concerning the dispute.

Scottishmen
learned, commanded to be resident in Dunfermline.

The temple
of Claudius
was at Colchester, and not in Scotland, what Hector Boetius
of there dreamt thereof.
Arthurs bo

Whereupon king Edward at his returning into England, took the chaire of marble with him, and causing it to be conveyed up to London, did place it at Westminster, where it remaineth yet unto this day. Furthermore, before his departure out of Scotland, he appointed all the Scottish lords to assemble at Scone, where he caused them to take a new oath, that from thenceforth they should take him for their soueraine lord, and to obeye him in all things as loiall subjects. All the nobilitie of Scotland was sworn to him that day (Wallase onelie excepted) who eschewed more than the companie of a serpent, to haue anie thing to do with the Englishmen, touching anie agreement to be made with them, agreeable to their desires. Whereupon, to keepe the Scots from rebellion, king Edward ordeined Adam de Wallace to be gouernour there, as his generall lieutenant ouer the whole realme of Scotland in his absence. And having thus set all things in good and quiet order (as he supposed) he returned into England with great ioy and triumph.

In the meane time, John Cummin surnamed the red, and Robert Buse having conference together, complained the one to the other of the miserable seruitude wherein the realme of Scotland as then stood by the oppression of king Edward. And at length by offers made betwixt them, it was agreed, that if by anie means they might deliuer the realme out of the Englishmens hands, the one of them should be king, that is to say, the Buse, and the other, that is to say, the Cummin, should enjoy all the Buses lands and possessions, with manie other preferments of honours and dignities, as next unto him in all authoritie touching the gouernement of the realme. There were indentures made betwixt them, subscribed with their names, and sealed with their seals interchangeable, for the full ratifying of covenants agreed in this confederacie betwixt them. Shortly after, vpon deliuerie of those writings, Buse went into England, for he might not remaine long in Scotland, for doubt of suspicion which king Edward had in him, because of the title which he had to the crowne of Scotland (as before is specified) so that (as was thought) king Edward would haue put both him and his brethren unto death long before, if he might haue once got them all into his hands.

John Cummin (after that he and Buse were thus agreed vpon articles, and departed the one from the other) began to doubt, least this conspiracie devised betwixt them, would not last to anie luckie conclusion for his purpose, either for that he feared the great puissance of king Edward, either else for that his authoritie and power (as he mistrusted) would not be great, if the Buse once attained the crowne: and hereupon he sent one of his seruants to king Edward, with his counterpane of the indenture, containing the covenants of the confederacie, signed and sealed with Buses owne hand and seals. The messenger deliuered this writing in secret unto king Edward, declaring vnto him the whole matter as it was passed and concluded betwixt the Buse and his maister, according to instructions giuen him in that behalfe. Vpon which king Edward at the first gave him credit either to the writings, or words of the Cummin, supposing that the same were done onelie through anie which he bare towards the Buse, considering lest he should beare no rule in Scotland, if the Buse once attained anie authoritie within the same. Yet at length king Edward pondering with himselfe the whole circumstance, and being in some doubt of the matter, he desired the counterpane of the indenture vnto Buse himselfe, questioning with him: if he knew his owne hand, and Buse answered that he was prouide to anie such deuise or writing, and there-fore desired of king Edward to haue the same for one night, to peruse and scan ouer at leasure, & then if he were not able to proue that it was forged, and maliciouslie deuised vpon an enuious purpose, to put him in danger of life, he would forfait all his lands and liuings that he held either within the realme of England, or else where. King Edward, because he conieured at the first how this accusation of Cummin was nothing like to be true, granted his request, wherein manie iudged he did unwise: but such was the ordinance of almighty God, that Buse should escape that danger, to accomplish that whereunto he was appointed. The earle of Gloucester immediatlie after that Robert Buse was departed from the kings presence, sent vnto him twelue sterling pence, with two sharpe spurs, whereby he conieured his meaning to be, that the best shift for him was to auoid out of the wale in most speedie wise, whereupon he causing a smith to shoo three horses for him, contrarilie with the calkins forward, that it should not be perceiued which wale he had taken by the tract of the horses, for that the ground at that time (being in the winter season) was couered with snow: he departed out of London about midnight, accompanied onelie with two trustie seruants.

Robert Buse
with his.

It chanced also, that there fell on the same night more snow aloft vpon the other snow that was fallen before, by reason whereof it could not easilie be iudged in the morning which way he was gone, though king Edward vpon knowledge had that he was fled, sent out a great manie of horsemen after, to haue brought him againe, if they might anie where haue found him. But Buse halted forth with such speed in his iourne, that the tenth day of his departure from London, he came to Louchmaben in Armandale, and there found David, or (as some books haue) Edward his brother, with Robert Fleming, a worthy yong gentleman, vnto whom (they musing what he meant by his sudden coming) he declared into what perill of life he had fallen by means of Cummin, and how narrowlie he had escaped out of king Edwards hands. His brother hearing the matter, consented to go with him, and to be partaker of all haps that might fortune to fall out in his sight; and by the way they chanced to light vpon one of Cummins seruants, that was going with letters vnto king Edward from his maister the said Cummin, signifying by the same, that if Buse were not the soner put to death, there would insue shortly such trouble and ruffling in Scotland against king Edward, that it would be much adoe to appease it.

He cometh to Louchmaben.

Robert Fleming.

A seruant of Cummin taken with letters on him.

These letters being found about Cummins seruant, through means of yong Fleming, the Buse after he had appoynted the bearer thereof in each behalfe, and learned of him that his maister the said Cummin was in the friers at Dunfermline, he first due this fellow that was thus sent with the letters, & after in all hast possible came to Dunfermline, by the guiding of the said Fleming, where he the quier of the friers church there he found Cummin. And reasoning the matter there with him, so that he had vled him to euill, and withall shewing him the indenture which king Edward had deliuered to him, as before is mentioned, in the end (after some multipling of words together) Robert Buse plucked forth his sword, and broke the door said Cummin a sore blow in the head, and thereupon fleeing out of the church, met with two of his dearest friends, James Lindsay, and Roger Blackthorne, who beholding his countenance altered, and comming forth of the church both hast, deniued of him what was the matter. I trow (said he) that Cummin is slain. Where (say they againe) had thou attempted so high an

Cummin was at the friers in Dunfermline.

an enterpryse, and lest it doubtfull? And immediatlie herewith they went to the place where Cummin lay wounded (as before is mentioned) and asked of him whether he thought he had anie death's wound, or hoped to recouer if he might haue a good surgian. And for that he answered how he trusted to do well inough if he might haue a good surgian in time; they gaue him three or foure other wounds so grievous and deadlie, that forthwith vpon the same he yielded vpon the ghost. This chanced in the yeare of our Lord 1305, the fourth Ides of Februarie. About the same time was William Wallace taken at Glasgow by the means of sir John Spenteth and others, in whome he had euer put a most speciall trust; but they being corrupted with the offers of large rewards promised by king Edward to such as could helpe to take him, wrought such fetches that he was apprehended at length by Domare de Valence earle of Penbroke, who with a great power of men brought him to London, where he was put to death, and his quarters sent into Scotland, and set vp in sundrie great towne there for a spectacle, as it were to giue example to other. This was the end of that puissant champion William Wallace, praised amongst the Scottismen aboue all other in that age, for so much as he would neuer yield or consent to acknowledge anie superiouritie in the Englishmen or uer his countrie, no not when all other had submitted themselves to king Edward as his liege subjects and most obedient vassals. It is said, that when he was young and went to schole, he learned by heart two verses of his scholemaister, which euer after he bare in mind, and usually would rehearse them, (when a top toke him in the head) as followeth.

*Dico tibi verum, libertas optima rerum, Nunquam serui, sub nexu viuito fli.
My sonne I say, freedom is best, Then neuer yeeld to thralls arrest.*

Of this William Wallace one Henrie, who was blind from his birth, in the time of my natiuitie (saith John Maior) composed a whole booke in vulgar berse, in which he intred all those things vulgarlie spoken of this Wallace. But I do not in all points saith the same author, giue credit to the writings of such as he was, who onelie get their food and clothing (whereof this man was most worthy) by reciting of histories before the nobilitie of Scotland.

But now touching Bruce; after he had slain Cummin (as before is mentioned) he purchased an abolition from Rome for that act: and to the end he might then through authoritie obtaine some aid to resist the puissance of his aduersarie king Edward, he went by support of friends into Scone, where caused himselfe to be crowned king, on the 27 day of March, though he had no great number that toke his part in the beginning; as shortly after well appeared. For when he should assemble an armie against a power of Englishmen that were sent against him by king Edward, immediatlie vpon knowledge had of his attempts, he was not able to get together anie sufficient number to resist his aduersaries, though with those few which came vnto him, he thought to trie the chance of battell, and so incountring with Domare de Valence lieutenant of the English armie at Speffen the 9 day of June 1306, he was there put to flight; and though the slaughter was not greatly yet for that it was iudged to be an evil signe to haue such infortunat lucke vpon his entering into the estate, the peoples faith and thanks grew at the from him.

Domare de Valence after he had obtained this victorie against king Robert, banished the date of all those that supported the same Robert, and whereof, manie ladies and gentlewomen were constrained to flee into woods, and other desert places, to escape the crueltie of their aduersaries. King Robert also after this ouerthrow, fled into Atholl, and from thence to Streill, where the third Ides of August at a place called Dalreie, he fought againe with the Cummins and other such Scots & Englishmen as were assembled in those parties ready to pursue him, and had the like lucke here that had chanced to him before at Speffen; for he was put to flight after the same maner, though he lost here but few of his men, neither in the fight nor chase. This place Dalreie is as much to say, as the kings field: Buchanan lib. 8, which is also called Watokie by I. Maior. lib. 4. cap. 19, who supposeth that Bruce had so hard a beginning for a punishment of the death of Cummin, slaine in the church by him and his friends. Whereupon finding fortune thus contrarie vnto him in these two seuerall battels, he was left so desolat and vnprovidid of all friendship, that he was constrained for his refuge to withdraw into the woods and mounteins, with a few other in his company, and there liued on herbs and roots oftentimes for want of other food.

Whilste he remained in this estate of aduersie fortune, there were two that shewed themselves right trustie and faithfull seruants vnto him aboue all the rest, the earle of Leuenor, and Gilbert Haie: for though either inforced by persecution of enemies, or constrained through some other necessitie, they departed sometimes from his presence; yet did they euer acknowledge him for their soueraigne lord and onelie king, ready at all seasons to serue and obey him in each behalfe. The most part of all other his friends yea and seruants, in that present miserie, did cleaue for sake him; so that sometimes he was left with onelie one or two in his companie, & glad to keepe himselfe secret in desert places, where no person lightlie vsed to resort. His wife & quene fled to saint Dunno, and chanced to be taken by William Cummin earle of Ross, who deliuered hir to king Edward; by whose commandement she was committed to safe keeping at London, where she remained till after the battell of Bannockshorne. His brother Nigel was also taken, and so afterwards were his two other brethren, Thomas and Alexander, with manie other nobles and gentlemen of Scotland, of whome some were executed at Carleill, and some at Berwick. Nigel was taken at the castell of Kildbrake whither he fled, and came to Berwick. Thomas and Alexander were taken at Loores, and carried to Carleill, and so beheaded. I. Maior. lib. 4. cap. 19. Finally the most part of all such as had aided him before, and were now shonke from him, were within one yeare after, either slaine or kept his prisoners in England.

Perthoughe he was thus left desolat of all aid and succour, having his brethren and other of his friends murdered and slaine to his bitter discomfort and ruine (as was to be supposed) he neuertheless liued vntil hope of some better fortune, whereby in time to come he might recouer the realme out of the enemies hands, and restore the ancient libertie thereof to the former estate. As for the paines which he toke in liuing barelie for the most part by water & roots, eating of berries on the bare earth, without house or other habitation; he was so accustomed thereto by his long time of wandering in his youth, that the same grieuous thing little troubled him at all. But to conclude, such was his valiantie and most excellent fortitude of mind and courage, that no inuincible mischance or violent aduersitie could abate his inuincible heart and manlike courage. At length, after he had withdrawn from place to place in sundrie parts of Scotland,

Cummin is slaine.

1305.

Wallace is taken.

Wallace is brought to London.

He is put to death.

John Fourdon.
John Maior.

Fr. Thin.

Abolition from Rome.

Robert Bruce is crowned king of Scotland, the first of that name.

John Maior.
King Robert is discomfited at Speffen.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

King Robert is taken at Atholl.

Scotland, the better to avoid the sleights of them that lay in wait to apprehend him, he got over into one of the Fies, where comming unto one of his speciall friends, a man of high nobilitie and welbelovied of the people in those parts, he was most hartlie welcome, and gladlie of him receiued, to his great ease and comfort.

Here when he had remained a certeine space, he got support of men, armour and weapons, by meanes whereof taking new courage, he passed over unto Carrike, & winning the castell there that belonged to his fathers inheritance, he due all the Englishmen, which he found within it, and bestowed all the spoile of monie and goods gotten there amongst his soldiers and men of warre. His friends that late hid in covert and secret corners, hearing of these his doings, began from each side to resort unto him, by whose assistance shortly after he won the castell of Inverness, and due all them that were within it in garrison. With the like felicitie he got the most part of all the castles in the north, rasing & burning by the same till he came to Glenneke, where being advertised that John Cummin with sundrie Englishmen and Scots were gathered against him, because he was upon a strong ground, he determined there to abide them: but they being thereof informed, and wondering at his manlie courage, durst not approach to give him battell, but sent ambassadors unto him to have truce for a time, under colour of some communication for a peace, till they might increase their power more strongly against him: which being done, they pursued him more fiercely than before. Whereupon the king Robert received them at all times in such warlike order, that they might neuer take him at anie advantage, but were still driven backe with slaughter and losse, though the same was of no great importance to make account of, but such like as happeneth oftentimes in skirmishes & light encounters, where the battels come not to ioine puissance against puissance. The same whereof yet procured him the favour of sundrie great barons in Scotland.

* About this time, Simon Fraser, and Walter Logan (most valiant knights, and greatlie favouring their countrie) were taken (by such as followed the faction of Cummin) deliuered to the English, sent to London, and there executed. Almost about which time, James Dowglassie joined himselfe to the part of king Robert. This James being the sonne of William Dowglassie, was a yong gentleman very active and forward in all chiefe exercises and arts. When he gaue himselfe to studie at Paris (hearing that his father was by the king of England cast in prison, in which he shortly after died, as is before noted) returned home to dispose the rest of his life after the advise of his friends. But being without living, & all his other friends by misfortune dispersed: he committed himselfe to the service of W. Lambert bishop of saint Andrews, of whose house he was gentlie receiued into his familie, and well interteined: untill king Edward comming to Sterling (after that he had almost pacified all the rest of Scotland) to besiege Striueling: at what time Lambert going to Sterling to salute the king, caried Dowglassie to attend upon him, to the end to prefer him to his living and inheritance. Whereupon the bishop finding the king at convenient leisure, besought him to be favourable to this Dowglassie; to restore him unto his fathers patrimonie: and that (receiuing the yong man into his fealtie and defence) it would please him to imploye him in his faithfull and warlike service: adding further such commendations in the behalfe of James, as for that time he thought most convenient. But the king was derst.inding his name and kinred, spake bitterlie of the disobedience and stubborneesse of his father William Dowglassie; further answering, that he would neither use the same James, nor his travel in anie thing, neither that he could (if so he would) restore him to his patrimonie, because he had with the same gratified other that well deserved it. For which cause being by the king so repelled, he remained still in the bishops service, untill Wm. came into Berne, at what time (least he might lose the opportunity to offend king Edward, whom he secretly in heart disdained) this Dowglassie departed from Lambert his master, taking with him all the bishops gold, and certeine of his best horses, with the which, having in his companie diverse other hardie yong gentlemen, priue to his doings, he fled with all speed unto king Robert, offering him his service, and to spend his life in his quarell and defense. The bishop was priue to his counsels going awaie, yea and counselled him thereunto, though he would by no means it should outwardlie so appeare, for doubt least if things had not come to passe as he wished, he might have run in danger for his cloaked dissimulation. The Dowglassie was iustlie receiued of king Robert, in whose service he faithfully continued both in peace and warre to his liues end.

Though the surname and familie of the Dowglassies was in some estimation of nobilitie before those daies, yet the rising thereof to honor chanced through this James Dowglassie: for by meanes of his advancement, other of the same linage took occasion by their singular manhood and noble prowes shewed at sundrie times in defense of the realme, to grow to such height in authoritie & estimation, that their mightie puissance in mainteint, lands, & great possessions, at length was (through suspicion conceived by the kings that succeeded) the cause in part of their ruinous decay. Edward king of England hearing of the doings of his aduersarie king Robert, doubted (if some redresse were not found in time) lest the Scots reioicing in the prosperous successe of his said aduersarie, would revolt wholie from the English obedience: and hereupon purposing with all speed to subdue the whole realme of Scotland from end to end, he came (with a far greater armie than ever he had raised before) to the borders; but before his entring into Scotland, he fell sicke of a right fore and grievous maladie, whereof he died shortly after at Burgh upon sands, as in the English historie more plainlie doth appeare, though Buchanan say he died at Lancaster.

The Scottish writers make mention, that a litle before he departed out of this world, there were brought unto him 55 yong striplings, which were taken in the castell of Widdowmme, after it was wonne by the Englishmen, and being asked what should be done with them, he commanded they should be hanged incontinentlie, without respect to their yong peeres, or consideration of their innocencies that might have moved him to pittie. After his decesse, his sonne Edward of Carnarvan succeeded in the gouernement of England, who following his fathers enterprize, called a councill at Dunfreis, summoning the lords of Scotland to appeare at the same, and caused a great number of them at their comming thither to do their homage unto him, as to their superior lord and gouernor: but yet diners disobeyed his commandements, and would not come at his summoning, upon trust of some change of fortune by the death of his father, for that the son was much giuen (as was reported) to incline his eare to lewd counsell, not without the great griefe of his people, and namelie of the lords and chiefe nobles of his realme.

Shortly

A craftie dissimulating priuate.

The rising of the Dowglassies to honor.

The death of king Edward Longshanks.

The cruelty of king Edward as is noted by the Scottish writers.

Edward of Carnarvan, sonne to Edward Longshanks.

Honour to king Edward of Carnarvan con-

ices,
king
hall, es of aine
lyth,
ite to chan-
light
to of place Bulaior,
hard
f Cu-
tends.
unto so dee was
to the s com-
tines se for,
s right
all the ie: for tes, or ey de-
they eds and o obey her his feritie,
e was & glad ere no ne fled William
to king s com-
remal-
His wards Alexan-
men of at Car-then to king Robert
are taken
and to death.
ad and friends
and ru-lied ein time the en-
thereof
he took & roots, it house thereto
the same
include,
ortitude chance infecti-
he had arts of otland,

king Robert
was taken
into the castell of
Carrike.

king Robert
was taken
into the
castell of
Carrike.

king Robert
was taken
into the
castell of
Carrike.

king Robert
was taken
into the
castell of
Carrike.

king Robert
was taken
into the
castell of
Carrike.

king Robert
was taken
into the
castell of
Carrike.

king Robert
was taken
into the
castell of
Carrike.

king Robert
was taken
into the
castell of
Carrike.

king Robert
was taken
into the
castell of
Carrike.

king Robert
was taken
into the
castell of
Carrike.

king Robert
was taken
into the
castell of
Carrike.

king Robert
was taken
into the
castell of
Carrike.

king Robert
was taken
into the
castell of
Carrike.

king Robert
was taken
into the
castell of
Carrike.

king Robert
was taken
into the
castell of
Carrike.

Shozlie after this, the said Edward of Carnarvan returned into England, and in the meane time John Cummin erle of Buchquhane gathered a mightie armie, both of Scots and Englishmen to resist against king Robert, that he might thereby declare his faithfull affection toward the new English king. He trusted onelie with multitude of people to cause his enemies to giue place: but king Robert though he was holden with a sore sicknesse at that time, yet he assembled a power, and caused himselfe in a hostelitter to be caried forth with the same against his enemies, who abiding him at a streight, supposed it had bin an easie matter for them to be put to flight: but it chanced quite contrarie to their expectation, for in the end the Cummin with his whole armie was discomfited, and a great number of king Roberts aduersaries slaine or taken. This victorie was gotten at a village called Cnuerrour, ten miles distant from Aberdeen, on the Ascension daie, where with king Robert was so much refreshed in contentation of mind, that he was suddenlie ther vpon restored to his former health, hauing at that time also taken the castell of Aberdeen, which he vtterlie destroyed, and caused to be leuelled with the ground, to the end his enemies might haue no more refuge thereby.

John Cummin
discomfited by
king Robert at Cnuerrour 1308.
Fr. Thin.

Donald of the Fles discomfited by Edward Bruce.

Argile subdued by king
Robert.
This was in 1309, as Iohn
Ma. saith.

R. Edward
commeth into
Scotland, Anno 1310 as should seeme
by Io. Maior.

A soze dearth.

1311.
Castels reco-uered by king
Robert.

King Robert
inuaeth
England.

1312. Io. Ma.
The towne of Perth reco-uered, otherwise called
St. Johns towne.

Castels won.

In the same yere Donald of the Fles came with a great armie of Englishmen and Scots against R. Robert, and was on the feast day of the apostles Peter and Paule discomfited by Edward Bruce the kings brother, at the water of Deir. At this battell was a right valiant knight named Rowland, slaine of the English part, with a great number of other about him, and Donald himselfe was taken prisoner. Thus king Robert through fauour of prosperous fortune, obtaining the victorie in sundrie conflicts, came with an armie into Argile, and not onelie subdued the countrie to his obeisance, but also toke Alexander lord of Argile out of a strong castell in that countrie, and banished him with all his friends into England, where shozlie after he decessed. In the yere next following, king Edward came with an armie into Scotland, where joining with an other armie of Scots that were assembled readie to aid him, he passed through the countrie into Kanfretw, and at length without atchiuing anie notable enterprize worthie the mentioning, he returned againe into England.

In the same yere, through continuall warres, there rose such dearth & scarcitie of things in Scotland, that neither corne nor other vittels could be had for monie: for the ground in manner generally through the countrie late vntilled, and beasts with all kind of cattell were diuen awaie, as booties taken by the enemies. By reason wherof the famine so increased on each side, that the people were constrained to eat hostles, and other lothsome fleshy & meats, thereby to susteine their liues. In the yere following which was after the incarnation 1311, king Robert chased the Englishmen out of all parts of Scotland, winning manie castels out of their hands, diuerse of the which he rased and consumed with fire. After this entring at sundrie times into England with his fierce armie, he brought from thence innumerable booties of cattell and other riches, afflicting the Englishmen with like slaughter and calamities, as the Scots had suffered in the yeres before, by the outrageous force and puissance of king Edward. On the eight day of Januarie next ensuing, king Robert wan by fine force the strong towne of Perth, beating and hanging all the people both English and Scottish, which were found in the same. He thereto also the walles of that towne to the ground, and filled the ditch with the rampire. The same yere the castels of Dunfreis, Aire, Lanarke, with manie other strengths and castels were rendered vnto him, and cast to the ground.

The castell of Rokeburgh was taken by sir James Dohoglasse on Feastings euen, in the yere 1313, when they of the garison were overcome with immoderate sursetting by meats and drinks excessive taken, according as on that day the accustomed vse is. In that yere also Thomas Randall, afterwards created earle of Surrep, wan the castell of Edinburgh. In which yere also, Bruce wan the Ile of Man; Iohn Maior lib. 5. cap. 1. And the same yere Edward Bruce besieged the castell of Striueling: but the strength of the house was such, that by nature of the high crag whereon it stood, and what by fortification of mans hand beside, all his traueil and inforcement diligentlie imploied to win it, procured vaine for the time. Within this castell as capteine thereof, was a right valiant knight named sir Philip Hotwhay, a Scottish man borne, but taking part with the English men, who feared nothing the siege, for he had sufficient store of men, vittels, munition, and all maner of puruesance sufficient to defend the hold for a long season: so that finally Edward Bruce, perceiuing no meanes whereby to atchiue the enterprise, which he had rashly taken in hand, was abashed thereof: for by force he saw well enough it could not be brought to passe, and by large offers made to the capteine, if he would render the place, and become seruant to the king his brother, he could not once moue him to giue anie care thereto, insomuch as at length he sought to trie him another way forth, which in the end toke better effect than was likelie it would haue done, considering the lacke of circumspection vsed in the bargaine making: as thus.

After long siege, and (as before is said) no good done, there was a motion made betwixt him and the capteine within for a truce, which was accorded on this wise: that if the fortreffe were not succoured within twelue moneths next ensuing, it should then be rendered vnto king Robert, and in the meane time no force should be vsed against it. This composition was vntwiselie made, as most men iudge: for euerie man of anie wisdom might easilie coniecture, that king Edward hauing so long day to make his prouision, would come in support of them within the castell, and that so strongly, as would be hard for the Scots to resist him. King Robert himselfe also was sore offended with his brother for his follie helued in this behalfe: but yet he would not go about to breake the covenant accorded, for doubt to lose his brother, whose aid he might not well want.

In the meane time king Edward sent forth messengers with letters, not onelie vnto all his subjects, but also vnto all his confederats and alies, to haue men of warre taken vp and retrained to serue him in his warres against the Scots, which he intended to folow to the vtter destruction of the whole nation. There came therefore in hope of spoile, not onelie such as were appointed by commissioners of the musters, but also a great number of other that offered themselves of their owne accord to go in that iourne, namelie such as had little to liue vpon at home, and trusted to amend the matter by some good fortune in the warres abroad. The countries out of the which it is reported by the Scottish writers, that such aid came to the English, were these; Holand, Zeland, Brabant, Flanders, Picardie, Bolognois, Calcoigne, Normandie, Guian, and Burdelois. For all these at that time were either subiect to the king of England, or else in confederate league with him. There were also manie Scots that were English by deuotion, and aided king Edward at this time.

Rokeburgh
swone on Shozlie
day.

1313.

The castell of Edinburgh
swone.

Striueling
well besieged.

Sir Philip
Hotwhay.

Some oftentimes exceeds the truth.

Edwards
humile.

Edward
thinketh him-
selfe sure of victory.

Robert was a Carmelite.

Iohn Ma. hath in his booke of thousand that Robert was coming toward the castell.

The opinion
of expert warriors of king
Edwards.

Out of what counties R.
Edward had aid of men.

Conchsane by house to show the Englishmen.

But the number of naturall Englishmen exceeded anie one nation beside, insomuch that the whole armie that of one and other, contained (as the same went) one hundred and fiftie thousand footmen, and almost as manie horsemen, beside carriage-men, coissers, women, and lackies, but the same herein belike (as often happeneth) did farre exceed the truth. For it is not to be thought (as Iohn Maior himselfe writeth) that he should get such a number together, not for that England it selfe is not able to set forth such a power: for as the same Maior saith, as manie men as are to be found in England of lawfull age, so manie able personages may be found there to passe for able souldiers. But either kings are not of abilitie to find so great a multitude with vittels and sufficient provision, or else they will not straine themselves thereto. Nevertheless, the whole number by all likelihood was great, for many as well strangers as Englishmen, brought their wives, their children, and whole household-meinie with them, in hope after the countie were once subdued, to have dwelling places appointed them in the same, there to inhabit: for so had king Edward promised them. By reason whereof the disorder was such, that no warlike discipline might be obserued amongst them; for men, women, and children, were all mixt together, with such clamor and noise, through the huge number of people, and diuersitie of languages, that it was a thing right strange to behold a campe so confusedlie ordered.

King Edward himselfe most proud and insolent of such incredible number, took no heed at all to the gouerning of them, supposing victorie to be alreadie in his hands; insomuch that at his coming to the borders, he took aduise with his counsell to what kind of torment and death he might put king Robert, for he had no doubt of catching him at all. He also brought with him a religious man somewhat learned belike, of the order of the Carmelites, to describe the whole manner of his conquest and victorie over the Scots: so sure he thought himselfe that all things would come to passe as he could wish or desire. This Carmelite, as may appeare in Iohn Bales booke, intituled A summarie of the writers of great Britaine, was named Robert Basson, and had the gouernance of an house in Scarburgh, of the Carmelites order, he being (as before is said) of that cote himselfe.

On the contrarie part, king Robert ordered all his doings by good & prudent aduise, and with 30000 men, right hardie and thoroughlie exercised in wars, came forth against his enemies, shewing no token of feare in the world, but boldlie pitched downe his tents in good order and warlike arae, vpon a plaine a little aboue Bannockshorne. Whether he did this for the great confidence he had in the hardinesse of his people, or for that he would shew how little he doubted the puissance of his enemies, least they should haue him in contempt, it is vncertaine. Indeed there were diuerse expert warriors amongst the Englishmen, that said (when they heard how the Scots were thus assembled to fight) that the victorie would not be had, except it were dearelie bought: the wisdom and manhood of king Robert was knowne so well amongst them, that they were assured he would not leopord himselfe in such a case, but that he knew he had such fellows about him, as would sticke to their tackle.

Moreouer the Scots by appointment of their king, to the furtherance of his hardie enterprise, had cast deepe pits and ditches in the place where it was iudged the battels should soine, and pitched sharpe stakes within the same, and after couered them ouer with greene fufes or sods, in such wise that a few footmen might passe ouer well enough; but if a nie great number should come preassing together, or that a nie horsemen came thereupon, the sods would shinke and fall to the bottome of the trenches, with extreme perill of the men and horses, that were sure to fall vpon the stakes set there for that purpose; or else to be so inclosed, that they should not be able to get out of those pitts. By the place where king Robert was thus incamped, there runneth a great brooke or water called Bannockshorne, so named of oten-cakes called bannocks, which were vsed to be made commonlie at the mills standing on the banks of the said water. It falleth into the fourth right famous afterwards by reason of this battell fought nere to the same.

When both the armies were approached within a mile together, king Edward sent eight hundred horsemen by a secret waie, vnto the castell of Strueling, to giue notice to sir Phillip Mowbraye the capitaine, that he was come with his armie to succour him. As Robert being aduertised of their gate, & beholding them which way they took, he sent Thomas Randall with five hundred Scottish horsemen to saue the countie from spoile, who with singular manhood encountering with those Englishmen in sight of both the armies, there ensued a cruell fight betwixt them for so small a number, continuing a long space with vncertaine victorie. In the meane time sir James Douglas, breeding that his special friend the said Thomas Randall should be ouerset with multitude of the Englishmen, came to king Robert, and falling on his knees before him, required licence to go forth to the support of them that were thus fighting with their enemies: which because the king would not grant at the first, he rushed forth of the campe without licence, hauing in his companie a small band of men, but yet chosen out for the purpose, that if it were but by shewing himselfe, he might put the enemies in some feare.

Notwithstanding, when he was come nere to the place where they fought, and saw how the Scots had got the victorie with great murder of the Englishmen, he staid and went no further, least he should by his coming seeme to bereaue them the glorie of the victorie, which had wone it with so great prowesse & singular valiancie. All those in the Scottish campe were relieved, in good hope of greater successe to follow in the whole enterprise by so hapie a beginning. The Englishmen passed little thereof, but yet for that the Scots should not wane proud, and take ouer-much courage thereby, they determined to giue them battell the next morow. King Robert with great diligence caused his people to prepare themselves ready to receiue the enemies, though he was nothing able to match them in number, deuising which waie he might traue them into the ditches before prepared. He commanded through the armie that enerie man should on the next morow receiue the sacrament of the Lords bodie, through the which they might haue the better hope of victorie against the vniust invaders of their realme and countie.

On the other side, the Englishmen trusted that all things would prosper with them, euen as they could best deuise: for by one small daies labour they hoped to be lords of all Scotland, and to dispose of the lands and goods of their enemies, as should seme to them good, and most for their owne anail. But king Robert all the night before the battell took little rest, hauing great care in his mind for the surtie of his armie, one while reuoluing in his consideration this chance, and an other while that; yea and sometimes he fell to deuout contemplation, making his prayer to God and saint Phillip, whose arme as it was set and inclosed in a silver case, he supposed had bene Bannockshorne.

The fight of Ch. Randall with 500 Scottishmen in his companie against 800 Englishmen.

The Englishmen determined to giue battell. King Robert prepared to receiue the enemies by battell.

Saint Phillip bene

E. j.

beene the same time within his tent, trusting the better fortune to follow by presence thereof. In the meane time, as he was thus making his prayers, the case suddenly opened, and clapped to againe. The kings chapleine being present, astonished therewith, went to the altar where the case stood, and finding the arme within it, he cried to the king & other that were present, how there was a great miracle wrought, confessing that he brought the emptie case to the field, and left the arme at home, least that relike should haue bene lost in the field, if anie thing chanced to the arme otherwise than well.

The king verie toisfull of this miracle, passed the remnant of the night in praier and thanksgiuing. On the morow he caused all his folks to heare diuine seruice, and to receiue the sacrament, as ouer night he had appointed. The abbat of Inchchaffrate did celebrate before the king that day, and ministered vnto him and other of the nobles, the communion, other priests being appointed to minister the same vnto the residue of the armie. After this, when seruice was ended, the king called the people to his standard, and first declared vnto them from point to point, how necessarie it was for them to shew their wanted manhood, considering that such a huge multitude of people was brought thither against them by king Edward, not of one nation or dominion, but of sundrie languages and parties, as well subiects as allies to the Englishmen, with full purpose of utterlie to extinguishe the Scottish name and memorie, and to plant themselves in their seates and homes, as in possessions utterlie voided of all the ancient and former inhabitants. To increase the fierce stomachs of the Scottishmen against the enemies, he recounted vnto them what he heard by credible report touching the menacing words and insolent brags of the same enemies, able to moue verie quiet minds vnto full indignation. Againe, to auoid feare out of their hearts, which they might conceiue by reason of the multitude of their aduersaries, he rehearsed that a number of rascals were amongst them, without anie skill of warrellike affaires, not taken by by choice and election in appointed musters, but resorting without difference together, in hope of spoile and botties, hauing not else wherbyon to liue at home in their countries.

Moreouer, if nothing else might raise their harts in hope of victorie, their iust cause sith they came in defense of their countrie against inuasions, was matter sufficient to aduance their manlie stomachs, in trust of Gods aid in that quarrell, hauing partlie assured them thereof, by notable miracles shewed in the night last passed. Hereto he added, that the greater multitude there was of the enemies, the more spoile and riches was to be got, if they attained the victorie. Finally, the more to stirre their harts to do valiantlie, he required them of one thing, which he trusted (their manhood being such) they would not thinke hard for them to achieve, and this was, that euerie of them would but dispatch one of the enemies, which if they performed, he promised them assured victorie. As for ten thousand, he knew to be amongst them of such approued souldiers, and old men of war, as he durst safelie undertake for them that they would slea two of the enemies a peece, at the least. Such manner of persuasions king Robert vsed to encourage his people.

* But Iohannes Maior, lib. 5. cap. 2. putteth speech much different from this, in the mouth of Bruce, further saing, that when this oration was ended, that the king came downe the hill, on which he stood, when he vttered these words, and bareheaded embraced all the nobilitie in his armes, and after turning himselfe to the whole armie, he reached to euerie man his hand, in signe of amitie: but I suppose he was over-wearied before he had taken 35000 men by the hands. On the other part, king Edward caused the colonels of ech nation within his campe, to criout their retinues to remember, that if they fought valiantlie for one houre or two, they should purchase infinite riches with the whole realme of Scotland, in reward of their labour: for he desired nothing for himselfe, but the superiortie. Againe, he willed they should haue in remembrance that irrecoverable shame would follow (sith they had departed out of their countries in hope of gaine) to returne home with emptie hands, and void of victorie, not without some reproch and note of cowardise.

* Besides which (as seemeth by Iohannes Maior) king Edward clothed in his kinglie robes, is said to haue vsed these speeches to the armie. If I did not behold the open victorie, I would this day (most valiant men) make an other beginning of speech vnto you. We are in preparation & number of souldiers farre beyond these miserable Scots. Besides which, we haue abundance of brasse peeces, catapultes, bowes, and other such engins of warre, which on the contrarie part the Scots doe want. They are onelie covered with leather pilches made of bucks skins, and with clothes like vnto the wild mountaine people, for which cause our archers, before the strength of the maine battell shall come, will some subdue them. I warrant not that they haue before time subdued some of my subiects, because they did it by their accustomed deceits, and not by strength of battell. And though by chance they haue overcome (in sight) some weake compaignie of equall number vnto them, yet are they not able to resist vs; being farre more excellent in number, preparation, and order of battell. The Scot hath a weake nation fighting on his owne charge, not hauing anie chosen souldier. God hath in this field inclosed that for Bruce (nourished by my god father) to the end that he might receiue worthy punishment for his wickednesse. His three brethren were consumed by my father: wherefore it now remaineth that we apprehend (aloue) these other two wicked and waueing men, to lead them to London, there to receiue their due punishment. You had great reuenues (noble princes) giuen to you by my father, in that kingdom. Wherefore now shew your selues valiant persons, that you may againe recover the same, at this day possessed by the vnjust and vnrighfull owners. Besides which, I will further by line geometricallie measure forth all the land of Scotland, to be diuided vnto those that deserue the same, according to the merits of the men. Thus much Maior.)

But yet when they should march forward in arraie of battell towards the Scots, they might scarce be seuered from their wiues and children, which they had there in campe with them: neuertheless, at length by the sharpe calling vpon of their capteins, they were brought into order of battell, not without much adoe, by reason of the vnraie multitude. The archers were placed in wings, mingled amongst the horsemen on the sides of the wards and battels, which stood inclosed in the middell of the same wings. King Robert appointing all his battels on foot, diuided the same into three parts: the fore ward he committed to Thomas Randolph, & James Douglas, capteins of verie approued valiance, vnder whom went seven thousand of the borderers, and three thousand of the Irish Scots, other wise called Batersans or Redshanks. These no lesse fierce and forward, than the other practised and skilfull. The second ward was gouerned by Edward the kings brother, wherein were ten thousand men: but for that he was suspected of too much rashnesse, there was ioined with him

A subtil chapleine.

A matter debated betwixt the king and his chapleine, as is to be thought.

The exhortation of king Robert to his people.

The exhortation of king Edward.

Fr. Thin. Iohannes Maior maketh Edward to speake (in his pen) thus: he lieth vnto you. We are in preparation & number of souldiers farre beyond these miserable Scots. Besides which, we haue abundance of brasse peeces, catapultes, bowes, and other such engins of warre, which on the contrarie part the Scots doe want. They are onelie covered with leather pilches made of bucks skins, and with clothes like vnto the wild mountaine people, for which cause our archers, before the strength of the maine battell shall come, will some subdue them. I warrant not that they haue before time subdued some of my subiects, because they did it by their accustomed deceits, and not by strength of battell. And though by chance they haue overcome (in sight) some weake compaignie of equall number vnto them, yet are they not able to resist vs; being farre more excellent in number, preparation, and order of battell. The Scot hath a weake nation fighting on his owne charge, not hauing anie chosen souldier. God hath in this field inclosed that for Bruce (nourished by my god father) to the end that he might receiue worthy punishment for his wickednesse. His three brethren were consumed by my father: wherefore it now remaineth that we apprehend (aloue) these other two wicked and waueing men, to lead them to London, there to receiue their due punishment. You had great reuenues (noble princes) giuen to you by my father, in that kingdom. Wherefore now shew your selues valiant persons, that you may againe recover the same, at this day possessed by the vnjust and vnrighfull owners. Besides which, I will further by line geometricallie measure forth all the land of Scotland, to be diuided vnto those that deserue the same, according to the merits of the men. Thus much Maior.)

Fr. Thin. Iohannes Maior maketh Edward to speake (in his pen) thus: he lieth vnto you. We are in preparation & number of souldiers farre beyond these miserable Scots. Besides which, we haue abundance of brasse peeces, catapultes, bowes, and other such engins of warre, which on the contrarie part the Scots doe want. They are onelie covered with leather pilches made of bucks skins, and with clothes like vnto the wild mountaine people, for which cause our archers, before the strength of the maine battell shall come, will some subdue them. I warrant not that they haue before time subdued some of my subiects, because they did it by their accustomed deceits, and not by strength of battell. And though by chance they haue overcome (in sight) some weake compaignie of equall number vnto them, yet are they not able to resist vs; being farre more excellent in number, preparation, and order of battell. The Scot hath a weake nation fighting on his owne charge, not hauing anie chosen souldier. God hath in this field inclosed that for Bruce (nourished by my god father) to the end that he might receiue worthy punishment for his wickednesse. His three brethren were consumed by my father: wherefore it now remaineth that we apprehend (aloue) these other two wicked and waueing men, to lead them to London, there to receiue their due punishment. You had great reuenues (noble princes) giuen to you by my father, in that kingdom. Wherefore now shew your selues valiant persons, that you may againe recover the same, at this day possessed by the vnjust and vnrighfull owners. Besides which, I will further by line geometricallie measure forth all the land of Scotland, to be diuided vnto those that deserue the same, according to the merits of the men. Thus much Maior.) Fr. Thin. Iohannes Maior maketh Edward to speake (in his pen) thus: he lieth vnto you. We are in preparation & number of souldiers farre beyond these miserable Scots. Besides which, we haue abundance of brasse peeces, catapultes, bowes, and other such engins of warre, which on the contrarie part the Scots doe want. They are onelie covered with leather pilches made of bucks skins, and with clothes like vnto the wild mountaine people, for which cause our archers, before the strength of the maine battell shall come, will some subdue them. I warrant not that they haue before time subdued some of my subiects, because they did it by their accustomed deceits, and not by strength of battell. And though by chance they haue overcome (in sight) some weake compaignie of equall number vnto them, yet are they not able to resist vs; being farre more excellent in number, preparation, and order of battell. The Scot hath a weake nation fighting on his owne charge, not hauing anie chosen souldier. God hath in this field inclosed that for Bruce (nourished by my god father) to the end that he might receiue worthy punishment for his wickednesse. His three brethren were consumed by my father: wherefore it now remaineth that we apprehend (aloue) these other two wicked and waueing men, to lead them to London, there to receiue their due punishment. You had great reuenues (noble princes) giuen to you by my father, in that kingdom. Wherefore now shew your selues valiant persons, that you may againe recover the same, at this day possessed by the vnjust and vnrighfull owners. Besides which, I will further by line geometricallie measure forth all the land of Scotland, to be diuided vnto those that deserue the same, according to the merits of the men. Thus much Maior.) Fr. Thin. Iohannes Maior maketh Edward to speake (in his pen) thus: he lieth vnto you. We are in preparation & number of souldiers farre beyond these miserable Scots. Besides which, we haue abundance of brasse peeces, catapultes, bowes, and other such engins of warre, which on the contrarie part the Scots doe want. They are onelie covered with leather pilches made of bucks skins, and with clothes like vnto the wild mountaine people, for which cause our archers, before the strength of the maine battell shall come, will some subdue them. I warrant not that they haue before time subdued some of my subiects, because they did it by their accustomed deceits, and not by strength of battell. And though by chance they haue overcome (in sight) some weake compaignie of equall number vnto them, yet are they not able to resist vs; being farre more excellent in number, preparation, and order of battell. The Scot hath a weake nation fighting on his owne charge, not hauing anie chosen souldier. God hath in this field inclosed that for Bruce (nourished by my god father) to the end that he might receiue worthy punishment for his wickednesse. His three brethren were consumed by my father: wherefore it now remaineth that we apprehend (aloue) these other two wicked and waueing men, to lead them to London, there to receiue their due punishment. You had great reuenues (noble princes) giuen to you by my father, in that kingdom. Wherefore now shew your selues valiant persons, that you may againe recover the same, at this day possessed by the vnjust and vnrighfull owners. Besides which, I will further by line geometricallie measure forth all the land of Scotland, to be diuided vnto those that deserue the same, according to the merits of the men. Thus much Maior.)

him certeine ancient gentlemen of great sobriety and circumspection, to qualifie his haire and hot nature. The third battell, in the which were (as Iohn Maior recordeth) fiftene thousand fighting men, the king himselfe led, the being a verie cherefull countenance amongst them, so farre forth, that certie one that beheld him, conceived in his mind an assured hope of victorie to succeed.

The abbat of Inchbalkate afore said (who as before is mentioned, discribete that morning after the king) came forth before the battels, with the crucifix in his hands, bearing it aloft like a standard, admonishing them valiantlie to take in hand the defence of their countrie, and the libertie of their posteritie: for (saith he) you must not everie man fight as it were for his owne private defense, his owne house and children, but everie man for all men, and all men for everie man must fight for the libertie, life, patrie, monie, children, and tomes of all the realme: for such and so great is the dignitie of our countrie; as they which deface or spoile it, are to be punished with perpetual fier, and they which doe preserve it, are to be recompensed with an eternall crowne of glorie. And herewithall this abbat instructed them of manie things touching the love of their countrie, which nature hath so planted in all men, that for the preservation and libertie thereof, none should refuse any danger, no not the losse of life, yea though (if it were possible) that it might be manie times lost therefore. Which done, he feared not to admonish them to worship the image of Christ, which he shewed them on the crosse. Incontinentlie wherupon, the Scottish armie fell on knees before it, devoutlie commending themselves to almightie God.

The English armie beholding the Scots fall on knees, thought verelie they had yielded without stroke stricken. But when they saw them rise againe, and to come forward, they began to be somewhat doubtfull. And hereupon rushing together, at the first joining a great number of people on either side were beaten downe & slaine. The archers which were arraied on the vtter skirts of the English wings, sore annoied the Scots, till finally Edward Bruse came on their backs with a thousand speares, and brake them assunder, in such wise that they did but little more hurt that day. Albeit incontinentlie herewith a battell of horsemen to the number of thirtie thousand, came rushing together all at once in thicke, to have borne downe and overriden the Scots; but being so in their full race galloping with most violence towards them, they tumbled into the fosses and pits before mentioned, in such wise one upon another, that the most part of them was slaine, without all recoverie. Nevertheless the Scots in manner oppressed through the huge multitude of the enemies, were nere at the point to have bene vanquished. During which conflict saith Buch, this happened (which though it be a small thing to put in writing, yet was such as oftentimes it chanceth in battell, and as brought no small benefit to the persuation of their businesse) that king Robert (who continuallie rode before the battell appointed to his government) holding a mace of warre in his hand (and keeping the first order in the arraie) was espied of an Englishman that knew him verie well: and forthwith rode full against Bruse with his spere. But the king beating the stroke aside, came to his English adversarie, overthrew him by the force of his horse, in the end killed him with his mace & so left him dead. Whereupon, the common people beholding the valure of their king and capteine, did with great force by the instigation of their fierie and fierie minds (and not by the kings persuation) fall upon their enemies in such sort, that they seemed to have had the victorie of the adversie battell of their enemies: had it not bene for the English archers, which were placed in the wings of the battell; whom Bruse (sending out certie light horsemen) did sore repulse: wherby the Scots encouraged, made their partie good; rather by hidden policie, than prepared force. For a stratagem by the Scots devised, and an error by the English therof conceived, did far more hurt to the enemy, than the power afforded in the field. For that deule in the end was the cause that the English lost the victorie, being in this sort.

The Scots which were appointed to attend the carriage, as carsters, wainemen, lackies, and the women, beholding in what danger their maisters, friends, & countremen stood, put on spirits, smocks, and other white linnen aloft upon their vsuall garments, and herewith binding towels and napkins to their speares, and to other such frames as they got in their hands, placed themselves as well as they could in arraie of battell, and so making a great moister and shew anelo, came downe the hill side in the face of their enemies, with such a terrible noise and hideous clamor, that the Englishmen fighting as then with most furie against the Scots with their certie victorie, and beholding this new rectiforce coming downe the hill upon their faces, supposing verelie it had bene some new armie, their hearts began to faint, the more in deed, so that they saw themselves vnto able to susteine the violent encounter of the Scots then present. And hereupon they began to turne their backs, and fell to running away as people clearelie vanquished: on whom the Scots followed with insatiable fire, and slew them down on all sides where they might overtake them. Sir James Douglas with foure hundred chosen horsemen, was commanded by king Robert to pursue the king of England with all speed, to trie if he might overtake him.

Douglas (according to his charge) followed him in chase to Dunbar, & casting betwixt that and the borders, late in wait to have taken him, if he had returned by land; but he being received into the castle of Dunbar by Patrike Dunbar erle of March, with fiftene earles in his companie, was by the same erle of March conveyed into certie vessels, lieng there at anchor, with the which he passed alongst by the shore into England, to shew an example of the trustable state of princes: for though this Edward was that day in the morning right proud of the great puissance and number of people which he had about him, not unlike sometime to the great armie of king Herres yet he was constrained before the evening of the same day, to save his life in a poore fishers boat. In this battell were slaine fiftie thousand Englishmen (as the Scottish writers assester) amongst whom was the erle of Gloucester, with two hundred knights. On the Scottish part were slaine about foure thousand, and amongst other two valiant knights, sir William Telpount, and sir Walter Kesse. The spoile was so great of gold, silver, and other jewels gotten in the field, that the whole number of the Scottish armie was made rich thereby: and besides this, they got little lesse monie and riches by ransoming of prisoners taken at this battell, than of spoile gotten in the fight, campe, and field. But the death of sir Giles Argentine, that died amongst other in this most fall battell, was so displeasing to king Robert, for the familiaritie which he had sometimes with him at England, that he reioiced little of all the gains got by so famous a victorie. He caused his body to be buried right honorable in saint Patricks church beside Edinburgh. The quene king Roberts wife, who had bene kept in

The English mens hearts began to faint.

The English men put to flight.

King Edward escaped.

The trustable state of princes.

The number of Scots slaine.

Sir Giles Argentine slaine.

The queene
king Roberts wife restored to his husband

in captiuitie the space of 8 yeares, was in England now, delivered by exchange for one of the nobles of England, which was taken at this battell. The rich clothes of silke, velvet, and gold, which were found in the English campe, were distributed to the abbeies and monasteries of the realme, to make there of vestments, copes, and frontals for altars. The Carmelite sister, of whome ye heard before, brought further by king Edward to, describe the victorie of the Englishmen, was taken prisoner amongst other, and commanded by king Robert to write contrailie the victorie of the Scots, according as he had sene: who thereupon gathered his rustie wits together, & made certaine rude verses beginning thus.

Merles made by Robert Balfour the Carmelite.

De planctu cudo metrum carmine nudo, Risum retrudo cum tali themate ludo, With barren verse this rime I make, Bewailing whilest such theme I take.

There be some that haue iudged, how this victorie was attained by the singular fauour of almightie God, by reason of miracles which they rehearse to happen at the same time. The night before the day of the battell, there came to the abbete of Glasen-burie two men in complet armour, desiring to lodge there all night: the abbat keeping an house of great hospitalitie, receiued them right gladlie, and making them good cheare, demanded what they were, and whither they were going: who answered that they were the seruants of God, and going to helpe the Scots at Bannockburne. On the morrow the chamberlaine found them departed before anie of the gates were opened, & the beds faire made, and not stirred otherwise than as they left them ouer night. The same day that the battell was foughten, a knight clad in faire bright armour, declared to the people at Aberdeen, how the Scots had gotten a famous victorie against the Englishmen, and was sene shortly after to passe ouer Dialand firth on horsebacke. It was supposed by the people that this was saint Magnus, sometime prince of Orkney, and for that cause king Robert endowed the church of Orkney with five poundes sterling of the cu-stomes of Aberdeen, to furnish the same church with bread, wine, and wax.

Robert Fleming rewarded for his faithfull ser-
uice.

Manie noble men for their approued manhood shewed in this conflict, were highlie rewarded at the hands of king Robert. One Robert Fleming, by whose means he reuenged the treason wrought against him by John Cumyn, with slaughter of the same John, had the lands of Cumnerald giuen him, which were of the inheritance belonging to the said Cumyn. It is reported by writers, that two knights of Brabant that serued amongst the Englishmen, chanced to heare manie reprochfull words spoken in the English campe against king Robert, who being somewhat moued therewith, and mis-king such dismeasured talke, wished in words that the victorie might chance vnto him. For the which with li. Edward informed thereof, caused them by a trumpet to be conueied vnto the Scottish campe, with commandement to aid king Robert to the uttermost of their powers, purposing to punish them according to his mind, if he attained the victorie, as he had no doubt but he should. Whereupon, before the joining of the battels, he caused proclamation to be made, that whosoever brought their heads vnto him, should haue an hundred marks in reward.

A proclamation.

The Scottish
house in Antuerpe build-
ed.

King Robert hearing in what danger they had run for his sake, rewarded them with great riches of the spoile got in the field, with the which they returning into Brabant, built a goodlie house in Antuerpe, naming the same Scotland, and causing the Scottish armes, and the picture of Bruce to be set vp in the same, appointed it for a lodging to receiue for men of the Scottish nation that should recome into that towne, as may appeare even vnto this day. And this was done for a memoriall, to shew that loue and hartie benenolence these two knights bare towards king Robert and his people, for the great liberalitie receiued at his hands. This glorious victorie chanced to the Scots on the day of the natiuitie of saint John Baptist, in the yeare 1314.

About this time for the varietie of fortune (in so small a course of yeares) happened a thing not belieueth the reporting. For John Wentith, which before betrayed his deere friend Wallace to the English, being therefore (as of right he ought) extreme-lie hated of the Scots, was (in recompense thereof beside manie other rewards) benefited with the gardianship of the castle of Dunbarton: which fort (after all the other castles before said) were recovered to the Scots) was almost the onlie thing (except some few others) that remained in the hands of the English; and because this fort was by nature inerpugnable, king Robert dealt with the capteine (by such as were friends and of kinred vnto him) to betraye the castle into his hands, promising great recompense therefore. Wherevnto this Wentith by no means would agree, unless li. Robert would giue to him the earledome of Lennox for his reward. Whereupon the king being greatlie in doubt what to say therein, (though in deed he vehementlie longed for the said castle) because he did not thinke the obtaining thereof to be of such good vnto him, as that he would therefore offend or lose the earle of Lennox; who had in all his calamities bene the most certeine, and almost the onlie friend of the king: which doubt, when the earle vnderstood, he forthwith came vnto him, willing him in no wise to refuse the condition; wherupon the bargaine was concluded betwene John Wentith and the king, and that in such sort, as it was most solemnely confirmed.

Now, when the king should come to recouie this castle (according to compositions) as he was in the wood Colchon, a mile distant from the same, a cer-teine carpenter called Kololand came thither secretly vnto him, & desired licence that he might speake to the king, for he would discouer a great matter touching a treason that was deuised and prepared against him, by the capteine of Dunbarton. Which pardon obtained, he opened vnto Bruce, that below in the wine-cellar of the castle, were a number of English inclosed, which at dinner should either take or kill the king (being then safe) after that he had obtained the castle. Whereupon the king nothing abashed, but keeping on his former determination, & being (according to appointment) receiued by the said John Wentith in the castle of Dunbarton: after that he had searched all other places, and was courteously invited to sit downe to dinner; answered that he would not eate, untill he had loked into the cellar below. Wherevnto for excuse, and to defer the time, the capteine answered that the smith was absent and caried the key alway with him.
But the king not waiting for the coming of the smith, did incontinentlie breake open the cellar dore, whereby all the deceit appeared. After which, the armed men were brought forth before the king, who being severally examined, confessed the whole matter; and further, that there was a ship readie in the haven to haue caried the li. prisoner into England, if they had taken him alive. Whereupon the rest being punished, John Wentith was onlie cast into prison, & reserved from further paine: because the king would not offend his friends & kinred in so dangerous a time as that was. For this Wentith had manie beautifull daughters married to men of great power & riches. After which imprisonment of this 1314.

The crowne
of Scotland
mailed.
Margerie the daughter of king Robert by his first wife.

Fr. Thin.

Buchanan.

John Wentith made captaine of Dunbarton
castle.

The second
marriage of
king Robert.

The issue of
king Robert by his second wife.

Liberties by king Robert.

Englishmen
inclosed in cellar to kill
king Robert
after his returne into Dunbarton
castle.

1315.

The lords of Ireland re-surre and of king Robert.

Walter.

Edward
Bruce proclaimed king
of Ireland.

The English
men possesse little in the pope's com-
mande-
ment.

this p^rinth was by mediation of such as greatlie fauored him, restored to the fauor of Bruce, vnder whome he did after serue most faithfullie.

In mediaticke after, king Robert called a parlement at Aire, where, by consent of the thre states he was confirmed king, and the crowne intailed to the heires male of his bodie lawfullie begotten, and for want of such heires, to remaine vnto his brother Edward Bruce, and to the heires male of his bodie; and if he chanced to die without such heires, then should the crowne descend to Margerie the daughter of king Robert, and to the heires generall of hir bodie by lawfull succession. In which parlement it was further decreed, that if the king were in his minority, he should then be gouerned by Thomas Randolph, and if anie misfortune chanced vnto the said Randolph, that then the gouernement of the kings person and kingdome should be committed to James Douglas.

This Margerie was gotten by king Robert on the earle of Mar his sister, his first wife, and was married by the aduise of his nobles vnto Walter great Steward of Scotland. Also king Robert, for that his first wife aforesaid was deceased, married shortly after Elizabeth the daughter of the earle of Ulster, on whome he got a sonne named David, and two daughters, the one named Margaret, and the other Maule. The first was married to the earle of Sutherland, and bare him a sonne named John: the second departed this world in hir infancy. After the marriage solemnized betwixt his daughter Margerie, and the foresaid Walter Steward, king Robert went through all the bounds of his realme, and did not onelie confirme the ancient liberties and priuileges of the burrowes and towne in all places where he came, but also augmented the same, and granted vnto diuerse, as well towne as baronies, sundrie new prerogatiues and franchises, as may appeare by his charters made vnto them of the same, speciallie to the towne of Perth, Dundee, and Aberdeen.

In the yeare folloving, which was in the yeare 1315, the princes of Ireland oppressed (as they toke it) with long and insufferable tyrannie of the Englishmen, and trusting by support of Scots to recover their libertie, now after so notable an overthrow of the whole English puissance, sent ambassadors vnto king Robert, requiring that it might please him to send his brother Edward Bruce, to receiue the crowne and gouernement of their countrie of Ireland. This request being granted, Edward prepared to take that iourne in hand, and so with a small power of Scottishmen transporting ouer into Ireland, and joining with an armie of such as were readie to assist him there, he toke the citie of Ulster, and due a great number of Englishmen which were found in the same. Then afterwards, by the generall consent of all the estates of Ireland, Edward Bruce was proclaimed king of that realme, and certeine of the Irish nobilitie sent ambassadors vnto the pope, to sue for a ratification of their act and proceedings, for the suertie and weale of their countrie, sith they were not able longer to susteine the greivous yoke of the English thraldome. These ambassadors, through their earnest diligence, got such fauor in their sute, that the pope sundrie times charged the Englishmen to auoid out of Ireland: howbeit, they seemed to passe little of his commandments in that behalfe, for they daile sought how to make themselves strong in that part: least they should lose the possession of that countrie, which their enemies were about to get forth of their hands.

King Robert, being informed how through the reinforcement of the English armie, being daile refreshed with new succors, his brother was like to run in danger to be cast away, he left sir James Douglas gouerno: in Scotland, with a competent number of men to defend the borders, and he himselfe with a great power of other souldiers and men of war went ouer into Ireland, to support his brother: but suffering great distresse at his first comming thither, for want of vittels & other provisions, he lost almost the one halfe of his folks through verie famine & hunger, & the residue were constrained to eate horses and other such lothsome meates, therewith to susteine their languishing liues. At length being approached within a daies iourne of his brother, in purpose to haue supported him with those people which he had left, his brother not abiding his comming, fought vntwifellie with the Englishmen at a place called Dundach, and receiuing the overthrow, was slaine himselfe with a great number of other. It is uncerteine whether he had anie knowledge of the comming of his brother king Robert, or that through desire of fame he feared least if he staied till his brother came, a great part of the praise (if they got the victorie) should remaine to him: and therefore he made such hast to fight. But howsoeuer it was, thus he was slaine on the fourteenth of October, in the yeare 1317.

Edward king of England, hearing that king Robert was passed ouer into Ireland, thought the time to serue well for his purpose, effioness to invade Scotland: and hereupon comming with a great power to the borders, he purposed to haue done some great feat. But sir James Douglas the gouerno: hauing likewise gathered an armie, gaue him battell, and put both him & his people to flight. In this battell were slaine thre notable captaine on the English side: as sir Edmund Lilaw a Gascoigne captaine of Berwik, with sir James Peuill, and the thirde sir James Douglas slue with his owne hands. King Edward perceiuing it was not like that he should doe anie good at that time against the Scots by land, thought it best to assaile them by sea, which way forth the Englishmen commonly were euer too good for the Scots. He rigged therefore a fleet of ships, and sent the same into the Forth, which burned the countrie on each side, and toke manie rich booties from the inhabitants nere to the shore.

Duncane earle of Fife, hearing of these cruelties done by the Englishmen, came forth with five hundred hardie souldiers, to defend the countrie from such inuasions: but when he perceived that the enemies were of greater number than he was able well to encounter, hauing but an handful of men in comparison to them, he gaue somewhat backe, and in the meane time met with William Sinclair bishop of Dunkeld, hauing about thre score armed men in his compaignie, who blaming the earle for his faintnesse of courage, caused him to set forward againe towards the enemies, & finding them busie in spoiling & harrieng the countrie, they gaue an onfet vpon them so fiercelie, that there was slaine at the first encounter to the number of five hundred of the Englishmen, and the residue chased to their booties lying at Dunbrissell, which they entered in such haste, that one of the booties being pestered with ouer great number of haikes with them before they could get to their ships. King Robert euer after customablie called this William Sinclair his owne bishop, for the noble prowess which he shewed in this enterprise.

In the same yeare Robert Steward the sonne of Walter Steward and Margerie Bruce was borne, which Robert after the death of King David le Bruce was preferred to the crowne. After this, Thomas Randall earle of Murray, the second day of April recovered

See more hereof in Ireland.

King Robert passed oner into Ireland.

Edward Bruce is slaine in Ireland.

See more of this matter in Ireland.

Edward sendeth a nauie into Scotland.

Englishmen discomfited.

William Sinclair called King Roberts bishop.

Robert Steward borne.

1318.

but yet he dissembled for the time, and commended them for their noble hearts and valiant stomachs: neuertheless, he purposed to be reuenged of their proud presumptions, when moze opportunitie of time serued thereto. Sundrie of the nobles perceiuing that the king bare an inward grudge towards them for this matter, deuised amongst themselves how to deliuer him into king Edwards hands, so to auoid all danger that might follow of his displeasure conceiued thus against them. For the accomplishment of this their treasonable practise, they made a bond in writing, confirmed with their hands and seales betwixt them, & minded to send the same into England vnto king Edward. But king Robert hauing some inkling of this their purpose, caused diligent watch to be laid by the way for such as should passe into England from them with the said bond, inasmuch that in the end a palmer or pilgrime was apprehended which had the bond, and other writings inclosed within his pilgrims staffe.

King Robert vnderstanding by these writings all the manner of the treason, and what they were that had consented to the same, hastily sent for the whole number of them, as though there had bene some matter in hand wherein he wished to haue their aduise. They were no sooner come, but straightwaies calling them before him, he questioned with them whether they knew their owne hands and seales, and immediatlie therewith shewed the writings, which were found in the palmers staffe: and because they could not denie their owne act, they were committed to ward within sundrie castles, till he had taken further aduise in the matter. Incontinentlie after, he went to Berwik, and there arrested the capteine of the towne, named sir William Soules, and caused him to be conueied to Berth (committing the said William Soules (as saith Io. Maior) with the countesse of Straherne, to perpetuall prison) where shortly after he called an assemble of all the estates of the realme. This was called the blacke parlement, kept in the yere after the incarnation of our Saviour 1320. In this parlement, at the beginning thereof, was David Abernethie, the sisters sonne of king Robert, accused as partie to the treason aforesaid, though being laboured vnto by the rest of the conspirators to ioine with them therein, he refused so to do, but yet for that he did not utter the thing, but concealed it with them, he was condemned & lost his head, the people sore lamenting his mishap, for the great balliance which was knowne to be in him, hauing serued honorable manie yeres before against the Saracens, and other miscreants in the parties of beyond the seas, where he was called the flower of chivalrie.

In deed the king himselfe would gladlie haue saued his life, but for that he minded to doe iustice on the residue, and finding no man to make sute for him, he permitted the execution. to proceed against him. On the morrow after, he caused all the residue of the traitors to be brought forth to iudgement, and sentence being giuen against them, he commanded without delate that they should be executed. Then came diuerse and sundrie persons in most humble wise to make sute for pardon to the king for their friends and kinsmen: but he made them plain answer, that there was none to be found that would make intercession for the saving of his kinsmans life the day before, when he was led to execution, that had offended nothing so grieuouslie, in comparison of them for whom they now made sute, and therfore he had them be contented, for they should assuredlie haue according to that which they had deserued. And therewith were the officers commanded to make had with the execution, which was done incontinent-lie without any further respite.

There were some that were accused to be partakers in this treason, but yet for that no euident proofes could be produced against them, they were dismissed, as Walter Martwell, with Walter Berclate prioste of Aberdene, Patrike Crain, Hameline Reidzinton, and Eustace Kathpe, knights; besides eight others. But yet the countesse of Straherne & William de Soules were condemned to perpetuall prison. The earle of Buchananes lands, who suffered at that present, were diuided into two parts, the one being giuen to William Haie that was made constable of the realme in place of John Quincie, who like wise suffered at the same time; and the other part was giuen vnto William Keth, together with the office of the stewardship of the realme. About the same time the king of England by complaint made to the pope, purchased that a legat was sent from the see apostolike into Scotland, to admonish king Robert to cease from further disquieting the realme of England, by such cruell inuasions, as were furnished that he wrongfullie exercised against the same realme. But answer was made herevnto by the king, and other the nobles of the realme of Scotland, that all the world might well vnderstand that the whole occasion of all the trouble which had chanced betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, did onelie proceed of the couetous desire in the Englishmen, seeking to conquer that realme without any iust claime or title: and therefore they thought it reason first to suppress the lottie stomachs of the Englishmen; and then if there were any thing worthy to be reformed on their behalfe, they would be contented to stand vnto the order of the popes authoritie therein. Thus was the legat dispatched home, without other effect of his errand [sauiug (as saith Buchanan) he cursed and interdicted the Scots and Scotland.]

Shortly after, king Robert entered with an armie into England, and waisted the countrie before him, till he came to the recrosse, which standeth vpon Stanemore. Wherewith it should seeme by that which Richard Southwell writteth hereof, that king Robert was not present himselfe in person in this iourne, but that he appointed the earle of Pirrey to be his lieutenant, who with an armie, after the feast of the Epiphanie entered into England, and coming to Darington, staid there for a season, whilst the lord James Douglas, and the lord Stewart of Scotland went abroad to harrie and spoile the countrie on each side, the one of them passing forth towards Hatfieldpole and Chelmsford, and the other towards Richmond. The inhabitants of Richmondschire, hauing no capteine amongstest them to defend their countrie from that grieuous inuasion of the enemy, gaue a great summe of monie in like manner, as at other times they had done, to haue their countrie spared from fier and spoile.

The Scots taried at this time about 15 daies within England, and in the end returned without battell. For when the knights of the north countries repaired vnto the duke of Lancaster then lieng at Bomfret, and offered to go into the field with him against the Scots, he would not once stirre his foot, by reason of the discord that was depending betwixt him and king Edward: but howsoeuer the matter went, king Edward sore grieued in his mind with such inuasion made by his enemies the Scots, he gaue order to leaue an armie of an hundred thousand men, what in horsebacke and on foot (as the report went) appointing them to be readie to enter into Scotland at Lancasters next: whereof king Robert being aduertised, went to prevent him, and there vpon in the countie of the Batistie of Saint John Baptist,

A legat sent from Rome to the Scots.

The answer made to the legat.

Fr. Thin.

King Robert with an armie into Scotland.

Ri. Southwell. 1321.

The bishopricke of Durham burnt by the Scots.

Richmondschire redeemed from spoile with a summe of monie.

The duke of Lancasters dissolute.

King Robert inuadeth England.

The abbey of Holme burnt.

Fourneis ab-
bele.

Leuin sands.

The towne of Lancaster
burnt.

Preston in Anderneis
burnt.

R. Edward
raifeth an ar-
mie.

He entered
Scotland.

The abbeies of Melrose or Melrose & Durburgh
burnt.
King Robert
inuaeth the north parts of England, approching almost to York.

R. Edward is put to flight.

The earle of Richmond is taken.

1323.

Ri. Southwell.
Ri. vale abbey.

Yorkeswald washed by
Scots.

Baptist, he entered into England with an armie raide to Carlisle, and burnt a manor place that sometime belonged to him at Rosse, and Allerdale, and spoiled the monasterie of Holme, notwithstanding his fathers corpes was there interred.

From thence he marched forward, destroing and spoiling the countrie of Copland, and so keeping up on his iourne, passed Doden sands, towards the ab-bele of Fourneis: but the abbat meeting him on the waie, redeemed his lands from spoile, and brought king Robert to his house, and made to him great chere: but yet the Scots could not hold their hands from burning and spoiling diuerse places; And marching forward vnto Cartmelle beyond Leuin sands, burnt and spoiled all the countrie about, except a priorie of blacke canons which stood there. Passing from thence they came to Lancaster, which towne they also burnt, saue onelie the priorie of blacke monks, and a house of preaching friers. Here came to them the earle of Murray, and the lord James Dowglas with an other armie, whereupon marching further southwards, they came to Preston in Anderneis, and burnt that towne also, the house of friers in-moors onelie excepted.

And thus being foure score miles within England from their owne borders, they returned home-wards with all their prisoners, cattell, and other bo-ties which they had got in that iourne, comming to Carlisle on the eue of saint Margaret, and lodging about that towne the space of five daies, they wasted and destroyed the corne, & all other things that came within their reach. Which done, on saint James euen they entered into Scotland againe, having bene within England at this time three weekes and three daies. Immediatlie hereupon, to wit, about the feast of Lammias, king Edward with his armie came to Newcastle, and desirous to be reuenged of such iniuries done to his subjects, entered into Scotland, and passing forth till he came to Edinburgh, through want of vittels and other necessarie prouisi-on, he was constrained to returne home within the space of 15 daies. For king Robert aduertised of his comming, had caused all the corne and cattell in the countrie to be conueyed out of the waie into cer-teine foris, whereunto the Englishmen might not come to get it into their hands, & so to relieue themselues therewith. But in their returning homeward, somewhat to reuenge their displeasures, they spoiled and burnt the abbeies of Melrose, and Durburgh, with diuerse other religious houses and places, & not sparing anie kind of crueltie against all those of the inhabitants that fell into their hands.

In reuenge hereof, king Robert shortly after entered with a puissant armie into England, spoiling & wasting the countrie, till he came almost to York.
At length, hearing that king Edward was com-ming towards him with an armie, he chose a plot of ground betwixt the abbey of Wiland and saint Sa-uoloch, there to abide battell; which king Edward refused not to geue, though in the end he was put to flight with his whole power, and chased with great slaughter both of Englishmen and Irishmen, which were there in his aid. Diuerse also of the nobilitie were taken prisoners, as John de Britaine earle of Richmond, and Henrie Solle, with others. This battell was fought in the yeere of our Saviour 1323, 15 daies after the feast of saint Michell the archan-gell. King Edward being the same time at the abbey of Wale, aduertised of this overthrow, fled and got him into Porke, leaving his plate and much other stuffe behind him for want of cariage in that his sudden departure, which the Scots comming thither found, and took away with them. And from thence they passed forth into Porke woods, spoiling and waking the countie men vnto Beuerleie, which to some for a summe of monie they were contented to spare, and so then they returned homeward, entering againe into Scotland on All soules day, which is the second of Nouember, after they had remained with in England at that time the space of a moneth and foure daies.

Shortly after, king Robert sent an ambassadoe to the French king [to pacifie him offended with them for the English] and to renew the ancient bond of a-mitie betwixt the two realmes of Scotland and France, which was accomplished with this new condition added to the former articles, that if it chanced that succession failed touching the inheritance of the croune of either realme, so that a doubt should rise, who ought by right to inioy the same, the claime and title thereof should be tried and decided by the nobles of both the realmes; and further, that they should not onelie remoue and exclude all such as went about wongfullie to vsurpe the croune, but also to defend and mainteine the true inheritor to the uttermost of their powers. In confirmation of this couenant, both the kings received the sacrament. And for further ratifying of it, they made a prouiso, that whereas (then) they had the popes consent hereto, neither he, nor anie of his successors hereafter should dispense with them for the breaking of that bond; and if they did, euerie such dispensation should be reputed void and of none effect.

In this yeere 1323 (as Richard Southwell re-porth) about the Ascension day, came commissioners from the two kings of England and Scotland, vnto Newcastle, there to treat of some agreement of peace. For the king of England came Auerie de Valence earle of Denbroke, the lord Hugh Spenser the younger, and foure other persons sufficientlie authorized. And for the king of Scots came the bishop of saint Andrews, Thomas Randall earle of Murray, and foure other persons likewise of god calling. After much talke, in the end they agreed vpon a truce to indure for 13 yeeres, which was proclamed in both realmes about the feast of saint Barnabas next ensuing. About this time also, or not long before, an Englishman descended of noble linage, called Hamton, chanced for speaking certeine words in commendation of king Robert, to fall at variance with one of king Edwards priue chamber, named John Spenser; insomuch that fighting together about the same words, Hamtons hap was to slea this Spenser, & thereupon knowing there was no waie but death, if he should hap to be caught, he fled with all speed into Scotland, where he was receiued of the king in most friendlie wise, and had giuen to him for the maintenance of his estate like a gentleman, the lands of Cadzow [which (as saith Buchanan) he called by the name of Hamilton.]

The posteritie of this Hamton remaineth in Scotland vnto this day, increased so in kindred and honor, by reason it was in processe of time mingled with the kings blood, that few linages in that realme are of like estimation. They are now called Ha-millons, somewhat changed from the name of their first beginner. [Donald earle of Marre, was made by king Edward the second gardian or capitaine of the castell of Wiffow in England, the which he kept untill the coming of queene Isabell againe hir husband Edward the second, at what time he deliue-red the same into the hands of the said queene, and returned into Scotland.]

In the meane time, Edward king of England being called altogether by two of the Spensters, as Hugh the father and Hugh the sonne, ran so farre into the hatred of his people, as well the nobles as commoners, that in the end he was deposed of all kinglie

Fr. Thin.
Buchanan.

The bond of amitie between Scotland and France renewed with new articles.

3 prouiso.

Ri. Southwell.

Hamton an Englishman
of whom the Hamiltons
are descended.

Fr. Thin.

The Ham-
tons mingled
with the kings blood.

Fr. Thin.
1323.
Scala chron.

R. Edward
deposed.

his son Edward the third crowned.

1326.
Ri. Southwell.
The collect of Hamton.

James Dow-
glas sent into France to the Baili.

The resignation of the Baili to
king Robert.

Parliament
at Cambus-kenneth.
In act for the cession of the croune.

The rule of things committed to Thomas

kinglie authoritie, committed to prison, and in fine secretlie murthered, as in the English historie moze plainelie appereth.

His sonne Edward the third was placed in his come, and crowned the 26 day of Januarie, in the yere 1326. In the night of the same day in which he received the crowne, the Scots went to haue stolne the castell of Roxham by scaling, and they went so cunninglie about their purpose, that they were to the number of 16 of them got aloft on the wals: but the capteine of this castle Robert Baners being warned aforehand of their coming by one of his souldiers that was a Scottishman bozne, suddenlie assailed them, slue nine or ten of them, and toke five prisoners alive, but sore wounded, so as this misfortune falling to them in the beginning of king Edward the third his reigne, might haue bene a forwarning of their losses to follow in the daies of his gouernement.

Whilste these things were a doing in England, king Robert though he might seeke to haue title iust enough to the crowne of Scotland, which he had possessed now not onlie by rightfull conquest, but also by lawfull interest of inheritance for a certeine number of yeres, by consent of all the estates of the realme; yet to the end to put atwaie all doubts, and to conclude the succession of the Ballioll from all claime, which hereafter they might pretend to the crowne of Scotland, he sent sir James Dowglas into France vnto the lord John Ballioll, to require him to transpore and resigne all the challenge of right and interest which he might seme to haue to the crowne of Scotland, as well for himselfe as his heires & successors for ever, to king Robert le Bruce, and his heires. In consideration of which resignation, he offered faire lands and rents to him to be appointed forth in Scotland.

The Ballioll being now soze woynie with age, and thereto blind of bodilie sight, lightlie consented vnto this motion, considering (as he said) he toke it to be the ordinance of almightie God, that king Robert should inioy the gouernement of the Scottish kingdom, as most worthy and able thereto, hauing deliuered the same, and defended it most valiantlie from the hands of most cruell enemies. He called therefore his friends and kinsmen together, in the presence of whome he wholie resigned vnto king Robert and his heires, all the right and title which he or anie other for him either had, or hereafter might haue to the crowne of Scotland, concerning anie interest or claime which might be auouched for anie cause or consideration, from the beginning of the world vnto that present day. After the returne of sir James Dowglas forth of France, with so good expedition and dispatch of that businesse wherabout he was sent, king Robert verie iollfull thereof, assembled a parlement of the nobles and other estates of the realme at Cambuskenneth, where he procured a new act to be established touching the succession of the crowne, which was, that if his sonne David deceased without heires of his bodie lawfullie begotten, that then Robert Stewart begotten on Margerie Bruce his daughter, should succeed in possession of the crowne. All the lords at the same time were sworne to mainteine this ordinance.

In the meane while, king Edward the third sent vnto king Robert for peace, but forsomuch as it was perceiued to be but a coloured pretense, no conclusion thereof insupd, but preparation made on either part for wars. King Robert shortly after fell sicke, by reason whereof, being not able to ride abroad, nor to traueil himselfe, he committed the administration of all things touching the common-wealth, and other the affaires of the realme vnto Thomas Randall, earle of Murray, and to the lord James Dowglas, two capteins, for their high prowesse and noble valancie in those daies greatlie renowned. These two hardie chieftains assembling an armie of twentie thousand men, or (as some writers haue) 25 thousand, entered with the same into Northumberland, waiking & spoiling the countrie on ech side. [And in countreing with an assemblie of the English at Darlington, there slue manye of them, and put the rest to flight.] Against whome came king Edward with an armie of an hundred thousand men: of the which number there were (as Froissard saith) eight thousand horsemen, and 24 thousand archers. At their coming into Northumberland, they might well perceiue by the smoke of the fiers, which the Scots made in burning of villages, houses, and towne, where the enemies were: but yet because they taried not long in a place, but passed on without sojournng here or there, the Englishmen might not come nere to fight with them.

King Edward therefore was counselled to draw towards Scotland, that lieng betwixt them and home, he might haue them at some aduantage as they should returne, which was thought should be shortly, as well for lacke of vittels, as also to defend their owne borders, when they heard once that the English armie drew that waies south. But coming to the riuer of Tyne, through abundance of raine (latelie fallen) the streame was so risen, that neither horse nor man might passe, so that the armie was constrained to incampe there for the space of thre daies, in great scarcitie of vittels, till they were faine to send vnto Newcastle (which was distant from thence 26 miles) and to Carlisle (which was about 22. miles thence) for prouision, which was sent them from those places in great plentie. In the meane time were thus certeine light horsemen sent abroad into the countrie, to vnderstand where the Scots were, and to view their doings. [Upon proclamation before made by the king (that who so could bring him word where the Scots were harbored, should haue a hundred pounds of yerelie reuenues in recompense for the same; Thomas Rokebeire after diligent search, brought word to the king thereof:)] for those which were sent, finding where the Scots were incamped, vpon the top of a mounteine, not past fife miles from the English campe, returned backe to king Edward, and declared what they had seene and learned of the enemies doings.

King Edward right iollfull of the newes, causeth his armie to be diuided into thre battels, and forthwith marcheth on towards the place where his enemies late. And coming about none daies within sight of the Scots, he perceiued at length that the place which they kept was so strong, that with the height of the ground, & thereto defended on the one side with the course of a riuer, that by no means they might be assailed without great and manifest danger. The Englishmen in the end thought it best to chuse forth a place to incampe in for that night, and so doing, sent an herald at armes vnto the Scots, requiring them to come downe vnto some euen ground where battell might be giuen; but the Scots refused so to do, alledging that sith the Englishmen were thre to one in number, it was no reason to will them to forsake their ground of aduantage which they had taken and chosen forth for their owne defense.

Thus were they incamped nere togither either in sight of other for the space of thre nights, euerie day shewing themselves in order of battell, without breaking their arraie, except certeine of the horsemen, which on either part now and then came forth and Randall and to James Dowglas.

They made Northumberland.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan.

1327.

King Edward the third commeth with an armie against them.

Fr. Thin.

The Scots are incamped on a hill.

The English men sent to the Scots.

The answer of the Scots.

The Scots
dislodge.

The English
armie raised.

An enterprise exploited by sir James Dowglas.

The Scots
secretly returne home to their countrie.

and fell in skirmish, so that sometimes a man might haue seene good emptieng of saddles betwixt them. On the fourth day in the morning, when the Englishmen beheld the hill where the Scots had lien the night before, they perceiued how they were gone, and thereupon sending forth light horsemen to trie out which way they had taken, word was brought how they were but remoued to an other hill a little off, lieng fast by the same river, and there lay incamped more stronglie than before. Incontinentlie hereupon, king Edward raiseth his campe, and remoueth to an other hill lieng ouer against that hill where the Scots with their power were now lodged. At length, after that both the armies had lien thus a good space the one ouer against the other, James Dowglas took aduise with himselfe to exploit a right hardie enterprise.

He chose forth two hundred of perfect good horsemen, mounted vpon verie swift and readie geldings, with the which in the night season he passed silie by the English watch, that he was not once descried by anie of them, till he was entered into their campe, where, by the noise of the mouing of the horse feet, some chanced to awake that lay asleepe. But yet per the alarme were raised to anie purpose, the Scots thus led by Dowglas had perced through, euen into the kings tent, and cut two cords of the same in sunder, so that the king was in no small danger to haue bene slaine, had not the Scots withdrauen the sooner for doubt of being inclosed with their enemies as now raised on each side to come to his succors, but Dowglas yet returned in safetie with his number backe againe to the Scottish campe, hauing slaine (as some books report) three hundred Englishmen at this bzunt. The Englishmen warned hereby, took better heed after to their watch.

These armies lay thus one against an other for the space of eightene daies, till at length the Scots priuillie in the night conueied themselves away, and returned home in most speedie wise, supposing they had done sufficientlie inough for that time. It chanced that in the euening, before the Scots went thus their waies, there was a Scot taken by the English watch, who being brought before the king, confessed that there was commandement giuen through the Scottish campe, that euerie man should be readie with his armor and weapon to follow the standard of Dowglas at a certeine houre the same night, but whether they intended to go, it was unknowne, saue onelie amongst the capteins. Hereupon the English doubting least the Scots minded to giue them a camifado that night, placed themselves in order of battell, and so stood till the next morning readie to haue receiued them, if they had come. The Scots also made great fires within their campe, that they might see about them. In the breake of the day, there were two Scottish trumpeters taken by the English scouts, the which being brought before the king, declared that the Scottish armie was broken vp and returned, and further shewed how they were appointed thus to declare vnto him, hauing suffered themselves to be taken for the same intent. As soone as the Englishmen were aduertised that the Scots were thus departed, they hasted to the place where they had lien incamped, in hope to haue found some riches, which for hast they had left behind them: but at their comming thither, they found nothing, but 200000 paires of hieland shoes, which are made of the greene hides of beasts vntanned. Also they found three hundred hides of sauage beasts set vpon stakes in stead of caldrons, therein to seeth their meat. Moreover, they had left behind them five hundred dead carcases of beasts & sheepe, which for that they could not dye them away, they killed, to the end the Englishmen should haue no gaine by them. There were likewise found five Englishmen with their legs broken, & bound naked vnto trees, which were quicklie loosed and committed to the cure of surgeons. The enemies being thus departed, king Edward by aduise of his counsell brake vp his campe, and returned to London, supposing it but lost labour to trauell his people anie further at that time.

In this yeare died Walter Stewart, father to Robert Stewart, that was after king of Scotland. And in this yeare following, or rather the same yeare, R. Elizabeth mother to David Bruce the prince deceased, and was buried in Dunfermling in the yeare after the birth of our Saviour 1328. In the same yeare, king Robert won the castell of Roxburgh, and shortly after besieged the castell of Alnwick, where were slaine William de Mowbray knight, John Clapauen, and Malisus de Dunbar, with diuerse other of the Scottish nobilitie. In the end of the same yeare, there were ambassadoes sent from king Edward into Scotland for the conclusion of a peace, which was accorded in this wise: that R. Edward should renounce all his right & claime which he had or might haue to the crowne of Scotland, in declaring it free as it was in time of king Alexander the third, vnder these conditions, that Northumberland should be admitted for the marches of Scotland on the east part, and Cumberland on the west. For the which renuntiation thus to be made, and for the damages done to England by the Scots, it was couenanted that king Robert should pay to king Edward thirtie thousand marks sterling. And for the more suertie and ratification of this small agreement and peace betwixt the two nations, it was concluded that Jane the sister of king Edward should be coupled in mariage with David Bruce the prince of Scotland.

All which articles were put in writing, wherevnto all the seals of the great lords within both the realms were set in most substantiall wise. The solemnization of the mariage before remembred was kept at Berwick within a while after, on the eighteenth day of Iulie, in the presence of a great number of the nobilitie, both of England and Scotland. King Robert liued not past twelue moneths after this mariage, departing out of this life at Cardos the seventh day of Iulie, in the yeare of our Lord 1329. In the latter end of his daies, he was grievously vexed with a leprosie, which thus finally made an end of him, in the twentieth fourth yeare of his reigne, being one of the most valiant princes knownen in anie part of the whole world in those his daies, hauing felt in his time the force of either fortune: for in the beginning of his reigne, such storms of aduersitie surrounded him on each side, that if his constant manhood had not bene the greater, it might haue brought him in despair of all recovery: for beside sundrie discomfitures, which he receiued at the hands of the enemies, with losse of all his brethren (his brother Edward onlie excepted) the most part of all the lords of Scotland were against him, and aided his aduersaries to the uttermost of his power: yet he nothing discouraged hereby, ceased not to imploy all industrious means to deliuer his countrie from the yoke of seruite bondage (which he believed would succeed by the gouernment of the English kings) till at length (as it were in despite of all former chanches) he attained the effect of his whole inuozors, so much the more to his praise, as he had found the hinderance and difficultie great in bringing the same fullie to passe.

This same therefore did spread hugelie, not onelie amongst

The Scots
king Robert

his mortal
enemies

quest propose an Eng herald by Edward
tied.

1325, as is Major faith, but that can not be, if the died the same yeare that the Scots were besieged in Roxburgh
parke.
Robert cas-
till won.
A peace was concluded between Edward and Jane, the sister of king Edward, married to David Bruce prince
of Scotland.

The best answer
question

The best scope

The hy-
percube

The death of king Robert

The hy-
percube

The hy-
percube

1329.

King Robert
rather both prosperous
and at warre
for some.

The of the conceit being a batter

amongst his owne people, but also amongst strangers, insomuch that his due praise was not wanting, no not euen amongst and in the midst of his verie enemies. For (as it is said) on a time it chanced that king Edward the third, sitting at a banquet among his nobles, fell in talke with them of warlike enterpises, and of such notable capteins as had excelled in knowledge in that behalfe. At length, after much reasoning to and fro, he proponed this question to the king of heralds, that as then stood by, commanding him to declare which were the three most worthe & ballant capteins that he had knowen in all his daies. The herald aduising with himselfe of this matter, staied a space, in which meane while all the companie were quiet, longing to heare his answer therein; both for that they knew his skill was such as was able best to giue sentence in such a matter; and againe, for that manie of them thought hee would haue numbred some of those that were there present amongst those three. But the herald did not onelie know all the noble men within the realme of England, but also all such strangers as had in anie wise excelled in partiall prowesse, hauing all their acts and ballant doings in fresh memorie, and thereupon boldlie vttered his mind as folloeweth.

The first, most worthe and ballant chiefeine (said he) that hath liued in these our daies, was Henrie the emperour: for he subdued three kings and three realmes, and mainteined his imperiall estate and prosperous felicitie to his liues end. The second, was sir Giles of Argentine, who in three sundrie battels against the Saracens got the victorie, & slue two of their principall capteins with his owne hands. The third (if vnder your graces correction I may praise the enimie) I must iudge to be Robert Bruce king of Scotland: whom the herald had no sooner named, but all those that were present, with scornfull laughter began to least at the heralds presumption, for that he durst so malapertlie in the kings presence honor the enimie with so high praise. At length, at the heralds request, the king commanded them to be still. The herald then began againe thus: I beseech your highnesse (said he) if I haue ought offended, to take my words in good part: for I haue bene euer of this opinion, that the truth should in euerie case be vttered, receiued, and allowed in your presence; namely, where your highnesse commandeth anie man to declare the same. This one thing therefore I shall desire you to consider, that if a man must needs be vanquished, it is lesse dishonor to be vanquished of him that is knowen for a right ballant personage, than of him that is but a coward. Moreover, to shew plainelie vnto your grace, how much I esteeme the ballancie of king Robert (whome I perceiue some here may not abide to haue numbred with the two former most ballant capteins) if truth might appeare, I durst be bold to preferre him with good cause before them both: for the ballant acts attributed by Henrie the emperour may be ascribed rather to the wisdomme of his counsellors, than to his owne ballantnesse and prudence: but contrarielie, king Robert being confined out of his countrie, and destitute of friends and all conuenient aid, recovered the realme of Scotland, by his singular manhod, out of the hands of your noble father, and established it with such tranquillitie, that he appeared moze terrible to his enemies of England, than euer they had bene afore to his subjects of Scotland. These or the like words vttered by the herald, were well allowed of the king; and stopped the mouths of them that toke the matter so strangely at the first.

But now to returne to the purpose. King Robert a little before the time of his death, called together into the chamber where he laye, the chiefe peers of his realme, and there in presence of them all, committed vnto them the government of his sonne David, a child as then not past seuen yeeres of age. He also aduised them of sundrie things touching the rule of the realme after his decease, which he perceiued was at hand. And first he counsellled them, that in no wise they should at anie time make an absolute lord ouer the Isles; because the people of the same are of nature wildest, and some seduced and brought to moue rebellion against the king, into the which being once fallen, they are not easilie reduced to their due obediencie againe, by reason their countreies are of such strength, that they cannot be approached but by sea; as instructed with the same. Secondarilie, he aduised them neuer to appoint anie set battell with the Englishmen; no, to leoparde the realme vpon the chance of one field: but rather to resist and keepe them off from indamaging their countreies, by often skirmishing, & cutting them off at streights & places of aduantage, to the intent that if the Scots be discomforted, they may haue some power yet reserved to make new resistance. Thirdlie, he forbade them in anie wise to make any long peace with England; for naturallie men war dull and slouthfull by long rest and quietnes, so that after long peace, though lacke of vse and exercise of armes, men are not able to susteine anie great paines or trauell.

Moreover, he alledged, how the Englishmen would continue in peace no longer than there wanted opportunitye and conuenient occasion for them to attempt the warres: and therefore he iudged it best, that the Scots should neuer conclude anie perpetual peace with them, nor take anie truce longer than for three or foure yeeres at the most. He willed them further, to consider one thing, that when their appeared least occasion of warres with England, then they ought to be most circumspect, least peraduenture their enemies should come at vnwares, and find them vnprovided for timelie resistance. Herevnto he desired them, that after his deceasse, they would choose some one of the most worthe capteins within the whole realme, to beare his heart vnto Iherusalem, and there to see it buried within the temple, before the holie sepulchre of our Lord. For if he had not bene for a long space hindered by vrgent businesse of warres at home, and lastlie prevented by death, he had vowed to haue passed with an armie into the holie land, in defense of the christian faith, against the Turkes and Saracens.

Herevpon when he was dead, the lords by one assent, appointed sir James Dowglas to take this enterpise in hand, who willingly obeyed their order, as he that had euer during the life of king Robert, serued most faithfully the bodie wherein the same heart was inclosed, & for this cause the Dowglas beare the bloudie heart in their armes. The commendations of which king Robert, Buchanan setteth forth (to comprehend manie things in few words) to be: that he was euerie way a most worthe person, and that there were few to be found (from the former herofall daies) equall vnto him in all kinds of vertue. For as he was in battell most ballant, so was he in peace most temperate & iust. And though his vndoubted good successe and perpetuall course of victories (after that fortune was once satisfied or rather wretched with his misfortunes) were verie great, yet he seemeth to Buchanan to be farre more wonderful in his aduerser fortune: whose valour of mind was such, that it could not be broken (no not so much as weakened) by so manie evils as happened vnto him at one time: whose singular constancie appeared by the captiuitie of his wife, and the death of his ballant brother. And besides that, his friends were

The aduise given by king Robert vnto his nobles before his deceasse.

His desire to haue his heart borne to the holie sepulchre

The cause why the Dowglas beare the bloudie heart

Fr. Thin.

There is no bodie but hath his shadow, no rose but hath his prick.

Welcome of king Robert.

His praise amongst the commons.

Question proponed to a English lord by king Edward the third.

The heralds answer to the question.

The herald assigned.

The heralds suit.

The heralds warning.

The opinion of the herald concerning king Roberts ballancie.

they no Englishman would make him king at King Edward the third by his campe.

1326, as lo.

Major faith, but that cannot be, if he died the same yeare that the Scots were besieged in Stanhop park. Forham castle still stood. A insomuch besieged. Ambassadors sent from Edward for a peace. A peace concluded with England in the year 1328, after account of them that began the peace at Chyll-male. Jane, or rather June, the sister of king Edward, married to David Bruce prince of Scotland.

The death of king Robert.

1329.

King Robert tasted both prosperous and aduerser fortune.

King Robert tasted both prosperous and aduerser fortune. He recovered all his gains, lost of his wife, so to damage ment here in text of praise, great

anelie ongt

at one time bereft with all kind of calamities, and they which escaped death, were banished with the losse of their substance: he himselfe was not onelie spoiled of all his patrimonie, but of the kingdome also, by the mightiest king of that age Edward the first, king of England, a man most readie in counsell, and of dispatch of his affaires as well in warre as peace. Yea, so farre was this Base oppressed at one time with all these kinds of evils, that he was diuened into extreme pouertie. In all which misfortunes he neuer doubted of the recoverie of the kingdome, neither did or fast anie thing unbeseeming the noble mind of a king: for he offered no violent hands to himselfe; as did the late Cato and Marcus Brutus, neither with Marius did he pursue his enemies with continuall hatred: For when he had recovered his former estate, he solued with them that most occasioned his labour and trouble, that he rather remembered himselfe to be a king ouer them, and not an enemy vnto them. To conclude, he did not so forsake himselfe towards his end (when a grievous disease added troubles to age) but that he confirmed and established the present estate of the kingdome, and provided for the quiet of posteritie, whereby his subjects did not so much lament his death, as that they were deprived of so iust a king and goodlie father.)

Sir James Dowglas then chosen as most worthy to passe with king Roberts heart vnto the holie land, closed the same in a case of gold, imbalmed with sweet spices, & right pretious ointments. And herewith hauing in his companie a number of nobles, and gentlemen, amongst whom sir William Sinclair and sir Robert Logan were chiefe, he passed forth till he came to the citie of Ierusalem, where he buried the heart aforesaid, with all reuerence and solemnitie that he might deuise. This done, he resorted with such number as he had brought thither with him, vnto such other christian princes as at the same time were gathered with great puissance, from sundrie parts of christendome to war with the Turks, and there in companie with them, he did so noble seruice against the common enemies of our religion, that by his often victories he wan great honoz to the christian name. At length, hauing accomplished his charge in those parties, with no lesse fame and glorie than princelie magnificence, he toke the seas to haue returned home into Scotland: but by force of contrarie winds he was diuened on the coast of Spaine, landing there vpon the borders of Granada, where at the same time he found the king of Aragon, ready to make warres against the Saracens that inhabited in those parties.

The Dowglas, to make his manhood and prowess the more knowne in all parts where he came, offered the king of Aragon to serue vnder him in those warres against the infidels, and so fought at sundrie times in his support against the enemies, with prosperous successe, till at length hauing too much confidence in fortunes fauour (which hath brought so manie noble men to their deaths) hee waied negligent, and toke small regard of dangers that might insue, so that in the end he was inclosed by an ambush laid for him by the enemies, and there slaine amongst them, with all such as he had about him. This was the end of that noble Dowglas, one of the most valiant knights that liued in his daies. He had gotten the victorie 57 sundrie times in fight against the Englishmen, and 13 times against the Turks, at it is written at length (saith Bellenen) in Scotichronicon. He might haue bene right necessarie for the defense of Scotland, if his chance had bene to haue returned home in safetie. He ended his life in maner (as is before mentioned) on the 26 day of August, in the yere of Grace 1330.

But now to proceed in order with the historie, we shall note, that after the decease of king Robert, his sonne Dauid, a child scarce seuen yeres of age, was proclaimed king, and afterwards crowned at Stone, the 23 day of Nouember, in the yere of our Lord 1331. During the time of his minority, earle Thomas Randall was ordeined gouernoz of the realme, who for the space of foure yeres in the latter end of R. Roberts reigne, had the whole administration of things committed to his charge by the same king, for that by reason of sicknesse he was not able to attend the same himselfe. This earle Thomas then being elected gouernoz by the generall consent of all the nobles of the realme, considered with himselfe, how necessarie it was for the people to continue in peace, till they had somewhat recovered their hindrance & losses chanced to them by the former wars. He addrested therefore certeine ambassadoz immediately after the death of king Robert, vnto the king of England, to require a new confirmation of the peace betwixt both the realmes for a season. These ambassadoz found the king of England easie enough to be intreated for the grant of their sute, so that a generall truce was taken for the space of thre yeres.

In that meane time, earle Thomas applied his whole studie for the maintenance of iustice and equitie throughe the whole realme, not omitting yet to appoint order, that men should be provided of armor and weapon for defense of the countrie, if neede shold be required. [Wherefore when he was going to Widdone (a towne in Galloway) word was brought to him, that there was a strong assemblie of theues in that countrie, besetting the high waies, and spoiling the passengers: wherupon sending forth a companie of his followers, he apprehended and hanged them all, not fauouring anie vnder pretext of deuotion or religion: For one of them latelie come from Rome (and safe as he supposed by the charter of the popes pardon) was also apprehended and executed by appointment of this Randall, saying, that the pardon of the fault belonged to the pope, but the punishment thereof belonged to the king.]

Whereouer, for the better proofe of exercising iustice amongst them that couered to liue by truth, and to haue more readie occasion to punish others that nient the contrarie, he commanded the saddles and bydes, with all other such instruments and stuffe as pertained to husbandrie, should be left abroad both day and night without the doores: and if it chanced that anie of them were stolen or taken awaie, the thiriffe of the thire should either cause the same to be restozed againe, or else to paie for it on his owne purse. Finally, such punishment was exercised against theues in all places, that both theft and pilforing were quite suppressed, and the realme brought to more tranquillitie than euer it was in anie kings daies before. Anie insolent and misruled persons were tamed by his seuerer chastisement and iustice. Also that vertue might be cherished within the realme, he commanded that no vagabund nor idle person should be receiued into anie towne or place, except they had some craft or science wherewith to get their liuings. By this meane he purged the realme of Scotland of manie idle & slothfull roges and vagabunds.

It is said, that during the time whilst such strict punishment was exercised against offenders, by the ministers of the lawes thereto by him authorized and assigned: it fortuned that a carle of the countrie, because he durst not steale other mens goods, stole his owne plow irons, that he might haue the value of them recompensed to him by the thiriffe: neuertheless, such earnest diligence was vsed in the search

David.

1331.

Earle Thomas Randall gouernoz of Scotland.

Ambassadoz sent into England.

A truce for thre yeres.

Fr. Thin, Buchanan.

A meane to haue iustice executed.

Domination of thames.

A landable ordinance against vagrant persons.

and truth
had the serue hard in up in ouer a migh
doze,
want
sum
red u
his g happ etill tigit
and f put ken wed
spit
other lon
man
that dau
rich ther licit
to e
if e wer imp
So
En
bos
for Edwards
ample to de me earle Thomas (as the Scots do say.) But this is a kind of practice a mongst men
of bigge stan dards re gards to byz nesses in contempt.
I wante sent into Scotlan to punish the gouernoz.
The strict in strument to bring such a thing to passe.

Hyperbolicall
commendations.The ballance of James
Dowglas
shewd against the Turkes.James Dowglas commeth
on land in Spaine.James Dowglas slaine by the Saracens
in Spaine.How often James Dow-
glas had got
the victorie.

and trill, who had the plow irons, that finally the truth came to light, whereupon for his craftie falsehood the partie gillie was hanged, as he had well deserved. The gouernour himselfe, for that he saw how hard it was to reduce them that had bene brought vp in slouthfull loitering, vnto honest exercise, held euer about him a gard of warlike persons, that he might the more easilie oppresse all stubborne offendors, which would not submit themselves to his com-mandements. Those that appeared before him, vpon summons giuen, had fauourable iustice, temper-red with much mercie ministred vnto them.

Others that refused to obeie, were pursued with his gard, and hanged euer as they were taken: as it happened on a time at Haddington, where threescore euill and naughtie disposed persons being gathered together, robbed and spoiled the people on each side: and for that they regarded not, but rather misused a pursuant, whom he sent vnto them, they were all taken incontinentlie by his foresaid gard, which followed the said pursuant at the heeles, and without re-spit hanged them vpon gibbets to giue example to others. Thorough such rigorous iustice, no rebellion was heard of within the realme of Scotland manie yeres after, so that such tranquillitie folowed, that not onelie theues and loitering lubbers were daunted, but the realme also aduanced in wealth and riches, to the great terror of all the foes and enemies thereof. King Edward aduertised of this great felicitie chanced to the Scots by this meanes, began to enuie the same, and imagined with himselfe, that if earle Thomas, the author of the same felicitie were dispatched out of the way, it should not onelie impeach the proceeding of so great wealth to the Scots, but also make for the suertie of the realme of England: for the singular manhood and high pro-uidence of this earle was by him and other his nobles so suspected.

He thought good therefore to attempt the thing by sleight, which might not be done by force, that afterwards the realme of Scotland might be the more infiebled, and as it were made open to receiue displeasure at his hands. For king David was young, and manie of his nobles bare small good will either towards him, or his house, for the slaughter of their fathers and friends in the blacke parlement.
Whereupon he deuised, which way he might best de-stroie earle Thomas, the onlie confounder of all his imagined hope, as to atchieue anie luckie enterprize against the Scots. At length he deuised to dispatch him by poison: and after he had long debated by whome he might worke that feat: finally he found none so fit for his purpose, as a monke of the order and facultie of those, that wandering from place to place, can with dissembling visage say that thing with mouth, which they neuer thought in heart: for oftentimes men of that order, put no difference between shame and honestie, cloking their execrable wickednesse vnder the feined shadow of their hypocriticall coloures.

This monke, fullie instructed in that wherabout he was sent, came into Scotland, and feining himselfe to be a physician, got credit within a while amongst the people, to be a man of most excellent knowledge, for he had a companion with him, that being made priuie to the matter, set forth his cum-ning and practise to the bittermost, declaring what notable and most desperat cures he had taken in hand, and made the patients perfectlie whole of the same, where all other had quite giuen them ouer: namelie he bruted it abroad, that for healing of the stone and grauell, his like was not to be found in all christendome, as euidentlie had appeared by cures which he had shewed vpon sundrie noble men, both in England and France. This he spake, for that it was knowne, how the lord gouernour was sore vered with that disease, hoping by this meanes to haue him in cure, that he might thereby the more easilie worke his diuelish enterprize.

And euen according to his desire it came to passe: for being taken for such a man as he was named to be, he was sent for to the gouernour, and comming before him, he handled the matter so with wordes, that the gouernour was contented he should take him in hand, which he did with such wicked intention, that persuading him to keepe such diet as he prescribed, and here with to take such sirrups & other things as he would giue him, at length he most traitorous-lie poisoned him in bed. The venem was of such mixture, as would not flea him out of hand, but by little and little waste his entrails, that the monke might haue leasure to escape home into England, per it were perceiued what he had done. He therefore after he had ministred his wicked poison, found meanes to conueie himselfe out of the wate, and returned most speedilie into England, informing king Edward how he had delt. The gouernour feeling himselfe tormented with such paine and worke in his stomach and wombe, and hearing that the monke was gone, and minded not to returne to him againe, he began to doubt the matter, and shortly after learned by physicians that he was poisoned, and that the venem had taken such hold within his bowels, that it was not possible to remoue it.

In the meane time was king Edward come with an armie to the borders, purposing to invade Scotland, for that he thought how the gouernour was either dead, or at the verie point of death, and therefore he was in hope, that comming in time of the trouble vpon his death into Scotland, he should find occasion to atchieue some enterprize, highlie to his aduantage.
But the gouernour aduertised hereof, raised a power, and though he were not able either to ride or go, yet he caused himselfe to be caried forth in an horse-litter. King Edward hearing that the gouernour was comming towards him with an armie, & that himselfe in person quite contrarie to his expectation, he sent an herald vnto him for meane of communication of some peace, as was outwardlie pretended, though nothing else was ment but that he should es-pie how all things in the Scotish campe stood. The gouernour hearing of this heralds comming, arraied himselfe in his best apparell, that it might appere he was rather recovered of his infirmities, than otherwise weak and feeble thorough his disease, and then causing the herald to be brought before him, where he was set in a chaire, to heare what his message was, which consistin in certeine demands not greatlie agreeable to reason, the gouernour with bold countenance answered, that he trusted within short time to make it knowne, what right the Englishmen had to moue such unreasonable request, and thus dispatching the herald, he gaue him all such gogeous and rich apparell as he ware at the same time when he thus talked with him.

King Edward at the returne of the herald, not perceiuing otherwise by his report, but that the go-uernour was in health, he returned immediatlie with his armie into England, and licencing euerie man to depart to his home, laid hands on the monke, and as one that had dissembled with his prince (for so he tooke it) caused him to be burnt for his vntruth. Thus was the wretch righteously recompensed, as he had most iustlie deserved. In the meane time, the gou-ernour returning homewards, through force of the venem still increasing, deceased at Appleburgh, and was buried at Dunfirmling, in the yere of our redemption 1331. He left behind him two sonnes, Thomas

The gouernour
is poisoned.

The monke
dieth.

Edward
his purpose to invade Scot-
land.

The gou-ernour in an horselitter is caried forth to encounter
the English-
men.
An herald
sent to the go-uernour.

The gouernours answer to the herald.

The monke
is burnt.

Fr. Thin:
Buchanan.

1331.

Thomas and John, worthie such a father, they bring persons of great valure, and friends to their native countrie.]

Two gouernours chosen to rule Scotland.

After his deceasse, by common consent of the three estates of the realme in counsell assembled, Patrike earle of March, and David earle of War were chosen gouernours, the first (that is to say, the earle of March) had the charge of that part of the realme which lieth on the south side of the Forth, and the other (that is to say, the earle of War) was appointed to gouerne all that on the north side. Shortly after rose great trouble in Scotland by meanes of Edward Balioll, the son of John Balioll before remembred, as thus: It chanced there was one Twynam Loxton, a gentleman borne, but spotted with vile conditions as adulterie, and diuerse other, for the which heing put under censure of the church by the official of Glasgow he took at length the same official as he was going towards the towne of Aire, and held him in captiuitie, till he had paid two hundred pounds for his deliuerance. But this iniurie remained not long unpunished: for sir James Douglas, before his passage to the hollie land, would not suffer him to rest, till he had constrained him to flee into England for his more safegard.

Twynam Loxton.

Scottish lords banished into England.

Twynam Loxton sent by to Edward Balioll.

At his comming into England, he met with David Cumyn earle of Atholl, and manie other Scottishmen, which were banished in times past by king Robert, for that they assisted the king of England against him. These persons being driven out of the realme, and confederat altogether in one band, remained in England long time after, euer trusting to see some occasion offered, whereby they might one day returne againe into their owne native countrie. And now hearing that earle Thomas Randall the gouernour was deceased, this Twynam Loxton in name of them all was sent ouer into France to perswade Edward Balioll to attempt the recovery of the crowne and realme of Scotland, as the rightfull heritage of his father, and descended vnto him as lawfull and rightfull heire. Though the Balioll had no regard to make anie claime at all to the crowne of Scotland before this time, yet through the pithe persuations of the earnest messenger, declaring how easie a matter it were for him to achieve, considering the aid which he should haue in England, both at the kings hands, and also by the Scottishmen which remained there in exile, by whose meanes he might assure himselfe of support inough within Scotland it selfe, after he was once entered, finally he concluded to passe ouer into England, to proue what purchase he might make there.

Edward Balioll cometh into England

The promise of the Balioll to Edward. Edward doth agree to aid the Balioll. The English writers speake but of two thousand, or 2500 at the most. Ric. Southwell.

Fr. Thin.

At his comming thither, he made suite to the king, to aid him in his righteous quarrell towards the attaining of the crowne of Scotland, which if he might bring to passe with prosperous successe, he promised to hold the same of him and his successors as superior lords thereof. King Edward gladly vpon that condition, condescended to his request, notwithstanding the alliance contracted with king David, by the marriage of him with his sister. Wherevnto he appointed forth six thousand men well apparelled and arayed for the warre, to passe by sea with the Balioll, and other the confederats into Scotland, trusting that vpon their arrivall there, they should find no small number of friends to assist them. For beside the Balioll, there was the lord Henrie Beaumont, a Frenchman, who had married the earle of Buchanans daughter and heire: also the earles of Atholl, Angus [the lords Perth and Wake, Richard Talbot, Henrie Ferrers, John Mowbray] & other Scottish lords such as were banished Scotland, when king Robert le Bruce recovered it out of the English mens hands. These were appointed to go with the Balioll to assist him in that enterpryse: and likewise the lord Stafford, and diuerse other English capitaine, wherevpon when all their provision was once ready, with the number appointed them by king Edward, and a few others, they got them a shipboard, and sailing forth by the coast till they entered into the Forth, at length they came on land nere the towne of Kingorne, and shortly after, incountring with Alexander Seton, they slew him, and put his folkes to flight.

Balioll verie ioyfull of this happie successe, came with his people to Perth, otherwise called St. Johns towne, whereof the earles of War and March being aduertised, they raised two mightie armies, and hastened toward the enemies, not as though they should haue to doe with men of warre, but to chastise a number of thieves and robbers, that were come out of England. Yet at length they concluded to ioinie both together in Strathern, that they might iointlie set vpon these enemies both at once. The Balioll seeing the matter brought so far forth, that no feare of death nor starting-hole by flight might auail him, boldly came forward, and pitched downe his tents at Dunblane nere to the water of Erne, trusting that if his armie would stand to it, and fight with manlike valour, he should weild his enemies well inough, notwithstanding their huge number. The same night came the earle of War with his power, and encamped with the same within sight of the English armie, but the earle of March lodged about fife miles from thence, at Dunsinane.

The Scots that were with the earle of War, having knowledge of the small number of their enemies, made no accounts of them, so that they neither took heed to their watch, nor to anie other order for defense of themselves, but fell to singing, dancing, revelling, and drinking, in most dissolute manner. The Balioll taking occasion hereof, determined to assault them the same night in their campe, and therevpon causing his people to make them ready to accomplish that enterpryse, in the dead of the night he issued forth of his campe, and comming vnto the water of Erne, passeth the same by the ford, where one Andrew Murray of Tullibard had pight a stake of set purpose, in midst of the streame, to stay them the waite. Thus having got all his armie ouer the water, without anie noise or din, so secretlie as might be deuised, he entered the campe of his enemies, and brake through till he came to the tent of the earle of War, the Scots generall, before he was once descried. Here at the first was the earle himselfe slaine, lieng fast asleep in his bed, & after with huge noise they set vpon the whole campe, murdering the Scots as they lay in slepe without all defense. And therevpon folloied so cruell slaughter, that nothing was heard but grunting and groning of people, as they lay on heapes ready to die, weltering together in their owne blood. And if it had not bene that Edward Balioll had caused ech of his men to wrape a white cloth about his arme, no man might haue knowne (by reason of the darknesse of the night) his friend from his fo.

The Englishmen were so earnestlie bent to the slaughter of Scots, that they might not be filled with the blood and murder of them, so that they slew none whome they might ouertake. There were slaine of nobles and gentlemen, to the number of three thousand, beside innumerable of the commons. A certeine number of the Scots that escaped out of the place, closed theiues together, and in purpose to be reuenged on the Englishmen for the death of their fellows, returned vpon them againe, and were slaine themselves euerie mothers sonne. The chiefest nobles that were slaine at this battell, were these,

Edward Balioll in Scotland.

Alexander Seton is slaine.

The earle of March is slaine.

The earle of War is slaine.

The earle of Atholl is slaine.

The earle of Angus is slaine.

The earle of Perth is slaine.

The earle of Buchan is slaine.

The earle of Mar is slaine.

The earle of Glamorgan is slaine.

The earle of Hereford is slaine.

The earle of Worcester is slaine.

The earle of Devon is slaine.

The earle of Somerset is slaine.

The earle of Gloucester is slaine.

The earle of Warwick is slaine.

The earle of Northampton is slaine.

The earle of Lincoln is slaine.

The earle of Derby is slaine.

Edward Balioll in Scotland.

Alexander Seton is slaine.

The earle of March is slaine.

The earle of War is slaine.

The earle of Atholl is slaine.

The earle of Angus is slaine.

The earle of Perth is slaine.

The earle of Buchan is slaine.

The earle of Mar is slaine.

The earle of Glamorgan is slaine.

The earle of Hereford is slaine.

The earle of Worcester is slaine.

The earle of Devon is slaine.

The earle of Somerset is slaine.

The earle of Gloucester is slaine.

The earle of Warwick is slaine.

The earle of Northampton is slaine.

The earle of Lincoln is slaine.

The earle of Derby is slaine.

these, the earle of Mar generall of the armie, Robert Bruce earle of Carrick, Alexander Fraser knight, William Haie constable of Scotland, with all his linage so whole, that had not his wife as then being great belied, bene afterwards delivered of a sonne, all his surname had bene utterly extingui- shed. [Whereupon saith Buchan, Thomas Kandoll, Robert Bruce, William Seintclere bishop of Dun- keld, and Doncan Hakouffe despairing of good suc- cesse, swore fealtie to Balioll.] There were slaine also Robert Keith marshall of the realme, with ma- nie of his surname, David Lindseie of Glenelke, Alexander Beiton, George Dunbar, Robert Stra- thaguen, Thomas Haliburton, and John Skrim- geour knights, with manie other overlong to re- hearse. The earle of Fife & a few other were taken. This battell was fought on the thirteenth day of August, in the peare 1332. After that Edward Ba- lioll had achieved this victorie thus at Duplin, he went straightwaies unto Perth (otherwise called 20 saint Johns towne) and giving assaile thereto, quick- ly entered it by force, without anie great resistance. The earle of Mar that lodged (as is said) the same night that the battell was fought, not past five miles off, hearing what had chanced both in the battell and to come, came with his people arrayed in good and per- fect order unto Perth asforesaid, to besiege the Eng- lishmen with Edward Balioll and other as then within it. But having lien there a certeine space, and filled the ditches in the meane time to such ab- 30 nantage, that it was thought if he had given the as- sault, he must needs have entered, he suddenlye raised from thence, and departed, to the unspeakable damage (as was thought) of the whole Scottish na- tion. The siege being thus raised, there came daillie great numbers of nobles and commons to the Ba- lioll, offering him their aid and service as his loiall subiects, towards the attaining of his right to the crowne.

Whereupon, perceiving his power sufficientlie in- 40 creased, and receiving the othes of the earle of Fife, and William de Seintclere bishop of Dun- keld, he went accompanied with them and a great number of other, unto Scone, where he was crow- ned the 24 day of September, in the peare last be- fore remembred, and received there the same time the homages and fealties of a great companie of no- bles & gentlemen, at that solemne feast there assem- bled. King David being not past nine peares of age, to avoid all dangers in that troublesome time, as de- stitute of succors, by advice of his counsell, was conveied over into France with quene Jane his wife, sister to Edward king of England, and was most friendlie received by Philip king of France the first of that name, so that they remained there the first of that name, so that they remained there the meane time divers noble men that yet remained at the deuotion of king David, understanding that 50 Edward le Balioll sojourned within the towne of Perth, otherwise called saint Johns towne, which standeth almost in the middle part of the realme, and was at that present not closed with anie wall, or rampire, they raised their powers, and besieged him within the same towne, he having as then no great companie about him.

Whereof when they of Galloway had advertise- ment, because the king was their speciall lord and chiefe gouernor, they assembled together under the conduct of the lord Eustace de Hakewell, and inua- ded the lands of those Scottishmen that had thus be- sieged their lord king Edward Balioll, and by that means constrained the adversaries to leaue their 60 siege. Whereupon earle Patrike and the new earle of Murray, with the lord Andrew de Murray, and the lord Archibald Dotoglasie, with an armie at- 70 sembled in all speed, entered into Galloway, doing all the mischief they could devise, with fire & sword, taking & bringing away from thence a great num- ber of cattell and other goods; but they slue no great number of people, for they found them not at home, being withdrawn out of the way for feare of this terrible inuasion. Thus did the Scots in that part of the realme spoile & harrie each others countries.

In the meane time, king Edward le Balioll for- 80 tified the towne of Perth, appointing the earle of Fife to the keeping thereof, whilst he with an ar- mie passed into the countrie; but before he returned, his adversaries (that is to say) the sonnes of them that had bene slaine at the battell of Duplin, Ro- bert Keith, Alexander Lindseie, James and Simon Fraser wan S. Johns towne in the third moneth, after they had laid siege thereto, as Hector Boetius saith. But whether that is to be intended after the first 90 besieging thereof, or now after their last coming thither, I can not affirme; but as the same Boetius writeth, now when the towne was wone, the earle of Fife, and Andrew Murray of Tullibard, were taken, with other of their complices. The earle with his wife and children were sent to the castell of Bal- dunnich, there to remaine vnder safe keeping; but Andrew Murray for his treason afoze committed, was beheaded. The towne being thus wone, was deliuered to the keeping of John Lindseie. But 30 Buchan. out of an other autho? supposeth that it was not committed to the custodie of anie; but that the walls were pulled downe to the ground. The ga- ning of this towne put the Scots in hope of more prosperitie to succed.

And thereupon John Kandoll the earle of Mur- ray, sonne to earle Thomas late of famous memo- rie, and Archibald Dotoglasie lord of Galloway, the brother of James Dotoglasie latelie slaine (as before is mentioned) in Spaine with Simon Fra- 40 seir and others, gathered a great armie, and came with the same [and William Dotoglasie lord of Lid- desdale to Panfet] against the Balioll, who being ad- uertised thereof, met them in Annandale, where in- countering thereof, after cruell fight & great slaugh- ter on both parts, at length Baliols part was put to the worst, so that he himselfe was glad to flee, ha- ving got an hostle without a bydle, and rested not till he came to Korburch, or rather to Carleill, as Richard Southwell saith. In this battell were slaine 50 sir Henrie Balioll, a man of great valiance, sir John Motobzaie, Walter Cumyn, and Richard Kirkbie; but Alexander Bruce earle of Carrick, and the lord of Galloway were taken prisoners, and sa- ued by the helpe of the earle of Murray, for that they had submitted themselves to the Balioll but latelie before. Shortlie after the achieving of this victorie, Andrew Murray a man of great puissance and pos- sessions was chosen to be gouernor, as colleague and associat with the earle of Mar. These two gouer- 60 nors, hearing that the king of England was min- ded to invade Scotland with a maine armie, sent sir Alexander Seiton with manie other gentlemen unto Berthke for defense of that towne and castell; [Alexander (as saith Buchan.) being captaine of the towne, and Patrike Dunbar captaine of the castle and borders adjoining.] Shortlie after, the new gou- ernor Andrew Murray was taken prisoner at Korburch, by reason that hauing put his enemies to flight in a skirmish which he made with them at the bydge without the castell, he pursued over fast- lie in the chase, and was inclosed amongst them, and so taken yet he might be rescued. [At which time also 70 William Dotoglasie lord of Liddesdale was sent to Annandale, to defend the west marches.] There Galloway in- uaded.

Saint Johns towne fortifi- ed.

Saint Johns towne wone.

Fr. Thin.

The battell discomfited and put to flight in An- nandale.

Andrew Murray chosen fellow gou- ernor with the earle of Mar.

Fr. Thin. Andrew Murray the new gou- ernor is taken prisoner.

Fr. Thin.

Ri. Southwell.
Crab, a pirat
taken.

was also taken beside the gouernoz, a notable pirat named Crab, who before that time had done manie displeasures to the Englishmen both by sea and land: and now because his countriemen would not ransom him, but to his further griefe had slaine his sonne within Berwikke, he became the king of Englands man, and did the Scots more damage afterwards, than euer he had done to the Englishmen before. The gouernoz at length was ransomed for a great summe of gold.

William Dowglas of Liddesdale taken prisoner.

About the same time William Dowglas of Liddesdale named for his singular manhood, The flower of chivalrie, fought with the Englishmen in Annandale, where himselfe was taken, and his people discomfited. Both these noble men thus taken prisoners, were detained in captiuitie more than a twelue moneths space, & then ransomed for a great summe of gold. This William Dowglas was sonne to sir James Dowglas, of whom so often mention is made heretofore. The realme of Scotland being thus diuided in two parts, the one assisting the Balioll, and the other continuing in their allegiance to king David: Edward king of England iudged the time to serue well for his purpose to make conquest on the Scots, and hereupon gathering a mightie armie both of Englishmen and strangers, as well such as were subiects to him as other, whome he retained out of Fozmandie, Anjou, and Flanders, he came with the same to subdue (as he outwardlie pretended) onelie such Scots as would not yeld themselves to the Balioll. The Scots perceiving themselves thus ouerset with enemies on each side, sent John Randall earle of Murray into France vnto king Dauid, that by his means they might purchase some aid of the French king to defend the realme from the forces of the enemies. In the meane time the king of England besieged Berwikke both by sea and land, notwithstanding such as were within it defended the towne so manfully that he got but small gaines by assaults; by reason whereof the siege continued for the space of foure moneths: during which time manie issues and skirmishes were made betwixt the Scots and Englishmen, whereat manie proper feats of armes were atchieued with variable fortune.

Edward king of England purposeth to subdue the
Scots.

The earle of Murray is sent into France.

Berwikke is besieged.

Buchanan.

Sir Alexander Seiton
capteine of Berwikke.

Archembald
Dowglas
chosen gouernoz in place of Andrew
Murray.

William Seiton bassard sonne to the capteine of the towne was taken prisoner, and his bassard brother, as he assailed the English ships one night ouerfiercelie, was drowned by mischance in the sea. At length, when they within the towne began to want vittels, the capteine sir Alexander Seiton sent vnto king Edward, promising that if he would grant a truce for the space of 6 daies, if no succour came in the meane time to resist his siege, the towne should be deliuered into his hands at the end of that terme; and for the assurance thereof, he was contented that his eldest sonne and heire Thomas Seiton should remaine with the said king in hostage. Whilist things passed thus at Berwikke, the nobles of Scotland by common consent chose Archembald Dowglas to be gouernoz in place of Andrew Murray. This Archembald Dowglas raising a mightie armie of Scottishmen entered with the same into the borders of England, so to withstand king Edward from the siege of Berwikke to defend his owne lands from burning and spoiling. But king Edward aduertised hereof, deuised an other shift, for immediatlie sending a messenger to sir Alexander Seiton capteine of the towne, he certified him plainelie, that unless he rendered the towne forthwith into his hands, both his sonnes which he had with him, the one as hostage, and the other as prisoner, should be without further delay hanged on a gibbet there in sight afore his owne face.

Sir Alexander Seiton hereto answered, that as yet the terme of the truce was not expired, & therefore desired the king either to obserue the covenants, or else to deliuer the pledges, that he might be at his aduantage: but king Edward (as saith the Scottish chronicle) immediatlie caused a paire of gallows to be raised before the towne, and both the sonnes of sir Alexander to be led thither, to suffer on the same without further respite. Sir Alexander Seiton beholding that pitifull sight, and weicing with himselfe, that he might saue the liues of those innocent creatures, if he would, was brought into great perplexitie of mind: the naturall affection and compassion which he bare towards his sonnes mouing him to haue rendered the towne on the one side, and the dutie with faith promised to his king and countrie restraining him from all such resolution on the other. But in the end, the tender regard he had to saue the liues of his sonnes, had overcome him, and caused him to haue rendered the towne into his enemies hand, had not his wife and mother to his said sonnes, exhorted him most earnestlie to the contrarie, alleging that such reproch and dishonour should rebound vnto them, and their posteritie, if through their fault the towne were traitorously deliuered into the enemies hand, that from thenceforth they should be infamed for euer: and as for the death of their sonnes, it was not to be counted a losse, for by this kind of death, they should win immortall name, & leaue to their parents the high honor and renoume of faithfull & loiall subiects. Againe they were yong enough to beget and bring forth new children, where they should be neuer able to recouer honor once lost; if by deliuering the towne into the enemies hands, they should seeme to betraye their countrie, & falsifie their faith to their naturall prince and soueraigne.

With such & manie other the like words, this noble & worthy ladie perswaded hir husband to restraîne his inward griefe, and brought him with right sorrowfull and heauie chere vnto his chamber, that through commiseration had of his sonnes, he should commit nothing either against his honor or weale of the towne. In the meane time, his two sonnes were put to death, ending their liues (saith Hector Boetius) with most honor, for the righteous quarell of their countrie: [at that time R. Edward removed his campe to Halidon hill.] Archembald Dowglas the gouernoz, being at that present entered into Fozthumberland with his armie, hearing that king Edward had thus cruellie put to death those two yong gentlemen, came the third day after with all his power, and pitched downe his tents not far from R. Edwards armie, fullie resolved to giue him battell, as well to reuenge the displeasure for the death of the said gentlemen, as to deliuer the towne of Berwikke from further danger of the enemies force.

Yet were there sundrie prudent counsellors in the Scottish armie, that for diuers respects aduised him in no wise to fight with the enemies at that present, considering the huge number of practised soldiers which they had amongst them, and the want of skilfull warriors on his side, hauing few with him saue yongmen, and such as lacked experience in the wars, for that they had bene but little trained therein. Notwithstanding, he himselfe was of contrarie opinion, iudging that the good willes and desire which his people had to fight with the Englishmen, should supplie their lacke of skill: and thereupon determining to trie the chance of battell with them, commanded his armie to refresh themselves with meat, drinke, and sleepe for that night, and to provide themselves readie for battell on the next morning. In the breake of the day he arrayed his people in order of battell. The vanguard was gi-

The appointing of the Scottish battles.

The policie of
the English
army.

Sir Alexander Seiton is doubt whether he will.

The maner
of the Alexander Se-
iton's wife.

The Scottish
army put to flight.

The great
laughter of
the Scots.

The number
of Scots slaine at Hal-
idon hill.

Sir Alexander Seiton
died at Hal-
idon hill.

1333. H. B.
Buchanan.

Fr. Th. B.

Archembald
Dowglas
purposeth to giue battell.

The towne of Berwikke
reioiced to Edward on the day, as
Ri. Southwell
saith.

men to Hugh, lord Rosse, having with him Kenneth earle of Southerland, Simon and John Fraiser, and John Purrey lieutenant to the earle of Purrey, who as then was sore tormented with a grievous maladie or sicknesse. The second battell was committed to the gouernance of Alexander Lindsay, with whom were joined Alexander Gordon, Kenneth Graham, and Robert Kenneth. In the third battell was the gouernor himselfe, accompanied with James, John, and Alane Stewards, the sons of Walter great Steward of Scotland.

On the other part, the Englishmen were nothing slow to come forward to encounter the Scots, but at the first to take the vantage of the ground; they gaue somewhat backe, withdrawing to the side of an hill, which they having once got, boldlie turned themselves to the Scots that pursued them over rashlie, in hope that the victorie had bene already theirs: but being here fiercelie receiued by the Englishmen, and beaten downe in heaps on each side, though they enforced themselves with all their might to be reuenged both for old and new iniuries which they had receiued, and so sue no small number of the enimies; yet in the end was the Scottish armie put to flight, and more slaughter made in the chase, than was afore in the battell: for one wing of the Englishmen making forwards to get before the Scots, so stopped their passage, that they were slaine miserablie on each side, as they had bene inclosed within a toile or deere-stall. There were but few in number that were taken prisoners, those on the next day were beheaded by commandement of king Edward, except a small number which were kept secret by some of the Englishmen for profit of their rancome. There were slaine on that day of the battell, to the number of fourtene thousand men, amongst whom were these as principall: Archem-bald Dowglas the gouernour, John Stewart, James Stewart, and Alane Stewart, the sonnes of Walter Stewart; the earle of Rosse, the earle of Southerland, Alexander Buse earle of Carrike, Andretto, James, and Simon Fraiser. This battell was fought on Dagdalen day, in the yeare of Grace, 1333.

¶ That this number and therewith manie more abounded by one yeare, Wil. Harison doth gather together by the series, because Adam Meremouth saith, that Dagdalen day fell on the monday this yeare, and that the morrow after being tuesday, Berwike was surrendered. But for so much as the same Meremouth maie be perhaps deceived, or mistaken herein: I haue here thought good (as in other places) to note in the margin the yeare, according to the account of Hector Boetius, speciallie in this place, the rather because he agreeth with Richard Southwell, Robert Auesburie, and other of our English writers, concerning this yeare in which this battell was fought: but where the same Boetius saith, that it was fought on Dagdalen day, R. Southwell, Robert Auesburie, Thomas Walf. and diuers other affirme, that it was fought the nineteenth of Julie being saint Margarets euen. But now to proceed. The place where this battell was stricken, is called Ballidon hill.

Immediatlie upon this overthrow of the Scottish power, Alexander Seiton and Patrike Dunbar captains of Berwike, despairing of all support, yielded the towne to king Edward, with condition to haue their liues and goods saved, and to become subiects to king Edward. Whereupon, when they had receiued their oths, Patrike Dunbar was commanded by king Edward, to build by againe the castell of Dunbar upon his owne costs and charges, for that he had throwen it downe, when he saw he was not able to defend it against the English power comming toward him. K. Edward accomplishing his desire, returned backe into England, leaving behind him with the Balioll, manie great lords of England (amongst whom for chiefe was Richard Talbot) that using the advice and counsell of them he might rule the realme of Scotland as should be thought expedient. Edward Balioll hereupon went thorough all the bounds of Scotland, placing garrisons of Englishmen in most part of all the strengths and castles of the realme, for he had them all at his commandement, save of them onelie excepted, which were kept by such Scottishmen, as would not renounce their allegiance promised to king David. For Dunbretan was kept by Malcolme Fleming of Cumrinald, Lochleuin by Alane of Drepon, the castell of Biddumme by Christine Buse, and Berghart by Robert Lauder, the pise of Loudopin, a strong thing of so small a compasse, was in the keeping of one John Thomson [who were supported with monie by Philip the French king] These captains would by no means neither yield themselves nor their fortresses to Edward Balioll, but defend them to the uttermost for the behoufe of their souereigne lord and master king David.

In the meane time, Philip king of France laboured to the pope, that he might by his authoritie cause the Englishmen to surceasse from further veyring the Scots, by their cruell inuasions made into their countrie: but when the popes ambassadors came about this matter into England, they were so little regarded, that they could not get licence to declare that message, and so were they glad to returne without doing any thing in the matter whereabout they were sent. Shortly after was a parlement called at Perth, where Edward Balioll was confirmed king of Scotland, a great number of the nobles promising there by solenne oths, neuer to remoue any rebellion against him in times to come. In the meane time rose great altercation betwixt Henrie Beaumont, and Alexander Dowglas for certeine lands in Buchquhane [which Edward the first had giuen John Dowglas, brother of this Alexander.] Henrie Beaumont claimed those lands by the right of his wife, that was daughter to the said Alexander, but the Dowglas claimed them as heire to his brother.

After long contention, Dowglas had the lands adiudged to him by sentence of the Balioll, by reason whereof, David Cumin earle of Atholl, and Richard Talbot, fauouring the cause of Henrie Beaumont, began to practise such conspiracies against the Balioll, that to auoid further danger, he was glad to repeale the former sentence by him giuen on the behalfe of Alexander Dowglas, and by new sentence adiudged the lands unto Henrie Beaumont, for that (as was alledged) he had married the inheritor thereof, which sentence he was constrained to change (saith Buchanan) by this means. K. Balioll (fauouring Alexander) and hauing adiudged the matter on his side, so offended the minds of the aduersaries, that they feared not openly to complaine of the iniurie. But when they perceived that they nothing profited therein by their speeches, they all departed from the court to their owne possessions of which faction Talbot, whilst he goeth into England, was taken and carried to Dunbretan: Beaumont doth strengthen Durgard a strong castell of Buchquhan, and not onelie maketh the land whereof the contention was, but also the whole countrie adjoining, to be subiect to his gouernement. Cumin (returning to the part of David Buse) goeth into Atholl (whereof he was earle) and sending the places of strength thereabouts, armeth himselfe to withstand all force, Richard Talbot.

All the fortresses of Scotland in Baliols hands, save onelie excepted.

Fr. Thin.

The popes ambassadors not regarded.

A parlement at Perth.

Strife betwixt Dowglas & Beaumont. Fr. Thin.

1334. Fr. Thin. John Maior.

The appointment of the Scottish battell.

The policy of the English.

Sir Alexander Seiton in doubt what to do.

The manie stomach of Alexander Seiton.

The Scottish armie put to flight.

The great slaughter of the Scots.

The number of Scots slaine at Ballidon hill.

Sir Alexander Seiton's sonnes executed. Fr. Thin.

1333. H. B. Buchanan.

Fr. Thin.

Archem-bald Dowglas purpoiseth to giue battell.

The towne of Berwike yielded to king Edward on the Dagdalen day, as R. Southwell.

if anie be prepared against him. Balioll fearing the conspiracie of these great men, changeth his iudgement, and awardeth the lands (whereof the contention grew) to Beaumont, and reconciled Cummin unto him, by the gift of many rich possessions, that then belonged to Robert Stewart, which shortly after was king of Scotland.

Thus through puissance of the parties, the truth in deciding the controuersie, might not onlie not haue place, but Balioll was also diuinen to that extremitie, that he must haue one of them (with his faction) to be his enemies. For now Alexander, stroken with this iniurie (to haue the iudgement giuen before for him thus to be reuoked) forsaking the Balioll, ioined him selfe with Andzew Murray gouernor of Scotland (for David Bruce) having a little before ransomed himselfe, with a great masse of monie out of the Englishmens hands. These things (although done at seuerall times) we haue ioined together, least by often repeating of them in other places, the course of the historie might be broken: for (vpon this) Andzew Murray besieged Beaumont in the castell of Dongard, the inheritance of his wife, where he surrendered the same, vpon condition that he might frelie repaire into England: at what time also Richard Talbot (being beyond the mounteins, in the inheritance of his wife the daughter of John Cummin of Scotland (for now manie English nobles possessed great reuenues in Scotland by marriages) hearing of these newes, that Balioll was forsaken by the earle of Atholl and Beaumont, would haue gone into England, but was taken in Lownes. ¶ This yere the earle of March holding on the part of the king of England, came to him to Perthcastell vpon Tine, who returning homeward, was grievously wounded of the people of Northumberland, for couetousnes, to haue robbed him of such monie as B. Edward had liberallie bestowed vpon him.)

Not long after this, Edward Balioll came to Kainfrew, and there receiuing the people into his obedience, had the keyes of the castell of Rothsaie and Dunnone, brought vnto him by sir Alane Lile shiriffe of Bute [at what time the king gaue to him the keeping of the castell of Rothsaie, hauing before made him shiriffe.] Thus did the Balioll increase in puissance, by such confluence of people as daile submitted themselves vnto him, & he enriched them liberallie with lands and goods still as they came to him, thereby to win there good wils. He sought by all meanes possible to haue gotten Robert Stewart into his hands, as the person whome he knew to haue most right, next vnto king David to the crowne of Scotland: but through the diligent foresight of his friends, this Robert Stewart being about the age of fiftene yeres, was conueied [with hote and horse, by the helpe of William Harriot and John Gilbert] to the castell of Dunbretton, where he was iustlie receiued by Malcolme Fleming the capteine.

The Balioll being soze offended, that such castles as were kept by his enemies, were so great an impediment to his interprises, by succouring and relieuing his aduersaries to make warres against him, he got together an armie, and the next yere laid siege to the castell of Lochleuin: but perceiuing that this castell might not be wone without long siege, he appointed sir John Striueling to continue the siege with a great power of men, vntill the castell were yielded. There were left also with him, Michaell Harriot, David Wernis, and Richard Palenill, with diuerse other. These captaine aduising the place and site of the castell, lodged themselves within the churchyard of saint Herse, beside Kainrosse, making bassiles and other defenses within the same, for their more safegard. Within the castell were two balliant captaine to defend it, the one named Alane Wepont and James Lambie, citizens of saint Andrezus.

The enemies assaied all the meanes that might be deuised to haue wone this castell, but all was in vaine. At length, they deuised a subtil sleight, whereby to compasse their intent, on this wise. They went about to dam vp the mouth of the riuer where it issueth out of the Loch, with earth, trees, & stones, that the water being so kept in, might rise to such an height, that it should ouerflow the castell, and so drown all the people within it. And to cause the Loch to swell more speedilie, they turned the course of diuerse riuers and brookes in the countrie thereabouts, and brought them into the same Loch. It chanced at the same time, that sir John Striueling captaine of the siege, with a great part of the armie, went vnto Dunfirmling for deuotion sake, to visit the shrine of saint Margaret, sometime queene of Scotland. Whereof Alane Wepont then captaine of the castell, hauing vnderstanding, about midnight prepared three botes, and taking certeine soldiers with him, rowed south to the head of the dam or water, and there, with such engins as he had deuised for the purpose, assaied to boare through and make a hole in the banke or rampire that kept vp the water, which when they had brought to passe, they returned quicklie againe to the castell.

The water hauing once gotten an issue, within a while ware the hole so large, that entering with more violence, it finally brake downe the banke, and rushed south with such an huge streame, that it bare downe all afore it, drowning by the bassils and tents of them that lay at siege there, and caried the same with men and all downe into the deepe sea, they were so suddenlie taken, yer they could make anie shift to escape. Alane Wepont, when the water was fallen to the old marke, issued south of the castell, & setting vpon those that had escaped the danger of the water, due part of them, and put the remnant to flight. John Striueling hearing the mischief that had happened to his folks, returned to the siege, and made a bold nener to depart from thence, till he had taken the castell, and slaine all them within it. But yet, after he had laine there a long time, and saw it was not possible to win that fortresse, he was constrained to raise his siege, and to go his waies, after he had lost thereat no small number of his people. This siege of Lochleuin chanced in the Lent season, in the yere 1335.

In the yere following, king Edward prepared an armie both by sea and land, to enter into Scotland. He sent by sea 70 ships well and sufficientlie decked for the warres, to enter by the Forth: but by a soze tempest manie of those vessels perished betwixt Inchkeith and the Forthland. He himselfe hauing the Balioll in his companie, with fiftie thousand men, came by land vnto Glascolw, and perceiving there was little for him to do, for that no rebellion greatlie anie where appeared, he returned backe againe into England with the Balioll, and left David Cummin earle of Atholl gouernor in his roome, to subdue the residue of the rebels, and to win those strengths, which as yet were defended against him. David Cummin left thus to be gouernor in Scotland, toke vpon him the rule in name both of the king of England, and also of the Balioll, and seized into his hands all those lands in Murray and Buchanane, which pertained to Robert Stewart, confiscating all the goods of such the inhabitants, as would not be swozne vnto him. [Who notwithstanding that he was of such great authoritie in Scotland, of credit with both kings, Edward of England, & Edward of Scotland, and of exceeding great possessions of Alane Wepont and James Lambie captaine of Lochleuin.

A deuise to drown the castell.

The castell of Dunnone taken. Fr. Thin.

The shiriffe of Bute slaine.

Fr. Thin.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan. John Maior.

The bassils and tents of them that lay at siege drowned.

A releasement of tribute.

Fr. Thin.

The earle of Murray re- turneth south of France.

Fr. Thin. Countries reduced to the obedience of king David. Fr. Thin.

A. Edward immediately Scotland both by sea and land.

The earle of Atholl fleeth into the mounteins.

He submitteth himselfe.

David Cummin earle of Atholl gouernor of the Scotland.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan.

Sir William Douglas, and Andzew Murray ransomed.

his blow to him witting and of would Bruce, alwaies

And semble bell of Dunm which John Montegile. this p numb that tuch by red by laid so [with there they d (called to be not fa thirist put th ners. bert gran

Bute from felicit the & ard, men

Carior c nant to his

A ned he u Ste said

friei cam and red

tim old to r wer for Ath

par the tim

len ant loz

rec tru lig

as of

Al ho aff p

bu

1334. Scala chron.

Scala chron. John Maior.

Scala chron.

The castles of Rothsaie and Dunnone destroyed to the Balioll. Fr. Thin.

Robert Stewart.

Fr. Thin.

Lochleuin besieged.

his done, would yet neuer vsurpe anie superiortie to him himselfe in title, but passed all the grants and writings in the name of Edward king of England, and of Balioll king of Scots. At what time none would publickely professe him a subiect to David Bruce, but boies, who in their plaies & games would alwaies call their king, David Bruce.]

Incontinentlie hereupon, Robert Stewart assembled his friends by the helpe of Dungall Campbell of Lochgubow, and suddenlie toke the castell of Dunnone, sleaing all the Englishmen and other, which were found therein. [Which Campbell (as saith John Maior) came with 400 men, and by the testimony of Buch. was a man of great power in Argle.] The commons of Bute and Arrane, glad of this prosperous beginning, assembled together to the number of foure hundred persons, and set forward, that they might come to support Robert Stewart in such his late begun enterprises: and being incouraged by the waite by Alane Lile thirrisse of Bute, they laid so lustilie about them, that they slue the thirrisse, [with John Gilbert capitaine of the castell of Bute] there in the field, & discomfited all his people [which they did after this manner. These people of Bute, (called the seruants of Batodanus) seeing such sturs to be made by Alane Lile, ran to a heape of stones not farre from them, and with great force pelting the thirrisse, they in the end killed him with stones, and put the rest to flight.] Diuerse of them taken prisoners, were brought awaie, and presented vnto Robert Stewart, who in recompense of this seruice, granted sundrie priuileges vnto the inhabitants of Bute and Arrane: as among other things, to be free from paying tribute for their corne and graine. Such felicitie succeding one another, caused manie of the Scots to ioine themselves with Robert Stewart, in hope to recouer the realme out of the English mens hands. Amongst other, Thomas Bruce earle of Carrike, and William Canther [whome John Maior calleth Carrucher, & Buchanan Carruder of Annandale] with a number of the commons came vnto him.

About the same time, the earle of Murray returned forth of France, and landed at Donbryton, where he was most ioyfullie receiued by the said Robert Stewart. Shortly after the said Stewart, and the said earle, hauing with them a great power of their friends and allies [as Godfrie Kosse, and others] came into Clibdale, Kankrewe, Kile, Cunningham and Aire, which together with Ros and Murray, they reduced to the obedience of king David. [At which time (as saith Buchanan) did Kankraie come to his old lordes the Stewards.] The earle of Murray also, to reuenge the iniuries done by the earle of Atholl, went vnto Aberdeen, and there learning where he sojourned, made thither with all speed: but the earle of Atholl vnderstanding how all the countrie toke part with his aduersaries, fled into the mounteins, where he sustained his life with hearbs and roots for a time, and durst not come forth to shew his head. At length, when he saw no waie to escape, he came forth and in most humble wise submitted himselfe to the lords that defended the part of king David. They receiuing him vpon his submission, sware him to be true vnto king David, and exhorting him to be as diligent in reconciling the people vnto king David, as he had bene afore to subdue them to the obedience of the Balioll, they suffered him to depart.

About the same time, sir William Dowglas of Liddesdale, and Andrew Murray, were ransomed home out of England, for a great summe of monie, after they had bene kept there by the space of three yeres in captiuitie. At their comming to Cuthburgh, they found the lords assembled in counsell, at the which John Randolph earle of Murray, and Robert Stewart, with generall voices were elected gouernours. Manie Scottishmen at this time revolted from the king of England, submitting themselves to king David, as Alexander Ramsay, a vertie skillfull warriour, Laurence Besson, John Herring, and John Haliburton knights, with diuerse other.

After this, John Randolph, and Robert Stewart, were sent into the north parts with a strong armie, gathered of such as were wearied by the English gouernement, whereat David Cumin (being feared with the sudden assemblie) fled for his safetie, whome they egerlie pursued, and taking him (being then beset in a narrow streit, and oppressed with penurie of all things) they compelled him to yeld (without anie more circumstances) to their faction, who then swearing fealtie to David Bruce, was permitted to depart vpon his promise: wherevnto they gaue such faith, that they left him deputie for them. At what time he did not faintlie dissemble the fauouring & defending of the part of Bruce. In the meane time, Randolph returned into Aouthian, and ioined himselfe with his old friend William Dowglas latelie returned out of England, & now with great slaughters of his enemies egerlie reuenged the long lothsomnesse of his imprisonment: to whome also to make their partie the stronger, came Andrew Murray, which was taken at Bokesborowe. Wherefore these gouernours sufficientlie garded with the nobilitie, appointed a parlement at Perth, in the kalends of Aprill. Whither when the nobles came, there could not be anie thing performed, by reason of the secret hartburning harboried in the bosoms of William Dowglas, and David Cumin earle of Atholl: the cause whereof was pretended to be, in that Dowglas did obiect vnto Cumin, that it was by his meanes, that he was no sooner deliuered out of prison from the English: amongst which nobilitie, Stewart fauored Cumin, and almost all the other toke part with Dowglas. Which dissention amongst the nobilitie, was occasioned for suspect which they had of the Cumins comming to that place with so great a traine: for he brought thither such number of his friends and followers, that he was a terror to all the rest of the assemblie, to the increase of which suspicion, they further ioined a conceit they had of Cumins great and changeable wit, his aspiring mind, and certeine rumors spred abroad of the comming of the English, with whome no man did doubt, but that the earle of Atholl would ioine for his defense.)

Edward king of England vnderstanding the rebellion of the Scots, determined to assaile them both by sea and land: and so prouiding a nauie of an hundred and foure score ships, sent the same well bittellied and manned to saile into the Forth, the which being there arriued, burnt and spoiled the towne on both sides that riuer, but returning backe into England, they lost manie of their vessels by a tempest. King Edward himselfe, together with Edward the Balioll entered by land, with an armie of fiftie thousand men, leading the same to the towne of Perth, otherwise called saint Johns towne, and there lodged in campe, abiding for the comming of the earle of Atholl, who as then being solicited thereto by the king of Englands agents, was ready to turne againe incontinentlie to his side [who after accozdinglie, with Godfrie of Kosse, & Alexander Dowglas, with other, came to the king of England.]

The same time, whilst the king of England lay thus at Perth, the earle of Ramure (whom the Scottish writers wronglie name the duke of Gelderland) came into England with an armie, and purposing to passe thorough Scotland vnto the place where king Edward lay in campe, to come to his aid, was discomfited

The earle of Murray and Robert Stewart elected gouernours.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan.

Hector Boet. saith it was holden at Darke.

Ye may read more of this matter in the historie of England. A nauie sent into Scotland. Shipwracke.

R. Edward invaded the Scots by land.

Fr. Thin. Scala chron.

Not the duke of Gelderland but the earle of Ramure, named Guy, nt Alane Alep

nt and James ve Ambie cap
teins of Loc lemin.
re. nt
u at un so
he se
re
It
ng
le,
sit
of ne id
ul
m de nd
he rea
th
ae,
it
nd
he
a,
he er
ca un
m
it
the ce,
th
re,
he is
of
he ed ot ie
by ve
na
u u el el he a
e, se
m. d,
d, Atholl gou
noz of the holl in Sco
land.
Fr. Thin.
Buchanan.

The castell of Dunnone taken.

The thirrisse of Bute slaine.

Fr. Thin.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan. John Maior.

Incomendment.

Fr. Thin.

The earle of Murray returned forth of France.

Fr. Thin. Countie reduced to the obedience of king David.

1335.

R. Edward invaded Scotland both by sea and land.

The earle of Atholl fled into the mounteins.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan.

The William Dowglas, and Andrew Murray ransomed.

John Fourdon.

William Dowglas cometh to the succour of the Scots.

David de Armand a Scottish knight.

Hyperbole.

A woman of manlike force and stature.

The earle of Murray is taken prisoner

The earle of Atholl renouling to the Balioll is established governour. The king of England returneth home taking the Balioll with him.

consisted on the Burrowe moore, beside Edinburgh, by the power of the governours, and others, which were there assembled against him. There died manie on both parts in the fight (as John Fourdon writeth) for the strangers fought verie valiantlie: insomuch that if William Dowglas, with diuerse other, had not come downe from Midland hills to the aid of the Scots, whilst they were thus fighting, the strangers that day had wonne the victorie. But now discouraged with the sudden comming of this fresh aid to their aduersaries, they began to giue place, and drew towards Edinburgh: neuertheless keeping themselves in order of battell, they fought still: and at length comming to Edinburgh, they were driuen by thorough the friers street, and so by an other street, called saint Marie Wind, where one sir David de Armand, a verie valiant knight chanced to be wounded by one of the enemies, by reason whereof he was so kindled in wrathfull desire to be reuenged, that with an are which he had in his hand, he gaue his aduersarie (that had hurt him) such a blow on the shoulder, that he claue him downe together with his horse, that the are staid not till it light vpon the verie hard pavement, so as the print of that violent stroke remained to be seene a long time after in one of the stones of the same pavement.

The strangers still retiring, and manfullie defending themselves, at length got to the hill where Edinburgh castle standeth, and there slue their horses, making as it were a rampier of their carcasses, so to defend themselves from the force of their enemies: but being inuironed by the Scots on ech side all that night, and hauing neither meate nor drinke there, with to susteine their languishing bodies, the which beside hunger and thirst, were soe tormented with cold also, and want of conuenient lodging, they yielded themselves the next day, with condition to haue their liues saued. When the spoile of the field (where they first ioined) was gathered, amongst the dead bodies there was found a woman of an huge stature, who in the beginning of the battell strept forth before hir companie, and incountering in singular fight with an esquire of Scotland, named Richard Shaw, she ouerthrew him, and afterwards beating downe hir enemies on ech side, long it was per the might he ouerthrew one, which chanced not before she was inuironed about on ech side with hir enemies.

The earle of Hamure hauing yielded himselfe into the hands of the governours, was verie courteously vsed, the earle of Murray not onelie rendering vnto him all his goods, but also granting him licence to depart: and for his moze suertie, he went himselfe in person with him to the borders, to see him safe deliuered out of all dangers. But by an ambush that lay in wait for the earle of Murray, he was taken prisoner, and brought to king Edward. David Cumin earle of Atholl, hearing that the earle of Murray one of the governours was thus taken, supposing king Edwards part to be much advanced thereby, came streightwaies vnto Perth, and gaue his faith effionces vnto Edward Balioll, and was againe established by him governour of the realme of Scotland, as he was before. The king of England, hauing in the meane time gotten the towne of Perth, returned into England, and toke the Balioll with him, for doubt least when he had recovered the whole gouernement of the realme, he should thinke awaite from him. The earle of Atholl hauing now regained his former authoritie, began to exercise great crueltie against all those that were enemies to the Balioll.

The nobles of the contrarie faction (as Patrike Dunbar earle of March, Andrew Murray, & William Dowglas, with other) toke great despite thereat, and raising an armie to restraints his insolent doings, came towards him, whereof he being aduertised (as then lieng at siege before the castle of Killdunmure) rose and met them in the fields within the forrest of Killblaine, where he gaue them a sore battell, and had gone awaite with the victorie, had not John Crag capteine of Killdunmure sallied forth of the castle with three hundred fresh men, and comming to the succour of his friends, renewed the battell in such earnest wise, that the aduersaries thereby were discomfited, earle David their chiefeine being slaine in the field, with Walter Bide, Robert Cumin, and a great number of other, both gentlemen and commons. Sir Thomas Cumin was taken prisoner, & beheaded the next day, being Iacobus day. For the battell before mentioned was fought the last day of December (as Fourdon noteth). Who further saith, that the earle of Atholl had with him three thousand men against his aduersaries, which were not past eleuen hundred.

* This David earle of Atholl was verie instant & greedy of gouernment, who if he had brought all the Scots to haue taken king Edwards part, would out of doubt, haue afterward contended with king Edward, and inuaded the kingdome of Scotland by violence; he did most grieuoullie oppresse the gilllesse and poore people, and wickedlie ordered all things after his own fantasie, without reason. Cumin earle of Atholl was slaine on this wise: Andrew Murray was chosen gouernour in place of the earle of Murray, taken (as before is said) by the Englishmen. This Andrew Murray in the beginning of his new office, laid siege to the castle of Couper, with a mightie power of men, but hearing that the Cumins made foule worke in the north parts of the realme, against such as fauoured not the English part, he left that siege, and went against them, with whome incountering in battell, he ouerthrew their armie, and put them all to flight.

At this bickering were slaine two of the Cumins, Robert and William, Thomas Caldar, and diuerse other valiant men, though enemies for the time vnto the gouernour. This victorie reduced all the north parts of Scotland vnto the obedience of king David. Few Englishmen after the same abode within the north bounds of Scotland, except those that were within the castle of Dungard in Buchquhane. At length this castle was wonne, & all that kept it slaine, except Henrie Beaumont the capteine, who being sworne neuer to returne againe into Scotland, was licenced by the gouernour to depart into England without anie interruption. After this, the gouernour came to the castle of Lochindozis, and laid siege to it, where within was the countesse of Atholl, the wiife of the late slaine earle David. This woman hauing knowledge aforehand, that hir house should be besieged, had sent vnto the king of England and to Edward Balioll for succours.

The king of England now doubting least all the strengths in Scotland, kept by such as were his friends, would be lost without recouerie, if the same were not the soner rescued, he raised an armie of forty thousand men, and entering therewith into Scotland, came to the castle of Lochindozis aforesaid. The Scots that lay there at siege, vpon knowledge had of his comming towards them, brake vp, and departed from thence. Wherevpon, when he had refreshed the hold with new men, munition, and vittels, he toke the countesse forth with him, and passed with bloudie sword thorough Murray, euen to Elghine, and returning by Mar, burnt the towne of Aberdeen. When he went to Strueling, where he strongly repaired the castle: from whence he toke his iourne to Bothernell, and there also in winter he made the castle

The earle of Atholl is slaine.

Fourdon.

Fr. Thin. John Major. 5. cap. 14.

Andrew Murray chosen gouernour.

The Cumins put to flight.

The north parts of Scotland reduced to the obedience of king David. The castle of Dungard wonne.

The castle of Lochindozis besieged.

The king of England cometh to raise the siege of Lochindozis.

The towne of Aberdeen burnt by the Englishmen. Fr. Thin. Scala chron.

The towne of Perth newlie built.

My crueltie.

Edward slayeth his brother William.

He died of a natural infirmie, as by the English writers it appeareth. Edward returneth into England.

Andrew Murray cometh forth the mountains. He winneth the castle of Munclewin.

He stronger, in which he placed a valiant garrison: to this fort the lord Berkeleie conueied vittels from Edinburgh, and in one night discomfited William Dowglas that lay in wait to intercept him. After which, king Edward did shortly lose all the said castles, which he had before with so great care fortified. His nauie being on the sea at the same time, entered into the Forth, and spoiling (as other had done afore time) the church of saint Colme, felt reuenge thereof shortly after: for that ship (as they tell the tale) wherein saint Colmes goods (for so they call them) were laden, sank to the bottome of the sea, without force of anie tempest, or other apparant occasion.

The king of England at his coming to Perth, south of the north parts of Scotland, and finding the towne unfortified, caused the same to be newlie fenced with wals and bulwarks, at the charges and onerous expences of these six abbeyes, Aberbrothoke, Couper, Lundoris, Balmerinoch, Dunfermling, & saint Andrewes. Henrie Beaumont also, who contrarie to his oth before taken, was now returned with king Edward into Scotland, was made capteine of saint Andrewes. Also Henrie Ferrar was made capteine of the castle of Lucres, William Montacute of Strueling, William Felton of Rockburgh, and the keeping of the towne of Perth was committed vnto one Thomas Wylsh. Whilste king Edward ordered things in Scotland after this manner, his brother (surnamed by the Scottish writers Eltham) came vnto him at Perth, who in the west parts of Scotland had exercised much crueltie, as well against the enemies of the Englishmen, as against those that were sauiours and friends vnto them, in so much that passing through Galloway, Carrick, Kyle, and Cunningham, he put all to the fier and sword that came in his waies. He burned the church of saint Bute, and a thousand persons within it, which were fled thither for safegard of their liues. At his coming to Perth, he found the king his brother within the church there, who being sore offended with him for his misordered doings, verie sharpelie reprimed him for the same: and for so much as he answered him somewhat srowardlie, he plucked south his sword, and there thrust him through the bodie, euen before the altar of saint John, wishing that all such might perish on the same wise, as put no difference betwixt friend and fo, place hallowed and unhallowed; as being no reason, that the church should be anie more refuge for him, than he had made it for other.

It may be, that king Edward sawe some other man in this sort, as the Scots here doe write: but for the earle of Cornewall that was brother to king Edward, and surnamed John of Eltham, because he was bozne at Eltham, it is nothing true that he was so made a waie, for he died of a naturall infirmittie, as by our English writers it manifestlie appereth. But now to proceed with the historie, as we find it written. Such things accomplished in Scotland (as before ye haue heard) king Edward returned into England, & left the Balioll behind him with a great power of men at Perth. About the same time, Henrie Beaumont slew all such Scots as he might lay hands on, that had bene at the battell of Halbleine, where his cosine David Cumyn was slaine. Shortly after, he came into Perth, and there toke the castle of Kinkellin, and rased it to the earth. Shortly after he came into Perth, and there toke the castle of Kinkellin, and likewise rased the same.

Then passing forward, he burned Dunnoter.

On the other part, the Englishmen made no lesse spoile and destruction on each side where they came, so that the Bernes, Angus, Stirling, and Perth through spoile, murther, & other disgraces, chancing by continuall warre, were left in manner waste and desolat. At length, this Andrew Murray assembling a great power, with support of them of Murray, Mar, and Buchan, fought with his enemies at 10 Dunnoter in Angus, where he obtained the victorie with huge slaughter of Englishmen, and other his aduersaries. In this battell was slaine Henrie Mountfort, who lately before had bene sent by king Edward into Scotland to support the Balioll, beside foure thousand others, the most part gentlemen: so that this ouerthrow was verie displeasing to the king of England, hauing his side sore weakened thereby. After the gaine of this victorie, Andrew Murray passed thorough Fife & Angus, ouerthrowing the castle of Lucres, with all the other strengths of Fife, the castle of Couper onelie excepted.

Andrew Murray gardian of the Scots (and sir David Buse) did much harme in the countrie of Carleill, from whence he went to besiege the castle of Edinburgh (as yet in the hands of the English) whose intent coming to the knowledge of the marchers of England, they hastened to repaire to raise the same siege of Edinburgh, and to rescue their countrymen within the towne. By means thereof, the Scots remoued and came to Clerkington, and the English came to Brethetowne not farre distant; betwene whome there was a great fight, and manie slaine on both sides. But the victorie inclining (without anie great conquest) to neither partie, both armies parted: for the English went ouer Tweed, and the Scots feining that they would go into England, lodged themselves at Calusarill. So that king Edward hearing of such prosperous successe chancing to his aduersaries, sent incontinentlie two capteins with two armies into Scotland, to the support of the Balioll.

William Calbois a man of notable prowes, hauing the conduct of the one of these armies, was encountered by William Keith, and after the discomfiture of his people, being taken prisoner, was kept in captiuitie till he paid two thousand marks for his rancome. The other was led by Richard Mountfort with whome Laurence Preston and Robert Gordon met, and giuing him battell, slew the same Richard with the most part of all his companie. About the same time sir William Montacute earle of Salisbury, together with the earle of Arundell came into Scotland with a great power of men, and besieged the castle of Dunbar, lieng at the same for the space of 22 weeks. [At which battell also was king Edward, the earle of Gloucester, the lords Perre and Beuill, being in the yeare 1337, as saith Scala chron.] Within the said castell was the countesse hir selfe, surnamed blake Agnes of Dunbar, who showed such manlie defense, that no gaine was to be got anie waies south at hir hands, so that in the end they were constrained to raise their siege, and to depart without speed of their purpose. It is said, that this countesse bled manie pleasant words in teasing and taunting at the enemies doings, thereby the more to encourage hir souldiers.

One day it chanced that the Englishmen had devised an engine called a sow, vnder the pentise or covert wherof they might approach safelie to the wals: the beholding this engine, merueille said, that unless the Englishmen kept their sow the better, she would make hir to cast hir pigs: and so she after destroyed it. In the yeare next after this siege, there was such a dearth thorough all the bounds of Scotland,

The calamitie chancing to sundrie countreies of Scotland thorough continuall wars. The victorie of Andrew Murray gotten at Dunnoter. Henrie Mountfort slaine.

The castle of Lucres ouerthrowne. Fr. Thin. Scala chron.

Two armies sent into Scotland.

William Calbois taken prisoner.

Richard Mountfort & Laurence Preston slain. The castell of Dunbar is besieged by the earles of Salisbury and Arundell. Fr. Thin.

1337. Blaque Agnes of Dunbar.

An engine called a sow.

A great dearth and all

The earle of Atholl is slaine.

The towne of Perth newlie fortified.

Fourdon.

Fr. Thin. Iohn Maior li. 5. cap. 14.

Andrew Murray chosen gouernor.

The Cumyn put to flight.

Myrmellie.

The north parts of Scotland reduced to the obedience of king David. The castle of Dungard wonne.

Edward burnt his brother Eltham.

The castle of Lochindrossin besieged.

Edward a natural infirmittie, as by our English writers it appereth. Edward returned into England.

The king of England cometh to raise the siege of Lochindrossin.

Andrew Murray cometh south of the mountains. The towne of Perth newlie fortified.

The towne of Aberdeen burned by the Englishmen. Fr. Thin. Scala chron.

of a death in Scotland.

Fr. Thin.
Scala chron.

The castell
of Couper left void.

The castell of Louthian in
the hands of the English-
men.

The death of Andrew Murray the governor.
1338.

The castell recovered out of the English
mens hands
by William Dowglas.

Fr. Thin.
Io. Maior. lib. 5.
cap. 5.

land, with such mortalltie of people, as a greater had not lightlie bene sene nor heard of. The cause of which mortalltie proceeded (as was thought) for that the ground lay untilld and not occupied, by reason of the continuall warres before passed. [The marchers of England (that were left behind the lords that went into Scotland) were discomfited at Pzefsen: where Robert Paners was taken, with manie other prisoners, beside a multitude that were slaine, by reason of certeine displeasent words amongst them, which caused that they brake order, divided themselves, and fought in an inconuenient place.] All the souldiers that kept the castell of Couper, for lacke of vittels left the house void, and coming to the sea side, hired a ship to haue passed into England, but through negligence of the master mariner, they fell vpon a sand-bed, and so were cast away. About the same time the most part of all the strengths and fortresses in Louthian were kept by Englishmen.

The towne of Edinburgh was stuffed with a great number of souldiers, both Englishmen and Scots. Amongest whome there was a Scot of a right stout stomach named Robert Bendergest; he, for that it was perceiued he loued but little the English nation, was euill intreated and vsed amongst them, in so much that on a day, hauing his head broken by the marshall named Thomas knatoun, he ceased not to seeke some meane to be reuenged, till he brought his purpose to passe, so that shortly after he slue the said marshall, and afterward to auoid the danger of death due for that fact, he got away, and came to William Dowglas, whome he perswaded with all diligence to passe vnto Edinburgh, where he might find his enemies at some great aduantage, by reason of the slothfull negligence as then growne amongst them. William Dowglas following this aduertisement, came secretly on a night vnto the foresaid towne, and slue foure hundred Englishmen snoring in sleepe and drunkenness, before they were able to make any resistance.

Not long after, Andrew Murray the governor of Scotland deceased, to the great damage of the common-wealth, and was buried in Rosmarkie, in the yeare after the birth of our Saviour 1338. It came well to passe for Scotland, that about the same time the king of England entering into wars against France, was constrained to cease his pursue of the conquest which he minded to make in Scotland, the which mull needs haue come to full effect, if he had followed his former purpose and intent. But to proceed, after the deceasse of Andrew Murray the governor, Robert Stewart took all the charge on him for the government of the realme, till king David returned home out of France, and began to rule all things himselfe. Luidall also was recovered out of the Englishmens hands, with diuers other places, about this time, by the high prowes and manlie valiance of William Dowglas and other Scottish captains; and therefore in the reward of the good seruice shewed by the same William in conquest of that countrie, he inioined the same afterward as his rightfull inheritance. [Herrie earle of Lancaster and Derby, hearing of the valure of these two worthie captains, William Dowglas, and Alexander Ramseie, earnestlie desired to see them, and to trie their strengths in iusting. Wherevpon, there was a day appointed therefore at Berwick by all the said parties, where they met with their complices provided accordingly. At what time a certeine Englishman asked Peter Crame, if he would not refuse to iust with him, to whome he answered, that he accepted the challenge, but willed him first to dine well, because he should that night sup in paradise. Which fell out accordingly, for in running together the Englishman was slain.] The king of England moued with high displeasure at these doings, sent a right valiant knight named Sir Thomas Berkeley with a great power of men into Scotland. Against whome came William Dowglas, and Robert Stewart the governor, and gaue him battell at Blackeborne, where the Scots were discomfited and so beaten downe, that few of them escaped, which were not either slaine or taken. Notwithstanding the two captains saued themselves by flight.

Not long after, William Dowglas fought with his enemies at the Cragings, where hauing not past fortie men in his companie, he discomfited sir John Strueling, who had with him nere hand five hundred Englishmen and Scots, that took his part in the king of Englands quarell. In the yeare following, the same William Dowglas wan the castell of Hermitage, & slue all them that were found within it. In the yeare next after, he fought five times in one day with sir Laurence Abernethie, principall capteine vnder the Ballioll, and being put to the worse at foure of those times, at the fift he banquished his enemies, and took prisoner their capteine the said sir Laurence, who was sent to the castell of Dunbretton, there to remaine in safe keeping for a time. For these and such worthie enterprises hardlie atchieued, this Will. Dowglas was much commended, and within a few daies after the taking of the said sir Laurence Abernethie, he was sent by the governor the said Robert Stewart into France, as ambassadoe to king David, for the dispatch of certeine weightie matters touching the state of the realme.

In the meane time, Robert Stewart the governor raised a mightie armie, and came with the same vnto the towne of Perth, planting a strong siege round about it; for diuiding his host into foure parts, he lodged them with their captains in foure severall places. The first consisting for the most part of westerne Scots, he gouerned himselfe; the second he committed to Patrike Dunbar earle of March, the third to William earle of Ross, and the fourth, to Maurice of Motowray lord of Clidesdale. These lay thus at siege of this towne for the space of ten weekes. And though sundrie times they gaue alarmes and assaults to it, yet was it so stoutlie defended by Englishmen and other within, that the Scots for a long time lost more than they wan. At length when they were in maner past all hope to get the towne, & readie to haue departed from it, William Dowglas arrived in the Tait, bringing with him out of France in five ships, both men of war, and also munition of armour, artillerie, and weapons, which serued the Scottishmen in that season greatlie to purpose.

Amongest other, there were two knights of the familie of Casteigallard, and two esquires, Giles de la Hois, and John de Bzeise; also a noble pirat, named Hugh Handpille, who had the charge ouer the foresaid five ships. [While Edward the third was at the siege of Turneie, the earls of March and Somersetland made a rode into Scotland, and were discomfited by Thomas Greie the elder, Robert Paners, John Copeland, with the garrison of Roxborough, then in the hands of the English, but after wonne by the Scots, on Easter day, at the vertie house of the resurrection; the gouernement whereof seemed to be fatal, because all the captains of this towne died of euill deaths, amongst whome was Alexander Ramseie the capteine hereof that died with hunger, being put in prison for verie enmie that William Dowglas bare vnto him.] About the same time, one William Bullocke had taken estones the

Sir Thomas
Berkeley.

The battell
of Blacke-borne.

Sir John
Strueling
discomfited.

The castell of Hermitage
won.

Sir Laurence Abernethie
taken prisoner.

Sir William
Dowglas
sent into France.

1339.
The towne of Perth besieged.

There was also in that armie beside other noble men William Murray of Galloway.

William
Dowglas
returneth out of France.

John Fowd.

Fr. Thin.
1340.
Scala chron.

the castell of Conper to the king of Englands use, but by perswasion of this William Dowglas, he rendered it by againe, and departed with bag and baggage. Those Scots that had served under him likewise, were content to forsake the king of Englands wages, and to serve William Dowglas, who led them forthwith to the siege of Perth, the which towne he beleagured, his coming was reported into the gouerners hands, by Thomas Thirde the capteine, in the third moneth after it was first besieged, & in the yeare after our redemption 1341. Among other exploits attempted at this siege after the coming of the lord William Dowglas, the Frenchman Hugh Desp'ere, taking upon him on a day to assault the towne with his ships, and to gaine an assault thereto, he lost the chiefest vessel he had, although afterwards when the towne was now rendered, the lord William Dowglas caused the same ship to be towed againe to the towne, and with great thanks and honour, as well to him as to the other of the Frenchmen, he sent them backe into France, as a gift to their pleasure and recompensation, although in their returne, as they passed out of Dumfries, they escaped herie hardlie from the thre. [The winter after the siege of Currie, king Edward went to Helroffe, but from thence riding through part of the forest of Strike, in a tempestuous time, he came backe againe to Helroffe, where Harry earle of Lancaster, iusted with William Dowglas (by covenant) in the kings sight, king Edward taking a truce, departed from Helroffe, half overcome with melancholie against those that first moued him to this tourne, not succeeding as they hoped and desired that it should haue done.]

In the same yeare (as some do write) or according unto other in the yeare following, there was such a miserable dearth, both through England and Scotland, that the people were driven to eat the flesh of horses, dogs, cats, and such like vntused kinds of meats, to susteine their languishing liues withall, yea, in so much that (as is said) there was a Scottish man, an vplandish fellow named Cristiclocke, spared not to slea children, and to kill women, on whose flesh he fed, as if he had bene a Wolfe. Perth being once deliuered (as before is said) to the gouernor, he went with his armie to Striueling, and besieging the castell, had it rendered unto him the eight day after his coming thither, on these conditions, that Thomas Foulkie the capteine, with his wife and children might safelie passe into England, without fraud or guile of anie impeachment [of which castell (as saith Buchanan) Maurice the sonne of Andrew Murray was made capteine.] Edward Balioll, by such good and prosperous successe, as did thus daile fall vnto his enemies, to auoid further danger, after oft removing from place to place, at length he was constrained to sitte into England, lest he should haue fallen into his aduersaries hands.

Not long after, the castell of Edinburgh was wonne by policie on this wise. William Dowglas hauing acquaintance with one Walter Towlers, [whom Buchanan called William Cur a merchant] caused him to prouide a ship, and to arrive therewith in the Forth, feining as though he were a merchant, and to offer wines to sell vnto the garison that kept Edinburgh castell. This Towlers according to instructions thus giuen him, prouided him of all things necessarie for the purpose, & so coming into the Forth with his ship, came on land himselfe, and brought with him into Edinburgh two punchions of wine, which he offered to sell vnto the steward of household to the capteine of the castell, who falling at a price with him, appointed that he should bring them earlie in the morning by to the castell, that they might be receiued in. Towlers hiring a cart ouer night, came with the punchions by to the castell gate, earlie vpon the brake of the day in the next morning, and hauing the gates opened, entered with his cart, and being come within the gates with it, he plucked forth a wedge or pin deuised of purpose, and immediatlie therewith the cart with the punchions fell downe, so stopping the entrie of the gates, that in no wise they might be shut or closed againe.

The Dowglasse hauing in his companie William Bullocke, Walter Fraserie, and John Sandlands, right valiant knights, with diuerse other hardie and bold personages, laie in conert not far from the castell, & hauing knowledge giuen him by sound of home, or otherwise, when to come forth, he hastied thereupon with all diligence vnto the gates, and finding them thus open, first shue the porters, and after into the castell, within a while had dispatched all them within, and so became maisters of that fortres, within the which for capteine they left one William Dowglas, the bastard brother of the other William Dowglas, by whose conduct chiefe, both this enterprisse and diuers other were luckilie achieved. Thus was the realme of Scotland clearelie redonered out of the enemies hands the Englishmen, and all other that took part with the Balioll, constrained to auoid out of all the parts and bounds thereof. The castell of Edinburgh was thus recovered by the Scots in the yeare last before remembred, to wit, 1341.

The same yeare, or in the next ensuing, the second of June, king David with his wife quene Jane, and sundrie nobles both french and Scottish, came safelie through the seas, and arrived in Innerbernie, from whence with no small triumph they were conueried vnto Perth. About the same time, Alexander Ramsay of Dalehouse, one of the most valiant capteins knowne in those daies, gathering a great power of men, entered into England, and hauing knowledge that the Englishmen were assembled, in purpose to giue him battell, laid an ambush for them, and training them within danger thereof, by such a fierce and new onset as he gaue vpon them, he put them out of order, and chased them most egerlie, killing and slaying a great number of them at his pleasure. Amongest the prisoners that were taken, the earle of Salisburie (as the Scottish historie saith) was one, and the capteine of Hokesburgh another.

Sir Alexander Ramsay, perceiving that the most part of the garrison of Hokesburgh were either slaine, or taken in this last conflict, together with their capteine, came hastilie thither, and giuing a right fierce assault thereto, by fine force took it. Wherefore king David in recompense of his valancie thus declared in his seruice, gaue vnto him the keeping of this castell, together with the shirfwike of Glouddale. Whereat William Dowglasse took such displeasure, that seeking to be reuenged, he found meanes to apprehend this Alexander Ramsay within the church of Hawike, and put him in prison within the castell of Hermitage, where he remained in great miserie and lacke of food till he died. [About which time by the said kind of death (as saith Buchanan) was William Bullocke slaine, by David Berkelie. The death of which two did draw Scotland into manie factions, and filled it with seditions.]

King David was sore moued herewith, purposing to see such punishment done vpon William Dowglas for that rebellious attempt, as might serue for an example to all other who they went about ante the like offense. Neuerthelesse, the Dowglasse kept him out of the way amongst the mountains

1341. H.B.
1342. Io. Ma.
King David returneth into Scotland.

Alexander Ramsay recovered into England.

This Ramsay was so renowned, that euerie noble man was glad to haue his sonne and kinsman to serue vnder him.

The castell of Hokesburgh wonne by Alexander Ramsay.

Alexander Ramsay taken by William Dowglas, & imprisoned.
Fr. Thin.

Sir Thomas Berkelie.

The battell of Blackhe.

The towne of Perth rendered to the gouernor.
1341.
John Fourdon.

Sir John Striueling discomfited.

The castell of Hermitage wonne.

1341.
John Fourdon.

Sir Lawrence Abernethie taken prisoner.

Fr. Thin.

Sir William Dowglas sent into France.

1339.

The towne of Perth besieged.

John Fourdon.

There was also in that armie beside other noble men William Keith of Caithness.

Children taken.

The castell of Striueling rendered.

John Fourdon.

Fr. Thin.

Edward Balioll with his army into England.

John Fourdon.

The castell of Edinburgh wonne.

Fr. Thin.

1340.
Scala chron.

Police.

teins and other desert places, till finally Robert Stewart and other nobles purchased his pardon, so that at length he came into favour againe, and had all his lands and livings restored unto him, as well in Tuidale as elsewhere.

The earle of Salisburie exchanged for the earle of Murray.

Froisard.

1342.

A parliament at Perth.

The bounteous liberalitie of King David. This Hugh was grandfather to Hector Boetius.

King David invaded Northumberland.

Fr. Thin.

King David the second time invaded the English borders.

Five Scottish knights taken prisoners.

King David the third time invaded England. Foul weather.

Calis besieged.

Ambassadors sent by French king into Scotland.

Some after the earle of Salisburie was taken by Sir Alexander Ramsay (as is said) he was exchanged for the earle of Murray, that had bene holden manie yeeres before as prisoner in England. But it should appeare by other writers, that the earle of Salisburie was not taken at that time in the borders of Scotland (as before is supposed) but in the borders of France, where he was in the wars which King Edward the same time made against the Frenchmen, & now was exchanged for the earle of Murray. But howsoever it was, King David after the realm of Scotland was once brought into a quiet estate from the former trouble of war, he called a parliament at the towne of Perth, where he rewarded verie liberallie all such as had either done any notable service themselves, or had lost any of their friends or parents in defense & recoverie of the realm out of his adversaries hands. Among other, Hugh Boece had in recompense of his fathers slaughter at Duplin, the inheritance & ladvie of the baronie of Balbrin given him in marriage, which baronie is yet possessed by the heires of the said Hugh.

Shortlie after upon the breaking up of this parliament, King David raised a mightie armie, and entered with the same into Northumberland; but committing the whole charge to John Randolph erle of Murray as lieutenant generall, he would not that any of his owne banners should be spred and borne in all that voiage [although himselfe were there in person, serving secretlie, and would not be knowne in this iourne.] The most part of all Northumberland was burnt and spoiled, for they remained there a moneth before they returned, conceieng atwaie with them great riches, which they got abroad in all places where they came. Shortlie after, he came with a new armie into England, causing his owne standard to be carried afore him at that time, as he that toke upon him the whole governance of that enterprize himselfe. The Englishmen withdrawing all their goods into strengths, minded not to give the Scots any set battell, but to take them ever at some advantage, if they strated abroad any where unwarlike to fetch in booties. Neither were they altogether disappointed of their hoped prey, for 5 Scottish knights, whose names were Stewart, Eglington, Craggie, Woid, and Fullarton, pursuing their enemies on a time over fiercelie, were taken prisoners, and after redeemed for great summes of monie. At length, King David perceiving that he wasted but time, returned into Scotland. But not long after he went againe into England, in which iourne his people were so beaten with vehement stormes of raine and haile, that they had much ado to save themselves from perishing through the unmeasurable force of that so rigorous weather.

On the other side, the Englishmen that were gathered to resist against him, were in semblable manner nere hand destroyed with the like rage of tempest. Hereupon King David, to the end that his enterprize should not seeme altogether to want effect, overthrow sundrie strong houses on the English borders, and so returned home without other damage either done or received. About the same time did Edward king of England besiege the towne of Calis. The French king therfore devising all waies possible whereby to save that towne, and to cause his adversary to raise his siege, sent ambassadors into Scotland, to require King David, that with an armie he would enter into England, and do what damage he might unto the Englishmen, to trie if by that meanes King Edward could be constrained to leave his siege; and to returne home for defense of his owne countrie and subiects. In the meane time also (as I find in the Scottish chronicles) King Edward addressed his orators into Scotland, offering unto King David, upon condition that peace might be had, to deliver into his hands not onelie the towne of Berwick, but also Edward Balliol his old adversary, for whose cause the warre had so long continued betwixt them.

These offers being proponed in counsell, though some of the wisest sort gaue advise that in no condition they ought to be refused; yet the king himselfe (for love that he had to the French king with whom he had bene brought up) and other of the nobles having young heads, upon desire to be revenged of the Englishmen by practise of warres (whereunto they were inclined) would needs consent to the French kings chargeable request, & refuse the king of Englands beneficall offers. Whereupon an armie was leaved, and solempne proclamation made, that all such as were able and fit to beare armour, should meet the king at a certaine day and place, which was to them in the same proclamation assigned. The earle of Ross therefore came with his people unto Perth, and there made his musters before the king: but in the night following he slew the lord of the Isles, with seven of his kinsmen as they were in their beds, and thereupon fled, and got him with all speed againe into Ross [whereby the armie was greatly diminished, when the friends of both parts fearing civil warres amongst the families departed home.]

King David, though he was sore displeased herewith, and desired most earnestlie to have punished that heinous act; yet because he would not hinder his iourne, he let passe the punishment thereof, till more convenient opportunitie might serve thereto. Notwithstanding that William Dowglas of Airdale did earnestlie persuade him, at that time to leade the iourne, and first to punish these turmoils at home, whereby all things might be quieted in his absence. At his coming to the borders, and before he entered into England, he made manie knights, to stirre them the rather to do valiantlie; but first he created William Dowglas an earle, which William was sonne to Archibald Dowglas, slain before at Halidon hill. There was undoubtedly a mightie power of the Scots assembled at that present; in somuch as there was of earles, lords, knights, and gentlemen, to the number of two thousand men of armes; and of such armed men as they called hoblers, set forth by the burrowes and good townes twentie thousand; beside the archers and other footmen; so that they were at the least forty thousand men in all, or (as some writers affirme) thre score thousand.

King David with that his puissant armie, the first of October entered Northumberland, and coming to a fortrell not farre off from the borders called Ribblesdale, they laie round about that place for the space of thre daies, without giving thereto any assault: but the fourth day they assailed it right fiercelie, and in the end entered by fine force, sleaing the more part of all those which they found within the house. The capteine Sir Walter Selbie was taken alive, but immediatlie by King David his commandement, had his head stricken off, and was not permitted to have so much time as to make his confession, which he instantlie desired to have done, but it would not be granted. From thence the armie removed, and went unto the abbie of Launcroft, which they spoiled; and that done they departed, and passing by Ratward castell, and the towne of Redpath, kept on Ambassadors from the king of England into Scotland.

The king of England offers.

The Scots ready to help the French, & hinder their neighbors the English.

An armie raised to invade England.

The lord of the Isles slain by the earle of Ross.

Fr. Thin.

Fr. Thin.

William Dowglas created earle of Dowglas.

Ri. Southwell. Two thousand men of armes, & 2000 hoblers.

King David invaded England.

The top of Ribblesdale.

Sir Walter Selbie taken by the Scots.

Launcroft.

King David lodged in the house of St. Mary.

The abbie of Durham spoiled.

The earle of Northumberland lieutenant of the North.

herald.

The appointment of the Scottish be.

Fr. Thin.

The earle of Dowglas slain.

on till they came vnto the p[ri]orie of Berham, which they sacked; but the towne was saued from fire by commandement of king Dauid, who in this iourne appointed to p[re]serue foure towne onelie from burning; to wit, Berham aforesaid, Corbridge, Darlington, and Durham, to the end he might in them lay vp such store of vittels, as he should p[ro]vide abroad in the countrie, wherewith to susteine his armie during the time of his abiding in those parties.

From Berham, where he late thre daies, he marched to Echester, wasting and spoiling the countrie on each hand, and after turned towards the wood of Beantepeire; and coming thither, lodged himselfe in the manour, and set his people abroad into the countrie to fetch in booties, & to burne vp the towne and houses in all places where they came. The spoile, waste, destruction, and slaughter which the Scots p[re]sided with fire and sword, was wonderfull to heare, and incredible almost to be told, they spared neither young nor old, church nor chappell: religious houses as well as other were consumed to ashes. The abbete of Durham, and all places thereabout (as the Scottish writers affirme) were spoiled and miserable sacked, although it was said king Dauid was admonished in a dreame, that he should in anie wise abstaine from violating the gods and lands pertaining to saint Cuthbert.

The earle of Northumberland lieutenant of the North vnder king Edward, to resist these iniuries, raised a great power of men, and joining the same with such bands of old souldiers as king Edward had lately sent ouer out of France for that purpose, first dispatched an herald at armes vnto king Dauid, requiring him to staie from further inuading the countrie, and to returne into Scotland, till some reasonable order for a small peace might be agreed vpon betwixt him and the king his master: otherwise he should be sure to haue battell to the utterance within thre daies after. King Dauid contemning this message, required his folks to make them readie to receiue their enemies if they came to assaile them, and on the next morrow, he diuided his armie into thre battels. In the first was Robert Stewart prince of Scotland, and Patrike Dunbar earle of March: in the second were appointed John earle of Murray, and William earle of Douglas: in the third was the king himselfe, with all the residue of the nobles. [Contrarie to the which Buchanan placeth Douglas in the first, the king in the middle, and Stewart in the third.]

In the morning earlie before the battell, the earle of Douglas departed from the armie to deserue the English host, and to vnderstand their force and order (if it were possible:) but entring somewhat betwixt the English host and his enemies, he was chased, and that to such disadvantage, that he lost fiftie, or rather fine hundred (as some booke haue) of young gentlemen, and such other light horsemen as he toke forth with him, escaping verie narrowlie himselfe also from being taken at the chase. In the meane season, the English host diuided likewise into thre battels, approached forward, and came within sight of the Scottish armie. Wherevpon Dauid Graham with a wing of fine hundred horsemen, well appointed gaue a full charge on the skirts of the English archers, thinking to haue distressed them: but he was so sharpelie receiued and beaten with arrowes, that losing a great number of his men, he was constrained to flee backe to the maine battell, and that not without great danger of being taken in his flight by such as followed him.

These two discomfitures notwithstanding, the Scots rushed fiercelie vpon their enemies, & fought with great manhood a long season; but in the end,

Robert Stewart, and the earle of March, perceiving their people partlie to shrink backe, caused the retreat to be sounded, in hope to saue their men by withdrawing into some safer place: but this fleeing backe of the earle of March and Robert Stewart, brought the discomfite vpon all the residue of the Scots. For that battell of Englishmen that was first matched with them, came now with such violence vpon the maine battell where king Dauid fought, that within a short while after, the same was utterlie discomfited and put to flight. In this businesse king Dauid himselfe did in euery point plaie the part of a most balliant chieftaine, encouraging his people as well with words as notable examples to doe their indentours. Neither would he flee after he saw himselfe destitute of all conuenient aid, but still continued in earnest fight, desiring nothing so much (as should appeare) as death, for that he thought nothing moze displeasing than life, after the slaughter of so manie of his nobles and liege people.

At length hauing his weapons stricken out of his hands, one John Copland came vnto him, and killed him to yeld; but he with one of his fists gaue this Copland such a blow on the mouth, that by force of the gantlet he strake out two of his teeth before he did yeld vnto him. Which Copland is misnamed by John Maior, and not onelie called Couptaunt, but also reported by him to be a Gascoigne, whereas it is euident by our histories, that he was named Copland, and a mere Englishman. But to our purpose. The Scots that fought in the reeward had no better successe than the other: for that battell was also broken & put to flight, with great slaughter as well of the nobles, as other commons, besides those that were taken. There were slaine in this dolorous conflict, the earle of Murray, the earle of Stratherne, the constable, the marshall, the chamberleine and chancellor of Scotland, with a great number of other nobles and commons [with Maurice Murray.] There were taken with the king five earles, that is to say, Douglas, Fife, Sutherland, Wigton, and Spentith [the earle of March & the Seneschall fled, but after the earle of March being taken, was with the earle of Spentith (as saith Scala chron.) d[is]turbance and hanged at London.] And besides other great riches lost in this field, the holie crosse (as they call it) of holie rood house, was found vpon king Dauid, who bare it about him, in trust that by vertue thereof he should be invincible: but he was spoiled both of that and all other his iewels which were found vpon him at the same time. This battell was stricken nere vnto Durham, the 17 day of October, in the yere 1346. What countries and places the Englishmen got after this victorie, ye may read in the English historie.

In the yere following, the Balliol, with the earle of Northumberland made a road into Louthian, and Cliddedale, bringing a great bootie of goods and cattell out of those countries into Galloway, in which countrie the Balliol abode a long time after. At length, the Scots recouering themselves with much paine, after the slaughter of so manie of their nobles and commons, beside the discomfite for the taking of their king, chose and appointed Robert Stewart as gouernour to haue the rule of the realme. About the same time, William Douglas the sonne of Archibald Douglas, that was brother vnto godd sir James Douglas, who (as before is said) was slaine in Spaine, returned forth of France, and by support of his friends chased the Englishmen out of Douglasdale, Tindale, Twisdale, Strike forest, & Tweedale. John Copland capitaine of Roxburgh, to resist such enterprises, gathered a number of men, A. J. and

The cause of the overthrow

The Scots discomfited.

King Dauid his valiance.

King Dauid taken by John Copland.

I 346. Scala. chron. Nobles slaine in this battell. Fr. Thin. Prisoners taken.

Fr. Thin.

The Balliol sojourneth in Galloway.

Robert Stewart gouernour of Scotland.

Countries recovered out of the Englishmens hands.

Embassadors from the king of England into Scotland

The king of England offers.

The Scots ready to helpe the French, & hinder their neighbors the English.

An armie raised to invade England.

The lord of the Isles slain by the earle of Ross.

Fr. Thin.

Fr. Thin.

William Douglas created earle of Douglas.

Ri. Southwell Two thousand men of armes, 20000 hoblers.

King Dauid inuadeth England.

The fort of Lidell.

Sir Walter Selbie helped by the Scots.

Launcroft.

King Dauid lodged in the manor of Beantepeire.

The abbete of Durham spoiled.

The earle of Northumberland lieutenant of the North.

A herald.

The appointing of the Scottish battels.

Fr. Thin.

The earle of Douglas chased.

David Graham taken.

John Cop-
land chased.

1349.

The second pestilence that was heard of
in Scotland.
Sir David
Berklie slaine

and came forth against his enemies, but receiving the overthrow, he was chased into Roxburgh againe, with losse of diuerse of his men.

In the yere next following, which was from the incarnation 1349, there came such a pestilence thorough all parts of Scotland, so beheiment and contagious, that it slue nere hand the third part of all the people. This was the second time that the pestilence was knowne or heard of to haue come in Scotland. The same yere, or (as other bookes haue) the yere next ensuing, one John saint Pighell slue sir David Berklie knight at Aberdeen, in the night season, by procurement of sir William Dowglas of Liddesdale, as then prisoner in England with the earle of Dowglas, both of them being taken at Durham field. The occasion was, for that this sir David Berklie had aforesaid slaine one John Dowglas, brother to the said sir William, and father to sir James Dowglas of Dalkeith.

1353. I. Ma.
Sir William
Dowglas
slaine.

In the yere following, was the same sir William Dowglas, being lately before ransomed out of England, slaine, as he was hunting in Etrike forest, by his cosine and godsonne William earle of Dowglas, in reuenge of the slaughter of Alexander Ramsay, and other old grudges. Thus was the house of the Dowglases diuided amongst themselves, pursuing each other manie yeres togither with great unkindnesse, vnnaturall enimitie and slaughter. In the yere next following, which was 1355, shortly after Easter, there arrived in Scotland a noble knight named sir Eugenie de Carenteris, with a companie of Frenchmen, though few in number, yet valiant and verie skillfull warriors, which were sent thither by John king of France, that succeeded his father king Philip of Valois, lately before deceased, and deliuered vnto the gouernour and other nobles of the realme of Scotland, forty thousand crownes of the sunne, to be imployed about the leuieng of an armie against the Englishmen, that they might be constrained the sooner to withdraw their powers out of France.

Fortie thousand crownes.

The earle of Morch and William Dowglas enter in to England with an army.
William Ramsey of the Dale
house.

This monie was receiued, though a small part thereof came to the hands of the souldiers or men of warre of Scotland, for the lords and nobles kept it safe inough to their owne vse. Yet neuerthelesse, the earle of Morch, and William Dowglas, gather their people, and passe forth with the same to the borders, and entering into England, appoint William Ramsay of the Dalehouse, to ride before with a number of light horsemen, to the end, that if the Englishmen did assemble and come forth too strong against him, he might retire backe to the maine battell, where they lay in couert, at a place called Pilsbet moze. This Ramsay doing as he was commanded, made a great forraie thorough the countrie, and hauing got together a great bootie of cattell, with, drew with the same homewards: but being sharpe-ly pursued by the Englishmen, in hope to recouer their goods, he fled amaine, and they following eagerly in the chase, were vpon the Scottish armie before they were aware. The Scottishmen, and those few Frenchmen that were there, set vpon the Englishmen fiercely, and finally put them to flight, though not without some slaughter on their part: for there were slaine of Scots sir John Holieburton, and sir James Turnebull knights. These were taken prisoners of Englishmen, sir Thomas Greie, and his sonne, with John Darcas, and manie other Englishmen.

The English-
men intrap-
ped.
Put to flight.

Prisoners taken.

Fr. Thin.
Scala chron.
1355.

The taking of which Greie is reported by others to haue bene after this manner. The lords Persie and Beuill, gardians of the English marches, took truce with the lord William Dowglas, at the time that he conquered the lands which the Englishmen had twone of the Scots. But Patrick earle of March (being in confederacie with Caranteris) would not by anie persuation consent to that leage: wherevpon (with a number of others) he made a road to the castle of Roxham, ambushing themselves vpon the Scottish side of the riuer of Tweed, sending ouer a banneret with his ensigne, and 400 men to forrage & spoile the countrie, who gathering the preies, draue them in despite alongst the castle: wherevpon Thomas Greie, capteine of Roxham (sonne to Thomas Greie, that had bene three times by the Scots besieged in the said castle of Roxham, in the reigne of king Edward the second) seeing the commons of England thus robbed (and deeming it his part to defend his countrie, friends, and their substance) issued forth of Roxham with few men more than fiftie of the garrison of the castle, and a few of the common people vnerpert in matters of war, who (not knowing of the secret ambush of the band which Patrick had laied in wait behind Tweed) issued forth to follow and recouer the preie: but being so farre gone in chase of the enemy, as that he could not returne in safetie (because he was beset before and behind with the 400 on the one side, & the ambush laied by Patrick on the other side) the said Greie and his companie (finding none other remedie but to hazard the successe) forsooke their horses, and on foot (standing to the extremitie) with a wonderfull courage set vpon the Scots, whereof more were killed than of the English, but the Scots comming so soze on the English (not able to resist) they began to flie, at what time Thomas Greie (as before is declared) was taken prisoner.)

The earles of March, and Dowglas, after the obtaining of this victorie, came suddenly in the night season vnto the towne of Berwik, and raising vp ladders to the wals, wan the towne, but not without losse of diuerse Scottish gentlemen, as Thomas Waus, Andrew Scot of Balwerie, John Gordon, William Sinclair, Thomas Pesson, and Alexander Mowbray knights. Of English were slaine Alexander Ogill capteine of the towne, Thomas Persie brother to the earle of Roxthumberland, and Edward Greie, with others. Eugenie de Carenteris with his Frenchmen did verie valiantlie beate himselfe in this enterpryse, whome Robert Stewart the gouernour rewarding with great gifts, sent backe into France, commending him by letters vnto the French king, as he that had done his dutie in euerie bechalle verie thourghlie. The castle of Berwik, notwithstanding that the towne was thus twone, held forth the Scots and Frenchmen, by reason thereof when an armie of Englishmen came to the succours thereof, they raced the wals, and burnt the houses of the towne, and so departed.

The tidings whereof were brought to king Edward at the verie instant of his landing from Calis into England, for which cause he taried at his parliament appointed at London but three daies, and with all speed came to Berwik, where he entered the castle; whereat the burgeses amazed, treated with him, and therevpon the towne of Berwik was rebelled (against the minds of the Scots) to king Edward. As Edward himselfe being come to the rescue and recouerie of Berwik, and hauing receiued the towne, and finding it so defaced, took order for the repairing thereof againe, went to Roxburgh, and there receiued of the Balioll a full resignation of all right to the crowne of Scotland. [For his pretended right to the crowne of Scotland.] For there the 26 of Januarie, the said Balioll hauing resigned (as before) all his title to king Edward, acknowledged these causes: first, in consideration that the Scots were full of rebellon; also, because he had no heire, nor anie verie nere of his linage: and for that he towne.

Berwik

Berwik
wals razed.
Fr. Thin.
Scala chron.

Berwik
repaired again by king
Edward.
The Balioll
resigneth his right.
Fr. Thin.
Scala chron.

alicus epis-
cop. Rolfe. lib.
p. 17.

1355.

The burnt Candlemas.

Salloway recovered.

The battell
of Potters.

The French
king John taken prisoner.

Archibald
Dowglas
taken prisoner.

Subell police.

he was of k. Edwards blod of England, he kneto not where to bestow it better than vpon him. This Balioll is by no autho^r (as Lesleus saith) placed in the catalog of the kings, as well for that he bound himselfe (by homage) to the gouernement of England with an oth, against the gouernement & maietie of Scotland: as for that being a tyrant, & by force inuading the crowne, he continued not long in the same. In truth, I suppose he held it not verie long, and that in continuall warre. But yet for that which I can see, he was crowned king at Scone, 1332, as Lesleus himselfe, Buchanan, and all other autho^rs do agree. Beside, he gouerned by him & his agents vntill the yeare of 1342, at what time he yelded his crowne to king Edward of England; which was the full part of ten yeares, after which againe he re-couered a good part of Endgland. Wherefore it semeth strange to me, that Rosse will not allow him a place in the catalog of kings, since Buchan. maketh him the nintie fourth king, and so placeth him vnder that title, and maketh David Bruce (who was crowned before Balioll, and gouerned after Baliolls departing Scotland) the 98 king, naming also Robert (who succeeded after Bruce) the hundred king in order of gouernement; in such sort, that both these writing at one time (but with diuers affections) cannot agree on the number of their kings: one receiuing, & the other reiecting him to be placed in the catalog of their kings. After this, king Edward passing forth to Hadington, spoiled and wasted the countrie by the way on each hand as he marched forward; and for displeasure that his nauie on the sea (after the souldiers and mariners had bene on land, and burned the church of our ladie in those parts called Whitekirke) had with force of a rigorous tempest bene soe shaken, and manie of the ships lost and drowned together with men and all, he fell into such a rage, that he caused all the buildings in those parts to be burnt and spoiled, as well abbies as all other churches and religious houses, as though he minded (say the Scotish writers) to make warre both against God and all his saints. These things chanced in the yeare 1355, after our common account, about the feast of the Purification of our ladie, & by reason the English men did so much hurt at that time in those parts by fire, they called it euer after. The burnt Candlemas.
Hostlie after that king Edward was returned into England, William Dowglas of Piddesdale recovered out of the English mens possession the lands of Galloway, & the lands of Widdale were in like maner recovered by one Birpatrick. In the same yeare on the 20 day of October, was the battell of Poitiers fought, where Edward prince of Wales, otherwise named the Blache prince, ouer-threw the armie of France, and took king John prisoner, with his yongest sonne Philip, and a great number of other of the French nobilitie besides.
There was at this battell with king John, the earle William Dowglas, & to the number of three thousand Scots, having diuers knights and gentlemen to their capteins, of whome there died in the same battell Andrew Steward, Robert Gordon, Andrew Holiebarton, and Andrew Claus, knights. The earle of Dowglas escaped with life and vntaken, but Archembald Dowglas, son to sir James Dowglas slaine in Spaine, was taken prisoner; albeit his taker suffered him to depart for a small ransome, by reason that William Ramsay of Colluthie, who was also taken with him, made semblance as though the same Archembald Dowglas had bene some poore slave, causing him to pull off his boots, and to do other such drudging seruice, as fell not for the estate of a man of any estimation or honestie, to the end it should not be knowne what he was.

Thus the king of England at one time hauing two kings vnder his captiuitie, sat crowned betwixt them at meate in the feast of Chyristmasse, making (as the vse is) amongst the Englishmen in that season a great banquet. And this he did (as is reposed) to the intent that the maner thereof might be bytuted abroad to his high praise & glorious fame.
King David with in certeine yeares after was conueied by the earle of Northampton vnto Berwikke, where the most part of all the nobles of Scotland assembled together to consult with him touching some agreement to be had for his ransome: but because they could grow to no certeine point therein, he was brought backe againe to London, and there remained in prison as before. In the meane time, Roger Kirkpatrick was slaine by James Lindseie, in a castell where the said James dwelled, and receiued the said Roger as his ghest. This Lindseie fled vpon the fact committed; but yet being apprehended and brought to the gouernor Robert Steward, he suffered death for that offense.

Two kings prisoners in England at one time.

Roger Kirkpatrick slaine.

Shortlie after, that is to wit at Michaelmasse next insuing, after king David had bene at Berwikke, there was an agreement made for his ransome, whereupon being deliuered, he returned into Scotland, in the eleuenth yeare after his taking at Durham field. It was aged that there should be paid for his ransome one hundred thousand marks sterling, at sundrie daies of payment, as was accorded betwixt them. After he had bene 11 yeares in England, in which place also Froissard setteth downe that he paid but 50000 marks English. And Scala Chron. saith, that at the feast of S. Michael, David king of Scots was deliuered for 100000 marks of silver: for which, his hostages came to Berwikke, being the countie of Southerland, and his sonne that was borne of the sister of king David; Thomas Senescall that was named in Scotland earle of Angus; Thomas Demurrise baron of Bothuill, and other twentie sons of noble men in Scotland.

King David
is deliuered.

1357.
Fr.Thin.
Scala chron.

Truce also was taken for the space of fourtē yeares betwixt both realmes, and diuers nobles of Scotland were appointed to lie as hostages in England, till the monie were paid, as is before mentioned [of which pledges (as saith Lesleus) most died in England, by means wherof, the king was deliuered of a great part of his ransome.] k. David was also bound by covenant of agreement to race certeine castles within Scotland, which seemed most noisome to the English borders: which covenant he performed. For vpon his returne into Scotland, he east downe the castles of Dalwhinton, Dunfreis, Portoluene, and Durisdere. He also called a parlement, wherein he enacted sundrie things for the punishment of them that fled from him at Durham field: and first for that his cosine Robert Steward was one of them, being through means thereof a great cause of the ouerthrow, he procured that the act (by which the crowne was appointed for want of issue of his bodie lawfullie begotten, to descend vnto the said Robert Steward) was vtterlie reuoked and disanulled, and John Southerland the sonne of Jane his yongest sister, appointed heire apparant in place of the said Robert. And all the lords of Scotland were sware to obserue and keepe this ordinance.

Truce for 14 yeares.

Fr.Thin.

Castles raced.

A parlement.
Robert Steward dishe-ried of the crowne.
John Southerland made heire appa-
rant.

The earle of Southerland, father to the said John, in hope that his sonne should inioy the crowne, gaue away the most part of his lands, dividing the same amongst his friends, as to the Hates, the Sinclares, the Ogilbies, and Gordons: but he was neuerthelesse deceiued of his hope. For shortlie after his son being one of them that was giuen in pledge to re-maine in England, till the monie for the kings ransome

The death of John Sou-
therland.

Robert Steward againe ordained heire
apparent.
The contribution of the cleargie.

1363.

Fr.Thin.
Buchanan.

A demand proponed to the lords of Scotland.

Fr.Thin.

1357.
Their answer.

1357

Quene
Janes death.
Fr.Thin.

John Maior li.
5. cap. 22.

Ouid.

King David
marrieth Margaret Logie.

He repenteth
his marriage.

He banisheth
hir.

She complai-neth to the pope.

Sentence gi-
uen on hir
part.
She departeth this world.

some was paid, died there of the pestilence, in such sort as the most part of the other pledges likewise did. And shortly after his deceasse, Robert Steward was reconciled to the kings sauer, and orde-ned heire apparant to the crowne in semblable manner as he was before. The cleargie of Scotland condescended to giue the tenth pennie of all their fruits & reuenues towards the paiement of the kings ransome [which the pope caused the clergie to giue.] Not long after, king David called an other coun-cell, wherein (according to his promise made to the king of England before his deliuerance) he moued the lords and barons of Scotland in a matter whereof he wished not to haue of them anie towardlie answer, and that was this: Whether they could be contented, that after his deceasse, the crowne of Scotland should be transferred vnto the king of Englands sonne, and to his lawfull heires: [Which thing Iohn Maior assigneth to the yeare 1363, who also saith, that it was this parlement (as he hath red) and done by the persuation of Jane the quene, forgetting that he said before, that she died in the yeare 1357.]

The lords hearing that was proponed vnto them, answered without anie long studie, that so long as anue of them were able to beare armour or weapon, they would neuer consent thereto. King David right sofall to heare them at this point, thought himsele discharged, for that he was not bound to labor further in this sute, because his promise made to the king of England touching this point, onelie was, that if the Scottis lords would agree, then he should intail the crowne to his sonne. In the yeare next following, which was from the incarnation 1357, quene Jane the wife of k. David went into England to see hir brother king Edward, & died there before she returned (leaving no issue behind hir) [at Hertford in the yeare of our redemption (as saith Io. Maior) 1362, and was buried (as saith Sca. chro.) in the greie friers in London beside hir mother.
This woman doth the said Maior commend for a most rare person, in that she neuer forsooke hir husband in his banishment into France, & in the time of his imprisonment in England; for which cause she deserueth as great praise as Penelope, although in hir life she intoyed small worldlie pleasure, having had hir bodie dedicated to the marriage bed. For si nihil infausti durus tulisset Vlyses, Penelope felix, sed sine laude foret.

According to which, it might haue bene said of this woman, that she might haue bene counted hap-pie, if hir husband had neuer bene oppressed with these manie disgraces of fortune; but then she should neuer haue bene extolled with that commendation, which now to the worlds end she hath amongst the wisest.]

k. David, after hir deceasse, married a yong lu-die gentlewoman named Margaret Logie, daughter to sir John Logie knight, but within thre mo-neths after he repented him, for that he had married himselfe with one of so meane parentage, to the disparagement of his blood. Whereupon he banished both hir, and all other that had counselled him to marie hir, confining them for euer out of all the parts of his dominions. She hir selfe went vnto Auig-non, where as then the pope with all his consistorie remained, and entering hir plaint there in the court, followed the same with such diligence, that in the end sentence was giuen on hir side (that is to say) that king David should receiue hir againe into his companie, and to accept and vse hir as his iust and lawfull wife. Thus should the realme of Scotland haue run in trouble and danger of interdiction, had she not departed out of this life by the way in returning homewards. * Charles the first surnamed the wise, being king of France (supported by the aies of Scots) prepared an expedition into the holie land, in which sortie, when a greuous contention fell among the French and English, the last were overcome by the first through the singular manhood of the Scots.

Which benefit Charles not forgetting, erected an order of an hundred archers to be about his person, and by office to keepe watch and ward for him (in the night) within his court gates: which (vpon this originall) is obserued with great solemnitie, euen in this our age.] k. David in the meane time repared fundie places and strengths of his realme, & built a tower in Edinburgh castell, bearing the name after him euen vnto this day, called Davids tower. * About this time (or rather more trulie as others haue before this written in the yeare of Christ 1356, or shortlie after the deliuerie of David Bruce from captiuitie as the third sort do say) William Dowglas being about to go on pilgrimage beyond the seas (at such time as king John was preparing his host against the Blaque prince) went with k. John vnto the foresaid battell, being honored by his hands with the title of knightood: but after, having manie of his men slaine, and being enforced to forsake the field, he returned home into Scotland. William Dowglas shortlie after, vpon the deliuerie of David Bruce from the captiuitie of England, was created earle of Dowglas. Such about which or at the selfe same time, the said king of Scots aduanced William Ramsie to the earldome of Fife, by the means of the wife of the said Ramsie, whom the king intirelie loued (as the report went.) The right of which countie king David affirmed to be in his (so that he might liberallie giue it) as truelie belied in his possession by the forfeiture which Duncan sometime countie of Fife had done in k.
Robert Bruces daies; in murdering of an elquier called Michael Beton, whome he miserable slue in a riuer for extreme displeasure. Wherefore this William Ramsie surmized that Duncan (to obteine pardon for his offense) did by indenture make Robert Bruce k. of Scots his heire in reuerfion, if he died without issue male. Yet had this Duncan a daughter (by his wife the countesse of Gloucester, and daughter to the king of England) which was entertained in England, and should haue bene sold to Robert the seneschall of Scotland. But she (rather respecting the satisfieng of hir loue, than the honor of hir estate, rather choosing to be a kings wife, than an earles ladie) toke to husband one William Felson, a knight in Northumberland, which (at the said time when William Ramsie was made earle of Fife) challenged that earldome in the right of his wife, daughter and heire to the said Duncan earle of Fife. But for anie thing that I can yet see, the said Ramsie went away with the honor thereof.] After this appealing of certeine rebels that sought to trouble the quiet state of the realme, he purposed to haue gone to Jerusalem: but hauing provided all things necessarie for such a iourne, he fell sicke of a burning feauer, and died within the castell of Edinburgh in the thirtie ninth yeare of his reigne, and fortie seuenth of his age, which was from the incarnation 1370, his bodie lieth in Holie rood house, where it was buried in the yeare aforesaid.

* During the time that this David Bruce was prisoner in England, he did so earnestlie set his louing affection vpon Katharine Portimer, a damsell of London (by reason of familiar acquaintance with hir) that he could not forbear hir companie, but (as it seemeth) brought hir also into Scotland with him; whereat the lords disdaining, and highlie offended with the king therefore, procured one Richard de Hull,

Fr.Thin.
Lectur. 127.
pag. 216.Dauton to be er built.
Fr.Thin.Scala chro.
Of this man
Dowglas
and his bein France English chronicles do
report.William Dowglas made
earle.Scala chro.
William Ram-
sie made ear-
of Fife.

Buchanan.

Fr.Thin.

The resigner
his right to the Stewar-Robert.
Robert Steward is crened king of
Scotland.
1370Fr.Thin.
Scala chro.The first
king of the Stewards
the crown
Fr.Thin.

Hull, a ballet of Scotland (in feining some matter unto hir from the king, as being sent in message by him) to find meanes to rid hir out of life, which he did so couertlie, and handeled the matter so cunninglie, that he suddenlie murdered hir riding from Melros to Seltrie. Whereupon, the king conceiuing great dolor (not daring to seeke reuenge thereof, for doubt of the nobilitie) caused hir to be honorable buried at Petobottle, not ceassing (as farre as in him lay) after hir death, to manifest the singular loue he bare unto hir in hir life.)

Sundrie marvellous things were seene in the daies of this king David, within the bounds of Albion. In the 16 yere of his reigne, crows, rauens, and pies, in the winter season brought forth their brood, and ceased in the summer and springtime, contrarie to their kind. All the yewes in the countrie the same yere were barren, and brought no lambes. There was such plentie of mice and rats both in houses, and abroad in the fields, that they might not be destroyed. In the 27 yere of his reigne, the rivers and other waters rose on such heighth through abundance of rainne that fell in the latter end of haruest, that breaking forth of their common chanelles, with their violent streame manie houses & towne were bozne downe and destroyed. About this time liued diuerse clerks, in that age counted notable, as Iohn Duns, of the order of saint Francis, Richard Middleton, and William Ocham, with others.

King David being thus dead and buried, the nobles assembled at Lithquo, about the election of him that should succeed in his place. The greater part of the nobilitie, and such as were of the sounder iudgement, agreed vpon Robert Steward; but William earle of Dowglas being come thither with a great power, claimed to be preferred by right of Edward Balioll, and of the Cumins, which right he pretended to haue receiued of them both, and there ought to be no doubt (as he alledged) but that the crowne appertained by iust title vnto them, as all the world knew, and therefore sith he had both their rights, he maintained that he was true and vndoubted inheritor to the crowne. It appeared that the said earle Dowglas purposed to vsurpe the crowne by force, if he might not haue it by friendlie and quiet meanes: but neuertheless he was disappointed of his purpose, by reason that George earle of March, and Iohn Dunbar earle of Murray, with the lord Erskine (which three were captiues of Dunbryton, Sterling, and Edinburgh) and others (of whose friendlie furtherance he thought himselfe assured) gaue their voices with the Steward, assisting his side to their uttermost powers. The Dowglas perceiving hereby that he should not be able to mainteine his quarell, resigned thereupon his pretended title, which in effect was of no importance, nor worth the discussing.

Robert. When was Robert Steward conueid to Scone, and there crowned with great solemnitie, and was called Robert the second. This came to passe in the 47 yere of his age, on our ladie day in Lent, called the Annuntiation, being the yere of Christ 1370. Whereupon, that the firmer amitie & friendship might continue and be nourished betwixt this king Robert and his subiect the earle of Dowglas aforesaid, it was accorded that Eufemie eldest daughter to king Robert, should be giuen in mariage to James sonne to the earle of Dowglas aforesaid. Thus ye may perceiue how the Stewards came to the crowne, whose succession haue intioed the same to our time: quene Marie mother to Charles James that now reigneth, being the eight person from this Robert, that thus first attained vnto it [of whose first originall and descent you shall see before in the life of Duncan.

He had to wife at the time of his attaining to the crowne, Eufemie daughter to Hugh earle of Rolfe, by whome he had two sonnes, Walter and David. But before he was married to hir, he kept one Elizabeth pure in place of his wife, and had by hir three sonnes, Iohn, Robert, and Alexander, with diuerse daughters, of the which one was married to Iohn Dunbar earle of Murray, and another to Iohn Leon lord of Glames. The earldome of Murray continued in possession of the Dunbars onelie during the life of this earle Iohn & his sonne, in whom the succession failed touching the name of the Dunbars, in the intioing of that earldome: for leaving a daughter behind him that was married to the Dowglas, the same Dowglas came by that means to the said earldome of Murray. King Robert after his coronation made sundrie earles, lords, barons, and knights. Amongst other, James Lindsay of Gleneske was made earle of Crawford. His wife quene Eufemie deceased the third yere after hir husband attained the crowne, and then incontinentlie he married Elizabeth pure [or more, daughter to sir Adam pure knight] his old lemman, to the end the children which he had by hir might be made legitimate by vertue of the matrimonie subsequent. [Although before he had procured this Elizabeth to be giuen in matrimonie to one Gifford a noble man in Louthian, which also died (as fortune serued) when Eufemie first wife of the said Robert died, whereby they (being now both at libertie) might renew their owne old loue, and in wedlocke possesse that which before they intioed in adulterie.]

Not long after, by authoritie of a parlement assembled, he made his eldest sonne Iohn, begotten on Elizabeth pure aforesaid, earle of Carrike: his second sonne begotten on hir, earle of Fentith and Fife: and his third sonne Alexander, begotten likewise on the same mother, he created earle of Buchquhane, and lord of Badenoch. [Besides which he had also two daughters by hir.] His eldest sonne Walter, begotten on Eufemie his first wife, was made earle of Atholl, and lord of Brechin: his second sonne David, begotten on the same Eufemie, was made earle of Stratherne. The said Walter procured the slaughter of James the first, for that he pretended a right to the crowne, as after shall appeare. Shortly after, he called an other parlement at Perth, where it was ordeined, that after the death of king Robert, the crowne should descend vnto Iohn his eldest sonne, and to his issue male; and for default thereof, vnto Robert his second sonne, and to his heires male; and for default of such heires, to Alexander his third sonne, and to his heires male; and in default of them, to remaine to his sonne Walter, begotten on Eufemie his wife, & to the heires male of his bodie begotten: and if such succession failed, then it should descend vnto his yongest sonne David the earle of Stratherne, and to his heires general either male or female. And all the nobles of the realme were sworn to performe this new ordinance touching the succession of the crowne, and that in most solemn manner.

About this time, the borderers, which are men ever desirous of warres and trouble, to the end they may applie their market, whereby they most chieflie liue, that is to say, reise and spoile of their neighbors goods, through enuie of long peace and quietnesse, vpon a quarell picked, sue certeine of the household seruants of George earle of Dunbar at the faire of Roxburgh, which as then the Englishmen held. Earle George soze offended herewith, sent an herald vnto the earle of Northumberland, warden of the English marches, requiring that such as had committed the slaughter might be deliuered to receive Elizabeth pure king Roberts concubine.

How the Dowglas came by the earldome of Murray.

Eufemie the quene deceased.

Fr. Thin. Elizabeth the pure married to king Robert.

The preferment of the kings sonnes to dignitie.

Fr. Thin.

An act for succession of the crowne.

The borderers desirous of warre.

Roxburgh faire.

1370.
Buchanan.
The truce
violated.

Roxburgh
surprised by the earle of March.

The English
men invade
Scotland.

The English
men discomfited.
Sir John
Lilborne
taken.
Fr. Thin.

Henrie Per-
tie earle of Northumberland.

A policie to afright hoyses

Tho. Mus-graue capteine of Berwik
taken prisoner

Fr. Thin.

A legat from the pope.

Fr. Thin.
1375.
Buchanan.

ceuse according to that they had deserved: but when he could get nought but dilatorie answers, full of derision rather than importing any true meaning, he passed over his displeasure till more opportunitie of time might serue. In the yeres following, against the next faire to be holden at Roxburgh aforesaid, the said earle of March, with his brother the earle of Murray gathered a power of men secretly together, and comming to the said towne, took it, slew all the Englishmen found within it, put their goods to the sacke, and after set the towne on fire, and so departed.

Hereupon the Englishmen hostilely after enter with an armie into Scotland, burning and doing much hurt upon the lands of sir John Gordon, for that they ioined to the earle of Marches lands. Sir John Gordon verie desirous to reuenge this iniurie, came into England with an armie, and getting together a great botie of cattell, returned therewith homewards, but being encountered by the way at a place called Carran o' Carran, by John Lilborne and other Englishmen, there was a sore fight betwixt them, the victorie for a time shewing it selfe so variable and vncertaine, that sir John Gordon was sore wounded, and the Scots were five times that day had in chase, and as oft got the like advantage of their enemies. In the end the Englishmen were clearely discomfited, and their capteine sir John Lilborne, with his brother and diuerse other brought prisoners into Scotland [the manner whereof John Maior condemneth and laith the fault of breach in earle Dowglas.]

To reuenge these displeasures, Henrie Persie earle of Northumberland entered into Scotland with seven thousand men, & comming vnto Duns, there pitched downe his tents; but the night following came the herds and other people of the countrie, hauing prepared certeine bagges made and sowed together, of drie leather like to bladders, into the which they had put small peble stones, & running by & downe about the place where the Englishmen were incamped, made such a noise with those bags full of stones, that the Englishmens horses breaking their halters and bridles wherewith they were tied, ran from their maisters and keepers, and were scattered so abroad in the countrie, that the Scottishmen got hold of them, and so in the morning the Englishmen that had watched all night (for doubt to haue bene assailed by their enemies) perceiuing themselves set on foot, returned home without any further attempt.

In the meane time, Thomas Musgraue capteine of Berwik, comming to the succours of the earle of Northumberland, chanced to meet with sir John Gordon vpon the way, by whom he was taken, and lead into Scotland as his prisoner. Neither had the Scots the better thus onelie on the east marches, but also on the west, where sir Jo. Johnston had sundrie skirmishes with the Englishmen, and went euer a waie with the vpper hand. [All which before (vntill the death of Eufemie the queene) Buchanan appointed to the first two yeres of the king, before the death of the queene.] About this time, pope Gregorie the 11 sent a legat from Auignon to king Robert, forbidding him in any wise to meddle with the goods pertaining to the church, after the decease of any bishop, person, or vicar. [About this time happened the death of Edward the third, king of England. And Charles the fifth king of France sent ambassadoys into Scotland, to renew the old leage betwene the two nations, and to perswade him to warre vpon England, to the end the warres might thereby be withdraue out of France: which was performed accordingly.]

On the 22 day of October, in the yere 1378, David Stewart was bozne, which afterwarde was made duke of Rothsaie, and on saint Andrews day next following, towne of Berwik was taken by sir John Gordon, and sir o' seven other knights, but it was not long kept: for a number of Englishmen entering by a posterne of the castell, recovered the towne easilie againe out of the Scottishmens hands. After this, William earle of Dowglas came with twentie thousand men to the faire of Pennire within England, and spoiled all the goods found as then in the same faire, and so returned with great riches into Scotland: but the Scottishmen smallie reioiced at this gain, for with such cloth & other wares as they brought awaie with them from the foresaid faire, they drew into the countrie such a violent and sore pestilence, that the third part of all the people (where it came) died thereof. This was the third time that the pestilence was knowne to haue done any great hurt in Scotland, being in the yere after the incarnation 1380.

The Englishmen [with the number of 1500, under the conduct (as saith Buchanan) of Talbot] to reuenge the displeasure done by the earle of Dowglas at Pennire, raised a great armie, and came with the same ouer Sulway, and invading the Scottish borders on that side most cruellie, spared neither fire nor sword. In the meane time, the Scots gathered to the number of five hundred men, & stood in a streit till the Englishmen should come and passe by them, and then with such huge noise and clamor they set on the Englishmen, that in giuing backe there was foure hundred of them slaine, and a great number of the residue for haist drowned in the water of Sulway, and hereby was all the botie of cattell & goods recovered againe by the Scots, and the most part of it restored to the owners. Charles the first as then French king, hearing of such prosperous aduentures daile chancing to the Scots, sent ouer his ambassadoys vnto king Robert, exhorting him to follow his good fortune, and occasion thus offered to reuenge old iniuries against the Englishmen, now that their hearts seemed to faile them through losses sustained diuerse waies of late at the Scottish mens hands. An other cause of their message was also (as the Scots do write) to renew the old league & band betwixt Scotland and France, which being done in solemne wise according to the maner, they returned into France, & with them went ambassadoys from king Robert vnto their master the said K. Charles, Walter Wardlaw, cardinall & bishop of Glascow, with manie other noble men, who in like maner there renewed the same leage & bond of friendship, to the high contentation of both the princes. This was in the eleuenth yere of king Robert his reigne.

In which yere John Lion chancelor of Scotland was slaine by James Lindesay, earle of Crawford. This John Lion grew into so high fauour with king Robert, that he gaue to him his daughter the ladie Elizabeth in marriage, with diuerse possessions and lands, called Glamis. Of him the surname of the Lions is descended: and in memorie thereof, they beare in their armes the lion & lillies, with the tressle in forme and fashion as the king of Scotland beareth his, saue that their lions are placed in a blacke field. The cause why the earle of Crawford thus slew the chancelor, was onelie vpon enuie and spite, for that after he had married the kings daughter, he attained to such estimation and authoritie, that he might do all things with the king, according to his owne will and pleasure. For this offense the earle of Crawford remained in exile certeine yeres after, and durst not returne home, till finally through ear nest sute made to 1378.

Recoverd a game out of their hands.

1380.
The faire of Pennire.

The third time that the pestilence came into Scot-
land.

1380.
Fr. Thin.

The English
men invade
the Scottish borders.

Englishmen
slaine and drowned.

Ambassadors
sent to the king.

1381. Le
Anno Reg. 11
The renewing
of the league betwixt Scotland and France.

The chancellor of Scotland slaine.

Enuie & spite

The earle of Crawford in exile.

to the king by the earles of Dologlas and Sparch, his pardon was begged, and then at length he was reconciled to the kings favour.

In the meane tyme, Edward king of England, the third of that name, departed this life, and Richard of Burdeour, sonne to the blacke prince Edward, that was sonne to the said king Edward, succeeded, in the fourth yere of whose reigne, being after the birth of our Saviour 1381, John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, with other English lordes, came into Scotland in ambassage [to whome were appointed James earle of Dologlas, and John Dunbar earle of Murray] to treat for the appeasing of the discord as then continuing betwixt the two realmes: and in the end the matter was so handled, that a truce was concluded to indure for thre yeres. As the said duke was returning homewards, he was informed of the rebellion and insurrection made by the commons of England against the nobles, having one Jacke Straw and others to their captains, whereby on doubting to passe thorough his owne countrie till things were better appeased, he returned into Scotland, and was conveyed by William earle of Dologlas, and Archembald Dologlas lord of Galloway, to holie rood house beside Edinburgh, where he remained till he heard that the rebels were suppressed, and their captains slaine or taken, and put to execution.

As soon as the truce was expired, Archembald Dologlas lord of Galloway, displeased in his mind that the Englishmen lieng in garison within the castell of Lochmaben, did daile harrie and rob the villages and countrie townes of Galloway and Annandale, raised a great power by support of the earls James of Dologlas, and George of March, and therewith laid a strong siege unto the said castell of Lochmaben, & having lien there at the space of nine daies, they fought with a number of Englishmen that came out of Carleill to rescue this castell, whom having put to flight, they gaue therewith also a sharpe assault to the castell, and put them within in such feare, that sir William Fetherston then capteine thereof, and the residue consented to yeld the house unto the Scots even the same day without more ado, upon condition they might depart with their goods in safetie into England.

But Fourdon writing of the winning of this castell, speaketh not of anie overthrow giuen to those that should come from Carleill, in maner as other write. For thus he saith. When Archembald Dologlas had got knowledge that the same castell was utterly unprouided both of men and vittels necessarie for the defense thereof, he assembled an armie together, with the helpe of the earles of Dologlas and Dunbar, who ioining with him, inuironed the castell about with a strong siege, so that no succour could enter to the reliefe of them within at anie hand. Hereupon the capteine sir William Fetherston knight, sent letters unto the lord wardens of the English marches, requiring aid, and letting them to understand in what danger he stood for lacke of men and vittels. The wardens wrote to him againe, that he should do his best for eight daies to hold out; and if no succour came within that terme, then to do as he should see cause. Hereupon sir William Fetherston requiring a truce of the Scottish lordes for the space of those eight daies, within which terme if no succour came to remove their siege, he would yeld the castell unto them, the liues and goods of them within saved. This was granted, and the Scots ceased further to annoy them within by assaults: and when the ninth day was come, and no aid from England appeared, they received the castell into their possession, according to the covenant. And so the Scots having thus wonne the castell of Lochmaben, rased it quite before to the earth.

King Richard hearing that the Scots had attained this enterprise, appointed the baron of Graustocke with a certein number of men to go with vittels and munition unto Roxburgh, for doubt least if the Scots came to lay siege to that fortresse, and finding it unprouided, they might peradventure bring it into further danger than would lightlie be remedied. As this baron was come within a mile of Roxburgh, he was taken by the earle of March, and brought to Dunbar with all his prouision. The king of England being informed also of this mishap, appointed two armies, one by sea, and another by land, to invade the Scots; the duke of Lancaster having the generall charge and conduct of them both, who giuing order to them that should passe by sea what they should do, entered himselfe by land, and waisting the countreies of March and Louthian, came to Edinburgh, and took the towne. But theras his souldiers would haue spoiled and burned it, he compounded with the inhabitants for a summe of monie, and so returned without doing anie more damage.

His nauie being as then arrived in the Forth, tarried behind, & first burning the abbey of saint Colmes Inch, a number of the souldiers with their captains landed in Fife, and spoiled diuerse townes and villages there: but in the end, Thomas and Nicholas Erskines being brethren, Alexander Lindsay, and William Cunningham of Kilmorris, set upon them, and slue the most part of them, so that few in number escaped againe to their ships, being pursued hard to the water side. The same yere the earle of Dologlas recovered all the strengths of Tindale out of the Englishmens hands, which they had held ever since the battell of Durham unto those daies. This earle of Dologlas, one of the most valiant personages in those his daies, within the whole realme of Scotland, died within his castell of Dologlas, shortly after he had attained this enterprise, and was buried in the abbey of Melrose.

After his deceasse, his sonne James, or (as saith Buchanan) William succeeded in the earldome of Dologlas, a verie fierce and hardie knight, the which shortly after appointed by the king to haue the guiding of an armie, he passed with the same into England, and burnt the countrie so farre as Herefordshire. But being countermanded home, he returned and came unto Perth, where he found the lord John de Harlan, admerall of France, and earle of Valentinois, who about the same time was arrived in Scotland with two hundred and fortie ships well and perfectlie furnished for the warres, and in them two thousand and five hundred armed men, diuerse of them being lords and barons, besides gentlemen and others. Also there was amongst them 400 haggbutters (as Bellenden saith) and two hundred with crokbowes: the residue bare pikes, halberts, and such like weapons. They were paid their wages for one whole yere aforehand, and had brought vittels with them to serue them as long. They had brought also with them foure hundred paire of white curets, foure hundred halfe long swordes, & fiftie thousand franks, to be giuen among the nobles of Scotland, accordinglie as king Robert should appoint and thinke expedient.

The admerall and other the nobles of France, being thus come into Scotland to make warres on the Englishmen, were highlie feasted by the king and lords of the realme, as then present with him; and when the earle of Dologlas was once come, by common consent of them all there assembled together in counsell, it was ordeined that an armie should be raised with all speed, that ioining with the

The baron of Graustocke taken.

Anno reg 15. 1382. l. Ma.

An armie by sea and another by land, prepared against the Scots.

The duke of Lancaster cometh with an armie to Edinburgh.

The Englishmen discomfited in Fife. The strength of Tindale recovered.

The earle of Dologlas deceased.

James earle of Dologlas.

The Scots invade Northumberland. 1385.

John de Harlan admerall of France.

200. Buchan. 25 barons, 800 men of armes or knights.

I. Fourdon. I doubt whether there were any haggbutts bled in those daies, though guns were some what before that time.

1378.

Berwick taken by Scots.

Recovered againe out of their hands.

1380. The faure of Denhire.

The third time that the pestilence came into Scotland.

1380. Fr. Thin.

The Englishmen invade the Scottish borders.

Englishmen slaine and drowned.

Ambassadors to the French king.

1381. Lef. Anno Reg. 11. The renning of the league betwixt Scotland and France.

The chancellor of Scotland slaine.

Ennise & Spite.

The earle of Crawford in exile.

perdition is begged.

Anno reg. 12. 1381. l. Ma.

English ambassadors sent into Scotland.

Truce taken. Rebellion in England.

Jacke Straw

The truce expired. The garison of Lochmaben Anno reg. 14. 1381. l. Ma.

1384.

The castell of Lochmaben rendered to the Scots.

John Fourdon.

Sir William Fetherston.

Buchanan.

The earle of Fife.
An armie of Scots and Frenchmen enter into England.
Castles won.

The Frenchmen & Scots cannot agree.

They invade Cumberland.

The Frenchmen returne into France.

King Richard invadeth Scotland.

1387.

An armie of thirtie thousand Scots invadeth England by the West marches.
Cokermouth taken vpon the sudden.

The forme of an old deed of gift.

The true meaning of men in old time.

Frenchmen they might passe immediatlie into England. The earle of Fife sonne to king Robert was appointed to be generall of this armie, hauing with him the earles of Dowglas, and March, Archembald Dowglas lord of Galloway, and diuerse other of the Scottish nobilitie. This armie when they were all togither, amounted to the number of fiftie thousand men, the which entring into England, toke the castles of Marke, Foud, and Cornewall. After this, by robbing and spoiling the countrie betwixt Berwik and Newcastle, they did much hurt in all parts where they came; but through continuall raine which fell as then in great abundance, they were constrained to returne into Scotland, where they pitched downe their field nere to the castell of Rochelburgh, purposing to haue assailed the winning thereof: but forsomuch as they could not agree in whose name it should be kept if it were wonne, they left that enterpryse. For the Frenchmen required that if they won it, that then it might be kept by them, in the name and to the behoofe of the French king, wherevnto the Scots would not agree.

Yet after this, the Frenchmen wishing to accomplish some other enterpryse, went to the west borders, where ioining with Archembald Dowglas lord of Galloway, they passed ouer Sulway sands; and so entering into Cumberland, did wonderfull much hurt in that countrie. At length they determined to lay siege vnto Carlisle, but being called from thence they returned into Scotland, and then (as some authors write) and not before, they laid siege to Rochelburgh, and raised from thence within eight daies after, by reason of the variance before alledged. At Allhallowentide next ensuing, the Frenchmen returned into France, hauing indured no small treuell and paines, since their first coming forth of their countrie. After they were gotten a shipboard to returne homewards, the Scots againe enter into England with an armie, remaining there for the space of two moneths (as the Scottish writers say.) And in the meane time king Richard assembled a mightie power, and invadeth Scotland, passed through the Shers and Louthian, putting all the towne, countries, and houses vnto utter ruine, as in the English historie more plainlie may appere.

In the yere next ensuing, Walter Wardlaw bishop of Glasgow and cardinall, departed this life. Also within a while after that king Richard was returned backe into England, Robert Stewart earle of Fife, with James earle of Dowglas, Archembald Dowglas lord of Galloway, entred into England with an armie of thirtie thousand men, coming so secretly thorough the water of Sulway, that they came to Cokermouth in such speedie wise vpon the sudden, that the people had not leasure to conueie away their goods: so that the Scots remaining there for the space of three daies, got a rich botie togither, and returned with the same thorough the countries of Westmerland and Northumberland safe, and without incounter againe into Scotland. Amongest certeine other things, found in rifeling and ransacking of houses in this iourne, there was a charter found of certeine lands given by king Athelstane, in this forme: I king Athelstane giues to Paullane, Odham and Rodham, als guid aud als faire, als euer yay mine waire, and yarto witnesse Mauld my wife. By tenure of which deed it may appere, that our ancestors gaue more credit to the true meaning of a few wordes barelie expressed in their writings, than that there needed so long processe and circumstance as is now used with long studie of penning, nothing being thought sufficient to assure the parties of their couenanted bargaines, and concluded agreements.

In this last iourne against the Englishmen, William Dowglas bastard sonne to Archembald Dowglas lord of Galloway, won great fame and honor for his high prowes and noble valancie, shewed as well in certeine approaches made vnto Carlisle, as in diuerse other skirmishes elswhere. The king also herevpon began to fauour him in such wise, that he thought him worthy of some high advancement; and therevpon gaue him his daughter in marriage, named Giles, a ladie of such excellent beaultie, as his match in those daies was not to be found: [with whom for his dowrie, he gaue the lands of Piddeldale.] He begat on hir a daughter, which was after married to the earle of Orkenie. This William Dowglas (as Iohn Fourdon noteth) was of a blackish or swart colour, not overcharged with flesh; but big of bone, a mightie personage, byright and tall, valiant, courteous, amiable, full of liberalitie, merrie, faithfull, and pleasant in companie, but herewith he was of such strength, that whom soeuer he stroke either with mace, sword, or speare, downe he went were he neuer so well armed. At one time (as the same Fourdon saith) he hauing with him but eight hundred, fought against three thousand Englishmen, of whom two hundred he slue in the field, & brought five hundred prisoners with him into Scotland.

In the yere 1388, Robert earle of Fife, and Archembald Dowglas lord of Galloway, entered with a proud armie into England, and in the meane time came sundrie Irishmen by sea to the coasts of Galloway, and landing in diuerse places, fetched aboate great booties of cattell, and other goods of the inhabitants: whereof William Dowglas, sonne of the said Archembald being informed, got a conuenient power of men togither, by support of his brother in law, Robert earle of Fife, and by licence of the king passed ouer with the same, shipped in certeine vessels into Ireland, where being got on land, he laid siege to the towne of Carlingford. The towne men doubting to be taken by assault, purchased a truce for certeine daies, promising to giue a great summe of monie to haue their towne saued: but in the meane time, they assembled the number of eight hundred men, through helpe of an other towne not farre off, called Doundalke, and ioining with them, they diuided themselves into two parts. One part set vpon Robert Stewart of Mordue, who hauing the conduct of the earle of Fifes men, was gone abroad into the countrie to fetch in some preie: and the other part assailed William Dowglas, that lay still afore the towne.

Nevertheless, the said Robert and William received the enemies with such manhood, that they put them in both places to flight, and immediatlie after gaue assault to the towne, and entring the same perforce, put all the goods found therein to the sacke, and then set it on fier, and burned it to ashes. This done, they toke threescore ships which they found in diuerse hamens and creeks there on that coast, and straghting fiftene of them with such spoile as they had got, they burned the residue, and then returning homewards, spoiled the Ile of Man by the way as they passed. Shortly after their returne home, the king of England sent an armie into Scotland, which did much hurt in the Shers, in burning and ouerthrowing diuerse towres and houses. King Robert being certified hereof, as then remaining in the north parts of Scotland, assembled the nobles of his realme at Aberdeen: and there by all their aduises it was concluded, that the whole puissance of the realme should be raised with all speed, to reuenge those iniuries done by the Englishmen. Herevpon were two armies assembled: the one, wherein were fiftene thousand men, was committed to the gouernance of the earle of William Dowglas lord of Galloway for his high prowesse.

Fr. Thin.

Fr. Thin.

Cumberland invadeth Scotland.

Cent of the cl men vol carle of glas.

The ab bir of Engl as R.

1388.

Irishmen fetch priues in Galloway. William Dowglas invadeth Ireland with five hundred men, as Iohn Fourdon saith. Carlingford besieged.

The craftie dealing of the towne men.

The Irishmen assaile the Scots in two severall places.

The Irishmen put to flight.

Carlingford wonne by assault.

The Ile of Man spoiled.

Englishmen burne in the Shers.

Two armies of Scottish men assembled.

of Fife, hauing with him the earle of Menteith, Archibald Dowglas lord of Galloway, and Alexander Lindseie of Malcop. The other containing like number of men, was appointed to the guiding of the earles of Dowglas and March, hauing with them James Lindseie earle of Crawford, John Dunbar earle of Murray, and the lord Haie the constable of Scotland, with diuerse other of the nobilitie (both which (saith Froissard) amounted to the number of 40000 men.)

These two armies parting in sunder at Jedworth, the earle of Fife with his people entered into Cumberland by the west marches, and the earles of Dowglas and March with theirs, entered on the other side into Northumberland, passing thorough the countrie, spoiling and wasting the same, till as farre as Durham; and on the other part, the earle of Fife spared neither fier nor sword, all the way as he passed. At length both these armies met together about a ten miles from Newcastle. Here the earle of Dowglas chose forth ten thousand of the most able men that could be found amongst all the numbers, with the which he went to Newcastle, to trie if by anie meanes he might take the towne. There was gathered into Newcastle before his comming thither, the most part of all the chosen men from Forke to the borders, with the earle of Northumberland, who by reason of extreme age was not able to sturre abroad (anie thing to purpose) himselfe, but he had with him two of his owne sonnes, the one named Henrie, and the other Rafe, verie forward and lustie gentlemen. This Henrie being the elder, was surnamed for his often picking, Henrie Hotspur, as one that seldome times rested, if there were anie seruice to be done abroad.

The earle of Dowglas comming to Newcastle, incamped with his people on that side the towne towards Scotland, and betwix the towne earnestlie, which way he might best come to giue assault to win it. Henrie Perie desirous to shew some prooue of his singular manhood, wherein he greatlie trusted, required to fight with the earle of Dowglas man to man; which request the earle granting, together they ran, mounted on two great coursers with sharpe ground speares at the vfferance. The earle of Dowglas in this encounter bare himselfe so well, that in the end he droue the Perie out of his saddle. The Englishmen that stood without the gates, made to the rescue, recovered him on foot, and brought him forthwith backe into the towne. Incontinentlie hereupon, the earle of Dowglas caused the assault to be giuen, and filling the ditches with hate and sagots, came with ladders to the walls; but the Englishmen so well defended themselves, that the Scots were beaten backe, not without great losse and slaughter of their people.

Froissard making mention of this enterprize thus made by the Scots, varieth somewhat from the Scottish writers in this place: for he speaketh nothing that the Dowglas and the Perie should thus run together on horsebacke (as before is specified) but that in giuing assault to the towne, it chanced, that as the Englishmen defended their barriers without the gate, the Dowglas fortuned to be matched hand to hand with Henrie Perie, and there by force plucked the Peries staffe from him, and in returning holsted it vp on height, saying, he would carrie the same for his sake into Scotland: and the next day after, he raised his campe and departed homewards towards the borders, comming to a place called Doterbozne, about twelue or fouretene miles from Newcastle, pitched downe his tents there, that his soldiers might take some rest, & refresh themselves after their great trauell, for they had not rested of all the day nor night before, nor to anie purpose, since their first entering into England.

In the meane time the English power was highlie increased at Newcastle, for a great number of the countrie came, and entered into the towne the same night that followed the day of the assault. Henrie Perie then perceiving his number sufficient to fight with Dowglas, set them in order of battell, & determined to issue forth upon the Scots, and to giue them an encounter: but when he understood that they were gone homewards, he followed them with all speed, for he would by no means that they should passe into Scotland without battell, trusting to recover the dishonour which he had sustained by losing his staffe at the barriers before the gate of Newcastle. Earle Dowglas aduertised that the enemies were comming to giue him battell, exhorted his people with few words to remember their wonted manhood, that by gaining the victorie, they might win euerlasting fame and honour, with safeguard to themselves and their countrie. The Perie likewise for his part, encouraged his men, willing them to fight manfullie in reuenge of their iniuries done to them and their friends by the Scots, and herewith commanding the trumpets to sound, he gaue the onfet fiercelie.

Here both the armies joining together, a right terrible encounter ensued: but because the night was at hand, before they began to ioine, through want of light to see what was to doe, they were seuered in sunder for that time; but remembering that the morrow would shoulde rise, they determined so sone as the began to giue light, to renew the battell againe. As sone therefore as the morrow began to appeare, they ioined againe with more malice than before. The Englishmen fought so egerlie, that putting the Scots backe, and causing them to giue ground, they had wonne the Scottish standards, and so by all likelihood got the vpper hand, had not Patrike Hepborne with his sonne, & such other of his companie as attended him, come to the rescue, by whome the fight was begun afresh. Here with also came the earle of Dowglas, and with a great mace in his hand laid such sore strokes round about him, that none came within his reach, but downe he went.

The said Dowglas the younger, hauing with him Robert & Simon Glendoure, was (all which notwithstanding) most grievously wounded, whom his friends (comming about to succor) found then cast vpon the ground, next vnto whome lay one named Hart most miserable wounded also. At what time a priest (which by faithfullie assisted this Dowglas in all distresse) did (now the bodie being faint and decayed) defend the same from other hurt of the aduersarie. Dowglas lieng in this estate, his neere friends (John Lindseie, John and Walter Seintclere) came vnto him, demanding how he did. To whome he frontlie answered (as one whome the presence of death nothing dismayed) that he was verie well; for said he, I doe not now die in my bed (by sluggish desinie) but in the field, as almost all my ancestors haue done. Wherefore, this shall be the last thing that I will require of you; first to keepe my death most secret, secondlie that you suffer not my standard to be throwne downe, and lastlie that you reuenge my death; the which if I may before hand by your promise hope to be performed, I shall with more patience indure all other things. Whereupon they first seuered his bodie that it should not be knowne; then they erected his standard, crieng (as the manner is) A Dowglas a Dowglas. At which voice, there was so great a concourse of people, & such a full assault vpon the enemy, that forthwith they drave them from the place of the battell. For at the verie

The English power increased.

Henrie Perie followed the Scots.

The Dowglas exhorted his men to fight manfullie.

The Perie with comfortabable words encouraged his men.

The onfet is giuen.

They were seuered by comming on of the night.

The battell is renewed.

Patrike Hepborne reueth the Scots at point to be overcome. The balaunce of the earle of Dowglas.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan.

This priest was William archdeacon of Aberdeen, as saith Io. Maior lib. 6. cap. 3. & Lellius lib. 7. pa. 263. calleth him William Loundie archdeacon of saint Andrews, kinsman to Dowglas.

This Dowglas was hurt in the shoulder in the lower part of his breast, and in the thigh with severall arrows, and had a deable blow on his head being encountered, Io. Maior. lib. 6. cap. 3.

William Dowglas honored for his high prowesse.

Thin.

Fr. Thin.

Cumberland invaded. Northumberland invaded.

With thousand of the choicest men with the earle of Dowglas. The assistance of the Englishmen at Newcastle.

1388.

Irishmen fetch prizes in Galloway. William Dowglas invaded Ireland with five hundred men, as John Fourdon saith. Carlingford besieged.

The craftie dealing of the townsmen.

The Irishmen assault the Scots in severall places.

The Irishmen put to flight.

Carlingford wonne by assault.

The fle of Man spoiled.

Englishmen burne in the Myres.

Two armies of Scottishmen assembled.

The earle of Dowglas and Henrie Perie run together. The Perie dismounted while his horse.

Downe the ground to Newcastle.

Froissard some varieth from the Scottish writers.

Dowglas incamped at Doterbozne.

name of Dowglas, not onelie the common people, but John earle of Murray (supposing that the same side was in distresse) prepared in all hast to succour them.]

The English men put to flight.

Rafe and Henrie Perrie taken prisoners.

Fr. Thin.

Other persons taken.

The number of prisoners taken.

Fr. Thin. There were slaine but five hundred Englishmen as Hector Boetius saith. The death of James earle of Dowglas.

See more of this matter in England.

Archemald Dowglas succeeded James the earle of Dowglas.

The first advancement of the Hepburns.

The earles of Bothwell.

1310.

12. kal. Aug.

1388.

Fr. Thin. Buchanan.

Finallie, the whole number of the Scottishmen bare themselves so manfullie, that the Englishmen being broken and put to flight, were slaine & bozne downe. The chase continued till the breake of the day with killing and taking, as in such cases is ever sene, though the more part in deed were taken with their liues saued after they once fell in the chase. Amongest other, Rafe Perrie and his brother Henrie, were taken by Keith, the marshall of Scotland, somewhat before the Englishmen began to turne. [But Lesleus. lib. 7. pa. 263. saith that Henrie Hotspur was taken by Montgomerie, who for his ransom did build the castle of Dounane, which his heirs to this day dwiney. There was also taken besides the two Perries, diuers other men of name, as Robert Ogill, Thomas Halberke, John Lilbozne, William Mauchlut, Robert Heron, the baron of Hilton, John Colwell, and Patrike Louell knights. There were taken in all of Englishmen, to the number of a thousand and fortie, and slaine what in the field and chase (as Froissard recounteth) about an eightene hundred. [But Buchan. saith, there were 1840 slaine, 1000 wounded, and 1004 taken.] But yet the Scottish writers themselves report a lesse number. Neither did this victorie chance to the Scots without great losse and slaughter. For amongst other, the earle of Dowglas himselfe was thise stricken through the bodie, and also wounded so mortallie on the head, that being bozne to his tent a litle before the end of the battell, he died of those hurts immediatlie after, to the great discomfort of all his armie, conceiuing more dolorous grieve for the losse of so worthie a chiefe, than for the gaine of a great victorie. His bodie was conueyed unto Helros, & buried beside his father earle William in the abbey church there. And because this earle James had no heires of his bodie begotten, his cosine Archemald Dowglas lord of Galloway succeeded him in the earldome. The house of the Hepburns (of the which this Patrike Hepburne that fought so valiantlie in this battell at Otterburne did descend) arose in Scotland after this wise.

It chanced in the daies of king David the thirde, there was an Englishman of that name taken prisoner in Scotland, who by chance being in place where the earle of March was got upon a young gelding vnbroken, the which plaieng the unrulie labe, in fetching and flinging aloft, put the earle in great danger of his life; and when all other that were present there gaue backe, and durst not step in to make anie shift to helpe the earle: this Englishman leapt to him, and boldlie catching hold on the bridle reine, held the horse fast, till the earle was safelie got beside him. In reward of which benefit, the said earle gaue unto this Hepburne certaine lands in Lowthian, whose posteritie increased afterwards in such power of lands and surname, that the same inioied not onelie the earldome of Bothwell, but was also diuided into sundrie branches, and manie knights thereof haue risen of right worthie fame and estimation. This battell of Otterburne was fought on saint Oswalds day, which is the first of August, in the yeare 1388.

Amongst those that fled to the battell, was Pathele Kedman gouernor of Berwik, whom James Lindseie (supposing by the beautie of his armor to be of the nobler sort) did behementlie follow by the space of thre miles. At the last, Kedman perceiving that he was not by flight able to escape (and deeming it better to hazard his life, than otherwise to be slaine without aduenture) alighted from his horse to fight with his enimie on foot, which Lindseie did accordingly; in the end after a long conflict betwene them, the Englishman (being as saith Buchanan inferior to the Scot in armor & weapon) did yeld himselfe to his aduersarie. By whom (after that he had giuen an oth to returne at a certaine day) he was permitted to go at libertie. Such in those daies was the humanitie amongst the bozners, and both nations towards their prisoners, which to this day doth continue betwene the inhabitants of those places. But if anie do not returne at the day appointed, this punishment is set upon him for a perpetuall disgrace. That in the assemblies of true daies (to demand restitution of things and injuries done by the one nation vnto the other) they vse that he which complaineth himselfe to be deceived by his prisoner (on his promise) doth carrie about a hand or gloue painted in a cloth vpon a long staffe or speare to be sene of all men; the which is accounted a singular infamie to the deserters thereof. For they which haue so broken their faith, be ever after hated of their friends and acquaintance; for which dishonestie, they will not afford them good report or intertainment. Lindseie hauing with this condition dismissed his prisoner (and perceiuing a great number of armed men) made directlie towards them, not knowing that they were his enimies, vntill he had ridden so neere vnto them, that he could not withdraw himselfe out of their danger. These men were the bands of the bishop of Durham, who when he came too late to Newcastell (to ioine with Perrie at the battell of Otterburne, because he supposed that the enimies would not ioine vntill the next day) commanded his armie to rest there, and to fall to their supper. Shortly after which, he took his iourne towards the Scots.

But (before he was anie great way marched out of the towne) vnderstanding (by those that fled from Otterburne battell towards Newcastell) that Perrie was ouerthrowne, and had lost the field, he returned with his friends to Newcastell, to consult what he should doe against the enimie. At which time it was declared, that the next day at the sunne rising, they should all be redie in armor to seeke the Scots. According wherevnto in the morning of the next day, the inhabitants bordering thereabouts were assembled, who (with these that the bishop had brought thither) were of all sorts gathered together, to the number of 10000 horsemen and footmen. These stirred the bishops mind; that (with all speed) he should lead them toward the Scots, and trie the successe of battell, for the Scots (saith they) wearied with the former daies fight, and most of them wounded, will not be able to abide the second battell. With which speeches they perswaded themselves of an easie conquest. Whereupon the bishop set forward with his armie, whose comming being vnderstood by the scouts of the Scots, the erle of Murray (whom now all men did follow after the death of Dowglas) called the present nobilitie together to consult what should be done with the prisoners, whom they could not in suffice now kill (hauing receiued them vpon ransome) but it would seme a most cruell part: and to rescue them (being their enimies), and almost an equal number to themselves: it was a thing most dangerous. Wherefore it was concluded, that the prisoners should sweare, that they would not stirre whilst the Scots and English were in fight; and further, that if the Scots were overcome, and they (being now their prisoners) rescued from them, that yet they should still remaine prisoners vnto them as before, and so returne to them at a certaine day. These things thus done, they left the prisoners in Lindseie had a halberd, and a sword with a buckler which he carried at his backe. lo. Ma. lib. 6. cap. 14. The disgrace of prisoners breaking promise.

lo. Ma. saith if they break promise, the picture of him is tied to a horse's tale and drawn about the borders of the countrey.

The bishop of Durham goeth towards the Scots, accompanied with Thomas Lindseie and Thomas Clifford.

The bishop of Durham goeth against the Scots.

John Maior saith, that some say they tied their prisoners fast with ropes, lib. 6.

The manner of the Scots was, that going to battell they carie a horse about their necks, and in the battell will encourage themselves to fight with that. lo. Ma. lib. 6. cap. 14. The picture of him is tied to a horse's tale and drawn about the borders of the countrey.

Can not be added to the list of the Scots.

The bishop of Durham goeth towards the Scots, accompanied with Thomas Lindseie and Thomas Clifford.

John Maior saith, that some say they tied their prisoners fast with ropes, lib. 6.

The bishop of Durham goeth against the Scots.

John Maior saith, that some say they tied their prisoners fast with ropes, lib. 6.

The bishop of Durham goeth against the Scots.

John Maior saith, that some say they tied their prisoners fast with ropes, lib. 6.

The bishop of Durham goeth against the Scots.

John Maior saith, that some say they tied their prisoners fast with ropes, lib. 6.

The bishop of Durham goeth against the Scots.

John Maior saith, that some say they tied their prisoners fast with ropes, lib. 6.

In the campe, with a small gard which should execute a present revenge vpon them, if they did at anie time sente to attempt anie thing.

After this the Scots (full of the victories latelie obtained) affresh descended into the battell, defended behind with the marches, and on the left and right side with the dead bodies of the former confidit: at what time it was also commended that euery one (as he did approach the enimie) should blote the honye he carried about his necke (hanging at his backe) as loud as he could, which sound being of it selfe terrible, was in the eecho (by reflection of the hills) so multiplied, that it forced the enimies to suppose the Scots to be of greater number than in truth they were: But before they entered into the battell (as saith Iohn Maior) George of Dunbar earle of Argyll encouraged his soldiers with these words. Whe haue this night (most noble Scots) sustained the chiefe heat and force of the battell, we haue overcome the youth and strength of Northumberland with their two princes: for which there is no cause to be proud (after such honor obtained against those valiant princes) should not feare this little priest. What there remaineth nothing now for vs, but that euery one of vs giue but two strokes, because the leade will die at the third, and all the stocke will follow, since the sheepe heard stroken, the sheepe will be disperced: But if they shall so long contend with vs, that (as God most rightlie forbid) we chance to be overcome, then shall we most shamefully lose the glorie which we before haue honorably gained by this night's trauell. But contrarie, if we be men, we must shew such valiant hearts (as the preservation of honor requirith) we shall easily reach this thirtie point, that it had bene farre more honor to him, had he to his, and then committeth to them all, that he had remanent at home, with robes to be worn by the victors, and diligent scholars, than with need to enter battell against greuous and bearded soldiers.

When he had spoken thus, the English nobles came to the place to witte with the aduersarie, the Scots began the battell with their honyes, whereupon the English hearing that terrible noise (vnaexpected to them in the middle of dead carcasses of their friends and kinsmen) late late (a spectacle to discourage most valiant hearts) and somewhat abashed at the fierceness of the Scots charging against them (which they looked not for after the last battell) the English (I say) considering these things, retired towards the place from whence they came, and suffered the Scots to returne without any other persecution against them. In the meane time, when Alexander Lindseie (taken as before, and as yet prisoner in Newcastell) chanced to be there and knowne by Redman (his yeolde prisoner) he was most courteouslie (after congratulation of amitie betwene them) suffered to depart from Newcastell to Scotland.

In the yere following, a parliament was holden at Perth, at the which demonstration was made by King Robert, that forsomuch as he was broken by great age, and might not through feebleness occasion thereof attend to his office in gouernement of the realme: it was necessarie that some gouernor should be chosen; wherefore he required that his second sonne Robert earle of Argyll might enjoy that office, considering his eldest sonne John earle of Carrike (by reason of a strike which he had receiued on the leg by an horse of Sir James Douglas of Walketh) was not able to trauell, but kept his bed, and might therefore way loth abroad: The lords consented to the kings request, and so the earle of Argyll was constituted gouernour of Scotland, by common consent of all the lords of the realme [before which time (as saith Buchanan) they were called wardens and not gouernors.] Also the earle marshall of England was sent by king Richard to the borders, to remaine there as warden in the place of Henrie Percy prisoner in Scotland. It is reported by the Scottish writers, that this earle should make stout brags, that he would fight with the Scots the next time he met with anie power of them, whether he were like in number to them or not. But when it came to passe that Robert Stewart the Scottish gouernor was entered into Northumberland with an armie, he withdrew into places of safegard, and suffered the most part of the countie to be harried and burned. In deed our English writers affirme, that the said earle, hauing with him but five hundred men of armes, was not able to accomplish anie notable exploit available against the great multitude of his enimies.

In the same yere was a truce taken betwixt England and France, the Scots (if they would so agree) being comprised therein. Whereupon there came ambassadors forth of England, to understand what the king of Scots would determine in that behalfe. By whom it was answered, that he would with god will stand to the same truce according as it was concluded. Whilist things passed thus in Scotland, Alexander Stewart earle of Buchquhane burnt the cathedrall church of Murray, the lanterne and ornament of all the north part of Scotland, vpon displeasure conceiued against the bishop of the same place. Whereat his father the king took such indignation, that when his sonne the said Alexander was brought to his presence, he commanded him to be committed vnto streit prison, wherein he remained till after his fathers decesse. The realme being in this manner brought to good tranquillitie, King Robert falling into great infirmittie and feebleness, by reason of extreme age, without any manner of ether accidentall sickness, decessed at his castell of Dundas, the 19 day of Aprill, in the yere after our redemption 1390, being as then aboue 75 yeres of age, and hauing reigned the space of 19 yeres, his bodie was buried at Scone before the high altar.

This Robert the second, though by reason of his great age, he went not forth into the wars himselfe, yet was there neuer prince afore him that had more happe successe by the conduct of his captains which he sent forth as lieutenants vnder him, for they neuer lightlie returned home but with victorie. He was a prince of such constancie in promise, that he seldom spake the words which he performed not. Such an obseruer he was also of iustice, that whensoever he remoued from anie place, he would cause proclamation to be made, that if anie of his men or officers had taken by anie thing unpaid for, the partie to whom the debt was due should come in, and immediatlie he should be satisfied. He willingly heard the complaints of the poore, and was no lesse diligent to see their wrongs redressed.

After the decesse of king Robert the second, his son John Stewart earle of Carrike was admitted to the crowne, which he receiued at Scone on the Assumption of our ladie. And forsomuch as John was thought to be an vnfortunate name for kings, they changed the same, and called him Robert after his father, being now the third of that name. But whether the same was so altered, either for the calamities which happened to the two Johns, the king of England and the king of France, or for the good successe of the two former Roberts (Wife and Stewart) had in the victories and gouernement of the realme: for their vertue in peace and warres: for their vniuersall happinesse in what they attempted:

Fr. Thin.
The earle marshall of England, warden of the marches.

The gouernor of Scotland invaded Northumberland.

A truce taken English ambassadors sent into Scotland. The king of Scots agreed to the truce.

The cathedrall church of Murray burnt.

The earle of Buchquhane imprisoned.

The decesse of king Robert the second.

2390.

His happe successe in warres.

The constancie of King Robert in word and promise.

His bright iustice.

His diligence to redresse poore mens wrongs.

Robert.
John Stewart earle of Carrike admitted to the crowne.

1390.
Fr. Thin.
Buchanan.

Lindseie had a halberd, and Redman a sword with a buckler which he carried at his backe. Io. Maior. lib. 6. cap. 14. The disgrace of prisoners breaking promise.

Io. Ma. saith if they break promise, the picture of him is tied to a horse's taile and drawn about the borders of the countie.

The bishop of Durham goeth towards the Scots, accompanied with Thomas Lindseie and Thomas Clifford.

The bishop of Durham goeth against the Scots.

John Maior writeth, that some say they tied these prisoners fast with ropes. lib. 6. c. 14.

The manner of the Scots was, that going to battell they carie a yoke about their neckes, with the battell encouragement themselves to fight with the English, which they do by making the noise of the English (as may be by many substantiall reasons apparent.)

John Ma. li. 14. c. 14.

John Ma. li. 14. c. 14.

John Ma. li. 14. c. 14.

John Ma. li. 14. c. 14.

John Ma. li. 14. c. 14.

John Ma. li. 14. c. 14.

I will leaue vncertefne, hauing no certefintie deli-uered thereof vnto me. This Robert the third rather lacked vices, than was beautified with anie extraor-dinarie vertues, for which cause he being king in name, his brother Robert was king in deed, as one vpon whome the whole gouernement did depend.
The king Robert did marrie Annabell (the daughter of John Drummond) whome he receiued into his bed, rather for hir singular beautie, than the honor of hir parents, or for anie benefit that might grow to the common wealth by hir or hir alliance. In the beginning of his reigne, a truce was taken betwene England and Scotland, for the space of three yeres, which thortlie after was proroged to the terme of four yeres.)

About the same time William Droglass of Mididale was chosen by the lords of Putzen, to be admerall of a nauie, containing two hundred and fortie ships, which they had rigged, and purposed to set forth against the miscreant people of the northeast parts. But being appealed by the lord Clifford an Englishman (who was there likewise to serue with the foresaid lords in that iourne) to fight with him in a singular combat: before the day came appointed for them to make triall of the battell, the lord Clifford lay in wait for the Dro-glass, and vpon the bidge of Danzke met with him, and there slue him, to the great disturbance and fay of the whole iourne. Moreover, thortlie after the coronation of king Robert the third, tidings came that Duncane [whom some call Daech Stewart] sonne to Alexander Stewart the kings brother as foze rehearsed, was entred into Angus with a great number of men, and slue Walter Ogilvie thirffe of the countrie, that came forth with a power to resist him from spoiling the people, whom he miserable afflicted; notwithstanding these his insolent doings were not long unpunished. For the earle of Crawford being sent against him with an armie, caused him to disperse his companie, and to flee his wates; but being apprehended with the most part of his said com-panie, they were punished according to their demerits.

At this time also the most part of the north coun-trie of Scotland, was soze disquieted by two clans of thole Irish Scots, called Katerans, which inhabit the hie-land countries, the one named Clankaites and the other Clanquhaffans. These two being at deadlie fude, robbed and waisted the countrie with continual slaughter and reise. At length it was accorded betwixt the parties, by the aduise of the earls of Murray and Crawford, that thirtie persons of the one clan, should fight before the king at Perth, against thirtie of the other clans men, with sharpe swords to the vnterance, without anie kind of armor or harnesse, in triall and decision of the quarell, for the which the variance betwixt them first arose. Both these clans right iofull of this appointment, came to Perth with their number, where, in a place called the North inch, a litle beside the towne, in presence of the king and other iudges assigned thereto, they fought according as it was agreed, and that with such rage and desperate furie, that all those of Clankaites part were slaine (one onelie excepted) who to saue his life, after he saw all his fellows slaine, leapt into the water of Tait, and swam ouer, and so escaped. There was 11 of Clanquhaffans side that escaped with life, but not one of them vntwounded and that verte foze. At their entering into the field or lists where they should fight the battell, one of the clans wanted one of his number, by reason that he which shuld haue supplid it, was priuile stolen awaie, not willing to be partaker of so deare a bargaine. But there was a countrie-felow among the beholders, who being soze that so notable a fight should be passed ouer, offered himselfe for a small summe of monie to fill vp the number, though the matter appertained nothing to him, nor to anie of his friends. This man (as saith Buchanan) seemed to be a saddle-maker, who for halfe a French crowne, and his diet during his life (if he were victor) took the matter in hand, in which none behaued himselfe more valiantlie than he, on whose part the said eleven did suruiue, himselfe making vp the number. This battell was fought thus betwene the two clans, in maner as is before remembred, in the yere 1396.

In the third, or (as saith Buchanan) the second yere after, a parlement was holden at Perth, wher-in, besides diuerse constitutions and ordinances enacted for the advancement of the common-wealth, the king made his eldest sonne named David (that was then about eightene yeres of age) duke of Rothesay, and his brother Robert (that was earle of Fife and gouernor of the realme, as before ye haue heard) he created duke of Albanie. These were the first dukes that had bene heard of in Scotland, for till those daies there was neuer anie within the realme that bare that title of honoz. [Which virgin title (saith Buchanan of that honoz) gaue neuer god successe to the maisters]. During the time that the peace continued betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, there were sundrie iustes and combats put in vze, and exercised betwixt Scots and Englishmen, for proufe of their valiant aduie in feats of armes, to win thereby fame and honoz. But amongst the residue, that was most notable, which chanced betwixt David earle of Crawford Scottish, and the lord Welles English.

It was agreed betwixt these two noble men, to run certaine courses on horsebacke, with speares sharpe ground for life and death. The place appointed for these iusts was London bidge, and the day the third, and twentieth of April, being the feast of saint George. At the place & day thus prefixed, they came redie to furnish their enterprise, and being mounted on their mightie courfers, they ran together right egerlie. At the first course, though they attained, yet kept they their saddles without anie perill of falling. The people beholding how stiffelie earle Da-uid sat without moving, cried that the Scottishman was locked in his saddle. He hearing this, leapt beside his horse, and verie nimble mounted vp againe into the saddle, as he was, to the great wonder of the beholders. This done, he took another course, & so together they ran againe right fierce the second time; and yet without anie great hurt on either part: but the third time, the lord Welles was borne out of the saddle, and soze hurt with the griuous fall.

And for bicause the earle of Crawford thus vanquished his aduersarie on saint Georges day, he founded a chanterie of seven priests to sing in our ladies church of Dundee, in memorie of S. George, which they did vnto our time, not without singular commendation of the said earle. After this, he remained thre moneths in England, in sporting and feasting amongst the nobles, before he returned into Scotland, highlie praised of all estates for his noble port and great liberalitie there shewed amongst them. Not long after, one sir Robert Douglas an Englishman, came into Scotland to trie his manhod in singular battell, with whome neuer would come against him: he vanquished one Archibald Comounston, and Hugh Wallace: but at length he was overcome by one Hugh Traill at Berwick, and died thortlie after vpon displeasure thereof conceiued.

In the same yere, Richard king of England, married

John Ma. lib. 6.
cap. 6.

Buchanan.

William Dow-
glas of Mid-dale chosen admerall by the lords of Putzen.

He is slaine
by the lord
Clifford.
Duncan Steward inua-
deth Angus.

Fr. Thin.

The north
parts of Scotland soze disquieted by two clans.

With Scots
called Kate-
rans.
A battell of thirtie against thirtie.

A desperate
fight.

Fr. Thin.

1396.

1398.

The first dukes that were created in Scotland.

Fr. Thin.

Justes and combats betwixt Scots
and English-
men.

1400.

The occasion of the falling out betwixt
king Robert and the earle
of March.

The earle of Crawford of Scotland, &
the lord Welles of England
iusted for life and death.

The earle of March sliech
in England.

The lord
Welles borne out of his saddle.

The costell
of Dunbar knew to the kings wife.

Fr. Thin.

Daile of the erie of Crawford.
Sir Robert
Douglas.

King Robert
sliech vnto
the earle of March.

married Isabell daughter to the French king, and some after went into Ireland, to subdue such Irish rebels, as troubled the quiet state of the countrie. But in the meane time, his lords at home rebelled against him, and determined to depose him from the crowne, so that upon his returne into England, he was apprehended, put in ward, and shortly after constrained to renounce all his right to the crowne, and adiudged therewith to perpetuall prison: yet at length (as the Scottish chronicle telleth) he got forth of prison disguised in womans apparell, and came into Galloway, where he fell in service with a Scottish man named Mahdonald. But at the last, being betrayed and knowen that he was so, and thereupon brought to king Robert, he was right honorable by him interteined: neuertheless, knowing himselfe deposed from his roiall estate, he gave himselfe wholly to contemplation, till finally he departed this world at Sterling, and was buried in the blacke friers there within the same towne, as the same Scottish chronicles butrultie doe report. But to the matter, Henrie the sonne of John of Gaunt, sometime duke of Lancaster, after that king Richard was deposed, was crowned king of England at Westminster, the thirtenth day of October, in the yere 1399.

In the yere next insuing, that is to say, 1400, king Robert, in consideration of a summe of monie to him aforehand paid, contracted covenants of marriage to be had and made betwixt his sonne the duke of Rothsaie, and the earle of Marches daughter. But Archembal earle of Dowglas, hauing indignation that the earle of March should be preferred before him, by support of the duke of Albanie, procured a counsell to be called, in the which he found meanes to assure his daughter the ladie Margerie, or Marie (as saith Buchanan) vnto the said duke of Rothsaie, & with all speed went about to consummate the marriage betwixt them, to put the matter out of all doubt. The earle of March perceiuing this dealing, came to the king, and required to know his pleasure, if he minded to performe the covenants concluded, concerning the marriage betwixt the prince and his daughter, or not; making as it were a great complaint of that which was already done to the breach thereof; and receiuing answer nothing agreeable to his mind, he departed in a great fume, not sticking to say, he would be reuenged on such vnturth per it were long. Shortly after he fled into England, leauing his castell of Dunbar well stocked of all things necessarie for defense, in the keeping of his sisters sonne named Robert Hailand. But when Archembal Dowglas came thither in the kings name, and required to haue the castell rendered into his hands, this Robert Hailand obeyed the kings commandement, and deliuered the house to the said Dowglas.

George earle of March informed hereof, procured all his friends to conueie themselves into England, and determined with himselfe to doe all the displeasure and mischief he might inuent against his owne native countrie. King Robert fore dreeding, least by this earles procurement some trouble might hap to follow amongst his subiects [did first confiscating his goods] send an herald at armes into England with letters vnto him, promising by the tenure of the same, not onelie to pardon him of all offenses committed, but also to redresse all wrongs or injuries which he had any waies forth receiued, if he would returne into Scotland. And forsomuch as the earle of March refused this offer, the same herald according to instructions given him at his departure from king Robert, went immediatlie to Henrie king of England with other letters, earnestlie desirring him to cause the earle of March to depart out of his realme, & not to receiue any rebels out of Scotland into his bounds, whereby the peace might be vniolated, which as yet remained betwixt the two kingdoms.

King Henrie upon reasonable allegations (as he pretended) refused to satisfie king Roberts petitions in this behalfe, by reason whereof the peace brake betwixt them and their subiects, without any further tracting of time. For shortly after, Henrie Perrie, surnamed (as is said) Henrie Hotspur, and the earle of March entered into Scotland, and got together a great bottie of goods and cattell in Louthian about Haddington, at that time they did in vaine besiege the castell of Hais or Hais, who being at Lintone were come upon by the Scots, for (to haue returne of the booties taken) Archembal earle of Dowglas, hauing assembled a powter of men, came with the same towards the enemies, immediatlie whereupon they fled to Berwikke, and left all their bootie behind them, which being recovered by the said earle of Dowglas and his compaignie, he returned backe vnto Edinburgh, where he shortly after being taken with an hot feuer, departed out of this life, leauing behind him an honorable memorie of his name, for his high prowesse and noble ballancie shewed in manie and sundrie enterprises, by him luckilie achieved for the wealth of his countrie. He was named of his terrible countenance and dreadfull loke, The grim Dowglas.

After his deceasse, his second sonne that was called likewise Archembal, was made earle of Dowglas; for his eldest sonne William Dowglas died in the yere before his father. Shortly after, Henrie king of England came into Scotland with an armie, without doing any great damage to the people; for he required no more of them that kept any castles or strengths, but onelie to put forth a banner of his armes as he passed by. At his comming to Haddington, he was lodged in the nurrie there, & shewed much bounteous humantie toward the nuns, and all other of that house, not suffering any manner of thing to be done preiudiciall to the same. The like gentleness he shewed towards them of the Holie rood house, at his comming to Edinburgh, wherein he likewise lodged. It is thought, that in memorie of the friendlie interteinement, which his father the duke of Lancaster found in these abbeies, at the time of his being in Scotland, when the rebellion chanced in England, through Iacke Straw and his complices, he shewed such fauour towards them at this present. To be brieue, it should appere, that king Henrie came into Scotland, as it were enforced, more thorough counsell of his nobles, than for any hatred he bare towards the Scots, as he well shewed in returning backe againe, without doing them any further iniurie.

In the yere after, or thereabout, died Walter Traillie bishop of Saint Andrewes, and the Scottish quene Annabell Drommond, after whose deceasse hir sonne Dauid the duke of Rothsaie, that vnder hir government had bene well and vertuouslie brought vp, hauing now got once the reine at libertie, fell to all kind of insolent outrage, seeking to defile wiues, virgins, nuns, and all other kind of women, in all places where he came. At length, his father perceiuing his sonnes poyntfull nature to rage after that manner in vnbideled lust, beyond the bounds of all measure, to the great reproch of them both, wrote to his brother the duke of Albanie, requirring him to take his sonne, the said duke of Rothsaie into his custody, and to see him so chastised for his wanton behaviour, as he might learne to amend the same. & Here is to be noted, that the duke of Albanie had of long sent letters also vnto the king of England.

Henrie Hotspur and the earle of March enter into Scotland. Fr. Thyn.

The deceasse of Archembal earle of Dowglas.

Henrie king of England invadeth Scotland.

Fr. Thyn. The death of quene Annabell.

The insolent outrage of the duke of Rothsaie.

W. b. f. time

time before, desired to see the duke of Rothsaie dispatched out of the way, as the person whome he most doubted; & therefore having commission thus from the king to take him, he reioised not a little, trusting thereby to compass his purpose without danger. And hereupon taking the duke of Rothsaie betwixt Dundee & saint Andrewes, he brought him to Falseland, where he shut him vp in streit prison, and kept him without all manner of meat or drinke, so to famish him to death.

The duke of Rothsaie committed to prison.

It is said, that a woman understanding the duke of Albanies intention, and taking ruth of the others pitifull case, found meanes to let meale fall downe thorough a rift of the loft of that tower wherein he was inclosed, by meanes whereof his life was certaine daies sustained; but after this was once knowne, incontinentlie was the woman made awaie. In the same manner, an other woman through a long reed fed him with milke of hir owne breasts, and was likewise dispatched as sone as hir doings were perceived. Then after this, the duke destitute of all worldlie sustenance, thorough verie famine was constrained to eat not onelie all such filth as he could find within the tower, but also in the end he gnawed off his owne fingers, and so finally in this miserable state of martyrdome (as I may call it) ended his wretched life, and was buried in Lundoris, where (as the same went) manie faire miracles were done nere to his graue, till time that James the first began to punish the murderers, for since that time such miracles ceased.

The duke of Rothsaie famished to death.

Miracles.

The displeasures done by George earle of March. The earle of Dowglas gouernour of Louthian.

Thomas Haliburton.

Patricke Hepborne slaine at Peshet.

About the same time, George earle of March did manie displeasures to the Scots, making sundrie rodes into their countrie, greatlie to his profit. The earle of Dowglas that had the gouernement of Louthian in those daies, toke order, that certeine captains of that countrie should euerie one of them for his turne, with a competent number for the time, make a rode into England, to reuenge such displeasures. The first that went, was Thomas Haliburton of Dirlington, who returned in safetie with a great preie taken of Englishmens goods. Next vnto him was Patricke Hepborne of the Valis the younger, appointed to go forth as capteine generall with a certeine number, who entering into England, got a great botie together; but the Englishmen following thereupon to recout it, incountered with him at Peshet in the Pers, and there not onelie slue him, but also distressed his people. Besides them that were slaine with their capteine, there were also manie that were taken, as John and William Cockborne, Robert Latwder of the Bas, John and Thomas Hallburton, with manie other. Almost all the floure of Louthian (as Iohn Maior writteth) perished in this battell, which was fought the 22 of June, in the yere 1402.

1402. Archembald Dowglas inuadeth England.

The nobles of Scotland in this armie.

Henrie Hotspur and the earle of March assaile the Scots at Homildon.

Archembald earle of Dowglas seze displeased, and wonderfullie wroth in his mind for this overthrow, got commission to inuade England with an armie of ten thousand men, and hauing the same once readie with all things necessarie for his voiage, he set forward, and entering into England, burnt and harried the countrie, not stateng till he came as farre as Newcastell. In this armie there was with the Dowglas, Purdoche eldest sonne to duke Robert earle of Fife, Thomas erle of Murray, George earle of Angus, with manie other lords and nobles of Scotland. At the last, when they were returning homewards with a preie of infinit goods and riches, Henrie Hotspur, and George earle of March, with a great power of men met them, and assailed them so with such incessant shot of arrowes, that where the earle of Dowglas with his armie had the aduantage of an hill, called Homildon, he was constrained to forake the same; and comming downe vpon the Englishmen, was neuertheless put to the sword, the most part of his people being either taken or slaine. It is said, that after the Scots were once put to flight, they gathered againe, and renewed the battell by the exhortation of Adham Gordon, & sir John Swinton, but that did little auaille them, for they were still beaten downe and slaine. Among other of those that were slaine, were the same sir John Swinton, and Adham Gordon; also John Leuiston of Balender, Alexander Ramsaie of Dalhousie, with sundrie other gentlemen & nobles of Scotland.

10

Archembald earle of Dowglas, Purdoche Steward eldest sonne to duke Robert the gouernour, George erle of Angus, Robert Erskin of Caloway, the lord Sawilton, James Dowglas master of Dalkeith, and his two brethren John and William, with the most part of all the barons of Fife and Louthian, were taken prisoners. This battell was fought on the Wood day in haruest, in the yere 1403, vpon a Tuesday. Henrie Perrie verie proud of this victorie, came with the earle of March vnto the castell of Cockclaus in Teuidale, and laied siege to the same, but John Greinelow capteine thereof defended it so manfullie, that they got no great aduantage; yet at length he fell to this composition with them, that if he had no rescue within the space of thre moneths (or as Buchanan saith) fiftie daies, the castell should be then rendered into their hands.

30

When the gouernour of Scotland was informed what agreement the capteine of Cockclaus had made, he assembled the lords in counsell to haue their aduise for the leauing of an armie against the time appointed. There were manie of this opinion, that it was better to lose the castell, than to leaopard the lines of so manie men as were necessarie to furnish that enterprise for the sauing of it. But the gouernour shewed, that he woted the losse of it so much, that if none of the nobles would passe with him to the rescue thereof, yet he would go himselfe to do what in him might lie to saue it. But in the meane time, such trouble rose in England, that there needed no power to be leaued for the defense of Cockclaus. For by a conspiracie practised against king Henrie, certeine of the English nobilitie were alied together to haue destroyed him; but amongst the residue, the Perries were as chiefe.

40

They fought together at Shrewesburie a verie bloudie battell, where the king got the victorie, and slue the lord Perrie, surnamed (as before ye haue heard) Henrie Hotspur. At this battell was also the earle of Dowglas, with a great companie of Scottishmen on the Perries side, for being taken prisoner at the battell of Homildon (as before is said) it was accorded betwixt him and the said Henrie Hotspur, that aiding him & other his complices against king Henrie, if it chanced the said king Henrie to be vanquished and put from the crowne, according to their intent and purpose, then should the said earle Dowglas be released of his ransom, and haue the towne of Berwike rendered vnto him in rewarde of his aid and assistance. He fought (as is reported) with singular manhod, and had the fore ward on the Perries side. He slue that day with his owne hands, thre gentlemen arraied in the kings cote armour; and finally when the battell was lost, he was taken in the chase, and saued aloue, where not one more of all his retinue of Scots escaped with life, but were all slaine out of hand. Neither was this victorie gotten by king Henrie, without great slaughter of those that were on his part, for he lost foure verie valiant knights, as Staluart, Blunt, Spasse, and Pottoke, with seuen hundred other soldiers and men of war (as

60

The Scots thought of the English influence in the battle.

The Scots are put to the sword.

Adham Gordon.

John Leuiston.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

John Greinelow.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

The earle of Douglas in prison.

(as the Scottish writers haue) but the English authors name a farre greater number, as firste hundred at the least.

King Henrie (as the same Scottish writers doe record) vsed the counsell & aduise of the earle of March, in the obtaining of this victorie, being fled latelie before from the rebels side to him. The earle of Douglas, in respect of his noble parentage and high valiance, was verie tenderlie cherished by king Henrie, who for that he had sene him do so valiantlie in the day of that battell, reputed him worthe of all honours. The earle of Douglas yet was verie infortunate in most of his enterprises, so farre forth, that he neuer wan battell wherein he chanced to be, and was therefore named Archembald Tinneman; though there were no default to be found at anie time in his owne person, for he euer fought with great manhood. At the battell of Homildon he lost one of his eyes, and at this battell of Shrewesburie he lost one of his shoulers. The old earle of Northumberland, hearing that euill successe his sonne and other his kinsmen had found in their rebellious enterprise at Shrewesburie, with one of his nephues (that was his sonnes sonne) and other of his friends and kinsmen, withdrew into Scotland, where he was receiued by Henrie Marlowe bishop of saint Andrews, and lodged with him at his ease and in good surterie within his castell of saint Andrews aforesaid.

About the same time, king Robert was aduertised, that his sonne the duke of Rothsaie was pined to death in Falkland (in manner as before is expressed) which newes were so greuous vnto him, that he grew each day more and more in sorow and melancholie. The duke of Albanie kept it so long as was possible from the kings knowledge, and being now sent for by the king to answer him for such treasonable slaughter of his sonne, he came, and so excused the matter with a faire painted tale, as though he had bene nothing guiltie in the cause, and for further declaration of his innocencie, he promised, if it might please the king to come vnto Edinburgh he would bring in the offenders which were culpable of the murder. The king as then remaining in Wate (where for the most part he euer sojourned) though he were not well able to trauell by reason of long sickness, yet in a chariot he came vnto Edinburgh, vpon the earnest desire he had to see his sons death punished. And at his coming thither, the duke of Albanie deliuered vnto him certaine naughtie persons, & such in deed, as for their heinous acts and vngenerous conditions deserved well to die (though not for this matter) which neuertheless by vntreue suggestions and forged acculements, being brought before corrupt iudges (and such as the duke of Albanie had provided for his purpose) were condemned as guiltie of his death, whome in all their life time they neuer saw.

Though this matter was handled as finclie as was possible, and made so sound and cleare as could be deuised, yet was not the king so satisfied in his mind, but that he had a great suspicion in the duke of Albanie as author of his sonnes death: but for so much as the duke had all the realme vnder his obediens, partlie by policie, and partlie by authoritie of his office, being gouernor thereof, the king durst not attempt anie thing against him, but rather doubted, lest he having an ambitious desire to the crowne, would compasse also to haue the life of his second sonne (named James) as then prince of Scotland; and therefore by the faithfull helpe & good aduise of Walter Marlowe the bishop of saint Andrews, he provided a ship, and sent the said prince forth in the same to passe into France to King Charles the first, deliuering him also a letter written and directed vnto the king of England in his fauour, if he chanced at vntwares by anie fortune to fall into the Englishmens hands.

Henrie lord Sinclair, the second earle of Orkney, was appointed to haue the conueie of him, who hauing all his puruesance ready, took the ship that was appointed for them at the Balke, where it laie at anchor, and losing from thence, they sailed forward till they came to Flamburgh head; where (as some say) they were taken on the sea by Englishmen, the which hearing how the prince of Scotland should passe that waies, laie in wait for him. Others write, that his desire was to be set on land there, because he might not awaie with the aire of the sea, being brought far out of quiet in his head & stomach therewith. But how soeuer it was, the truth is, taken he was in the ninth yeare of his age, the 33 day of March, in the yeare of our incarnation 1406, and was kept in captiuitie of the Englishmen by the space of eightene yeares. At his coming to the presence of king Henrie, he deliuered to him the letter directed from his father king Robert, the tenor whereof here insueth, as in the Scottish tongue they be written.

James prince of Scotland taken by the Englishmen. H.B. 1404.

The tenor of the said letter as it is written in the Scottish tongue.

Robert king of Scots to Henrie king of England greeting. Thy great magnificence, humilitie, and iustice, are right patent to vs, by gouernance of thy last armie in Scotland; howbeit like things had bene vncertaine to vs afore. For though thou seemed as enemy with most awfull incursions in our realme: sit we found mair humanities and plaisures than damage (by thy cunning) to our subdittes. Speciallie to yame that receiuit thy noble fader the duke of Longcastell the tyme of his exill in Scotland. We may not ceis yairfore, while we are on life, but aye luf and loif thee as mair noble and worthe prince, to ioy thy realme. For yoch realmes and nations contend among themselue for conquests of glorie & launds, sit na occasion is among vs to invade athir realmes or lieges with iniuries, bot erat to contend among our selfe, quhay sall persue othir with mair humanitie and kindnesse. As to vs we will meis all occasion of battell, quare any occures at thy pleasure. Forther, bycause we haue na lesse sollicitude in preferuing our children fra certaine deidlie enemies, than had sometime thy noble fader, we are constrained to seeke support at vncouth princes hands. Howbeit, the inuasion of enemies is sa great, that small defense occures against yame without they be preserved by amitie of nobill men. For the world is sa full of peruersit malice, that na crueltie nor offense may be deuist in erd, bot the samme may be brought be motion of gold or siluer. Heirfore, because we know thy hyelle full of monie, noble vertues, with like puissance and riches, that na prince in our daies may be compared thairto: we desire thy

B. b.

huma-

humanitie and support at this time.

We traist it is not vnknowne to thy maiestie, how our eldest sonne David is flaine miserablie in prison be our brothir the duke of Albanie, quhome we chest to be gouernour (quan we were fallen in decrepit age) to our subdittes and realme, besekand thy hienes thairfoze to be so fauorable, that this bearer James our second and allanerlie sonne may haue targe to liefe vnder thy faith, and iustice, to be some memorie of our posteritie, knaweund the vnstable condition of mans life so dainlie altered: now flourishand, and suddenly falling to vtter consumption. For thir beliefe well, quhan kings and princes hes na other beild bot in thair aboin folks, thair empire is caduke and fragill. For the mind of common people, ar eur flowand and maie inconstant than wind. Zit quen princes ar roborat be amitie of othir vncowth kings thair brethir and nighbours, na aduersitie may occurre to elect thaim fra thair dignitie rall. Forthir gif thy hienes thinke nocht expedient (as God forbeid) to obtemper to thir ovr desires. Zit we request aue thing quhilk was ratiffit in our last trewes and condition of peace, that the supplication made be ony of the two kings of Ingland and Scotland fall staund in manner of sauveconduct to the bearer. And thus we desire to be obseruat to this our allanerlie sonne, and the gracious God conserue the maist noble pynce.

After that king Henrie had caused these letters to be opened and read, he aduised himselfe thereon with great deliberation; but in the end, he determined to state this James pynce of Scotland as his latofull prisoner, for that he was thus taken in time of warres, and that mozeouer, there were diuers rebels of England succored within the bounds of his fathers dominion, to the high displeasure of the said king Henrie. But such was the fauour shewed in his bringing vp, that his captiuitie turned moze to his honor, profit, and commoditie, than anie other wo:zblie hap that might by anie means haue otherwise chanced vnto him. He had such perfect instructo:z to teach him, as well the vnderstanding of tonges as the sciences, that he became right expert and cunning in euerie of them. He was taught also to ride, to run at the tilt, and handle all kind of weapons conuenientlie to be used of such a personage, where vnto he was so apt and readie, that few in anie point of actiuitie might ouermatch him. He had good knowledge in musike, and could plaie on sundrie instruments right perfectlie. To be brieue, it appeared in all his behaviour and maners, in what companie so euer he came, that his bringing vp had bene according to his nature, neither of them differing from his birth, and the qualitie of a noble and most vertuous pynce.

After it was signified vnto his father king Robert, as he sat at supper, that his sonne was thus arrested in England, he made full great and dolorous mone, soze lamenting that euer he matched himselfe in marriage with a woman of so meane degree (to the disparagement of his blood) as was queene Annabell, on whome he begat his sonnes, which (as he toke it) was the onelie cause why as well foraine pynces as his owne subjects had him thus in contempt. He toke this matter so sore to hart, that with in three daies after the newes came vnto him, he departed this world through force of sicknesse, not increased by melancholic, which had bered him a long time before. He died at Rothsaie in the sixteenth yere of his reigne complet, and from the incarnation 1408. His bodie was buried at Ballete, with his wife queene Annabell before rehearsed. He was a man of a mightie stature, verie liberall and gentle, so that if he had not bene maimed with a horse, and thereby grew lame, that he might trauell about the affaires of the realme himselfe, it was thought the common-wealth should haue prospered vnder his gouernement, as much as euer it did vnder anie of his predecesso:z.

The gouernor Robert duke of Albanie, after the deceasse of his brother king Robert, was by newelection chosen, or rather confirmed in his office of gouernor, which he exercised moze by rightlie, & with better iustice now after his brothers death, than before. For (as sayth Buchanan) take away from him, that he was ouermuch blinded with desire to gouerne (wherevnto he cared not by anie means to aspire) there were in him manie other good parts wo:zthie to haue such gouernement: for he was valiant in battell, wise in counsell, he did decide matters of controuersie with great equitie, he was the nobilitie with his liberalitie, and did not sucke the commons dyte by exactions. In the meane time, the castell of Jedworth (which the Englishmen had held euer since the battell of Durham) was taken by the Scotsmen, and raced downe to the earth. Archibald earle of Dowglaste, as yet remaining captiue in England, after he had knowledge of king Roberts death, made shift to agree for his ransome, and so being set at libertie, returned with all speed now at length into Scotland.

Shortlie after, there was a counsell called, where in was a motion made for the restoring of George earle of March to his countrie, lands, and blood. After long debating of the matter, and hard hold to and fro both with him and against him, it was in the end concluded, that he should returne into Scotland, and be receiued as a true Scottishman; but vnder this condition, that he should forgo his lands of Arnerdale, and Lochmaben, which should for euer remaine to the Dowglaste, and to his heires. All his other lands and possessions, it was accorded, that he should inioy as in his former right & estate. And thus was the earle of March pardoned of all passed offences committed against the crowne of Scotland, and returned home, to the great comfort of his friends. Perlie that before was fled into Scotland to the erle of March his old friend, was courteously receiued, interteined, & nourished according to his estate, by the said earle of March: during which time, he solicited his friends in England to find means for returne into his countrie. And amongst other of his friends, with whom he dealt by secret messengers; he directed letters concerning the same, to an old (and as he deemed a most faithfull) friend of his, called Rafe Roksbie, declaring vnto him that he should not want friends, both Scottish & English (though whose helpe he did not despaire to recouer his patri monie) if he might haue his aid also therein, for this Rafe was thiriffe of Wokshire. This man, after he had intised Perlie (vnder the assurance of false hope and trust in him) to come into England, he opened the conspiracie to the king, and secretlie laid wait to intercept the said earle, by which meanes, (getting him into his possession) he cut off his head, and sent it to the king to London. At which time also, there was an Englishman in Scotland, which called himselfe Richard the second: but falslie (as I suppose

The death of king Robert the third.

1406, Buch. 1408.

His buriall.

His stature and qualitie.

The duke of Albanie confirmed gouernor of the realme.

Fr. Thin.

Donald substituted Roffe.

Fr. Thin. Lelles lib. 7. cap. 268.

Jedworth: castell taken.

The earle of Dowglaste released and returned into Scotland.

The earldome of Roffe transferred from the line of Walter Roffe to the Stewards.

The earle of March released home.

Fr. Thin.

Buchanan. 1409.

The earle of Mar.

The battell of Barlow.

Doubtfull booke.

The number same.

James the pynce of Scotland staid as prisoner in England. His bring- ing vp.

An happy captiuitie. His instructo:z in the tonges.

His training in warlike exercises.

His knowledge in musike.

The griefe of his father king Robert.

suppose, saith Buchanan; for when the elder Perrie did often and importunatlie require to talke with him, he could neuer be perswaded by anie mens words to come, or enter speech to, or with the said earle of Northumberland, fearing (belike) least his deceit would be understood by him, which knew his owne and true king verie well. This counterfeitt king yet boasting him to be of the princelie blood, was honozed accordingly; after certeine yeares, and at length (feining himselfe to be far from all desire of gouernement, to the end he might make his effect the more safelie) he died and was buried in the church of the frier Dominicks in Sterling, with a title of the king of England grauen vpon him.)

About the same time, there rose great trouble in Scotland, by the rebellion of Donald of the Isles, who claiming by right of his wife, a title to the earldome of Ross, was defeated of the same, by the practise of the gouernoz, hauing by subtil conuenance, assured the said earldome vnto his second son the earle of Buchquhane named John. The foresaid Donald, by way of supplication, besought the gouernoz to doe him reason; but he receiued nought, except it were froward speech, wherewith he took such displeasure, that raising all the power of the Isles he came into Ross, and subdued the same at his pleasure. * The which to make the matter more plaine, and to deduce his title out of Lesleus (which he forgetteth not to report for the honoz of his owne house) I will set the same downe in this manner. Walter Lesle a noble man, after singular prowesse shewed by him (in externall battell) vnder the Romans, returned with honoz into Scotland, where he married the daughter of William earle of Ross, (slaine at the battell of Haldon) and with hir obtained the earldome of that province, of which wife he raised one sonne called Alexander, after earle of Ross; and one daughter giuen in mariage to Donald of the Isles. This Alexander joined himselfe in mariage with Eufemie the daughter of Robert the gouernoz, and had by hir one onelie daughter and heire christened after the name of hir mother, who (after the death of hir father, being yet a tender maid and vnpractised in the course of things) was partlie by the flatteries, and partlie by the threats of the gouernoz, induced to glue the earldome of Ross vnto him, by whose helpe, as it was reported, she shortly after died. Whereupon, Donald that had to wife the sister of Alexander Lesle (aunt to this Eufemie which sold hir inheritance) demanding the earldome of Ross by right of inheritance (as is said) by his wife, entered Ross, and brought it to his subiection. But not being satisfied with this, he passed through Durey, Boghtuall, and other bounds thereabouts, till he came vnto Garioch, purposing to burne Aberdeen.

But Alexander Steward earle of Mar, hauing gathered a power with all diligence to resist this Donald, met with him at a village called Harlow, & incontinentlie not staing for more aid that was coming towards him, set on the enemies more rashlie than orderlie, and more fiercelie than discretlie, not passing for keeping anie accustomed array of battell, as had bene requisit. By reason whereof, great slaughter was made on either part, the victorie in the end being so doubtfull, that both parts were faine to withdraw out of the field, and flee to the next mounteins, as glad to be seuered the one from the other. There was slaine on Donalds part nine hundred men, with Makelane, and Makinhos. On the earle of Marres side, there died Alexander Ogilvie thiriffe of Angus, with seven knights of name, and diuers other gentlemen, with commons, to the number of six hundred. This battell was striken on saint James euen, in the yeare 1411. Donald of the Isles, after this bickering wholie granted the victorie to his enemies, in fleeing all the night long after the battell towards Kofse, and from thence with like speed he passed ouer into the Isles.

In the yeere next following, the gouernoz prepared to make a iourne into the Isles, to chastise the foresaid Donald; but he through feare of further damage, submitted himselfe, and was sworne neuer to procure anie trouble to the realme in time to come. Not long after the battell of Harlow, Patrike Dunbar, second sonne to the earle of March, with one hundred of hardie persons, came earlie one morning somewhat before the breake of the day to Fast castle, and wan the same, taking the captiue prisoner, whose name was Thomas Haldon. At the same time was the bridge of Roxburgh broken downe, and the towne burnt by William Dowglas of Dumlamerik, Gawan Dunbar another of the erle of Marches sonnes, and diuerse others. In the same yeere (or rather in the yeere before) the vniuersitie of saint Andrews was first founded, which afterwards was furnished with diuerse notable learned men brought in and placed there by James the first, to the end that by their instructions his people might increase in learning, to the further aduancement of vertue, laudable maners, and all sorts of ciuill customs. Amongest sundrie other expert men in all sciences which he brought into Scotland, there were 18 doctors of diuinitie, & 8 doctors of the canon law.

* From this time by the space of ten yeeres (saith Buchanan) there was almost nothing done worthe of memorie, betwene the Scots and the English, either because the truce occasioned it (which yet I find not mentioned of anie man) either for that Henrie the fourth, king of England, being dead, and his sonne Henrie the fifth reigning in his place, and being all the time of his gouernement busied in the warres of France, the English ceased to offer iniuries to the Scots: or for that the gouernoz of the Scots durst not moue anie thing against the English, fearing least the k. of England would then retorne home the right and true heire of Scotland, who (he was most assured should find fauour against him) in the hearts of his owne people, that would tenderlie pitie the misfortune of his imprisonment, and seeke to establish him in the kingdome. Wherefore if there were anie thing done in that meane time, they were but some few and small excursions within the realme, which more aptlie might be called robberies & spoiles, than anie right wars. For as Pennure in England was burned by Archibald Dowglas, so to (answer the same) Dunfermeil in Scotland was in the like order destroyed by the English. Besides which there was a certeine exchange of prisoners of the one nation with the other: for Morbac the sonne of the gouernoz (taken at Haldon) was returned into Scotland, and Perrie (who was brought out of England by his grandfather into Scotland, and left vnder the protection of the gouernoz) was deliuered to the English, and after by the new king of England was restored to the title & lands of his ancestors earles of Northumberland. This man (though by the vniust detaining of James the sonne of the king of Scots stopped the mouths of the English, that they could not complaine of anie iniurie done in detaining him. The doing whereof so little offended this Perrie, that while he liued, he did (with all kind of courtelie) giue witness of the humanitie shewed vnto him by the Scots. Not much different from this time, came two ambassadoers into Scotland, the one from the councell of Constance (whereof 1411.

Donald of the Isles bath.

1412.
Donald of the Isles submitteth himselfe.

Fast castle wonne.
1410. Buc.
The bridge of Roxburgh broken downe 1411

The first beginning of the vniuersitie of S. Andrews.

Doctors of diuinitie, and of the canon law.
Fr.Thin.

The death of King Robert the third.

1406, Buch.
1408.
His buriall.

His stature and qualities.

The duke of Albanie confirmed gouernoz of the realme.

Fr.Thin.

Rebellion moved by Donald of the Isles.

Donald submitted to the king.
Fr.Thin.
Calculus lib. 7.
cap. 168.

Hedworth castle taken.

The earle of Dowglas released and returneth into Scotland.

A motion made for the restoring of the earle of March to his countrie.

The earle of March restored home.

Fr.Thin.

Buchanan.
1409.

The earle of Mar.

The battell of Harlow.

Doubtfull battell.

The number slain.

the chiefe was the abbat of Pontineac) and the other was from Peter de Luna, who did studie reteine and defend the papasie, whereof he had once gotten possession, which Peter by the trauell and persuation of Henrie Hardine (an English man, and a franciscane frier) had drawne the gouernor of Scotland to follow his faction, which yet succeded to none effect: because the vniuersall companie of the cleargie stiffelie labored against it, and did subscribe to the deposition of Peter, and to the counsell of Constance for the election of Martin the first to the papasie.

Much what about the same time, John Drummond sue Patrike Graham earle of Stratherne, by traitorous meanes, and thereupon fled into Ireland: but as he was about to haue passed from thence ouer into England, the vessel wherein he sailed, was driuen on the coast of Scotland, where hee was taken, and afterwards lost his head for the said offense. Shortly after also, there rose great warres betwixt England and France, as in the histories of those realmes may more plainlie appeare. There was also a great rebellion raised in Wales, against Henrie the first king of England, which was the son of Henrie the fourth latelie deceased. We find in the Scottish chronicles, that this Henrie the first, at his returning forth of France, after his first iourne thither (having in the same towne the towne of Harfleur, & discomfited the whole power of France at Agincourt) was constrained to go against the Welshmen, and encountering with the prince of Wales, was discomfited, and lost ten thousand of his men: but after this, he reinforced his power, and came againe into Wales, not ceasing till he had brought the Welshmen subiect at his pleasure: but the English writers make no mention of anie such matter.

Whilest things passed thus in England, William Haliburton wan the castell of Marke, and sue all such as he found within it, howbeit small while indured the top of this fortunate successe to the Scots: for sundrie Englishmen that knew all the secrets of the house, found means to enter through a gutter, that serued in manner of a sinke, to auoid all the filth of the kitchen into the riuer of Tweed, breaking downe a pane of an old wall, and so made entrie for the residue of their fellows; by reason whereof they easilie recovered the castell, and in reuenge of them that were slaine there when the Scots wan it, they likewise sue all those which were then within it, without anie respect of one or other. After this, in the yere 1419, the third day of September, Robert duke of Albanie, that had bene gouernor of Scotland for the space of fiftene yeres, after the death of king Robert the third, departed out of this life, hauing borne himselfe in all his time as a right valiant and noble prince. [This doth Buchanan attribute to the yere 1420, being the fiftieth yere after the death of Robert the third.]

A little before his deceasse, there came from Charles the French king, the earle of Wandosme, and chancelor of France, both to renew the ancient league betwixt the two realmes of Scotland and France, & also to get some power of Scots to passe into France, to support the said Charles against the Englishmen, which as then soe inuaded his realme. Whereupon shortly after by decree of counsell, it was ordeined, that John Stewart earle of Buchquhane, second sonne to duke Robert, and Archem-bald Douglas earle of Wigton, should passe into France with seven thousand armed men. The king of England informed hereof, to cause the Scots to keepe their men at home, menaced to inuade Scotland with a puissant armie, & that in all hast. Which rumoz being spred ouer all the bounds of his realme, caused the Scots for doubt thereof to lie all the next summer on the borders: but in the meane time, king Henrie passed into Normandie, to pursue his wars against France with all diligence.

At length, through the procurement of the duke of Burgognie, vnder certeine conditions and covenants of agreement, king Henrie toke to wife the ladie Katharine daughter to the French king. And among other articles of the same agreement, it was concluded, that after the deceasse of Charles the French king, the crowne of France should immediately descend vnto king Henrie, as lawfull inheritor vnto that realme, without all contradiction; by reason whereof, Charles the Dolphin, and sonne to the said king Charles, was clearelie excluded from all claime to the same: but this notwithstanding, the Dolphin did not onelie refuse to surrender his title, but also sought to mainteine the war against king Henrie as his aduersarie, and open enimie to the realme. In the meane while also, the earles of Buchquhane and Wigton, with Alexander Lindsay brother to the earle of Crawford, and Thomas Swinton knights, accompanied with seven thousand well armed men, arrived in France, to the great reioysing of the Dolphin, as he well declared in the thankfull receiuing, and most heartie welcomming of them. Finally, the towne and castell of Chatelon in Touraine was deliuered to them, that they might haue a place at all times to resort vnto, at their owne will and pleasure.

Shortly after they were imployed in the battell of Baugé. For the duke of Clarence brother to the king of England (in whose place he was deputie and generall of the armies in France) after that he had spoiled and ouerrun the countrie of Anjou (which hitherto had remained most stedfast in the obedience of the French) was comming (as it was supposed) to the towne of Baugé, about two daies before Easter: for which cause the Scots (thinking that the duke in that holie feast would, as the maner was, cease from all violence of warre, and attend the church ceremonies appointed for those times; or else as some write, by reason of the truce which was taken for eight daies) did more negligentlie looke vnto their estate than wisdome would they shuld haue done. The which when Clarence vnderstood (either by Andrewe Fregose an Italian, or by the Scottish foragers intercepted by his horsemen) he reioysed that he had so good occasion offered worthilie to performe something. Wherefore rising forthwith from dinner, he commanded his horsemen to arme themselves, with whom he went directlie towards his enimies, at what time he was (besides the beautie of his other furniture) richlie adorned with gobbie diamonds of gold (set with manie pretious stones) and placed vpon a chaplet of iron. At whose sudden approach, those few French which were nere vnto them in a village called little Baugé (amongst whom was John de la Croix) being feared, made their defence in flight; and for safegard entered the steeple of the next church adioining, in the which they were hardlie after besieged.

Whilest these were thus inuironed, the clamor and cries which was now come to the next armie (where in the Scots were assembled) suddenlie caused them with great feare to flee to their weapons. At that time the erle of Buchquhane (whilest the others prepared themselves) sent thirtie archers to possesse the bridge, vnder which the next riuer had his course, and through which they might passe ouer, where (encountering with the English enimie) Hugh Kennedie came vnto them out of the next church (in which he fortified) with a hundred of his companie halfe armed, as it often falleth out in such sudden exploits. These

The king of England marrieth the daughter of the French king. The articles of agreement.

The Dolphin of France maintaineth warre against the Englishmen. Scottish soldiers arrived in France.

Chatelon in Touraine deliuered to the Scottishmen.

Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 1. 1420. Buc. 1421. NG.

The battell of Baugé.

Heitor Boet.

Buchan. lib. 10.

Nic. Gil.

Buchan. lib. 10.

The earle of Buchquhane created constable of France. Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 10.

The earle of Stratherne slaine.

warres betwixt England and France. Rebellion in Wales.

Henrie the first discomfited by the Welshmen the subduerth them.

The castell of Marke wone.

It is againe recovered.

1419.

The deceasse of Robert duke of Albanie. Fr. Thin.

Ambassadors from the French king.

An armie Scots sent into France.

The king of England menaceth the Scots.

with their arrowes so streitlie kept this streit, that the horsemen could not haue anie passage there, for which cause the duke of Clarence did first forsake horse (as the rest of the companie did after him) began the battell on foot, and with a strong assault made way for his men, beating from them the Scots, who were for the most part unarmed, and the others not verie well armed.

After this, in the meane time whilst Clarence taketh his horse againe, and some of the rest scatterie do passe the bridge, the earle of Buchquhane commeth vpon them, & forthwith (desirous to make trial of his people egerlie seeking after it) there was a bitter battell committed, with like minds of hatred the one against the other: for the Scots did reioise, that they had now obtained cause, time, and place, where they might (after their first arrivall in France) shew some token of their valure, and refuse those talvnts which the Frenchmen laid vpon them, obiecting that the greedinesse of wine & vittells had brought them ouer into that countrie. With which reproch the Frenchmen are wont to vpbraid the English, the Spaniard the French, and the African the Spaniard. But as the Scots were eger in a strange countrie to win honoꝝ, so was the English no lesse desirous of conquest, greatlie disdainig both at home and abroad, to be so infested with that implacable nature of the Scots. In which battell none did fight more ballantlie or egerlie than did the duke of Clarence himselfe. Against whome (so noted for the richesse of his armor) came John Swinton, which greivouslie wounded him in the face, and whome the earle of Buchquhane (striking on the head with his mace) quite overthrew to the ground. Which done, the English fled, and were greivouslie slaine, because the same continued till the night ended the quarrell; which battell was fought on Easter eue, a little after the equinoctiall spring. In this battell were slaine of the English about 20000, amongst whome were 26 of noble calling, whereof were the duke before said, the earle of Riddelsdale, otherwise called the earle of Angus, & the lord Grete were part: but of the Scots and Frenchmen, there were few missing, and they of the meaner sort. All which, as we haue here set it downe, is the common report of the death of the duke of Clarence. But the booke of Pluicart reporteth, that the duke was slaine by Alexander Macell, a knight of Lenox, which took from him the coronet (whereof we spake before) and sold the same to John Stewart of Derrill; for a thousand angels, which he after laied to pawne to Robert Hufstone, to whom he bought five thousand angels; & this saith that booke was the most common report at those dates. The chiefe praise of which victorie remained with the Scots, even by the testimonie of the envious adversaries, as the writer of this storie saith vpon his credit. At this battell also were a great companie of prisoners taken, amongst whome (as principall) were these, the earle of Huntingdon, & the earle of Summerset, with his brother, both of them being brethren to the ladie Jane, that was after married to king James the first, king of Scotland. For the high valiance of the Scottishmen shewed in this battell, the Dolphin created the earle of Buchquhane high constable of France, and gaue him sundrie townes, castles, and lands, therewith the better to mainteine his estate.

King Henrie hearing of the death of his brother the duke of Clarence, did substitute for his deputie his other brother the duke of Bedford, promising that he would shortly after come thither himselfe with an armie of foure thousand horse, and a thousand footmen (which he performed accordingly.) For with all speed he after came into France with a mightie host, and had with him James the Scottish king, or rather prince of Scotland, for all this while the Scots reputed him not as king, for that he was not as yet crowned: nor set at libertie out of the Englishmens hands, into the which (as before ye haue heard) he chanced to fall by his fathers life time.

The cause why king Henrie did take this James ouer with him at that present into France, was, for that he hoped by his meanes to procure all the Scottishmen that were in seruice with the Dolphin to forsake him, and to returne home into their owne countrie: but when he had broken this matter vnto the said James, and promised, that if he could bring it to passe, he would not onelie remit his rancome, but also send him into Scotland highlie rewarded with great riches: James answered hereto, that he marvelled much, why he did not consider how he had no authoritie ouer the Scots so long as he was holden in captiuitie, and as yet had not receiued the crowne, but (saith he) if it were so that I might be set at libertie, and had receiued the crowne according to the accustomed manner, together with the othes and homages of my subiects, I could then in this matter do as should be thought to stand with reason; but in the meane time I shall desire your grace to hold me excused, and not to will me to do that which I may in no wise performe.

King Henrie maruelling at the high wisdom which appered to be planted in the head of that yong prince, left off to trauell with him anie further in this matter. In the meane time, the warres continuing betwixt the king of England and the Dolphin of France, manie townes were besieged, wone, and sacked, and sundrie light bickeringes and skirmishes chanced betwixt the parties, as occasion serued. But the Englishmen shewed themselves to beare such hatred toward the Scots, that so manie as fell into their hands neuer needed to streine their friends for their ransomes, which crueltie they put not in practice against their enemies, being of an other nation. [For king Henrie, when he had taken the towne of Speldens, hanged twentie Scots which he found therein, laing to their charge that they had fought against their owne king.] At length, king Henrie fell into a greivous disease, which in short time made an end of his life, notwithstanding all the helpe that either by physicke or other waies might be ministered vnto him. The same yeere, that is to say, 1422, the French king Charles, the first of that name, deceased; after whome succeeded his sonne Charles the seventh, before named the Dolphin, as the custome there is. By the death of these kings, the wars were not altogether so earnestlie followed as before, wherevpon the earles of Buchquhane and Wylton returned into Scotland, and shortly after was an armie leuied, and siege laied both to Rocksburgh, and to Berwik, but for that they lay long abroad and did no good, returning home without gaine, this iournie in derision was called The battie rode, or (as the Scots terme it) The dirtie rade.

But now to speake somewhat concerning the order of the common-wealth in Scotland, ye shall vnderstand, that after the death of Robert duke of Albany, his sonne Mordo Stewart earle of Fife and Menteith was made gouernour, continuing in that office for the space of foure yeeres, though (to confesse the truth) he was farre off from thereto, differing much from the wisdom and manhood of his father, for in him remained sundrie vices, greatlie variable and contrarie one to another. In time of anie aduersitie, he shewed himselfe as a man despairing of all comfort or helpe: in prosperitie so list he in carelesse insolencie, that he had no faie of himselfe, by reason whereof

The king of England taketh the prince of Scotland ouer with him into France.

The answer of James the king, or rather prince of Scotland.

King Henrie took it for a sufficient answer.

The cruell dealing of the Englishmen towards the Scots.

Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 10.

The death of Henrie king of England.

1422. The death of Charles the French king.

Rocksburgh and Berwik besieged.

The dirtie rade.

Mordo Stewart earle of Fife elected gouernour of Scotland. The repugnant vices reigning in Mordo Stewart.

The king of England marieth the daughter of French king. The articles of agreement.

The Dolphin of France maintaineth warre against the Englishmen. Scottish soldiers arriveth in France.

Chatelion in Touraine delivered to the Scottishmen.

Fr. Thin. Buchan. li. 10. 1420. Buc. 1421. N. G.

The battell of Baugy.

Robert Boet.

Buchan. lib. 10.

Nic. Gil.

Pluicart's tale.

Earle of Buchquhane created constable of France. Fr. Thin. Buchan. lib. 10.

whereof, sometimes he suffered heinous offendours through dread of their puissant friends (a thing not to be suffered in Scotland) to escape unpunished; and at other times againe, he shewed himselfe more seuerer & cruell in executing of iustice, than the matter required.

This negligence in chastising his sonnes.

An insolent part of one of his sonnes.

The swordes of duke Moris do to his son.

Duke Moris traueileth for the redeming of James the first.
Fr.Thin.
Buchan.lib.10.

Lesleus lib.7.
pag.272.

The earle of Buchquhane returneth into France.

Fr.Thin.
Lesleus lib.7.
pag.270.

The earle of Dowglas made duke of Couraine.

Thus was he still in extremities, keeping no temperance nor laudable meane in anie of his doings. Hereunto was he so negligent in chastising his sons Walter, James, & Alexander (whether through softnesse & lacke of wit, or by reason he bare such a fond & tender fatherlie loue toward them) that they hauing him in small regard, plaied manie outrageous parts, to the sore offending of a number. At length, one of them taking displeasure with his father, for that he would not giue him a falcon, the which he had long before greatlie desired, stepped to him, and plucking him beside his fist, wong his necke from his bodie euen presentlie before his face. Whereupon the father somewhat kindeled with this presumptuous deed of the sonne: Walter (said he, for so was his name that had thus misused him) sith it is so that thou and thy brother will not be ruled by my soft and gentle gouernement, I shall bring him home per it he long, that shall chastise both you and me after an other manner. And after this, he rested not to trauell still for the redeming of James the first out of captiuitie, till at length he brought him home in deed, to the great wealth, ioy, and good hay of all the Scottish nation. & For calling together a parlement of the nobilitie at Perth, they consulted of receiuing home their James imprisoned in England, and at length willinglie agreed (either for fauour they bare to the lawfull heire, or being wearied with the lothsomnes of the present gouernement) to send an ambassage to the king of England, to demand the restitution of king James. Whereupon they dispatched into England (to execute their deuise) Henrie Lichon bishop of Aberdeen, Archembald Dowglas (the third earle of that name, and fift of that familie) the sonne of Archembald Dowglas, duke of Touraine, William Heie constable of Scotland, Richard Cornall archdeacon of Londane, and Alexander Jarraine a Dum, knight.)

In the meane time, the French king, Charles the seuenth, being sore vexed with wars by the Englishmen, sent to the earle of Buchquhane his constable, requirring him to returne againe with all speed into France, and to bring so manie Scottishmen with him, as he conuenientlie might. This earle therefore found meanes to persuaide Archembald earle of Dowglas, father to the foresaid earle of Wigton, to passe with him into France, which two earles with an armie of five thousand men, or (after some writers) ten thousand, toke the seas, and arriued with prosperous wind and weather at Rochell, and coming to the French king, were receiued of him with all ioy and gladnes. With this companie also was sent ambassado, Gilbert Grenlatw bishop of Aberdeen, a man of great authoritie amongst the nobilitie of Scotland, for his singular wisedome, and such a person as with great dexteritie executed the office of the chancelorship of the realme. The effect of whose message was, to comfort Charles the seuenth, then king of France, and to assertheine him, that not onelie they which were now allanded in France, but also all the inhabitants of Scotland would remaine so firme in his faith & friendship, that they would spend both liues and goods in the defense of the crowne of France, as the following experience should well trie. Whereupon the earle of Dowglas was by the king for his further advancement, honored with the title of the dukedome of Touraine. But that glorie of the Scots was some diminished (as saith Lesleus) by the infortunat successe which they had through the English at the battell of Veruole. In which (besides all the hired or common souldiers which were also most slaine at that time) there perished of the nobilitie, the two brethren of the gouernour, the earle of Buchquhane constable of France, Archembald Dowglas duke of Touraine, with James his sonne and heire, Alexander Lindseie, Thomas Swinton, Robert Stewart, and manie other, as in the French and English histories more largelie may appere.

Lesleus lib.7.
pag.270.
1424.N.C.

And here a little to step out of the way, because in this place Buchanan giueth at the English (as he doth in all the parts of his booke, with most bitter taunts) I will a little shew that he hath forgotten himselfe in the same: as well against vs generallie (as appereth in manie places) as against Grafton, Humfrie Lhoid, and Hall, especiallie in manie other places thereof. And therefore (readers) giue me leaue in milder sort to speake of him (being dead) than he doth of others. For although (against all humanitie) he do most bitterlie with words of heat inflame his pen against Humfrie Lhoid, departed the world manie yeeres (as it appereth) before he toke the later penne in hand (after the ouersieing of his old fragments) as himselfe in his epistle confesseth, to write an historie: yet I will spare him in better sort. And therefore I much muse, that he a man so learned and graue, would now in his later age, when reason should most rule him, so dip his pen in gall, as forgetting himselfe, he should be of these rough conditions (contrarie to all learning, which Emollit mores, nec sinit esse feros) he would call men impudent, immodest, vnlearned, liars, vnbridled, malicious, backbiters, euill tonged; and that he can rather proue the Britains to be made of dogs and brute beasts, better than to be descended of Brutus. All which speeches are to be found in his booke: for (if there were a fault in Lhoid) as there was none, because it seemes he did not well conceiue his mind: could not he either reprehend error, or disproue men, but with such bitter taunts, when they but onelie shew their opinion, dissenting in orderlie sort from others, as it is lawfull for all learned men to do? Where learned he that rhetorike, to reiect the opinion of men with dogs eloquence, and sooner to deduce that creature (formed to the image of God, and lord of all beasts) to be rather made of dogs than of men, and for one or two priuat persons to inueit, against a whole state?

But Humfrie Lhoid imputeth a note of infamie to his nation (as he supposed) in disprouing Hector Boetius, who arrogantly (beside all truth) hath transferred to his Scots, both places, persons, and deeds, which neuer belonged to them. And is this so great a fault in Lhoid, when himselfe and Lesleus bishop of Ross (secretlie milking Boetius) haue in silence passed ouer a great manie imperfections in the historie of Boetius, and placed manie other things after an other sort, referring them to other times than Boetius doth? And why should he maligne Lhoid for reprehending him, whome himselfe condemneth, & of whome he saith that In descriptione Scotie quaedam parum uere prodidit, & alios in errorem induxit, and whome for manie faults (by Boetius escaped) he further saith in the later end of his second booke, that he will not defend him in such errors, as no reason there is why he should? But if, from the abundance of the hart the tong and hand do speake and write, I can not see but that by his dissemperat speeches, I must condemne him of secret grudge, not so much to the person of Lhoid, as to the whole nation, against which the chief part of his booke seemeth to be a Romping inuestiue. And yet such as it is, they must of necessitie follow that interest of the historie of his nation, as he will exclaim against them (as he doth in this place

A digression against Buchanan.

Entie misce.

Robert bluche line of
of Sh
men sen France

Robert
bluche Leper
Gulcoig
Fr.Thin.

place of the battell of Terroille) that they maliciouslie obscure the glorie of the Scots, following the authoritie of the aduersarie, and not the truth of the historie written by him, of the French nation.

And in this place of his booke, rather than he will want occasion to talent and disgrace vs by his cholericke pen, he will seeke a knot in a rush, and make a mountaine of a molehill, in so vehement inuading against the English, that say that the Scots were not able to mainteine such titles of honor as were giuen them by the French: a simple matter to make such discourse vpon, and to step so much aboze out of the course of the storie. But thinke you Buchanan hath committed no such (nay greater) faults against vs: per trulie, and that I suppose will be well proued at another time, in another treatise vpon his booke now iustlie forbidden in England, and (as I heare) more iustlie in Scotland. And here remember I praise the gentle reader, that in one place of his booke he saith that he ment to haue obserued this course from the beginning, that he would not seeke to digresse by bypaths out of the course of the historie. And hath he so sone forgotten that in the first forehead of his booke, almost three leaues togither, & also in manie other parts of the same (as well as in this place of the battell of Terroille) he hath leapt manie miles out of the way, with bitter words to talent Humfrie Lhoid, Grafton, Hall, & all the English histories, and by manie whole pages (in manie parts of his worke) with much spence of powder and shot, to batter the credit of the English writers. These trulie were not parts of such a person, as the place (which he had about the prince whilest he liued) required. But enough of this by me (who am not Honorarius arlter, and will be no seuerer censurer of other mens writings at this time (whereunto I was occasioned by Buchanans digression in this place) since the same will be more substantiallie touched by others in other works (whereunto I refer my selfe) and so returne to the order of the historie.)

The Scottish chronicles declare, that the losse of this field chanced speciallie through enuie and discord, which reigned amongst the chieftains. For the duke of Alanson craving that the Scots should bailie rise in honor within France, kept himselfe backe, till time the Scots were overthrowen and brought to bitter destruction. Againe, even vpon the ioining, there rose great strife and contention betwixt the constable & the duke of Touraine, who should haue the supreme rule of the Scottish legier, the one disdainig to giue place to the other. Thus ye may perceiue, how the Scots with losse of manie of their liues, and much bloudshed, supported the side of Charles king of France, against the Englishmen. And though there came bailie newes of diuerse great overthrowes giuen by the Englishmen to such Scottishmen and other, as serued the said king Charles, yet did not the Scots therefore staie at home, but at sundrie times, and vnder sundrie capitains repaired into France: as amongst other, one Robert Wastilocke of Dunbar with a new power of Scots went ouer to king Charles the seventh as aforesaid, shewing such proue of his singular manhood and balancie in those wars, as in recouerie of the realme of France out of the Englishmens hands, his seruice stood king Charles in notable stead. Whiche his diligence and polidesse well appeared, in reducing the parties of Gascoigne vnto the French subiection, which had remained a great number of yeeres vnder the domination of the English kings. And here vpon was he called by the inhabitants euer after, Le petit roy de Gascoigne.

* But to returne to the businesse of Scotland and of the Scots, as they passed in the meane time. We say, that the French reioicing of this conquest of Gascoigne, would not seeme to be vnthankfull to the Scots therefore: for which cause they erected a statue or image of this Wastilocke, in the hall of the king of France, as a perpetuall memorie of this conquest, and as a singular testimonie of their good will towards the Scots, which they placed there to remaine a monument to all posteritie. Beside which, he confirmed and increased the number of the gard of Scottish archers (which they were wont to be in peace and warre) first instituted by Charles the king of France, ouer all which he made this Wastilocke chiefe capteine, which office the Scots did then and since so well discharge, that the same continueth yet in our memorie. Besides which (a little before this) Charles the first appointed an other companie of Scottish horsemen to be in wages with him, being commonlie called the trap of the Scottishmen at armes. Of whome the chiefe gouernour was Robert Steward (borne of the familie of the earle of Lennox) who was honored by the king with the title of the lord de Aubignie, with other lands and great possessions bestowed vpon him. All which (being of long time possessed of the Scots of the same surname, by continuall order of blood & descent, that is, by Bernard the famous capteine of warre, then by Robert, and to conclude, by John Steward, brother of the earle of Lennox) is at this day also in possession of the worthie young gentleman (the sonne of the said John) who giueth forth a rare hope that he will not degenerat from the nobilitie of his ancestors. The ambassadoys sent as before is shewed) into England for James, behaued themselves so sagelie therein, that in the end, they brought it to good conclusion: as thus. First it was agreed, that king James should be set at libertie, and also pay for his ransome the sum of 100000 marks sterling, the one halfe to be paid in hand, and for the other halfe to leaue sufficient pledges behind him, till it were paid. Albeit some writers alledge, that leauing pledges for the payment of the one halfe, he was discharged of the other, in consideration that he toke to wife the ladie Jane, daughter to the earle of Summerset. The said earle and the cardinall of England his brother, conueied him with his quene their niece, vnto the borders of both the realmes. And at their taking leaue each of other, there was presented vnto king James and to the quene his wife, besides a caphood of maslie plate, sundrie faire cloths of rich and costlie arras by his wiues friends, with manie other iewels and things of great price & balure.

King James then departed on this wise from his wiues brethren, and other such his deere friends, as his vertue and princelie behauiour had procured him during his abode here by the space of sixtene or eightene yeares in England, entered into Scotland, and came to Edenburgh on Care sundae, & therwise called Ballion sunday in Lent, where he was receiued with all honor, loy, and triumph that might be deuised. * At what time as the nobles came to giue him their dutifull welcome into his native soile and inheritance, there began to be manie complaints by them, who since the death of their last king (partlie by negligence, and partlie by the default of the gouernors) had bene molested with diuers kinds of iniuries; where vpon, Walter the son of Spordar, Malcolme Fleming, and Thomas Boib being gréuoullie accused, were (to pacifie the exclamation of the common people) committed to diuers prisons till the next parliament, which was appointed the first halends of June following, where is more intreated of this matter, as after shall appear, Buchanan hauing thus placed it before the kings

Lesleus lib. 7.
pag. 271.

Lesleus lib. 7.
pag. 271.

The ransome of James.

Jane daughter to the earle of Summerset set married to king James
the first.

Gifts giuen to James
by his wiues
friends.

King James
cometh to Edenburgh.

Fr. Thin.
Buchanan.
lib. 10.

Deus lib. 7.
3270.
24. N. G.

Digression
aint Buanan.

Emie and
ship.

Robert Wastilocke captured a power
of Scottish men sent into France.

Robert Wastilocke called Le petit roy de Gascoigne,
in France.

James.
He is crowned at Scone together with his wife.

1423, Buch.
1424, Less.

Andrew Graie.

The surname of the Graies in Scotland.

King James keepeth an audit.

A parliament at Edinburgh.

A tax leuied.

The commons grudge at payments.

Bills of complaint exhibited against the sonnes of duke Morz.

Walter Stewart put in prison.

The oath of James.

kings coronation.]

And after that, as sone as the solemnitie of the feast of Easter was finished, he came to Perth, and thortlie after to Scone, where he was crowned king, and his wife queene, by duke Morz the gouernor, and Henrie bishop of saint Andrews, the one and twentieth day of Maie, after the incarnation 1424. There came forth of England with this James the first, diuerse English gentlemen, which remaining euer after in seruice with him, were advanced to certeine lands, possessions, and liuings in Scotland. Amongest whome (as one of the chiefest) was Andrew Graie, who afterwards by the kings aid and god furtherance, got in marriage the daughter and heire of Henrie Mortimer of Foulis, named Helen, and by that means came the lordship of Foulis vnto the hands of the Graies, whose surname and posteritie continueth yet in Scotland, inuested with great lands and dignities, both in Cotwrie and Angus.

King James after his coronation returned from Scone to Edinburgh, where he called before him all those that bare anie authoritie in the administration of the common-wealth, during the time of the gouernors duke Robert and duke Morz, namely the chancelor, the tresoror, the clerks of the register, the controller, the auditors, and receiueurs, with all other that had borne offices, or had anie thing to do concerning the kings rents. At length, when he perceived by their accounts made, that the most part of all the lands, rents, and reuenues pertaining vnto the crowne, were wasted, bestowed, alienated, and transported by the two foresaid gouernors, vnto their friends and fauours, contrarie to all right or good consideration (the customs of burrowes and good townes onlie excepted) he was not well content herewith, though for the time he passed ouer his displeasure, in the twing outwardlie no semblance, but as if he had liked all things well.

In the meane time, he aduisedly perused all endences, rols, and charters pertaining to the crowne, and thortlie thereupon called a parliament at Edinburgh, in the which, by aduise of the thre estates, a generall tax was ordeined and granted, to be raised through the whole realme; as twelue pence of the pound to be paid of all lands within Scotland, both spirituall and temporall; and foure pence for euerie cow, ore, and horse, to be paid for the space of two yeares together. This payment was leuied the first yeare without anie trouble, but the second yeare there rose such murmur and grudging amongst the poore commons about the payment thereof, that he remitted the residue that was behind, & toke neuer anie tax after of his subiects, vntill he married his daughter with the Dolphin of France. Amongst other bills put vp in this parliament, there was diuerse complaints exhibited by the people, for sundrie oppressions used and done by the sons of duke Morz, and other great peeres of the realme, before the kings returne into Scotland.

Whereupon Walter Stewart, one of the sons of the said duke Morz, was arrested, and sent to a castell situated vpon a rocke within the sea called the Bass, there to remaine in safe keeping. Also Malcolme Fleming of Cumeruall, and Thomas Boyd of Kilmaroke, were committed to ward in Dalkeith, but these two at the intercession of diuerse noblemen were pardoned and forgiven of all offences for an easie fine, with condition, that they should satisfie all such persons as they had in anie wise wronged. In the foresaid parliament also, James took a solempne oath, to defend as well the liberties of his realme, as of the church, during the course of his naturall life. The like oath by his example did all the residue of the barons take at the same present time. Not long after, an other parliament was called and holden at Perth, in the which duke Morz, with his sonne Alexander, were arrested and committed to ward. So was also Archibald earle of Douglas, with his brother William earle of Angus, George earle of March, Adam Hepburne of Hales, and manie other great barons of Scotland, euerie of them being put in sundrie castles and strengths, to remaine there in safe keeping. Duke Morz was sent to Carlarocke, and his duchesse was put in Temptalloun.

In the yeare following, on the Holie rood daie, called the Inuention of the crosse, James Stewart the third sonne of duke Morz moued with great ire, for that his father and brethren were holden in prison, came with a great power to the towne of Dunbarton, and burnt it, after he had slaine John Stewart of Dondonald, and two and thirtie other persons, which were found in the same towne: but the king kindled in great displeasure for this attempt, pursued this James so fiercelie, that he was faine to flee into Ireland, where he afterwards deceased. [And Finelaw (which was sometime one of the order of the frier Dominicks) which fled with him into Ireland, & was author that the said James committed all these outrages, died there also. Besides which, there fled into Ireland the wife of Walter, hir two sonnes, Andrew and Alexander, with Arthure the bastard: who (in the end) returning home, was after by James the third aduanced to great honors.] In the next yeare ensuing, James called a parliament at Sterling, in the which he sitting with scepter, sword, and crowne in place of iudgement, Walter Stewart with his brother Alexander were condemned, and incontinentlie were lead forth to a place before the castell, and there beheaded.

On the morrow after, duke Morz himselfe, and Duncan Stewart earle of Lennox were conducted of high treason, and beheaded before the castell in semblable manner. [It is a constant fame (saith Buchanan) though I find it not written in any place, that the king sent the heads of the father, husband, & children, to Isabell the wife of his cosine germane, to trie whether she being a fierce woman, would (as it fustlie happened) by dissemperance of griefe discover the secrets of hir mind. But she (notwithstanding all which grievous and vnlooked for spectacles) did not inordinatlie burst out into anie bitter words, but onlie said; If the fautes be true which are laid against them, the king hath done but right and iustice vnto them.] Thus by the attainder of duke Morz and his sonnes, the earldome of Fife, Perth, and Lennox came into the kings hands. The residue of the lords and barons remaining as then in prison, and adding the kings pleasure, were soe afraid, when they heard what rigorous iustice had bene executed on duke Morz and his sonnes: notwithstanding, within 12 moneths after they were all set at libertie, and receiued into the kings favor, on promise of their loiall demerit & dutifull obedience euer after to be shewed, during their naturall lines.

The parliament being ended, John Mountgomerie, & Humphrie Cunningham were sent by the king to the castell of Bonnington, which was kept against him by the vnting of James Stewart, whom in short time they forced to surrender the said castell. Not long after, John Stewart of Dornie (who was master of the Scottish garrison of horsemen in France, the rest of the former captains being consumed) came into Scotland with the bishop of Reims, as ambassador in the name of Charles, to re-

A parliament holden at Perth. Duke Morz do with his sonne Alexander, and diuerse other peeres of the realme arrested.

1425.

The towne of Dunbarton burnt.

Fr. Thin, Buchanan, lib. 10.

A parliament holden at Sterling.

1426.

Walter and Alexander the sonnes of duke Morz beheaded.

Duke Morz and Duncan Stewart earle of Lennox beheaded.

Fr. Thin.

1426.

1428.

1427.

Alexander the third of the kings arrest.

He is set at libertie.

He rebellet.

The towne of Dunbarton burnt.

Fr. Thin, Buchanan, lib. 10.

Alexander the third of the kings arrest.

He is set at libertie.

He rebellet.

new the old league betwene the two nations, and to conclude matrimonie betwene Lewes the sonne of the said Charles the seventh, and Margaret the daughter of R. James, both being yet verie yong. Which thing so dispatched, in the next yeare being the 1426 he determined (having pacified all Scotland betwene the mounteins of Granzeben) to subdue the further parts beyond it also. Wherefore to begin the same, he commanded the castell of Inuerness (set in a convenient place in the furthest borders of Murray) to be repaired. Whither when he came two yeares after, to sit in iudgement upon misdemeanors of the inhabitants, and to suppress their robberies, he called before him the chiefe of all the families of that countrie, especiallie such as being accompanied with great traines, were wont to fetch prizes from their next borders, did set tribute on the quieter sort, and did compell the common people to minister sustenance to those idle loiterers, of which capitains; some had a thousand, some two thousand, & some far manie more redie at their call to obeye their comandement: with which they ceased not to keepe the good in danger unto them for feare of hurt, and made the euill (amongest whome they were assured of refuge & defense) the bolder to commit all kind of wickednesse. Which persons when the king had gotten in, and drawn to come before him, partly by flatteries, and partly by threats: he committed about fortye of their leaders to generall prisons: whose euill being throughe known, he hanged two notable fellows amongst them, called Alexander Macroz and John Macarcure; at what time also he beheaded James Campbell (for the murder of John of the Isles) a man deerie beloued of his people. The rest which remained (being of the common sort) they likewise dispersed into diuers prisons, whereof some were after executed, and some were permitted frelie to depart to their owne. The capitains of the factions thus slaine (or for the most part restrained in prison) the inferior sort durst not attempt anie thing, being destitute of leaders. Whereupon the king calling them before him, did giue them a long admonition to embrace iustice, because there was no surer or certeine hope of safetie in anie thing, than in the innocencie of life, the which if they would determine to do, they should alwaies find him readie to honor and reward them; if not, they might learne by the examples of others what they should hope to receiue themselves.)

In the yeare next following, which was after the incarnation 1427, Alexander lord of the Isles was arrested by the king at Inuerness, for that he was accused to be a succorer & maintainer of theues & robbers in the countrie: but forsomuch as he promised in time coming to reforme his former misdemeanors, he was pardoned and set at libertie; wherof ensued great trouble immediatlie after. For shortlye by his deliuerance, he gathered a power of wicked scapethifts, and with the same comming into Inuerness, burnt the towne, and besieged the castell, inforcing with all diligence to win the same, till he was aduertised that the king was comming towards him with a great power, whereupon he fled incontinently to the Isles. Finally hauing knowledge that a great number of people lay daile in wait to take him, that they might present him to the kings hands, he came disguised in poore arate to the holie rood house, and there finding the king on Easter daie deuoutlie in the church at his prayers, he fell downe on his knees before him, and besought him of grace, for his sake that rose as that day from death unto life.

At request of the queene, the king pardoned him of life; but he appointed William Dotinglas earle of Angus to haue the custodie of him, and that with in the castell of Temptallon, that no trouble should rise by his meanes thereafter. His mother Eufemie daughter to Walter sometime earle of Ross, was also committed to ward in saint Colmes inch; because it was knowne that she solicited hir sonne to rebell (in maner as is afore said) against the king. Not long after, Donald Balloch, brother to the said lord Alexander of the Isles, came with a great power of men into Lochquhaber. The earles of Mar and Cathnes came with such number of their people as they could raise, to defend the countrie against the invasion of those Islandmen, and fought with the said Donald at Inuerlochty, where the erle of Cathnes was slaine, and the earle of Mar discomfited. Here with did Donald returne with victorie, and a great preie of goods and riches into the Isles. The king fore moued with the newes herof, came with a great armie vnto Dunstaffage, purposing with all speed to passe into the Isles. The clans and other chiefe men of the said Isles aduertised herof, came to Dunstaffage, and submitted themselves vnto the king, excusing their offense, for that (as they alledged) the said Donald had constrained them against their willes, to passe with him in the last iourne. All those clans vpon this their excuse, were admitted to the kings fauour, and sworne to pursue the said Donald vnto death.

Shortlye hereupon, this Donald fled into Ireland, where he was slaine, and his head sent by one Odo a great lord of Ireland (in whose countrie he lurked) as a present to the king that laie as then at Sterling. There were also thre hundred of his adherents taken, and by the kings commandement hanged for their offenses within thre weekes space, after his first fleeing into Ireland. This trouble being thus quieted, king James passed through all the bounds of his realme, to punish all offenders and misruled persons, which in anie wise wronged and oppressed the poore people. He allowed no pardon granted afore by the gouernor, alledging the same to be expired by his death. For he thought indeed it stood neither with the pleasure of God, nor wealth of the realme, that so manie slaughters, reiffes, and oppressions, as had bene done afore in the countrie, should remaine unpunished through fault of iustice. It is said that within the first two yeeres of his reigne, there were thre thousand persons executed by death, for sundrie old crimes and offenses.

And though such extreme iustice might haue bene thought sufficient to giue example to other to reforme their naughtie vices, yet one Angus Duffe of Stratherne nothing afraid thereof, came with a companie of theues and robbers, and toke a great preie of goods out of the countrie of Murray and Cathnes: for recouerie wherof, one Angus Murray followed with a great power, and ouertaking the said Angus Duffe nere to Strachnauerne, fiercelie assailed him. Who with like manhood made stout resistance; by reason whereof there ensued such a cruell fight betwixt the parties, that there remained in the end but onelic twelve persons aliue, & those so wounded, that they were scarce able to returne home to their houses, and liued but a few daies after. About the same time, there was also another notable theefe named Makdonald Rose, which grew with spoiles and robberies to great riches. This wicked oppressor thod a woman with horse shoes, because she said she would go to the king, and reueale his wicked doings. As soone as she was whole, and recouered of hir wounds, she went vnto the king, and declared the cruelties done vnto hir by that vngracious person Makdonald. The king (who before had heard the

Donald Balloch inuadeth Lochquhaber.

The earle of Cathnes slaine Donald Balloch returneth with victorie & spoile into the Isles.

The clans of the Isles submit themselves to the king.

Donald fled into Ireland. His head is sent as a present to the king. Thre hundred of Donalds accomplices hanged.

Pardons granted by the gouernor are void.

Thre thousand offenders put to death within two yeeres space.

Angus Duffe

A cruell fight.

Makdonald Rose a notable robber.

He had a widow.

Fr. Thin.

same same of others, and had gotten Makdonald in prison, determining to see due punishment for that wicked fact comforted the sillie woman, promising hir thortlie to behold a iust reuenge thereof. Whereupon Makdonald being brought out of prison with twelue of his companions, the king commanded that they (by the talion law of Moses that yeldeth an eie for an eie, and a toth for a toth, and by the example of Phalaris, who burnt him first in the bull that was the author thereof for others) should likewise be shod with iron shodshoes, in that sort as they before had serued the woman, and then to be carried thre daies togither about the citie for a spectacle to the people, to feare to attempt such extraordinary wickednesse; the king proclamation that euerie one might see this new kind of punishment. After which, at length (doubting if he liued he would not cease to commit the like, or else reuenge the same) he chopped off Makdonalds head, & caused his twelue fellows and partakers to be hanged in the high waies.)

1430.

The quene deliuered of two sonnes at one birch.

Fiftie knights dubbed.

Archemald earle of Douglas arrested and put in prison.

Fr.Thin.

King James desirous to purge his realme of vnrallie persons.

Fr.Thin. Buchanan.li.ro.

An ordinance for measures.

Castles repaired and munited.

In the third yere after, which was from the incarnation 1430, on the eleuenth daie of October, Jane the quene of Scots was deliuered of two sonnes at one birth, Alexander and James. The first deceased in his infancie. The other succeeded after his fathers deceasse in the kingdome, & was named James the second. At the baptisme of these two infants, there were fiftie knights made. Amongst the which, and first of all other, was William the sonne of Archemald Douglas, that succeeded his father in the earledome of Douglas. His father the said Archemald Douglas, somewhat before this time, or (as other authors say) in the yere next ensuing, was arrested by the kings commandement, and put in ward, remaining so a long time, till at length by supplication of the quene, and other peeres of the realme, the king pardoned him [with John Kennedy] of all offenses, and set both them And Alexander earle of Ross at libertie. King James in this sort did what in him lay to bring the realme of Scotland in such quiet tranquillitie, that (in purging the same of all offenders, and such as liued by reisse and robbing) passengers by the high waies might trauell without dread of anie euill disposed persons to molest them.

Having thus with diligence suppressed the robberies (practised through all parts of his realme) he forgot not to looke into small offenses which were less cretillie done, and of lesse danger; determining to take awaie all euill customes which had continued in the realme. For custome, being an other nature doth bring to passe, that a common error (by manie ages continued) maketh a perfect law, and therefore (because the inferior iudges would the better administer iustice, if they had persons of high authoritie that might punish their false sentences) he chose forth speciall persons of the better sort (commended for their wisdom, grauitie, and holinesse of life) and made them iustices, whom he sent ouer all the realme giuing them full authoritie to heare and determine all quarels and lutes (if anie were brought vnto them) whereof the ordinarie iudges either (for feare) durst not or (for hatred or fauor) would not, or (for strength of others) could not giue anie perfect iudgement.)

He caused also the bailiffes and prouosts of good townes, to see that iust measures were used by all manner of buiers and sellers, and none to be occupied, but such as were signed with the note & marke of the said bailiffes or prouosts. Moreover, he repaired and fortified the castles and fortresses of his realme, and stuffed them with such ordinance and munition as was thought expedient. He granted also sundrie priuileges and great liberties to the vniuersitie of saint Andrews, to the high advancement thereof, and was oftentimes himselfe present at their disputations, taking great pleasure therein. Such as were knowne to be learned men, and were presented to him by the vniuersitie, he preferred to great benefices and other ecclesiasticall livings, till as the same chanced to be vacant. [Wanting for that cause made a law in the said vniuersitie, that none should enjoy the ronne of a canon in anie cathedrall church, vnles he were a batcheller of diuinitie, or at least of the canon law.] By which meanes all manner of vertue and good learning increased daillie through the realme during his time, and namelie musike was had in great price, which he appointed to be used in churches with organs, the which before his time were not much knowne amongst the Scottismen.

Much what about the same time, there was a parliament holden at Perth, in the which Henrie Wardlaw bishop of S. Andrews, in name of all the thre estates there assembled, made a long and right pithie oration to this effect; that where by the high policie and prudent diligence of the kings maiestie there present, iustice, and all due administration of lawes and good ordinances were so reuiued, that nothing seemed to be ouerpast, that might aduance to the profit and commoditie of the common-wealth; yet was there one wicked vlsage crept in of late, increasing so fast, that if speedie remedie were not had in time, all those commodities brought into the realme by his coming, should be of small auail, and that was, such superfluous riot in banquetting there, and numbers of costlie dishes, as were then taken by and used after the English fashon, both to the great hinderance of mans health, and also to the vnprofitable waisting of their goods and substance. If the laudable temperance used amongst the Scottish men in old time were well considered, nothing might appeare more contrarie and repugnant thereto, than that new kind of gluttonie then used, by receiving more excelle of meats and drinks than sufficeth to the nourishment of nature, through prouocation of such deintie and delicate dishes, confectioned sauces, and deuised potions, as were now brought in amongst them. As for such gentlemen as the king had brought with him forth of England, they were worthy in deed to be cherished and had in high fauour; neither was this abuse to be so greatlie imputed vnto them, considering it was appropriate to their nation. But the Scottishmen themselves were chieflie to be blamed, that had so quickly yelded to so great an inconuenience, the enormitie whereof appeared by the sundrie vices that followed of the same, as excelle, sensuall lust, sloth, reisse, and waisting of goods. For if temperance be the nourisher of all vertue, then must the contrarie, that is to say, intemperance, be the bringer forth and prouoker of all vice. If it might therefore please the kings highnesse, to shew his accustomed wisdom and prouidence in repressing this abuse of costlie fare, so much damagable to his people, he should do the thing that was meritorious before God, and no lesse profitable and necessarie for the publike weale of all his subjects.

By these and manie other the like persuations, bishop Wardlaw used to dissuade the king and his people from all superfluous courses of delicate dishes and surfetting bankets. Insomuch that euen then there was order taken, that fewer dishes and more spare diet should be used through the realme, licensing gentlemen onelie, and that on festiuall daies, to be serued with pies, the vse of them not being knowne in Scotland till that season. Neuertheless, such intemperance is risen in proceesse of time following.

Fr.Thin. Lellus lib. pag. 174.

Organs brought into Scotland.

Parliament at Perth.

Bishop Wardlaw inuictly against superfluous fare.

John of Perth.

John of Perth.

John of Perth.

John of Perth.

Fr.Thin. Lellus lib. pag. 175.

The abbey of Chartreuse.

The 10th of December.

The office of the King.

The office of the King.

The office of the King.

The office of the King.

The office of the King.

following, that the greedie appetite of gluttons in this age may be satisfied with no competent feeding, till their bellies be so stuffed with immoderate good mandise, that they maie scarce fetch breath, through which their noisome surfeiting, they fall daile into sundrie strange and lossome kinds of diseases, being oftentimes killed by the same in their flourishing youth, as by daile experience plainlie appeareth.

In the same yeere the seventeenth day of June, 1520, was a terrible eclipse of the sunne, at thre of the clocke after none, the day being darkened ouer head for the space of one halfe houre together, as though it had bene night, and thereupon it was called the blacke houre. At the next Lammis, the king raised an armie, & came with the same to Norburgh, besieging the castell for the space of fiftene daies together. He had in this armie (as the report went) the number of two hundred thousand men, accounting cariage men & all other such as followed the campe: yet notwithstanding all this huge multitude, hauing wasted his powder and other munition, before he could doe anye great hurt to his enemies, he was constrained to raise his field, and leaue the castell in the Englishmens hands as he found it. After this king James perceiuing how the knowledge of handicrafts and manuell occupations was decayed in Scotland, though continuall exercise of wars, since the daies of Alexander the third, to the further advancement of the common-wealth, and that his subjects might haue occasion to auoid sloth and idleness (the root of all mischiefe) he brought a great number of cunning craftsmen out of Germanie, France, and other parties, to instruct his people in their arts and faculties.

Not long after, one Paule Crawl a Bohemian borne, was burnt at saint Andrews, for preaching and setting forth the doctrine of John Hus, & John Wicliffe. John Fogo being one of them that helped chieflie to condemne him, was made (for his great and earnest diligence therein shewed) abbat of Melrosse. [After which, the said king James began to take vpon him the person of a private man, sundrie times associating himselfe to the companie of others (but especiallie of the merchants) in changed apparell, according to the state of such persons with whom he would companie, to the end he might thereby learne what men did say and iudge of him, and so vnderstand what was to be corrected in the gouernment of the common-wealth.] About the same time was the abbie of Charturur monks founded besides Perth, by king James, with great cost and magnificence.

Also the lord Scrope and other associats with him, came in ambassage from Henrie the first, king of England. The effect of whose message was, to haue the ancient league betwixt the Scots and Frenchmen dissolved, promising that if the counsell of Scotland would consent thereto, and ioine in league with the Englishmen; that both the towne and castell of Berwik, with all the lands lieng betwixt Tweed and the Hecrosse (as the Scots write) should be deliuered into the Scottishmens hands. King James hauing small credit in such faire promises, persecuted the same to tend onlie to this end, that the league betwixt the Frenchmen and Scots might be once clearelie broken, and then to vse the matter as occasion should serue their turne. This matter therefore being proponed before the counsell, it was concluded, that in no wise the said league betwixt the Frenchmen and Scots should be dissolved, and so thereupon the English ambassadors were dispatched without moore talk concerning that matter.

In the same yeere, that is to say, 1433, the king caused George Dunbar erle of March, sonne to that earle which rebelled against his father king Robert the third, to be arrested and put in safe keeping within the castell of Edenburgh. He sent also the earle of Angus with his chancelor William Creighton, and Adam Hepborne of Hales to the castell of Dunbar, deliuering them letters signed with his hand, and directed to the keepers of the said castell, that they shuld deliuer vp the house immediatlie vpon sight of those letters vnto the bringers of the same. The keepers durst not disobey his commandement, but suffered them to enter according to their commission. Within twelue moneths after, a parlement was held at Perth, where the foresaid George earle of March was disherited of all his lands and linings for his fathers offense committed against king Robert the third. Thus the house of the Dunbars lost the earldome of March, wherein the same had flourished so manie yeeres together, to the great defense and safeguard of the realme of Scotland on that side, against both ciuill and foreine enemies.

The king yet moued with some pitie toward so noble a linage, within short time after gaue the earldome of Buchquhan to the said George; and after the kings deceasse, the lords of the counsell thinking the same to litte, assigned forth to him and his son Patrike, the summe of foure hundred marks yeerlie, to be receiued out of a parcell of his owne ancient inheritance of the earldome of March, to inioy the same till James the second came to full age. In the yeere 1435, Alexander Steward earle of March departed out of this life. This Alexander was a bastard sonne of the earle of Buchquhan, that was one of the somes of king Robert the second. He was a man of right singular prowesse, and in his youth following the warres, was with Philip duke of Burgonie at the siege of Liege, or Luike, where he bare himselfe so manfully, that few wan the like honor at that iournie. Not long after, to his high aduancement, he got in marriage the ladie Jacoba countesse of Holland: notwithstanding, he continued but a while with hir, being forced to forgo hir companie, either for that he had another husband, or else for that the inhabitants would not suffer a stranger to reigne ouer them.

After his returne into Scotland, he sent messengers into Holland, requiring to haue the issues and profits of such lands as were due vnto him in right of the said countesse his wife; but receiuing nought saue a froward answer, he provided him of ships, and made soe warres on the Hollanders by sea: first being put to the worse; but at length he took a number of their ships laden with merchandize, as they were returning homewards from Dantzicke. The mariners were drowned, and the ships burnt. Through which losse the Hollanders being soe abashed, fell to a composition with him, and took truce with the Scots for an hundred yeeres. This earle of March so long as he liued had the gouernance of the north parts of Scotland under king James the first, for he was a right prudent person, as well in warlike enterprises, as in ciuill administration. He brought forth of Hungarie sundrie great horses and mares for generation, that by such meanes the countrie might be provided of great horses of their owne race, where till that time there was none bred within Scotland, but small nags, more meet to serue for iournieng hacknies, than for anye seruice in the warres.

Not long before this time, there came an ambassage from the king of Denmarke to king James, requiring him to make payment of such yeerlie tribute as was due to the said king of Denmarke, being also king of Norway for the westernne Isles, according George eric of March arrested and put in ward.

A parlement at Perth.

The earle of March disinherited,

The earldome of Buchquhan given to George Dunbar.

1435. The death of Alexander Steward erle of March.

Leodium.

warres betwixt the earle of March & the Hollanders.

Truce twixt the Scots & Hollanders for teame of 100 yeeres.

God mares brought out of Hungarie into Scotland for breed.

Ambassadors out of Denmarke. Their request corbing to the promise and agreement made by Alexander sometime king of Scotland, the third of that name, unto his predecessor Magnus, at that time king of Norway. The ambassadoes that came with this message were honorable received, and in like sort intertained by king James, who at their departure gave to them sundrie rich gifts, and appointed sir William Creighton to go with them into Denmark, ambassador to him, to the king there, who sed himselfe so sagelie in this business which he thus went about, that renewing the old league betwixt the two realmes of Denmarke and Scotland, sed fast peace and assured amitie without anie more adu therof insured. Much about the same time, there came ambassadoes from the French king, Charles the seventh, not onelie desiring to haue the old league betwixt France and Scotland to be ratified at that present by a new confirmation, but also to confirme the same with better assurance. Margaret eldest daughter to king James, at request of the said king Charles, was giuen in marriage unto Lewis the Dolphin, and eldest sonne to the said king Charles.

Many great lords of Scotland were appointed to haue the conueiance of hir into France, and great pouision of ships made for that voiage, because the king was aduertised that the Englishmen had a fleet abroad on the seas, to take hir if they might meet with hir by the waie. But as the hap fell, it chanced the same time, as the Scottish ships should passe, there appeared on the coast of England, a great fleet of Spaniards, which the Englishmen supposing to be the Scots, they came vpon them with foure score vessels of one and other, thinking verelie to haue had their wished preie, euen according to their expectation: but being receiued with as hot a storme as they brought, they quicklie vnderstood how they were in a wrong boe, and so they wolie amazed (as Hector Boetius saith) they sustained great losse both in men and ships, and in the meane time the Scottish naue passed by quietlie without damage, encountering not one ship by the waie that sought to impeach their passage. There went 140 ladies and gentlewomen with of Scotland, to attend this ladie Margaret into France, amongst which number there were siue of hir owne sisters.

In the meane time, whilst such things were a doing, Henrie Persie of Northumberland invaded Scotland with foure thousand men, not being known whether he had commission so to do from the king of England, or that he made that enterprise of himselfe. William Dowglas earle of Angus, to resist this inuasion, gathered a power of chosen men, amongst whome were Adam Hepburne of Hales, Alexander Ramsie of Dalchoules, and Alexander Elphinston, with others. The earle of Angus being thus associat, met the Persie at Piperden, where a sore battell was foughten betwixt them, with great slaughter on both sides; but at length the victorie fell to the Scots, though there were slaine together with Alexander Elphinston, two hundred gentlemen and commons of Scotland: and of the English part there died Henrie of Cliddesdale, John Wgill, and Richard Persie, with sixteen hundred other of gentle men and commons, of the which gentlemen, fortie were knights. There were taken also and brought home by the Scots as prisoners, to the number of foure hundred.

Shortly hereupon, king James raised a mightie armie, and besieged the castell of Rocksburgh, but when he had almost brought his purpose so nere to passe, that those within began to fall to communication, for the rendering of the place, the quene came to the campe in great haste vnto him, signifieng that there was a conspiracie begun against him, so that if he toke not the better heed, he was in great danger to fall into the hands of those that sought his life. The king doubting the matter, raised his siege and returned home to prouide the better for his owne safety, but that preuailed little: for Walter Steward earle of Atholl, and head of the whole conspiracie, pretending euer a right to the crowne, by reason that he was procreat by king Robert the second on his first wife, procured his nephew Robert Steward, and his cosine Robert Graham, to flea the king by one meane or other, which finally they accomplished in this wise. This Robert Graham, for diuerse wicked acts before committed, contrarie to the lawes and ordinances of the realme, was giuen to an outlawrie, so that if he were taken, he looked for nothing but present death, and therefore hated the king most deablie. And though by the quenes diligence both his and other of the conspirators purposes were now disappointed, hauing contriued to dispatch the king at the siege of Rocksburgh; yet for so much as their names were not knowne, they hoped still to find occasion to atchieue their detestable intention, sith they were no more mistrusted than the others.

Hereupon the said Steward and Graham came one euening to the blacke friers of Perth, where the king as then was lodged, and by licence of the porters comming into the house, entered vp into the gallerie before the kings chamber doze, minding to haue staied there till one of the kings seruants that was priue to their diuelish purpose should come, by whose helpe they were promised to haue entrie into the chamber. But before the comming of this Judas-like traitor, an other of the kings seruants named Walter Straiton came forth of the chamber doze to haue fetched wine for the king: but being aduised of these two traitors standing there at the doze, either of them hauing a long sword girded to him, he slept backe, and cried, Treason: but per he could get within the doze to haue made it fast, they leapt vnto him, and slue him there outright.

Whilst this was a doing, not without great noise & rumbling, a young virgin named Katharine Dowglas (that was after married to Alexander Louell of Wolunnie) got to the doze, and shut it: but because the barre was alwaie that should haue made it fast, she thrust hir arme in the place where the bar should haue passed: she was but young, and hir bones not strong, but rather tender as a gristle, and therefore hir arme was sone crast in sunder, and the doze broken vp by force. Herewith entering the chamber, they slue such of the seruants as made defense, and then the king himselfe with manie cruell and deablie wounds [at 28 feuerall blowes.] The quene was also hurt as she was about to saue hir husband. Patrick Dunbar, brother to George sometime earle of March, was left for dead on the floze, by reason of such wounds as he receiued in the kings defense, doing most manfullie his uttermost deuoir to haue preserved him from the murderers hands. Thus was James the first murdered the 21 day of February, the 44 yere of his age, the 13 of his reigne, and from the incarnation of Christ 1436. His bodie was buried in the house of the Chartarars at Perth which he founded in his life time, but had not as yet thoroughlie finished.

Of this James I find written in his singular commendation, that he was for proportion of bodie of the middle stature, with broad shoulvers, hauing the other parts also answering therevnto, as they neither seemed monstrous big to be wondered at, nor extreme small to be scoffed at; but carried the maiestie of a person, whome Aeneas Syluius (expressing the most excellent conformitie of members in this our king) doth terme to be squared or of euen proportion

Sir William Creighton sent into Denmark. Peace and amitie betwixt Scotland and Denmarke. Ambassadoes forth of France. The old league renewed betwixt France and Scotland. The Dolphin marieth Margaret daughter to king James.

Englishmen lie in wait for the Scottish fleet.

The Englishmen encounter a fleet of Spaniards.

The arrivall of the ladie Margaret of Scotland in France.

Henrie Persie invadeth Scotland.

The battell of Piperden fought betwixt Henrie Persie and the earle of Angus. The Scots get the victorie. The number of Englishmen slaine. Prisoners taken.

Rocksburgh besieged.

The king the sonne of a conspiracie made against him, raiseth his siege. The earle of Atholl heard of the conspiracie.

Robert Graham.

Robert Steward and Robert Graham murdereth the king.

Walter Straiton is slaine.

Katharine Dowglas.

The murderers enter the kings chamber, and slay the king. The quene is hurt. Patrick Dunbar wounded and left for dead in the kings defense. James the first murdered.

1437. Buchan. 1447. 1. M. 1226. Lellie. His stature and forme of bodie. Fr. Tim. Lellieus lib. 7. cap. 271.

Buchan. also with he wrote Latin verses with such good grace, as the rudeness of that age permitted.

tion, as the parts of a quadrangle or iust square do answer each other, so that nature seemeth not to have framed a creature more apt or excellent than he, either for shape of bodie, or for kinglie maiestie. He did manie times embrace iustice more streialie and seuerelie, than well became a king, which ought to be called (and so in truth to be) the father and nourisher of the common wealthe. For he learned so exactlie to measure all things by the rule of iustice, that he is said within the space of three yeeres) to have executed three thousand persons for their committed offences. Although this may rather seeme to be a slander (than otherwise) grounded vpon no foundation, since all things seeme to haue bene performed by him in respect of sincere zeale of iustice, whereof this may be a sufficient argument, that he was of so mild and sweet nature, that we read not of anie of our princes that did more reuerentlie embrace peace at home amongst his subjects, or more willinglie conclude the same abroad with strangers. What shall I say of his wisdom, which in manie and the greatest affaires did so manifestlie appere, that the kings of other nations did toine in league and friendship with him: Of which wisdom, and of other his vertues (although he obtained part by the benefit of nature) he got the greatest summe by the learning & instruction which he purchased in England, when he was prisoner: at what time he was by the commandement of Henrie the king most diligentlie instructed. For he was there by the kings beneuolence so well trained in all sciences and gentlemanlie activitie, with the diligence of good scholemasters, that it is not easie to iudge what science he best vnderstood: for beside that he had skill in all kinds of musike (but most excellent in plaieng on the harpe) he was so good an orator, that nothing might be more artificall than that which he spake: againe, he was a rare poet, in which he seemed not so much cunning by art, as furthered by nature, which is sufficientlie proued by verses of diuerse kinds (at this day remaining) composed by him in Scottish meter with that singular art, as he is thought fullie to equall the sharpenesse, grauitie, and wisdom of the ancient poets.

It is strange that I saie, and far beyond the diligence of the princes of our time, yea and almost beyond the opinion of men: but yet most true and confirmed by the testimonie of them which knew him well: and therefore to be written to his perpetuall praise. He did so exactlie in mind and memorie comprehend the depth of diuinitie and law, that therein he excelled manie, & in his time gaue not place to anie: to conclude, there was nothing wherein the commendation of wit consisted, or wherein anie shew of the liberrall arts appeared, that he would not with great diligence applie his induror for the knowledge thereof, yea and that sometime to all mechanicall or handie-craft labors which were meet for a free man, which he is said most studiously to haue followed. But in the end, iudging it ouer base for kinglie maiestie to be exercised in these meane & inferior: knowledges, he caused artificers of all sorts to be brought out of England, Flanders, and other nations, which should instruct our people therein: for by that means he persuaded himselfe he should in the end calme the rough manners of his nation, and that with these mild arts they would also receiue a mild and sweete condition of life & manners. Wherefore I may well say, & most happie common-wealthe which was gouerned by so worthy a prince: & may iustlie exclaime; O you most fierce and wicked rebels, that would by murder take away such an honor, beauntie, and pillar of the common-wealthe. Now, besides manie other things by him done, I will here (being better late than neuer) set downe this (not touched before) which is, that he was not onlie a beauntie to his countrie, in prouiding for his people to liue at quiet within dore; but he also sought for the defense of his realme against his enemies without dore: by artillerie, and other necessaries required for the warres. For the invention of guns hapning about his time, or not much before, he caused certeine pæces of artillerie to be made beyond the seas in Flanders, of which, there was one most especiall and great peece called the Lion, on the circumference whereof were these verses ingrauen, testifieng the antiquitie in like manner of the same:

Illestri Jacobo Scotorum principi digno, Regi magnifico, dum fulmine castra reduco, Faciunt tum subito, nuncupor ergo Leo.

The nobles and pæces of the realme right sorrowfull for the death of this James, assembled together, and made such earnest & diligent search for the traitors before mentioned, that at the length they were apprehended and brought to Edinburgh, where they were executed on this manner. The earle of Atholl, which was not onlie principall in practise of this treason concerning the kings death, but also in times past was chiefe of counsell with Robert duke of Albanie, in making away of David the kings eldest brother, and after the kings returne south of England did most earnestlie solicit him to put duke Morde to death, with all other of his linage, trusting that when they were dispatched, he should find means to rid the king also, and his children out of the way, & so at length attaine to the crowne without anie obstacle. This earle I say was first stripped of all his clothes, saue onlie his shirt: and then was an instrument of wood, made like to the dialler of a well, set fast in a cart with a frame: at the end of which instrument, was the earle fastened and bound, and so caried about the towne, sometime hoisted on high, that the people might see him aloft in the aire, and sometime let fall againe with a swate done vpon the pavement. After this, being brought to an open place, where most resort of people was, they crowned him with an hot iron, for that (as was said) a witch had told him, that before his death he should be crowned openlie in sight of the people. Through whose illusion being deceived, he liued vnder vaine hope to attaine the crowne, directing all his imaginations to compass the means thereto. Thus was he serued on the first day. On the second day, he was drawn with his complices laid on burdels, round about the towne at an horse taile. The third day, his bellie was ript, and his bowels were taken forth, and throught into the fire sickerling before his eyes, & then was his heart pulled forth of his bodie, and throught likewise into the fire: and last of all, his head was cut off, and his bodie diuided into foure quarters.

His nephew Robert Stewart was not altogether so cruellie executed. But Robert Graham, for that it was knowne that he lue the king with his owne hands, was put into a cart, the hand that did the deed being fastened to a paire of gallows, which were raised vp in the said cart; and then were three persons appointed to thrust him through in all parts of his bodie with hot irons, beginning first in those places where it was thought no hastie death would thereof insue, as in the legs, armes, shighes, & shoul ders. And thus was he caried through euerie street of the towne, and tormented in most miserable wise, and at length had his bellie ript, and was bowelled and quartered as the other were before. Christopher Clawn also, and other that were of counsell in the conspiracie, were put to most shameful kinds of deaths, as they had iustlie deserued, few or none lamenting their case. [Touching whose death, and

John Maior
lib. 6. cap. 13.

The search
made for the traitors.

The execution
of the
earle of Atholl.

The prophetic
of a witch.

Robert Stewart
executed.

The ordering
of Robert Grahams
execution.

Christopher
Clawn.

Fr. Thin.

The king in formed of a conspiracie
made against him, raiseth
his siege.
The earle of Atholl heard of the conspiracie.

Robert Stewart
and Robert Graham murderers of
the king.

Robert Stewart
and Robert Graham
murderers of
the king.

Walter Stewart
son is slain.

Katherine
Dowglas.

The murtherers enter the kings chamber, and slaue
the king.
The queene is hurt.
Datrike Dunbar wounded and left for dead in the kings defense.
James the first murthe-
red.

1437. Buch.
1447. I. Ma.
1326. Lelle.

His stature and forme of bodie.
Fr. Thin.
Lellous lib. 7.
cap. 271.

ular bodie
uing they
d at,
ma
sing
this opo-
tion

Lesleus lib. 7.
pag. 279.

Strange
lights.
Dogs with heads like to Dogs,
A calfe with a head like a colt.
A blasing star.
A great frost.
Ale and wine sold by the pound weight
A sword scene in the aire.

James the second.
1436

Buchan, 103.

The daughter of the duke of Gelderland married to James the second.

Sir Alexander Leuing-ston governoz.
Sir William
Creichton L. chancelloz..

Disobedience
in the Dowglas.

1437.

A pollicie brought by the queene.

the reuenge thereof, it is reported, that Aeneas Syluius (being then ambassadoz in Scotland for pope Eugenius the fourth to the said king James, considering the cruelnesse of such a wicked fact, with the spedie reuenge, therefore executed by the nobilitie) should say, that he much doubted, whether he ought with greater praise to commend them which reuen-ged the kings death, than by sharper sentence punish those that had committed such parricide.] In the daies of king James the first, sundrie strange and monstrous things chanced in Scotland. At Perth there was a sow that brought forth a litter of pigs with heads like unto dogs. A colt also brought forth a calfe, hauing a head like a colt. In the haruest before the kings death, a blasing star was scene with long streaming beams. And in the winter following, the frost was so belement, that ale and wine were sold by pound weight, and then melted against the fire. A sword was scene gliding vp and downe in the aire, to the no lesse dread than wonder of the people.

James the first made away through the traitorous practise of the earle of Atholl (as before is specified) his eldest sonne James the second of that name being as then but six yeares of age succeeded to the crowne, as lawfull heire to the same, and by his mother and the nobilitie of the realme was brought to Scone, where, by the vniuersall consent of the three estates he was crowned king of Scotland, being the 102 king of that realme from Iferguse the first.
He was surnamed James with the stier face, by reason of a broad red spot which he had in one of his cheekes. This James at his comming to mans state proued a stout prince, and married the daughter of the duke of Gelderland, as after shall appeare. In the beginning he had some trouble and businesse, by reason of the great authoritie and rule which the high barons of the realme sought to beare & mainteine, as the Dowglas, and other, but in the end he subdued them all.

Shortlie after his coronation, because he was not of himselfe able to gouerne, by reason of his tender age; the nobles and estates of the realme chose sir Alexander Leuingston of Calender knight, gover-noz of the king and realme, and sir William Creichton knight was confirmed in his office to inioy the same as he before had done, the king being committed to his keeping, together with the castell of Eden-burgh. Archembald earle of Dowglas remained in his countreies of Dowglas & Annardale, and would neither obeie governoz nor chancelloz, wherby great trouble was raised within the realme. Within a short tyme also, the governoz and chancelloz were diuided. The governoz with the queene remained at Striueling, but the chancelloz had the king still with him in the castell of Edinburgh; and what the one commanded to be done, the other forbade: wherby neither of them was obeyed, nor any execution of iustice put in practise, so that through all the countrie, reiffe, spoiles, and oppression were exercised without feare of punishment. The queene perceiuing such mischief to reigne throughout all parts of the realme, deuised a meane to aduance the gouernozs side, and hereupon with a small companie repaired to Edinburgh, where she to bring hir purpose to passe, did so much by great dissimulation, that she persuaded the chancelloz to suffer hir to enter the castell, and to remaine with the king; but within three daies after, she feigned one morning to go on pilgrimage vnto the White kirke, and caused the king hir sonne to be handsomlie couched in a trunke, as if he had bene some fardell of his apparell, and so packed vp, sent him by one of hir trustie seruants laid vpon a sumpter horste vnto Leth, from whence he was conueied by bote vnto Striueling, where, of the governoz he was isollie receiued, commending the queene highlie for hir politike working, in deceiuing so wise a man as the chancelloz was. Then raised he a great power of his friends and well-wil-lers, and besieged the chancelloz in the castell of Edenburgh.

The bishop perceiuing in what danger he stood through the womans deceit, sent to the earle of Dowglas, desiring his assistance against the queene and governoz. But the earle refusing either to helpe the one or the other, alledging that they were both ouer ambitious in seeking to haue the whole government of the realme in their hands. The chancelloz then perceiuing himselfe destitute of all helpe, made agreement with the governoz, vnder certeine conditions, that he should retaine still the castell of Eden-burgh vnder his possession, and likewise continue still in his office of chancelloz. Shortlie after the earle of Dowglas deceased at Lethelricke, in the yeare 1439, against whom aswell the governoz as chan-celloz had conceiued great hatred. He left behind him a sonne (begot of the earle of Crawford's daughter) named William, a child of fourtene yeares of age, who succeeded his father in the earldome of Dowglas, appearing at the first to be well inclined of nature, but afterwards by euill companie he warded wild and insolent.

About this season, James Stewart sonne to the lord of Lozne, married the queene Dowager, and fauored the earle Dowglas in his vnrulie demean-our: whereupon, both the said James and his brother William, with the queene, were committed to pison in the castell of Striueling by the gouernozs appointment; but shortlie after they were released by the sute of the lord chancelloz, sir William Creichton, and Alexander Seton of Curdon, who became suerties for their good abearing, vnder great forfeiture of sufficient band. About the same time, or rather somewhat before, Alane Stewart lord of Dernlie was slaine at Palmatis thorne, by sir Thomas Boyd. And in the yeare following, the same sir Thomas was slaine by Alexander Stewart of Holmet and his sonnes; where through there rose, great troubles in the west part of Scotland. William earle of Dowglas sent Malcolm Fleming of Cumernald, and Alane of Lodow, vnto Charles the seventh, king of France, to obtaine of him the duchie of Towzaine, which was giuen to Archem-bald Dowglas at the battell of Veruouil in Perth; and the last earle, father to this earle William, had intoied the same all his life time, whereupon that sute was the sooner obtained: which made the young earle more insolent than before.

He kept such a port, and vsed to haue such a traine attending vpon him, speciallie when he came to the court, that it should seme he had the king in small regard; for he thought himselfe safe enough in mainteining the like state and port, or rather greater than euer his father at any time had mainteined before him: insomuch as he would ride with two thousand horste, of the which number there were diuerse errant thieues and robbers, that were bozne out in their vniuersall and wicked practises by the same earle.
Certeine capteins of the Fles, as Lachlane, Spake-laine, and Murdac Wipson, with a wicked number of the inhabitants of the same Fles, haried, spoiled, and burnt the countrie of Lenor, and slue John Colquhoun lord of Lute vnder assurance. They also slue women and childzen, without respect to age or sex. In this yeare chanced a great dearth in Scotland, the like was neuer heard of before, and such a death by pestilence, that few escaped that were taken therewith, and so the realme was plagued with reiffe,

The king
conueied vnto Striueling.

An agreement
made.

The earle of
Dowglas
departeth the life at Lethelricke.

1439.

The queene
imprisoned.

Alane Steward is slaine

The great
port of the earle of Dowglas

Lenor is har-
ried.
John Colquhoun, of Cognaham
slaine.

A dearth.
Pestilence.
reiffe.

Fr. Thin.
Buchan lib. 11.

The king
sent with the chancelloz
to Edinburgh.

The gouernoz and chancel-loz are made friends.

Fr. Thin.
Lesleus lib. 8.
pag. 294.
Buchan lib. 11.

Lenor is har-
ried.
John Colquhoun, of Cognaham
slaine.

A dearth.
Pestilence.
reiffe.

reife, oppression, dearth, and death of people. This reare also the gouernor take the whole administration upon him, wherewith the chancello: was displeased, and leauing the king and him in Striueling, repaired to Edenburgh, where he deuised the way how to recover the king from the gouernor, and so on a morning took foure and twentie men with him and rode to the parke of Striueling where the king was then hunting, and the gouernor absent at Perth.

At what time the chancello: with great courtelie drawing towards the king, did salute him, being in some feare to see such companie come vnto him, hauing so few in his traine. Which when the chancello: perceiued, he praised the king to be of good comfort, and in few words fit for that time, exhorted him that he should looke to himselfe and the kingdome, and deliuer himselfe from the imprisonment of Alexander the gouernor, liuing free from henceforth after a haughe manner; that he should not accustome himselfe to obay the pleasure and courtousnes of others, that he should vse to command his subiects in all iust and lawfull causes; and that he should deliuer his people from those euils which increased vpon them, by the ambition and courtousnesse of the rulers, which he could not now well remedie or resist, except the king would take on him the gouernement, the which to doe, he had without all danger or trouble prouided a meane. For he had in a readinesse sufficient number therefore, which should attend vpon the king where so euer he would go, or to vse any other matter as need should require. Which the king taking with a pleasant countenance either because the matter liked him well, or to dissemble the feare he had of the chancello:, did fullie approue, and went with his small vnarmed companie and the chancello: toward Edenburgh.)

The chancello: as Hector Boetius saith had caused the number of foure thousand hoisemen of his seruants, tenants, and friends, secretly to be readie that morning about the town of Striueling, to resist his aduersaries if they should haue used any force against him: and now vnderstanding of the kings going thus with the chancello:, they came to him on the way, and attending him, brought him safelie and without further trouble vnto Edenburgh, where he was iustfullie receiued. The gouernor when he was aduertised herof, was grieuouslie displeased; but because he knew not how to remedie the matter, he went to Edenburgh, and there got John Junes bishop of Murray, and Henrie Lichon bishop of Aberdene, to labor some agreement betwixt him and the chancello: which they did in this wise: the king to remaine in the keeping of the chancello:, and the gouernor to continue his office. And so by this accord they were made friends.

During which turmoiles, William Dowglas (that with a certeine pride of mind had highlie borne himselfe, disobeying the rule of the gouernor, & disdainning to ioyne in societie of the chancello:) did betwixt the dedlie hatred of them both against him; for which cause they seek by all means vtterlie to take him awaie. For the doing wherof (to the end it might be performed without any tumult) they appoint a parliament to be holden at Edenburgh; whither came not a few (as at other times in such assemblies it alwaies happeneth) but almost the whole countreies came flocking thither, to complaine of the iniuries which they had receiued: of which sort, there was such a miserable shew, that men could not behold the same without great motion of a pitifull mind: when euerie one for himselfe, the father for the children, the children for the fathers, and the widows for their husbands, did complaine that they were by the robbers spoiled of all their substance. Wherevpon (as it happeneth alwaies through pietie of gentle hearts, to rue the afflicted) there arose great enmie against the captiues and leaders of the wicked doers of such spoile, whose euils were now growne to such excessse, as by no means they might be suffered; whose factions were so largelie spread ouer the realme, that none could defend their life or liuehood: but such as did yeld themselves to their actions, and whose riches were so increased, as the weak could not well find any helpe (in the authoritie of the magistrate) against their violence.

Wherevpon it liked the wisest sort (since their force seemed not almost able to be broken, or their parts to be seuered) to sit to policie and leaue strength, not daring openlie to call the earle Dowglas by that name of captiue of them, although they well knew him to be the chiefe author and santon of those people. Wherefore the gouernor and the chancello: (for a time dissembling the hatred which they harboured against Dowglas) persuaded the whole parliament, that it were more conuenient with faire speeches to pacifie Dowglas, than with shew of suspicious and euill words to stirre him to further heat: especiallie considering that he was of that great wealth and power, that he alone, if he stood against them, might binder all the decrees of the parliament: but if hee ioynd with the nobilitie, there might be easie remedie found to salue all these present euils. Through which wise and subtil persuasion of Alexander the gouernour, it was decreed amongst them, that there should be honourable letters directed to him in the common & speciall name of all the nobilitie, which should admonish him, that being mindfull of the honorable place which he possessed (and of his worthie ancestors, by whom the common-wealth of Scotland had receiued many singular benefites) hee should repaire to the parliament, which well could not, and willinglie would not, either keepe or determine any thing in the same without his presence. In which assemble, if hee would complaine of any wrongs or griefes offered vnto him, hee should be satisfied so fullie as they might lawfullie.

And if he or any of his friends or familie had committed any disordered part, the nobilitie there met would fullie remit the same, as well for the nobilitie of his, and the worthie memorie of the deeds done by his ancestors; as for that they rather attributed such actions to the iniurie of the times, and the frailtie of his age, and the persuasion of others, than vnto him, of whome there was conceiued a singular hope of great towardnesse, for the advancement of his name and benefit of his countreie. Therefore if he would come and ioyne with them, he should receiue in gouernement what part, place, and office of the common-wealth pleased him, to the end that as in times past, their countreie had bene manie waies deliuered out of most heauie dangers by the hand of the Dowglases, so at this present, the same might also by his presence and furtherance, be againe advanced and strengthened from and against those intestine euils wherewithall it now fainted. The young man (by nature and age greedy of glorie) being moued with these flatteries, and the other persuasions of his friends (whereof euerie one was blinded with a certeine hope of good to happen to himselfe) they now deemed it best (forgetting all former dangers) to thinke vpon their private commodities, and with that resolution took their iourne to come to the parliament.

The chancello: when he vnderstood they were on their way, rode south of Edenburgh manie miles to meet the Dowglas, and courteously invited the earle to his castell of Creichton, which laie in his waie as he should ride, at which place he was most honourable intertained by the chancelloz. Where, when they had remained two daies, the chancelloz (after hee had shewed manie tokens of a friendlie mind vnto him) bicause he would vtterlie banish from the earle all suspicion of him, that he had any mislike in the said earle) began familiarlie to persuade him, that (remembzring the kings dignitie, and the office of him whome the lot of inheritance, thei countrie lawes, and the consent of the parliament had aduanced to the gouernement and administration of all things) he should in all humilitie acknowledge him for his chiefe lord and king; that he would permit the large patrimonie obtained by the blood of his ancestors to descend to posteritie by lineall inheritance as he himselfe receiued it; that he would clearelie deliuer the name and familie of the Dowglasses (no lesse famous for their dutie, than their deeds) not onelie from the filthie spot of treason, but also from all note of suspicion thereof; that he would refraine himselfe and his from offering iniuries to the weake and common people; that he would remoue from him all such as were giuen to robberie and spoile; that he would from henceforth applie himselfe to the defense of iustice, to the end that his former offenses (if there were any) might rather be attributed to euill counsell of the wicked, than to the naturall disposition of himselfe: for so the repentance of his yong yeeres might be taken for prooue of his innocencie in such evils. With these and such like speeches, declaring the faith of a well-willing mind, he allured the earle to come to Edinburgh with David his brother partaker of all his counsels and actions.

This faire tale of the chancelloz, more than in times past or then besemed the place which he possessed, with the manie messengers sent to him from Alexander the gouernoz (to meet him on the way) almost euerie houre, draue a deepe suspicion in the heads of the earles companie riding with him to Edinburgh, of some trecherie to be ment towards him. Whereupon the same began to be blundered from one to another of the traine, and came so fast to the friends of Dowglasse, that some of them did boldlie and liberallie admonish him, that he should remaine in that purpose (which once he did) to staie, to returne, and not to go forward with the chancelloz: and at the least (if he would aduenture himselfe) to send home his brother David, to the end that hee might not hazard the whole familie vnder the fortune of one stroke, as his father had before admonished him when he died. Whereat the vnadvised youth of this man, being moued to anger against his friends, did by the voices of some of his men (as it were by one that should make proclamation therfore) pacifie the secret murmurings that were amongst the companie; and answered such of his friends as found fault therewith, that he sufficientlie knew, that it was the common plague of all great families, alwaies to haue such men about them, as being impatient of quiet and ease, respect not the danger and miserie of their patrons, so it maie be commoditie vnto them: who bicause (they would not be restrained within the bounds of peacefull lawes) are authors of sedition, in which (when all things are in turmoile) they may the better wander abroad to satisfie their euill humors: whose speeches hee regarded not, since hee rather respected and trusted the approued wisdom of the chancelloz and the gouernoz, than the slouthfull & rash minds of such seditious persons.

After which (to cut awaie occasion from the rest to answer) he set spurres to his horse, and hastned his iourneie more than he did before, with his brother and a few of his other friends, taking his right course into the castell, and (as it were by a certaine destinie) casting himselfe he dloug into the snarcs of his enemies. At such time as he came to the castell, the gouernoz (according to his promise) was ready there to meet him, to the end the matter might come to be wrought by common consent, and the weight of so great enuie might not light vpon the head of one man. Dowglasse being honorable and friendlie by the gouernoz receiued into the castell, was for dinner placed at the kings table. But in the midst of this sweet meat (sower saluice being prepared) there was a bulles head set before him, which in those daies was a signe of death. Wherewith the yong man amazed (and greatlie troubled in his mind, inwardlie repenting that he followed not the aduise of his followers) was about to rise from the table: but being apprehended by armed men (appointed to that function) he was caried into the court next to the castell, and was there (in reuenge and punishment of his vnbrideled youth) beheaded, with his brother David, and Malcolme Fleming, who (next vnto his brother) was in greatest credit with him. Whose death the king now entring into his adolescencie or yeeres (as we tearme it) of discretion, is said heauilie with teares to lament, which the chancelloz (griuing to see) did greatlie rebuke in the king such vntimelie and inordinate mourning, for the death of his and the common-wealths enimie, whose life (said hee) would haue taken awaie all peace and tranquillitie in the realme.)

After the death of the said earle, the state of the realme became more quiet: for his vnkle James Dowglasse baron of Abircorne that succeeded him, being a man of great stature, and verie fat, gaue himselfe to quietnesse, and liued but thre yeeres after. The foresaid William had but one sister, that was called the faire maiden of Galloway, and was married to one William Dowglasse, sonne to this earle James before his decesse, that the heritage should not be diuided: bicause the earledome of Dowglasse was intailed vpon the heires male, and the lands of Wigton, Saluanie, Annardale, and Dymont remained to hir as heire generall. This earle William, after the decesse of his father earle James, began to war vnrulie, and to follow the vntoward maners of the other William Dowglasse lastlie beheaded (as before ye haue heard) so that by support manie disobedient persons would not obeie the gouernoz and chancelloz, wher vpon sundrie great slaughters and oppressions were committed.

* Againe (by the marriage of this earle William with his rich kinswoman) he did (besides his vnrulie behaviour) aduance himselfe in pride, wherof grew secret enuie, and of that rose open malice: but he in countering sufficientlie with them, partlie by force, & partlie by subtiltie, mainteined his people in those oppressions and robberies, in despite of the proudest: which occasioned the nobilitie to iudge, that the said earle was priuie of their misdemeanor. Amongest which euill disposed companie, there was one John Gormacke of Atholl, who (when he had infected all the countrie about him with this miserable plague of robberie) did set vpon William Ruwen (thristie of Perth, and had almost killed him) because he had led a theefe of Atholl to execution. But at the length (true men being alwaies better than theues) the thristie recovered the battell, and killed the capteine Gormacke, with thirtie of his companie, and put the rest to flight into the mounteins.

In the yeere 1443, not manie daies after, the castell of Dunbreton (which is not by strength to be subdued) was twise taken within a few daies: for Robert Sempler that was capteine of the castell, 1444.

The king wil
rule himselfe.

1445. Lesle.

Fr. Thin

Buchanan,
lib. 11.

1443.

well, and Patrike Galbith captaine of the higher castell, did so diuide their gouernement of the said castell (being a thing of great circuit) that euerie one had a peculiar and seuered entrance into his owne part without offense of the other. But yet these two (as most part of the realme of Scotland then was, and as it alwaies, or most commonlie happeneth in the minoritie of the prince, when euerie one will be a king) wanted not their factions, whome they did follow: for Patrike was secretlie thought to fauour Dowglass, for which cause Semplier, or (as some haue Simplicie) the other captaine perceiuing the part of the castell wherein Patrike ruled to be more negligent¹⁰ kept, than due to the state of the time required, found opportunitie to expell Patrike from thence, and to cause all his furniture to be caried out of the same, conuerting the said castell to his owne vse. In the end (the next day after) Patrike vnderstanding thereof, and coming with foure vnarmed persons (to fetch awaie his furniture and household stuffe) entered into the castell; and first finding the porter alone, turned him awaie, then taking armor, expelled the others out of the higher castell: after which, calling aid out of the towne next adioining, he shut them also out of the inferior castell, and got possession of the whole castell to himselfe.) 1444.

The king sent him himselfe.

The king, after he came to the age of fouretene yeres, would not anie longer be vnder the gouernement of others, but took the rule vpon himselfe. The earle of Dowglass informed thereof, came to him at Striueling, and put himselfe and all he had to remaine at his pleasure: wherevpon the king receiued him, pardoned all his passed misdemeanors, and admitted him to be one of his speciall friends and priuie counsellors in all his affaires. By his perswasion shortly after, sir Alexander Leuingson, & William Creighton being discharged of their offices, were also put off from the counsell, and all their friends banished the court, and they themselues were summoned to appeere before the king: which because they refused to do, they were proclaimed rebels, and put to the horne. The earle Dowglass then for the old grudge he bare them, raised an armie, and harried their lands. In reuenge wherof, sir William Creighton spoiled the earle of Dowglass his lands, so that great trouble was raised through the whole countrie, and the lands of Strabroke, Abircorne, & the towne of Blackneth were burnt and destroyed.

1445. Lelle.

The earle of Dowglass ruled wholie about the king, & made Archembald his brother earle of Murray, by ioining him in marriage with a ladie of the house of Dunbar inheretrix therof. Porouer, Hugh Dowglass was made earle of Dymont. Thus the earle of Dowglass aduanced his name, and ioined in friendship with the earle of Crawford, with Donald earle of the Isles, and with the earle of Ross. To the end that ech of them should be assistant to others. In this meane time, the earle of Crawford at the request of the earle of Dowglas, took a great preie of goods out of the bishop of S. Andrews lands in Fife, which bishop was called James Benedie, sisters son to king James the first: where through the earle of Crawford on the one part, and the earle of Huntlie with the Ogilvies on the other, met at Arborth in set battell, where the earle of Crawford was slaine, and diuerse barons on his side, although the victorie and field remained with his sonne, the maister of Crawford, who succeeded his father, and was called earle Weirdie. On the earle of Huntlies side were slaine, John Forbes of Petsteege, Alexander Berkleie of Gartulie, Robert Martwell of Teline, William Gurdun of Burroisfield, sir John Oliphant of Aberdage, and fine hundred more on their side, and one hundred of the victors were also slaine, as Hector Boetius saith.

The same writer reporteth that the occasion of this battell did chance, through the variance that fell out betwixt the earle of Crawford eldest sonne Alexander Lindseie, and Alexander Ogilvie or Ogilvie (as some write him) about the office of the bailiffewike of Arborth, the which the maister of Crawford inueng, was displaced and put out by the said Ogilvie. Wherevpon the maister of Crawford, to recouer his right (as he took it) got a power together with helpe of the Hamiltons, and with the same seized vpon the abbete, and Ogilvie with helpe of the earle of Huntlie, came thither with an armie to recouer the place againe out of his aduersaries hands, and so vpon knowledge hereof giuen vnto the earle of Crawford, he himselfe coming from Dundee vnto Arborth, at the verie instant when the battells were ready to iaine, caused first his sonne to staie; and after calling forth sir Alexander Ogilvie to talke with him, in purpose to haue made peace betwixt him and his sonne, was thrust into the mouth with a speare, by a common souldier that knew nothing what his demerment, so that he fell downe therewith, and presently died in the place: wherevpon together the parties went incontinentlie without more protracting of time, and so fought with such successe, as before ye haue heard. The earle of Huntlie escaped by flight: but Alexander Ogilvie being taken and sore wounded, was led to the castell of Fineluin, where shortly after he died of his hurts. This battell was fought the 24 of Januarie, in the yere of our Lord 1445.

* The king thus ruled by the trope of the Dowglasses, the earle Dowglass sent to sir William Creighton knight, to deliuer by the castell of Edinburgh. But Creighton (saing that the castell was committed to his gouernement by the whole realme, and that the king had not anie thing to do therewith vntill he came to his full age) had all his goods shortly confiscated to the kings vse, with his castell of Creighton, which the kings people entered into and possessed. But least they should seeme to offer anie manifest wrong to the said Creighton, they gaue out the same edict (as a veile of their malice and enuie) which Creighton had before caused to be established and proclaimed. For he first of all others made a law, that whosoener did denie or resist the king, demanding the deliuerie of anie castell, should be in danger of treason: the breach and execution of which law did first come and fall by and vpon him, by whome that might be worthilie said (which is vsed to be spoken in common prouerbe) He is fallen into the snare which he prepared for others. Wherevpon the Dowglass (since the castell would not otherwise be deliuered) harpeltie besieged the same by the space of nine moneths, which in the end Creighton surrendered into his hands, on certeine conditions to be performed. At which time also the said Creighton was reiuued with the honor of the chancellorschip, although he neuer after intangled himselfe with affaires of the kingdome, hoping that in time to come (when the darke clouds of the wicked men, which had now ouerspread all things, were overblown) a better forme of gouernement would be brought in, as a certeine light to giue shine to the common-wealth.

James Steward a worthie knight (not he that was surnamed The blacke) was slaine at Birkepartrike, two miles from Dunbreton, by Alexander Lillie, and Robert Boid, whose crueltie not being satisfied with his bloud, they laboured to bring his wife (great with child, & vpon point of deliuerance) with in their danger. For the performance whereof, they sent a priest vnto hir, that (in haste and as it were troubled) should tell hir in what distress the now re-

Fr. Thin.

1445. I. Ma.
1446. Lelle.
Buchanan.
lib. 11.
Lellous lib. 8.
pag. 279.

1446. Lelle.

Buchan. lib. 11.

sted, and that there was no meanes to relieue hir selfe by anie waie (since euerie place was beset with horse and footmen) vnlesse she escaped by boote to Robert Boid at Dunbretton, who further vpon oth promised hir, that he would safelie bring hir backe to hir owne house.

The woman being credulous (and ignorant that Robert Boid was present at the death of hir husband) and caried out of Cardrossie, into the Dunbretton castell, might easilie perceiue hir selfe hardlie beset on euerie side by the deceipt of hir enemies, who (being so deceiued and overcome with feare & griefe) was deliuered of child befoze hir time, and (together with hir sonne) died there within few houres after. Almost at the same time, Patrike Hepburne (gouernour of Hales) held the castell of Dunbar, where he had Jane Seimer the quene with him, to whome she fled for succour in the times of these tumults. Archibald Dunbar (supposing this to be a iust cause of anger) in the night did set vpon Hales the castell of Hepburne, which he toke at the first assault, by slea-10 sing of the watch, who being stroken with a great feare for the same, did (in few daies after) restore the same to earle Dowglaste, with couenant that all they which were within, should depart in safetie without anie danger.)

Sir James Steward surnamed the Blacke knight, husband to the quene the kings mother, was banished the realme for speaking words against the mis-30 gouernement of the king and realme, therewith he offended the earle of Dowglaste. As he passed the seas towards Flanders, he was taken by the Flemings, & shortly after departed this life. The quene his wife being aduertised of his death, died also with-40 in a while after, and was buried in the Charterhouse of Perth the fifteenth of Iulie, in the yeere 1446. Her name was Jane Summerset, daughter to the earle of Summerset. James the first married hir (as befoze ye may read) in England. She had by him eight chil-50 dren, two sonnes, and six daughters, which were all honorable mariages: the first named Margaret, to the Dolphin of France: the second Cleane, to the duke of Britaine: the third, to the lord of Terner in Ze-land: the fourth, to the duke of Austria: the fift, to the earle of Huntley: and the sirt, to the earle of Morton. And by James Steward hir second husband, she had three sonnes: John earle of Atholl, James earle of Buchanane, and Andrew bishop of Murray.

After the death of the quene, Hepburne deliuered the castell of Dunbar (to the king) being emptie, and without companie. In August, Alexander earle of Crawford did put to death at Toadune John Leon-50 ton, as an ingratefull person to him, since by his fathers helpe he had bene advanced to great riches, and to the kings affinitie and kindred. Some after, Sir William Creichton, with the bishop of Dunkeld, and Nicholas Aberburne a canon of Glascow, were sent in ambassage vnto the duke of Gelder-60 land, for his daughter called Marie, to be ioined in marriage with king James. Their sute was obtained, and the ladie sent into Scotland noblie accompanied with diuerse lords both spirituall and temporall. At hir arrivall she was receiued by the king with great triumph, and the marriage solemnized by the assistance of all the nobles of Scotland, with great banquetting, ioyfull mirth, and all pleasant intertainment of those strangers that might be.

In the yeere 1447, there was a parlement holden at Edenburgh, in the which Sir Alexander Levingston of Balenbar late gouernour, James Dundas and Robert Dundas knights, at the pursute of the earle of Dowglaste were forsaken and condemned to perpetuall prison in Dunbretton, and James Leningston his eldest sonne, Robert Levingston treasuro, and David Levingston knights, lost their heads. James befoze his execution made a verie 10 wise declaration to the standers by, declaring the in-stabilitie of fortune, and change of court, exhorting all persons to beware thereof, with enuie euer followed high estate, and wicked malice neuer suffered good men to gouerne long. In the same parlement, Sir William Creichton was also forsaken for diuerse causes, but principallie for that his seruants would not deliuer the house of Creichton to the kings he-rals, who charged them so to do. This forsalture was concluded in parlement by vertue of an act which the said William (when he was chancelor) caused to be made, and so being the first inuentor, was also the first against whome it was practised.

The yere next insuing were sundrie incursions made betwixt Scots and Englishmen on the borders, Dunfreis was burnt, and likewise Anwik in England: but shortly after a truce was concluded for seven yeres, great offers of friendship made by the Englishmen for to haue the wars cease on that side, because the warre betwixt them and France was verie hotlie pursued, and ciuill dissention disquieted the state of England, which was raised betwixt the two houses of Lancaster & Yorke. This yere there were manie meetings or parlements of the nobilitie, in which were lawes established for byideling the wicked facts of such as applied themselves to spoiling of other men; whereupon a long peace followed in Scotland: beside which, there were other lawes made for auoiding of treasons, and chieflie of such as touched the kinglie maiestie. This lawe of treason was afterward executed first vpon Dowglaste, which was author thereof. In this parlement were manie earles and lords created, thereof the chiefe were Alexander Seton baron of Gordon, who was made earle of Huntley, and George Leslie baron was made earle of Rothsaie, both men singularlie famed for their wisdome and valure.)

The English borderers of the west marches set-40 ched a great botie of cattell out of Scotland, notwithstanding the truce, in reuenge wherof the Scots inuaing England, waiked the countrie, burnt townes and villages, slue the people, & with a great preie of prisoners, goods, and cattell, returned home into Scotland. Wherewith followed dailie rodes and forraies made on both sides betwixt the Scots and Englishmen, and that with such rage and crueltie, that a great part of Cumberland was in manner laied wast: for on that side the Scots chieflie made their inuasions, because that from thence the first oc-50 casion of all this mischief might seme to haue had the beginning. When such things were certified to the king of Englands counsell, an armie was appointed forthwith to inuaide Scotland, vnder the leading of the earle of Northumberland, and of one Magnus surnamed Redberd, a capteine of great experience, as he that had bene trained by from his youth in the warres of France. The Scots, because 60 of his long red berd, called him in scoyne and derison, Magnus with the red mane.

The Scots hearing of the approach of this armie towards their borders, leuied a power: George, or rather Hugh Dowglaste earle of Dymont by the kings commission, hauing the conduction thereof, who vnderstanding that the enemies would enter into Annardale, drew thither with the said armie to resist their attempts. The Englishmen passing ouer the riuer of Sulweie and Annand, came to another riuer called Sarr, & there pitched downe their tents.
And on the next day they began to rob and spoile the countrie on ech side: but aduertised that the Scots were at hand with an armie, they that were thus gone forth, were with all speed called backe to the campe

James Leuington made an oration.

W. Creichton
condemned.

Incursions
made.
1448.

Fr. Thin.
Lectus lib. 2,
pag. 300.

1446.

Englishmen
fetch booties out of Scot-
land.
1450.

The Scots
inuaide Eng-
land.

A knight named Magnus

The earle of Dymont generall of the Scottish armie

The English
armie inuadeh Scot-
land.

Sir John
Dymont

Wallace of Craigie.

The earle
Dymont
hosted by armie.

The batt-
began.

Magnus
name.

The
men put flight.

The
name.

Eden-
burgh.

Buchan, lib. 11.

James Steward is banished the realme.

He died.
The quene
died.

1446.

Fr. Thin.

1448. Lecte.

King James
married a daughter of the duke of Gelderland.

1447.
1448. Lecte.

campe by found of trumpet, and forthwith their armie was brought into order of battell. Magnus with the red mane was appointed to lead the right wing, and sir John Penneinton a verie skilfull warriour governed the left wing, in the which the Welshmen were placed. The battell of middle ward the earle of Northumberland himselfe ruled.

The earle of Dymont on the other side ordered his battels in this wise. He appointed a verie valiant knight called Wallase of Craggie, with an hardie number of souldiers to encounter with Magnus. And against the Welshmen he placed the lord Sparwell, and lord Johnstoun, with a chosen companie of lustie Scottishmen, and commanding himselfe in the battell of middle ward, had farse set his people in a raie, when the trumpets in the English armie began to sound to the battell. He therefore exhorting his men to doe valiantlie, put them in remembrance that they had put on armor, being thereto prouoked by iniurie which their enemies had first offered them, whereupon they might conceiue good hope of victorie by the fauour of the righteous God, who giueth the vpper hand (for the most part) to that side that hath iust cause to make warre. He willed them then to put all feare out of their harts; and as they had force enough to vanquish their enemies that came thus to brag and threaten them with viter destruction: so he besought them to shew no lesse manlike stomachs to deliuer their countrie by hardie fight from iniurie of the same enemies.

He had no sooner made an end of his speech, but that the arrows came so thicke from the English archers, that the Scots began to looke about them, as it were to see which waie they might best escape by flight. But Wallase perceiuing their faintnesse of courage, with loud voice repproued their cowardise, and with most pithe words exhorted them to remember their duties, and to follow the example of him their leader, whome they should perceiue to haue fullie botowed to spend his life in defense of his countrie. The Scots heerewith seemed to be so encouraged, that they rushed forward with great egerneesse vpon the right wing of the Englishmen where Magnus stood, and so laied about them with speares, axes, and such like hand weapons, that with great slaughter they brake the Englishmen to breake a raie and to flee: Magnus heerewith being more chafed than afraid, as should appere, pressed forward vpon Wallase with great violence, and seeking to approach vnto him that he might haue broken his grieve vpon him, was inclosed among the Scottish troopes, and slaine with a few other of his friends and seruants that followed him.

The slaughter of this man, in whome consisted no small hope of victorie on the English part, put the residue of their armie in such feare, that they were not able longer to resist the Scottishmens violent impression, but turning their backs fled amaine, whom the Scots pursued in chace verie fiercelie, so that manie of the Englishmen died in the battell, but more now in the chace: for the tide being come in, staid manie of them that made their course to haue escaped thorough the riuer, whereby diuerse that ventured into the water were drowned; & other that durst not take the water, were oppressed by the Scots that followed them. There died in this battell of Englishmen, to the number nere hand of three thousand, and amongst other, Magnus (as before ye haue heard) with eleuen other knights of no small account and estimation. Of Scots were lost somewhat about six hundred. There were taken prisoners of Englishmen sir John Penneinton, and sir Robert Hartington knights, and the lord Perrie, sonne to the earle of Northumberland, who helpe his father to pay backe, whereby he escaped by flight: & besidethis, a great number of other were by the Scots taken prisoners, whome the sword and water had spared.

The earle of Dymont having got this honorable victorie, conueied the chiefest of the prisoners to the castle of Lochmaben, and after repaired to the court, where he was of the king iustlie receiued, honorable feasted, and highlie rewarded: After this, the Scots that dwelled vpon the borders, liued for a season in better quiet: for though the Englishmen wished to haue bene reuenged for this losse and ouerthrow of their people, yet by reason of ciuill wars that shortly after followed, they were constrained to forbear to make anie further wars against the Scots, till better occasion might serue. And for the auoiding of danger that might insue in time of this intestine trouble by forren enemies; they sued to haue a truce with the Scots, which for the terme of three yeares was granted. In this yeare, William earle of Dowglas, with a great companie of nobles and gentlemen, as the lords Hamilton, Grate, Salton, Seiton, and Elphinstoun; also, Calder, Argyll, Cambell, Fraser, and Lauder, knights, went into Italie, and was at Rome in time of the Jubile which was kept there that yeare. He left behind him to gouerne his lands in Scotland, Hugh earle of Dymont that was his brother: but in his absence (by counsell of such as were about him) the king, summoned the erle to appeare before him within 40 daies; & because he came not within that set time, he was put to the horne, & his lands invaded & spoiled.

Whereupon the king sent William Sentclaire earle of Orkades at that time chancelor first into Galloway, and then into Dowglas; where he appointed collectors to take vp (to the kings vie) the revenues of the Dowglas. But when Sentclaire was not of sufficient strength to performe what he thought, because some of the most part refused (though others embraced) him, he returned home without doing anie thing. Wherevnto the king greatlie moued (because he saw his authoritie contemned) called all the Dowglases vnto law, and declared them publicke enemies and detractors of his gouernement. And therevpon (providing an armie against them) he goeth into Galloway; where at their first coming (since their captains were all in prison) a small part of the armie (seeing the enemies dispersed) fled to rougher parts of the countrie to hide themselves: turned backe to the king without anie thing done. Whereat the king highlie offended, in that such transgreding theues should so lightlie dare to contemne his power, followed them into their starting holes and caues, and with no great labor, took the castle of Lochmaben, reducing the countrie of Dowglas (with extreme labor of his souldiers) to his subiection, at what time he leuelled the castle thereof equall with the ground.

The earle advertised hereof, with all speed returned home through England; and sent his brother James vnto the king, to know his pleasure: who commanding the earle to see his countries (namelie Angusdale) purged of theues and robbers, pardoned him of all offences, and receiued him into fauor againe, so that he was also at some time proclaimed the kings lieutenant; but shortly after going into England without the kings licence, to common with the king of England about the recovery of losses suffered by the Englishmen by certene inuasions (as he alleged) the king took the matter in verie ill part, for that he should thus be so to be had in contempt of the king: and to that he mistruied also, least there were some secret practises in hand to the prejudice of him, and his realme: so that he deemed not a little to be the earle, who being thereof advertised, came

The earle of Northumberland escaped by flight.

1448. Buch. 1450. Less. A truce for three yeares betwene England and Scotland.

The earle of Dowglas goeth into Italie.

Fr. Thia. Buchanan. The earle of Dowglas goeth into Italie.

The earle of Dowglas goeth into England without licence of the king of Scots.

Sir John Penneinton.

Wallase of Craggie.

The earle of Dymont exhorteth his armie.

The battell is begun.

Magnus is slaine.

The Englishmen put to flight.

The number slain.

Prisoners taken.

3. Ke. On made mon.

reichon mmed.

48.

in. lib. 2.

46.

Englishmen duties Scot.

50.

Scots & Eng.

ght na Magnus

earle of ont ge of the ish armie

English Scot-

The earle of
Dowglas
suech for pardon.

came in humble wise to the king, & besought him of pardon, if he had in ante wisse offended him, assuring him that from thenceforth, he would neuer commit ante act that might tend to his maiesties displeasure.

The enuie thole that bare rule about the king.

Herewith the quene also and other noble men made sute to the king for the earles pardon, so that in the end he was receiued againe into fauor, but yet discharged of bearing ante publike office, which pinched him so sore (namelie for that his aduersaries William Cheynton lord chancelor, and the earle of Mearne seemed to beare all the rule about the king) that he sought to dispatch the chancelor, procuring certeine of his seruants and friends to assault him on a morning, as he was comming forth of Edinburgh, but yet he escaped to his castell of Cheynton, although wounded in ded right sore, and with in few daies after, gathering a power of his kinsmen, friends, & allies, he returned againe to Edinburgh, and had destroyed (as was thought) the earle of Dowglas at that present, if he had not shifted away the more speedlie, who being thus to his great greife, and no small dishonor chased out of Edinburgh, devised which way he might best be reuenged; and for the more easie accomplishment of his purpose, he procured the earles of Crawford and Ross to ioyne with him in that quarrell against Cheynton and other his complices, by force of which confederacie they covenanted to assist one another against the malice of the said Cheynton, and all other their aduersaries.

The seeketh to destroie the
L. chancelor.

The Dow-
glas constrained to flee out of Edinburgh.
He maketh a part.

The earle of Dowglas having concluded this bond of confederacie, bare himselfe verte high, in presuming further thereof than stood with reason: and this was one great cause of the kings displeasure now pasingly increased against the said earle. An other cause was this: a sort of theues and robbers brake into the lands of the lord John Herres, a noble man, and one that had continued ever faithfull to the king, taking with them out of the same lands a great boord of cattell. And whereas the said lord Herres complained unto the earle of Dowglas of that wrong, because the offenders were inhabiting within his come; and yet could haue no redresse; he attempted to fetch out of Annandale some prey, wherewith to satisfie in part the wrong which had bene offered him by those thimners and robbers. But such was his euill hap; that taken he was with his retinue, and committed to prison; and shortly after by commandment of the earle of Dowglas he was hanged as a felon, notwithstanding that the king by an herald commanded the contrarie.

The Lord
Herres hanged.

The king being sore offended herewith (as he had no lesse cause) passed over his displeasure with silence; till he saw time and opportunitie to reuenge the same: but in the meane season marie an honest man bought the bargain right deuile, being spoiled of that he had, and other wise well intreated, and yet durst not the meane sort once complaine for feare of further indignite: where the higher powers also forelamented the great disorders daily increasing, and yet were not able in anie wise to reuenge the same, inso much as it was greatly doubted, least the earle of Dowglas, Crawford, Ross, Mearne, and other of that faction might put the king before his seat. Which doubt being put into the kings head, by doing him into no small perplexitie, wherupon by courteous messages he sent for the earle of Dowglas, willing him to departe to his place, forourning then in Strueling castell, which he refused to do, till he had assurance vnder the kings great seale for his safe coming and going. And thus he came to the court at Strueling, where the king

The confeder-acie mistrasted.

The king sent deth for the earle of Dow-
glas.

toke him aside, & in secret talke moued and requested him to forsake the league and bond of friendship betwixt him and the earle of Crawford, and other such his confederats.

There was a secret murmuring amongst a number, that this earle of Dowglas purposed to make a pwoe on a day to get the garland beside the kings head. In ded by reason of his kinsmen and allies, he was of more puissance in the realme, than (as it was thought) stood with the suertie of the kings estate, vntill he were the more faithfull. He had at the same time two brethren that were also earles, as Archemald earle of Murray, and Hugh, or (as other haue) George earle of Dymont, beside the earle of Angus, and the earle of Morstoun, that were of his surname and blood, with a great number of other lords, knights, and men of great possessions and linings, all of the same surname, and lincked in friendship and alliance with other the chiefest linages of all the realme. Hereto (by reason there had bene so manie valiant men and worthy captiues of the Dowglases one after another, as it had bene by succession) the people and commons of Scotland bare such good will and fauour towards that name, that they were readie to ride and go with them, they cared not whither, nor against whome. It is said, that the earles of Dowglases might haue raised thirtie or forty thousand warlike persons readie at their commandement, whensoever it had pleased them to call. In ded the Dowglases had enen the gouernement of all matters pertaining vnto the defense of the realme, so that the men of war had them still in all the estimation and honor that might be.

But now to the purpose, touching the conference had betwixt king James the second, and the earle of Dowglas: it chanced in the end (vpon that occasion I know not) that the earle answered the king somewhat ouerthwartlie, wherewith the king toke such indignation, that the earle hereupon was slaine by him, and such other as were there about him, on Shous euen. Then after the earle was thus made awaie, his brethren made open warre against the king, and slue all such of his friends and seruants, as they might incounter with: insomuch that those which travelled by the high waies, were in doubt to confesse whether they belonged to the king, or to the Dowglases. The Lord of Cadzow being in the toterne of Strueling, with a great companie of the earle of Dowglases friends, in reuenge of his death the continentlie burnt that toterne, and did mane other great displeasures to the king and his subiects, setting forth proclamations against the king and his counsell, for the violatng of the assurance granted (as before is said) to the earle of Dowglas.

And that with such despite, as in the 6 kalends of Aprill, binding a wooden truncheon to an horse talle, they fasten thereto the safe conuol of the king and the nobles, which they forbore not to traile vp and downe the streets (not sparing to reuile the king) with bitter and heauie words of contumelie and exclamation. With which not satisfied, when they were come into the market place, they did with the noise of fine huihozed hornes, and by the mouth of a crier, proclame the king and all such as were about him, faithbreakers, perjurors, and such persons as were to be denounced enemies of all godnesse and good men. And yet supposing this not a sufficient reuenge to quench the furie of their rebellious minds, they run with like rage, and with like order do spoile the countreys & possessions of all such as took part with the king, and did still remaine in the execution of their obediēt dutie. For they besieged the castell of Dalkeith, binding the nobles (as consured and periares enemies of all vertue) not to depart from thence,

Carles of the surname of the Dowglases.

The linage
and great alliance of the Dowglases.

The tone that the people
bare toward the name of the Dowglases.

The earle of Dowglas an-swereth the king over-thwartlie, and is slaine.

1442. Buch.
His brethren
make warre
against the king.

Strueling
is burnt.

Fr. Thin.
Buchan. li. ii.

The king
would haue
him.

Collare of Bannanwin
betrath the rit of Crawford.

The earle of Huntlie
indogert.

1452.

Lands giuen
to the earle of Huntlie.

The earle of Murray.

The earle of Crawford
poised.

Lords cited to appeare.

Writings set up in contempt of the king.

thence before they had taken and spoiled the same, being grievously offended with John the lord of that place, because that he with the earle of Angus had severed themselves from the opinion and faction of the Douglasse, whose furie growing still to extremitie, found such support by the inclining multitude that the king was put to his shifts that he was determined to have left the realme, and to have fled by sea into France, had not James benedic the bishop of saint Andrews caused him to staie, on the hope he had of assistance onelie by the earle of Huntley, which earle hearing that the Douglasse had gathered an armie in the south against the king, raised an other armie in the north to aid the king.

On the other side the earle of Crawford, having assembled a great power, encountered him at Bietthune, in purpose to stop the earle of Huntleys passage, where betwixt them was fought a fore battell, and the earle of Crawford chased into Finlwin, so that manie noble men, gentlemen, and commons were slaine, and amongst other the earle of Crawford's brother was one. Hector Boetius writeth, that John Cullace of Bannanwin, whome the earle of Crawford had appointed to lead them that bare the battell ayes, or (as I maie terme them) the bilmen, in the left wing of his armie, fled of purpose in the hottest of the fight, so left the middle ward naked on the one side of the chiefest aid that the said earle had, and so the victorie by that meanes onelie inclined to the kings standard, which the earle of Huntley had there with him. But howsoever it was, the said erle of Huntley had the honor of the field, who neuertheless lost diuerse of his men also, though nothing so manie as his aduersaries did. This battell was fought the eighteenth of Maie, being the Ascension day, 1452.

